The Messenger of God summoned Ḥāṭib and said, "Ḥāṭib, what made you do this?" He said: "Messenger of God, by God, I am a believer in God and His Messenger. I have not changed or altered. But I was a man with no roots or clan among the people, while I had family and children among them.[695] And so I did them this favor for their sake." 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb said, "Messenger of God, let me cut off his head, for the man has played the hypocrite." The Messenger of God said: "How do you know, 'Umar? Perhaps God looked down on those who were at Badr[696] on the day of the battle and said, 'Do what you will, for I have forgiven you.'" Concerning Ḥāṭib, God revealed: "O believers, take not My enemy and your

694. If the reading al-Ḥulayfah is correct (and is the same place as the well-known Dhū al-Ḥulayfah), she was overtaken about six miles from Medina. Ibn Hishām reads al-Khalīqah, which is 12 miles from Medina (cf. al-Samhūdī, Khulāṣat al-wafā', 542, 546). The identification of the place as belonging to "Ibn Abī Aḥmad" renders both identifications doubtful.

695. I.e., the Meccans.

696. For the presence of Ḥāṭib at the Battle of Badr, see W, I, 140, 154; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 314.

enemy for friends"—to the words, "to Thee we turn," and the end of the story.[697]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Muslim al-Zuhrī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah b. Mas'ūd—Ibn 'Abbās, who said: Then the Messenger of God went on his journey and left Abū Ruhm Kulthūm b. Ḥuṣayn b. Khalaf al-Ghifārī in charge of Medina. He departed on the tenth day of the month of Ramaḍān.[698] The Messenger of God fasted, [1628] and the people fasted with him. When he was at al-Kadīd, between 'Usfān and Amaj, the Messenger of God broke his fast. He proceeded on and encamped at Marr al-Ẓahrān with 10,000 Muslims. [Members of the tribe of] Sulaym numbered 700, [members of the tribe] of Muzaynah 1,000, and in all the tribes there were a number of men and Muslims. The Emigrants and Anṣār went forth all together with the Messenger of God; not one of them hung back from him. When the Messenger of God encamped at Marr al-Ẓahrān, reports had been kept hidden from Quraysh; no news was reaching them about the Messenger of God, and they did not know what he would do. That night, Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb, Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām, and Budayl b. Warqā' went out to seek news, hoping to find a report or hear of one.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-'Abbās b. 'Abdallāh b. Ma'bad b. al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib[699]—Ibn 'Abbās: Al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib met the Messenger of God along the way. Abū Sufyān b. al-Ḥārith[700] and 'Abdallāh b. Abī Umayyah b. al-Mughīrah[701] had met the Mes-

---

697. Qur'ān 60:1–4. The passage uses the story of Abraham and his followers as an example of the enmity between believers and nonbelievers: "You have a good example in Abraham, and those with him, when they said to their people, 'We are quit of you and that you serve, apart from God. We disbelieve in you, and between us and you enmity has shown itself, and hatred for ever, until you believe in God alone. . . . Our Lord, in Thee we trust; to Thee we turn.'"

698. 10 Ramaḍān of A.H. 8 fell on 1 January 630.

699. Al-'Abbās b. 'Abdallāh b. Ma'bad b. 'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib al-Hāshimī of Medina is mentioned without dates in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 120. According to Tahdhīb, VI, 39, his grandfather, Ma'bad, was the brother of 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās.

700. Abū Sufyān [al-Mughīrah] b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, Muḥammad's cousin [son of his paternal uncle], was a poet and had written satires against Muḥammad. See W, II, 806–12; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VII, 86–87; GAS, II, 275.

701. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Umayyah b. al-Mughīrah was the half-brother of Muḥammad's wife Umm Salamah by Muḥammad's paternal aunt 'Ātikah bt. 'Abd al-senger of God at Nīq al-'Uqāb, between Mecca and Medina.[702] They sought to have an interview with the Messenger of God, and Umm Salamah spoke to him about them, saying, "Messenger of God, the son of your paternal uncle and the son of your paternal aunt and relative by marriage!" He said: "I have no need for the two. As for the son of my paternal uncle, he injured my honor; as for the son of my paternal aunt and my relative by marriage, he is the one who said what he said to me in Mecca." When word of this came out to them—Abū Sufyān [b. al-Ḥārith] had a young son of [1629] his with him—he said, "By God, he shall let me in, or I will take the hand of this son of mine and we will go into the open country until we die of thirst and hunger." When this was reported to the Messenger of God, he softened toward the two of them. He gave permission, and they came before him and became Muslims. Abū Sufyān [b. al-Ḥārith] recited to him the following verses, which he composed about his becoming a Muslim and to excuse himself for what he had done in the past:[703]

By my life, the day I carried a banner that the horsemen of al-Lāt[704] might overcome the horsemen of Muḥammad, I was like a perplexed traveler in a dark night;
but now the time has come when I am guided and find the way.
A Guide other than myself guided me; there overcame me,

Muṭṭalib. His sceptical arguments against Islam during Muḥammad's days in Mecca—they are said to have grieved Muḥammad greatly—are recorded in IH, I, 298 (tr. Guillaume, 134–35). After his conversion, he was killed fighting as a Muslim at the siege of al-Ṭā'if in A.H. 8/630—see IH, IV, 486 (tr. Guillaume, 591).

702. A place between Mecca and Medina, near al-Juḥfah; cf. Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VIII, 360.

703. The poem should be read in connection with the first of the two accounts in al-Wāqidī of the conversion of Abū Sufyān b. al-Ḥārith, which is quite different from the second account (the one that al-Ṭabarī includes). In al-Wāqidī's first account, Abū Sufyān repeatedly attempted to find favor with Muḥammad on the eve of the conquest of Mecca but was not successful until his wife interceded for him during the women's pledge of allegiance after the conquest. He subsequently accompanied Muḥammad to the Battle of Ḥunayn against the tribes of Hawāzin and Thaqīf (the latter from the town of al-Ṭā'if). Thus the poem apparently refers to events that took place after the conquest of Mecca and cannot belong to the conversion story given by al-Ṭabarī.

704. See note 325, above.

with God, one whom I had expelled utterly.
I used to shun and diligently keep my distance from Muḥammad;
yet I was called related to Muḥammad, though I did not declare my kinship.[705]
They—what sort are they? Whoever does not profess their false opinion, though he be of sound judgment, is blamed and ridiculed.
I wanted to please them, but I could not adhere [to him] with the people, so long as I was not guided in every place of abode.
Say then to Thaqīf that I do not want to fight them, and say this to Thaqīf: "Threaten others than me."
I was not in the army that overcame 'Āmir;
it did not happen because of my tongue or my hand:
[It was] tribes that came from far away lands—strangers who came from Suhām and Surdad.[706]

[1630] Some have alleged that when he recited to the Messenger of God the words, "there overcame me, with God, one whom I had expelled utterly," the Prophet struck his chest and said, "You expelled me utterly?"[707]

According to al-Wāqidī:[708] When the Messenger of God set out for Mecca, some said his destination was Quraysh, some said it was Hawāzin, and some said it was Thaqīf. He sent to the tribes, but they hung back from him, and he appointed no one to military commands and displayed no banners. Then, when he reached Qudayd, the Banū Sulaym met him with horses and full arma-

705. According to material in W, II, 811, this refers to an occasion when Abū Sufyān b. al-Ḥārith fled to the court of the Byzantine emperor. Asked to identify himself, he gave his name as Abū Sufyān, son of al-Ḥārith, son of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. The emperor immediately said, "If you are telling the truth, you must be the cousin of Muḥammad, the son of 'Abdallāh, the son of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib." Impressed by the fact that although he had fled from Muḥammad's reach and was so far away, he was known to the emperor only by his relation to Muḥammad, Abū Sufyān began to doubt the truth of paganism and lean toward Islam.

706. Suhām (also vocalized as Sahām) and Surdad were two places in Yemen. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, V, 67, 184.

707. As the parallel in W, II, 811, makes clear, the sentence is a rhetorical question. In al-Wāqidī, Muḥammad adds, "Rather, God has utterly expelled you!"

708. Cf. W, II, 812 ff.

ment. 'Uyaynah [b. Ḥiṣn][709] joined the Messenger of God at al-'Arj with a group of his companions. Al-Aqra' b. Ḥābis[710] joined him at al-Suqyā. 'Uyaynah said: "Messenger of God, by God I see neither the implements of war nor preparation to enter a state of consecration. Where then are you heading, Messenger of God?" The Messenger of God said, "Where God wills." The Messenger of God ordered that the information be kept ambiguous, and he encamped at Marr al-Ẓahrān. Al-'Abbās met him at al-Suqyā, and Makhramah b. Nawfal met him at Nīq al-'Uqāb. When he encamped at Marr al-Ẓahrān, Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb came out with Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām.

According to Abū Kurayb—Yūnus b. Bukayr—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ḥusayn b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās[711]—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās, who said:[712] When the Messenger of God encamped at Marr al-Ẓahrān, al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib said, the Messenger of God having departed from Medina: "Woe to Quraysh! If the Messenger of God surprises them in their territory and enters Mecca by force, it means the destruction of Quraysh forever." So he seated himself on the white mule of the Messenger [1631] of God and said, "I will go out to al-Arāk;[713] perhaps I shall see a firewood gleaner, or someone bringing milk, or someone coming in who will enter Mecca and inform them where the Messenger of God is, so that they will go to him and ask him for a promise of safety."

[Continuing, al-'Abbās related:] So I set out. By God, while I was going through al-Arāk seeking what I had come out to find, I heard the voices of Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb, Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām, and Budayl b. Warqā', who had come out in search of information about the Messenger of God. I heard Abū Sufyān say, "By God, I have never seen fires like those I see today!" Budayl said, "These, by God, are the fires of Khuzā'ah gathered for war." Abū Sufyān said,

---

709. Cf. W, II, 803–4.

710. Al-Aqra' b. Ḥābis was said to be the first Muslim from the tribe of Tamīm. See Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 137–38.

711. Ḥusayn b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās died ca. 140/757. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 341–42.

712. Parallel: Aghānī, VI, 97–98.

713. Wādī al-Arāk [Arāk-Tree Valley] is a valley near Mecca; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, I, 169.

"Khuzā'ah are too lowly and abject for that." Recognizing his voice, I said, "Abū Ḥanẓalah!"[714] He said, "Abū al-Faḍl!"[715] "Yes!" I said. He said: "At your service, may my father and mother be your ransom! What news do you have?" I said: "Here is the Messenger of God behind me. He has come against you with a force you cannot resist—10,000 Muslims." "What," he asked, "do you command me?" I said, "Mount the rump of this mule, and I will ask the Messenger of God to grant you a promise of safety; for, by God, if he gets hold of you, he will cut off your head." He mounted behind me, and I set out with him, urging the mule of the Messenger of God toward the Messenger of God. Whenever I passed one of the fires of the Muslims, they looked at me and said, "The uncle of the Messenger of God on the mule of the Messenger of God!" Finally, I passed the fire of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who said: "Abū Sufyān! Praise be to God, who has delivered you up without treaty or covenant!" He ran toward the Prophet, and I urged the [1632] mule, Abū Sufyān riding behind me, until I jumped off at the door of the tent, having outdistanced 'Umar by as much as a slow mount can outdistance a slow man. 'Umar went before the Messenger of God and said: "Messenger of God, here is Abū Sufyān, the enemy of God. God has delivered him up without treaty or covenant. Let me cut off his head!" I said, "Messenger of God, I have granted him protection." Then I sat by the Messenger of God and took hold of his head. I said, "By God, no one but I shall speak confidentially to him today." When 'Umar kept speaking to him at length, I said: "Take it easy, 'Umar! By God, you are doing this only because he is from the Banū 'Abd Manāf; if he had been from the Banū 'Adī b. Ka'b,[716] you would not have said this." He said: "Take it easy, 'Abbās! By God, your [conversion to] Islam, the day you became a Muslim, was more pleasing to me than the conversion of [my father] al-Khaṭṭāb would have been, had he become a Muslim; for I know that your [conversion to] Islam was more pleasing to the Messenger of God than that of al-Khaṭṭāb would have been, had he become a Muslim." The Messenger of God said:

714. Abū Ḥanẓalah is the kunyah of Abū Sufyān.
715. Abū al-Faḍl is the kunyah of al-'Abbās.
716. The Banū 'Adī b. Ka'b were 'Umar's clan.

"Go, for we have promised him safety. Bring him to me tomorrow morning."

So 'Umar took Abū Sufyān back to his dwelling. In the morning, he brought him to the Messenger of God, who, when he saw him, said, "Alas, Abū Sufyān, hasn't the time come for you to know that there is no god but God?" Abū Sufyān said: "May my father and mother be your ransom! How concerned you are for your kin, how forbearing, and how generous! By God, I think that if there were another god along with God, he would have availed me somewhat." "Alas, Abū Sufyān," he said, "hasn't the time come for you to know that I am the Messenger of God?" Abū Sufyān said: "May my father and mother be your ransom! How concerned you are for your kin, how forbearing, and how generous! As for this matter, there is something of it in my mind."

[Al-'Abbās continued his narrative, saying:] So I said to him: "Woe to you! Recite the testimony of truth before, by God, your head is cut off!" And he recited the shahādah.[717]

The Messenger of God said to al-'Abbās, when Abū Sufyān recited the shahādah, "Go back, 'Abbās, and detain him by the spur of the mountain in the narrow part of the valley until the troops of God pass by him.[718] [1633]

[Al-'Abbās continued his narrative, saying:] So I said to him, "Messenger of God, Abū Sufyān is a man who loves glory. Grant him something that shall be [a cause of glory for him] among his clansmen." He said, "Yes; whoever enters the house of Abū Sufyān shall be safe; anyone who enters the sanctuary[719] shall be safe; and anyone who locks his door behind him shall be safe."

I went out and detained Abū Sufyān by the spur of the mountain in the narrow part of the valley, and the tribes passed by him. He would ask, "Who are these, 'Abbās?" I would say, "Sulaym," and he would say, "What have I to do with Sulaym?" A tribe would pass by him, and he would ask, "Who are these?" I would say, "Aslam," and he would say, "What have I to do with Aslam?"

---

717. I.e., the formula of testimony or profession of faith whereby one becomes a Muslim: "There is no god but God; Muḥammad is the Messenger of God."

718. The parallel in IH, IV, 403, adds: "and he sees them," implying that the purpose is to impress Abū Sufyān.

719. Arabic: masjid, here meaning the area around the Ka'bah in Mecca; in later usage, a mosque. On the development of the term see *EI*², s.v. Masdjid.

Juhaynah would pass by him, and he would say, "What have I to do with Juhaynah?" Finally, the Messenger of God passed by with al-Khaḍrā',[720] the squadron of the Messenger of God, composed of Emigrants and Anṣār in iron [armor], with only their eyes visible. He asked, "Who are these, Abū al-Faḍl?" I said, "This is the Messenger of God amid the Emigrants and Anṣār." He said, "Abū al-Faḍl, your nephew's kingdom has become great!" I said: "Woe to you! It is prophethood."[721] He said, "All right then." I said, "Go join your people now, and warn them!"

Abū Sufyān departed in haste. When he reached Mecca, he shouted in the sanctuary, "People of Quraysh, behold Muḥammad has come upon you with forces you cannot resist." "What then?" they asked. He said, "Anyone who enters my house will be safe." They said, "Alas, what will your house avail us?" He said, "Anyone who enters the sanctuary will be safe, and anyone who locks his door behind him will be safe."

[1634] According to 'Abd al-Wārith b. 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-Wārith[722]—his father ['Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-Wārith][723]—Abān al-'Aṭṭār[724]—Hishām b. 'Urwah—'Urwah [b. al-Zubayr], who wrote [the following letter] to 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān:[725] To proceed: You wrote to me asking about Khālid b. al-Walīd, whether he fought on the day of the conquest, and under whose command he fought. As regards Khālid on the day of the conquest, he was on the side of the Prophet. When the Prophet traveled the Marr basin heading for Mecca, Quraysh had already sent Abū Sufyān and Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām to meet the Messenger of God, not knowing, when they sent the two, where the Prophet was heading, whether to them or to al-Ṭā'if—that was at the time of the con-

720. The name means "green, greenish black, tawny" and is said to be derived from the appearance of their armor; see Ibn Hishām's comment, IH, IV, 404 [tr. Guillaume, 548, and note ad loc.].

721. I.e., not secular kingship such as had been claimed by powerful Arab chieftains in the past. On the disapproval of kings and kingship in early Islam, see *EI*², s.v. Malik.

722. 'Abd al-Wārith b. 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-Wārith died in 252/866. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 390.

723. 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-Wārith b. Sa'īd al-'Anbārī al-Baṣrī died in 206 or 207/821–22. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 327–28.

724. For Abān b. Yazīd al-'Aṭṭār al-Baṣrī, see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 101–2.

725. See note 447, above.

quest. Abū Sufyān and Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām asked Budayl b. Warqā' to follow—they wanted him to accompany them. They were only Abū Sufyān, Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām, and Budayl. When [Quraysh] sent them to the Messenger of God, they said to them, "Let us not be approached from behind you; for we do not know against whom Muḥammad intends to go, whether he intends to go against us, against Hawāzin, or against Thaqīf." Between the Prophet and Quraysh there was a peace made on the day of al-Ḥudaybiyah, with a pact and a fixed period of time. The Banū Bakr were in that peace on the side of Quraysh. Then a group of the Banū Ka'b and a group of the Banū Bakr fought with each other. Among the terms on which the Messenger of God and Quraysh had made peace was that there should be neither betrayal nor clandestine theft.[726] Quraysh aided the Banū Bakr with weapons, and the Banū Ka'b suspected Quraysh. That is why the Messenger of God attacked the people of Mecca. During this expedition of his, he met Abū Sufyān, Ḥakīm, and Budayl at Marr al-Ẓahrān. They had no idea that the Messenger of God had encamped at Marr until they sud- [1635] denly came upon him. When they saw him at Marr, Abū Sufyān, Budayl, and Ḥakīm went before him in his dwelling at Marr al-Ẓahrān and swore allegiance to him. After they swore allegiance to him, he sent them ahead of him to Quraysh, to summon them to Islam. I have been told that he said, "Whoever enters the house of Abū Sufyān shall be safe"—his house was in the upper part of Mecca—"and whoever enters the house of Ḥakīm"—it was in the lower part of Mecca—"shall be safe, and whoever locks his door and withholds his hand shall be safe."

After Abū Sufyān and Ḥakīm left the presence of the Prophet heading for Mecca, he sent al-Zubayr after them, gave him his banner, and appointed him commander over the horsemen of the Emigrants and Anṣār. He commanded him to plant his banner in the upper part of Mecca at al-Ḥajūn.[727] He said to al-Zubayr, "Do not depart from where I have commanded you to plant my banner until I come to you." [The Messenger of God entered [Mecca] from there.] He commanded Khālid b. al-Walīd, along with those of [the tribe of] Quḍā'ah and the Banū Sulaym who had become Muslims and some people who had become Muslims only a short time before, to enter through the lower part of Mecca—that was where the Banū Bakr were, whom Quraysh had called on for aid, the Banū al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd Manāt, and the Aḥābīsh[728] whom Quraysh had commanded to be in the lower part of Mecca. So Khālid entered against them by the lower part of Mecca.

726. See p. 86 and note 372, above.
727. Al-Ḥajūn is a mountain overlooking Mecca.

I have been told that the Prophet said to Khālid and al-Zubayr when he dispatched them, "Fight only those who fight you." When Khālid came upon the Banū Bakr and the Aḥābīsh in the lower part of Mecca, he fought them, and God put them to flight. That was the only fighting that took place in Mecca. However, Kurz b. Jābir, one of the Banū Muḥārib b. Fihr, and Ibn al-Ash'ar, a man from the Banū Ka'b—the two were among al-Zubayr's [1636] horsemen—took the road to Kadā'.[729] They did not take the route that al-Zubayr took, which he had been commanded to take. They encountered a squadron of Quraysh on the slope of Kadā' and were killed. There was no fighting by al-Zubayr in the upper part of Mecca. The Prophet arrived from there. The people stood before him to swear allegiance to him, and so the people of Mecca became Muslims. The Prophet stayed among them half a month, no more—until Hawāzin and Thaqīf came and encamped at Ḥunayn.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ: When the Prophet sent his army in divisions from Dhū Ṭuwā, he commanded al-Zubayr, who was in charge of the left wing, to make his entry with some of the forces by way of Kudā.[730] He commanded Sa'd b. 'Ubādah to make his entry with some of the forces by way of Kadā'. Some scholars assert that when Sa'd was sent out, he said as he made his entry, "Today is the day of battle; today the sacred territory is deemed profane."[731] Hearing this, one of the Emigrants said: "Messenger of God, hear what Sa'd b. 'Ubādah has said! We fear that he may assault Quraysh." The Messenger of God said to 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib:

728. See note 74, above.

729. See note 688, above.

730. Kudā (distinct from Kadā', with which it is sometimes confused, as shown by the apparatus criticus of the Leiden edition) is a mountain in the lower (i.e., southern) part of Mecca. Kadā' is in the upper (i.e., northern) part. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, VII, 220–21; map in *EI*², VI, 163.

731. The slogan is in rhymed prose (saj').

"Overtake him, and take the banner. You be the one who takes it in!"

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ: The Messenger of God commanded Khālid b. al-Walīd to enter the lower part of Mecca by way of al-Līṭ[732] with some of [1637] the forces. Khālid was in charge of the right wing, which included Aslam, Ghifār, Muzaynah, Juhaynah, and other [tribes] of the Arabs. Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ advanced with the line of Muslims, moving toward Mecca in front of the Messenger of God. The Messenger of God entered by way of Adhākhir[733] and halted in the upper part of Mecca: there his round tent was pitched.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ and 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: Ṣafwān b. Umayyah, 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl, and Suhayl b. 'Amr had gathered men at al-Khandamah[734] to fight. Ḥimās b. Qays b. Khālid, a member of the Banū Bakr, was readying weapons before the Messenger of God entered Mecca and set it in order. His wife said to him, "Why are you readying what I see?" He said, "On account of Muḥammad and his forces." "By God," she replied, "I think nothing can stand up to Muḥammad and his forces." He said, "By God, I hope to make some of them serve you!" Then he said:

If you advance today, I have no excuse!
Here is full panoply: a long-bladed spear, and a two-edged [sword] quick to be drawn.

He took up a position at al-Khandamah with Ṣafwān, Suhayl b. 'Amr, and 'Ikrimah. When the Muslims, forces of Khālid b. al-Walīd, met them, they skirmished. Kurz b. Jābir b. Ḥisl b. al-Ajabb b. Ḥabīb b. 'Amr b. Shaybān b. Muḥārib b. Fihr and Khunays[735] b. [1638] Khālid (who is al-Ash'ar) b. Rabī'ah b. Aṣram b. Ḍabīs b. Ḥarām b. Ḥabashiyyah b. Ka'b b. 'Amr (an ally of the Banū Munqidh) were killed. The two were among the horsemen of Khālid b. al-Walīd, but they became separated from him and took a different route 732. I.e., by the main thoroughfare from the south. See Hamidullah, Battlefields, 39.

733. The vocalization Adhākhir is given by Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, I, 158–59.

734. Al-Khandamah is a mountain east of Mecca. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, III, 470–71; map in EI², VI, 163.

735. Ms. C and ed. Cairo: Ḥubaysh.

from his. Both of them were killed. Khunays was killed before Kurz b. Jābir. Kurz set him in front of him[736] and, reciting the following verses of rajaz, fought until he was killed:

A light-complexioned woman of the Banū Fihr, spotless of face, spotless of breast, knows that today I will strike to protect Abū Ṣakhr.

(Khunays was nicknamed Abū Ṣakhr.) Of [the tribe of] Juhaynah, Salamah b. al-Maylā', one of the horsemen of Khālid b. al-Walīd, was killed. About twelve or thirteen of the polytheists were killed, and then the polytheists were routed. Ḥimās left the scene in flight. He entered his house and said to his wife, "Lock my door behind me." "And where," she asked, "is what you used to say?" So he said:

[1639] Had you been present at the battle of al-Khandamah, when Ṣafwān fled and 'Ikrimah fled,
While Abū Yazīd[737] was standing like a pillar,[738] and the Muslims met them with swords
That cut off every arm and skull with their blows, with only battle cries to be heard, Behind us their roaring and snarling—you would not have spoken the least word of blame.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: When the Messenger of God ordered his commanders to enter Mecca, he charged them to kill no one except those who fought them; however, he gave charge concerning a group of men whom he named: he ordered that they should be killed even if they were found under the curtains of the Ka'bah. Among them was 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd b. Abī Sarḥ b. Ḥubayb b. Jadhīmah b. Naṣr b. Mālik b. Ḥisl b. 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy. The Messenger of God ordered that he should be killed only because he had become a Muslim and then had reverted to being a polytheist. He fled to 'Uthmān, who was

736. I.e., mounted him in front of him. This seems to be the sense of bayna rijlayhi, "between his legs."

737. Abū Yazīd refers to Suhayl b. 'Amr.

738. Arabic: ma'tamah. The reading is explained in ed. Leiden, Glossarium, pp. CII–CIII.

his foster-brother,[739] and 'Uthmān hid him. 'Uthmān later brought him to the Messenger of God after the people of Mecca had become calm. He asked the Messenger of God to grant him a promise of safety. The Messenger of God is said to have remained [1640] silent for a long time and then to have said yes. After 'Uthmān had taken him away, the Messenger of God said to his companions who were around him, "By God, I kept silent so that one of you might go up to him and cut off his head!" One of the Anṣār said, "Why didn't you give me a signal, Messenger of God?" He replied, "A prophet does not kill by making signs."

Also among them was 'Abdallāh b. Khaṭal, a member of the Banū Taym b. Ghālib. The Messenger of God ordered that he should be killed only for the following reason: He was a Muslim, and the Messenger of God had sent him to collect alms,[740] sending with him one of the Anṣār. With him went a mawlā of his, also a Muslim, to serve him. He halted at a resting place and commanded the mawlā to slaughter him a goat and make him a meal; then he went to sleep. When he woke up, the mawlā had done nothing for him; so he attacked him and killed him. Then he reverted to being a polytheist. He had two singing girls, Fartanā and another with her. The two used to sing satire about the Messenger of God; so the latter commanded that the two of them should be killed along with him.

Also among them was al-Ḥuwayrith b. Nuqaydh b. Wahb b. 'Abd b. Quṣayy. He was one of the men who used to molest the Messenger of God in Mecca.

Also among them was Miqyas b. Ṣubābah. The Messenger of God commanded that he should be killed only because he had killed the member of the Anṣār who had killed his brother by mistake and had then returned to Quraysh as a renegade.

Also among them were 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl and Sārah, a mawlāh of one of the sons of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. She was one of those who used to molest the Messenger of God in Mecca. 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl fled to Yemen. His wife, Umm Ḥakīm bt. al-

739. I.e., the same woman had nursed them as infants.

740. Arabic ṣadaqah (here translated as "alms") is ambiguous. In later usage it usually refers to voluntary contributions. In early usage, however, it is often a synonym for the obligatory contributions known as zakāh. See the references in note 604, above.

Ḥārith b. Hishām, became a Muslim. She asked the Messenger of God to grant 'Ikrimah a promise of safety, and he did so. She set out to find him and then brought him to the Messenger of God. 'Ikrimah, as people relate, used to say that what brought him back to Islam after his departure for Yemen was—in his own words: I [1641] was about to set sail for Ethiopia. When I came to board the ship, its captain said, "Servant of God, do not board my ship until you declare God to be one and repudiate any peers to Him; for I fear that if you do not do so, we shall perish in it." So I asked, "Does no one board until he declares God to be one and repudiates all others?" "Yes," he said, "no one boards until he clears himself." So I asked: Why then should I depart from Muḥammad? By God, this is the very message he brought to us: that our God on the sea is [the same as] our God on land! At that moment I came to know Islam, and it entered into my heart.

'Abdallāh b. Khaṭal was killed by Sa'īd b. Ḥurayth al-Makhzūmī and Abū Barzah al-Aslamī: the two shared in his blood. Miqyas b. Ṣubābah was killed by Numaylah b. 'Abdallāh, a man of his own clan. The sister of Miqyas said:

By my life, Numaylah shamed his clan and distressed winter guests by [killing] Miqyas.
How excellent it was for one to see a man like Miqyas in times when no food was prepared even for women in childbirth![741]

As for Ibn Khaṭal's two singing girls, one was killed and the other fled. The Messenger of God later was asked to grant her a promise of safety, and he did so. [As for Sārah, he was asked to grant her a promise of safety, and he did so.][742] She lived until someone in the 741. The line is proverbial for a time of such famine that no food is prepared even for those in greatest need of it, or when everyone looks out only for himself. Cf. Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, I, 217. The meaning is that Miqyas was generous even in times of extreme hardship.

742. The Leiden editor restored the sentence from the parallel in IH, IV, 411. The text in the manuscripts of al-Ṭabarī implies that it was one of the singing girls (Fartanā, according to Ibn al-Athīr) who later was trampled to death. The loss of the sentence (if it ever existed in the text of al-Ṭabarī) must have taken place early, since the later historian Ibn al-Athīr reflects the loss. The account in W, III, 860, accords with the text without the sentence. According to al-Wāqidī, Sārah was killed, as was one of the singing girls; the other singing girl [cf. the next paragraph time of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb caused his horse to trample her at al-Abṭaḥ[743] and killed her. Al-Ḥuwayrith b. Nuqaydh was killed by 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

According to al-Wāqidī: The Messenger of God commanded [1642] that six men and four women should be killed. Of the men, [al-Wāqidī] mentioned those whom Ibn Isḥāq named. The women he mentioned were Hind bt. 'Utbah b. Rabī'ah, who became a Muslim and swore allegiance; Sārah, the mawlāh of 'Amr b. Hāshim b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib b. 'Abd Manāf, who was killed on that day; Quraybah, who was killed on that day; and Fartanā, who lived until the caliphate of 'Uthmān.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Umar b. Mūsā b. al-Wajīh—Qatādah al-Sadūsī: Having halted by the door of the Ka'bah, the Messenger of God stood up and said: "There is no god but God alone; He has no partner. He has fulfilled His promise and helped His servant. He alone has put to flight the parties who leagued together. Behold, every alleged claim of hereditary privilege, or blood, or wealth is abolished,[744] except the custodianship of the Ka'bah and the right of supplying water to pilgrims.[745] Behold, the one slain by an error that is like intention, [by] whip or staff—for both cases the blood money shall be made rigorous: [a hundred camels],[746] forty of them with their foals in their wombs. People of Quraysh, God has taken from you the haughtiness of the Time of Ignorance and its pride in ancestors. Mankind is from Adam, and Adam was created from dust." Then the Messenger of God recited:[747] "O mankind, We have created of al-Ṭabarī) was granted a pardon; only to die of a broken rib in the time of 'Uthmān (not 'Umar).

---

743. Al-Abṭaḥ (abṭaḥ is a wash, a broad, dry stream bed with pebbles and gravel) is an area north of Mecca on the way to Minā. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, I, 85–86; map in *EI*², VI, 163.

744. Literally, "is [as dust] under these my feet." Cf. al-Zamakhsharī, Asās al-balāghah, 496: "'Put it under your feet' means 'turn from it.'"

745. On the custodianship (sidānah) of the Ka'bah and the right of supplying water (siqāyah) to pilgrims, see *EI*², s.v. Ka'ba. Muḥammad's uncle, al-'Abbās, was confirmed in his possession of the siqāyah. The custodianship of the Ka'bah was given to 'Uthmān b. Ṭalḥah.

746. The addition from the parallel in Ibn Hishām is not strictly necessary, since the Arabic diyah mughallaẓah "blood money that is made hard, rigorous, or severe" regularly implies a total of 100 camels. Cf. Lane, Lexicon, VI, 2283.

747. Qur'ān 49:13.

you male and female, and made you nations and tribes, that you may know one another. Surely the noblest among you in the sight of God is the most god-fearing of you"—to the end of the verse. "People of Quraysh and people of Mecca, what do you think I intend to do with you?" "Good," they said, "[for you are] a generous fellow tribesman and the son of a generous fellow tribesman!" Then he said, "Go, for you are 'those whose bonds have been loosed.'"[748] Thus the Messenger of God emancipated them, [1643] although God had enabled him to take their persons by force and they were his booty. Therefore the people of Mecca are known as al-Ṭulaqā' (Those Whose Bonds Have Been Loosed).

The people assembled in Mecca to swear allegiance to the Messenger of God in Islam. As I have been informed, he sat for them on al-Ṣafā.[749] 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb was below the Messenger of God, lower than the place where he sat, administering the oath to the people. He received from them the oath of allegiance to the Messenger of God, to heed and obey God and His Messenger to the extent of their ability. That was the oath he administered to those who swore allegiance to the Messenger of God in Islam.

When the Messenger of God was finished with the men's swearing of allegiance, the women swore allegiance. Some of the women of Quraysh assembled before him. Among them was Hind bt. 'Utbah, veiled and disguised because of her offense and what she had done to Ḥamzah; for she feared that the Messenger of God would punish her for her offense.[750] When the women approached to swear allegiance to him, the Messenger of God said, as I have been informed, "You are swearing allegiance to me on condition that you will associate nothing with God as a partner." Hind said:

---

748. Arabic ṭulaqā' (plural of ṭalīq), meaning "a captive having his bond loosed from him," or "a man freed from slavery, emancipated," became a technical term for those Quraysh who became Muslims at the time of the conquest of Mecca. See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CCCXLII.

749. Al-Ṣafā was a low hill to the southeast of the Meccan sanctuary. Together with its neighboring hill to the north, Marwah, it still forms part of the sacred terrain of the pilgrimage as the site of the sa'y or ritual running between al-Ṣafā and Marwah to commemorate Hagar's frantic search for water for her son Ismā'īl (Ishmael). See Peters, The Hajj, 18–19.

750. For the part of Abū Sufyān's wife Hind in mutilating the bodies of the Muslims slain at the Battle of Uḥud, including the body of Muḥammad's uncle Ḥamzah, see al-Ṭabarī, I, 1415; IH, III, 91–92 (tr. Guillaume, 385–86); and *EI*², s.v. Hind bt. 'Utba.

"By God, you are imposing something on us that you are not imposing on the men. We will grant it to you." He said, "Do not steal." She said, "By God, I used to take one trifle or another from Abū Sufyān's property, and I do not know whether it was permitted for me or not!" Abū Sufyān, who witnessed what she was saying, said, "As for what you took in the past, you are absolved regarding it." The Messenger of God said, "Surely you are Hind bt. 'Utbah!" She replied: "I am Hind bt. 'Utbah. Forgive what is past—may God forgive you." He said, "Do not commit adultery." She said, "Messenger of God, does a free woman commit adultery?" He said, "Do not kill your children." She said, "We raised them when they were young, and you killed them at the Battle of Badr when they were grown; so you and they know better about it!" 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb laughed immoderately at her words. The [1644]
Messenger of God said, "Do not bring slander that you invent now and henceforth."[751] She said: "Bringing slander is truly ugly. Sometimes it is better to pass over a thing." He said, "Do not disobey me in a good action." She said, "We have not taken our seats in this place intending to disobey you in a good action." The Messenger of God said to 'Umar, "Receive their oath of allegiance." The Messenger of God prayed for their forgiveness, and 'Umar received their oath of allegiance; for the Messenger of God would not shake hands with women or touch a woman, nor would any woman touch him, except one whom God had made permissible to him [through marriage] or one too closely related for him to marry.[752]

751. The Arabic: bayna aydīkunna wa-arjulikunna "between your hands and your feet" (here translated as "now and henceforth," following the suggestion of the Leiden editor, Glossarium, p. DLXX) is obscure. The phrase occurs in Qur'ān 60:12, which contains a series of injunctions that echo the ones that Muḥammad imposes here. Commentators on the verse see the phrase as referring to a woman's foisting of a bastard child or foundling on her husband. The Leiden editor rejects this possibility because the phrase also occurs in masculine contexts. Another possibility is that it means "of your own doing"—hands and feet being a metonymy for the entire person.

752. Normally the oath of allegiance was sealed by a handclasp. Because of Muḥammad's scruples about contact with women, the actual administration of the oath was left to 'Umar. Women whose degree of relationship falls within the forbidden degrees of marriage (dhāt maḥram) are considered to be part of a man's extended family, and therefore he and they may mix more freely than may a man and an unrelated woman.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Abān b. Ṣāliḥ (as one scholar informed him): The women's oath of allegiance took place in two ways. A vessel containing water would be set before the Messenger of God. When he proposed the oath to them and they took it, he dipped his hand in the vessel and took it out; then the women dipped their hands in it. Later, he would propose the oath to them; and when they accepted his conditions, he would say, "Go, for I have accepted your oath of allegiance"—and that was all he did.

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year Khirāsh b. Umayyah al-Ka'bī killed Junaydib b. al-Adla' al-Hudhalī (his name, according to Ibn Isḥāq, was Ibn al-Athwa' al-Hudhalī).[753] Khirāsh killed Junaydib because of a blood feud that had occurred during the Time of Ignorance. The Prophet said: "Khirāsh is murderous! Khirāsh is murderous!"—thus reproaching him. The Prophet commanded [the tribe of] Khuzā'ah to pay blood money for the slain man.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. al-Zubayr (Muḥammad b. Isḥāq said, "I know nothing of the latter except that he transmitted traditions to [1645] me from 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr"), who said:[754] Ṣafwān b. Umayyah left for Juddah to set sail from there to Yemen. 'Umayr b. Wahb said: "Prophet of God, Ṣafwān b. Umayyah, the lord of his people,[755] has left fleeing from you to hurl himself into the sea. Therefore—may God grant you peace—give him a promise of

753. IH, IV, 414–16, gives two variants of the name: first (in the main text of Ibn Isḥāq), Ibn al-Athwa', and then (in a note by Ibn Hishām) Ibn al-Akwa'. Parallel: W, II, 843–46.

754. The story, which is included to illustrate Muḥammad's forbearance and mildness, depends on one's knowing something of the past history of two prominent leaders of Quraysh. In A.H. 2, 'Umayr b. Wahb al-Jumaḥī, whose son Wahb had been captured by the Muslims at the Battle of Badr, went to Medina to assassinate Muḥammad with support from his cousin Ṣafwān b. Umayyah al-Jumaḥī (who agreed to support 'Umayr's family if the attempt came to grief; cf. al-Ṭabarī, I, 1352–54). 'Umayr was so impressed by Muḥammad's foreknowledge of his intentions that he converted to Islam on the spot and returned to Mecca to cause difficulties for the pagans. Ṣafwān, on the other hand, remained a pagan, commanded a Meccan contingent at the Battle of Uḥud in A.H. 3 (cf. Watt and McDonald, The Foundation, 105–7 [I, 1384–86]), and later went out of his way to purchase a captive Muslim and have him killed to avenge his father, Umayyah b. Khalaf, who had been killed at Badr (cf. ibid., pp. 144, 147 [I, 1433, 1437]).

755. I.e., the Banū Jumaḥ clan of Quraysh.

safety!" "He shall be safe," replied the Prophet. 'Umayr said, "Messenger of God, give me something whereby he may know your promise of safety." So he gave 'Umayr the turban he had been wearing when he entered Mecca. 'Umayr set out with it and, having overtaken Ṣafwān as he was about to set sail at Juddah, said to him: "Ṣafwān, may my father and mother be your ransom! I beg you for God's sake not to destroy yourself. Here is a promise of safety from the Messenger of God which I have brought to you!" Ṣafwān said: "Woe to you! Go away, and do not talk to me!" 'Umayr said: "Ṣafwān, may my father and mother be your ransom! The most excellent of men, the most righteous, the most forbearing, and best of them is the son of your paternal aunt.[756] His strength is your strength, his honor your honor, and his dominion your dominion." Ṣafwān said, "I am in mortal fear of him." 'Umayr said, "He is too forbearing and generous for that." So 'Umayr brought Ṣafwān back with him and came before the Messenger of God with him. Ṣafwān said, "This man asserted that you have given me a promise of safety." "He spoke truly," said the Messenger of God. Ṣafwān said, "Give me two months to decide what to do." He replied, "You have four months to decide about it."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī: Umm Ḥakīm bt. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām (the wife of 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl) and Fākhitah bt. al-Walīd (the wife of Ṣafwān b. Umayyah) became Muslims. Umm Ḥakīm asked the Messenger of God to grant a promise of safety to 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl, and he did so. She [1646] then joined 'Ikrimah in Yemen and brought him back. When 'Ikrimah and Ṣafwān became Muslims, the Messenger of God confirmed the two women as wives of the two men as they had been originally.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: When the Messenger of God entered Mecca, Hubayrah b. Abī Wahb al-Makhzūmī and 'Abdallāh b. al-Ziba'rā al-Sahmī fled to Najrān.[757]

---

756. IH, IV, 418: "your paternal uncle."

757. Najrān, near the northern border of Yemen, is about 180 miles south of Mecca.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥassān b. Thābit al-Anṣārī, who said: Ḥassān [b. Thābit] let fly a single verse, no more, against 'Abdallāh b. al-Ziba'rā in Najrān:[758]

May you never be deprived of a man whose hatred has made you inhabit
Najrān in a life that is scanty and base!

When Ibn al-Ziba'rā learned of this, he returned to the Messenger of God. He said when he became a Muslim:

O Messenger of the King, my tongue shall repair what I rent when I was perishing;
When I was trying to outstrip Satan in the way of the wind[759]— and whoever turns aside with Satan shall perish.
My flesh and my bones have believed in my Lord, and my soul is witness that you are the warner.
[1647] I will restrain from you—there is a clan descended from Lu'ayy—all of them are in error.[760]

As for Hubayrah b. Abī Wahb, he stayed there as an unbeliever. When he learned that his wife, Umm Hāni' bt. Abī Ṭālib [her given name was Hind], had become a Muslim, he said:[761]

Does Hind miss you? or is she far from asking about you?
Such is absence—her ties and [then] her turning away.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said: The total number of Muslims present at the conquest of Mecca was 10,000. There were 400 of the Banū Ghifār, 400 from Aslam, 1,003 from Muzaynah, 700 from the Banū Sulaym, and 1,400 from

758. The verse occurs in IH, IV, 418 (tr. Guillaume, 556). See Dīwān of Ḥassān b. Thābit, I, 140–41, and II, 214. Guillaume, noting that the version in the Dīwān consists of three verses, comments, "It looks almost as though Ḥassān's grandson knew that they [viz. the extra two verses] had been grafted on to Ḥassān's line and resented the impertinence."

759. Variant: "in the way of error."

760. The text of the verse appears to be corrupt. The parallel in IH, IV, 419, reads: "I will drive away from you there a clan descended from Lu'ayy, all of whom are in error." Lu'ayy was an ancestor of most of the clans of Quraysh.

761. The line is the beginning of a longer poem, seven lines of which are quoted by W, II, 849, and eleven lines by IH, IV, 420–21 (tr. Guillaume, 557).

Juhaynah; the remainder were from Quraysh, the Anṣār and their allies, and groups of Arabs from the Banū Tamīm, Qays, and Asad.

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year the Messenger of God married Mulaykah bt. Dāwūd al-Laythiyyah. One of the Prophet's wives came to Mulaykah and said to her, "Are you not ashamed to marry a man who killed your father?" She therefore "took refuge [in God]" from him.[762] She was beautiful and young. The Messenger of God separated from her. He had killed her father the day of the conquest of Mecca.

The Destruction of Idolatrous Shrines

In this year, five nights before the end of Ramaḍān, Khālid b. al-Walīd destroyed al-'Uzzā in the lowland of Nakhlah.[763] Al-'Uzzā was an idol of the Banū Shaybān, a subdivision of Sulaym, allies of the Banū Hāshim. The Banū Asad b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā used to say it was their idol. Khālid set out for it, and then he said, "I have destroyed it." [The Messenger of God] said, "Did you see anything?" "No," said Khālid. "Then," he said, "go back and destroy it." So Khālid returned to the idol, destroyed its temple, and broke the idol. The keeper began saying, "Rage, O 'Uzzā, with one of thy fits of rage!"—whereupon a naked, wailing Ethiopian woman came out before him. Khālid killed her and took the jewels that were on her. Then he went to the Messenger of God and gave him a report of what had happened. "That was al-'Uzzā," he said, "and al-'Uzzā will never be worshiped [again]." [1648]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq, who said:[764] The Messenger of God sent Khālid b. al-Walīd to [deal with] al-'Uzzā, who was at Nakhlah. She was a temple venerated by the tribes of Quraysh, Kinānah, and all Muḍar.[765] Her keepers were of

762. Arabic: ista'ādhat minhu. This apparently alludes to pre-Islamic practice whereby a wife could repudiate her husband before the consummation of marriage by pronouncing the words a'ūdhu billāhi minka, "I seek refuge with God from you." For a discussion of three instances reported by Ibn Sa'd in which arranged tribal marriages were terminated by this formula, see Stowasser, Women in the Qur'an, Traditions, and Interpretation, 111–12.

763. Parallel: W, III, 873–74. 25 Ramaḍān of A.H. 8 fell on 16 January 630. Nakhlah is close to Mecca, on the way to al-Ṭā'if. On the cult of the goddess al-'Uzzā, see EI[1], s.v. al-'Uzzā; Fahd, Panthéon, 163–82.

764. Parallel: IH, IV, 436–37 [tr. Guillaume, 565].

765. See note 257, above.

the Banū Shaybān, a division of the Banū Sulaym, allies of the Banū Hāshim. When the master of the temple heard that Khālid was coming to deal with al-'Uzzā, he hung his sword on her and climbed the mountain near which al-'Uzzā was located. As he went up he said:

O 'Uzzā, attack with an attack that hits no unvital place, against Khālid! Throw down thy veil, and gird up thy train!
O 'Uzzā, if today thou wilt not slay Khālid, bear a swift punishment, or become a Christian!

Having reached al-'Uzzā, Khālid destroyed her and returned to the Messenger of God.

According to al-Wāqidī:[766] In this year [the idol] Suwā' was destroyed.[767] He was at Ruhāṭ[768] and belonged to [the tribe of] [1649] Hudhayl. He was a stone. The person who destroyed it was 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ. When he reached the idol, the keeper asked him, "What do you want?" 'Amr replied, "To destroy Suwā'." The keeper said, "You cannot destroy him." 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ said to him, "You are still in falsehood." 'Amr destroyed him but found nothing in his treasury. Then 'Amr said to the keeper, "What do you think?" He replied, "I have become a Muslim, by God."

In this year [the idol] Manāt was destroyed by Sa'd b. Zayd al-Ashhalī at al-Mushallal.[769] It belonged to [the tribes of] al-Aws and al-Khazraj.

The Expedition against the Banū Jadhīmah

In this year the expedition of Khālid b. al-Walīd against the Banū Jadhīmah took place.[770] The following is an account of events concerning him and them according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, who said:[771] The Messenger of God had sent 766. Parallel: W, II, 870.

767. On the cult of the Suwā', see Fahd, Panthéon, 155–56.
768. Ruhāṭ was a place three nights from Mecca in the direction of Medina; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, IV, 341.
769. On al-Mushallal see note 600, above. Manāt, one of the ancient deities of the Semitic pantheon, was a goddess of destiny and fate. See *EI*², s.v. Manāt; Fahd, Panthéon, 123–28.
770. See *EI*², s.v. Djadhīma b. 'Āmir.
771. Parallels: W, III, 875–84; IH, IV, 428–36 (tr. Guillaume, 561–65).

out detachments to the areas around Mecca to summon people to God; he did not command the detachments to fight. One of those whom he sent out was Khālid b. al-Walīd, whom he commanded to travel through the lowlands of Tihāmah to summon people; he did not send Khālid to fight. Khālid, however, mistreated the Banū Jadhīmah and killed some of them.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ḥakīm b. Ḥakīm b. 'Abbād b. Ḥunayf[772]—Abū Ja'far Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Ḥusayn,[773] who said: After he conquered Mecca, the Messenger of God sent out Khālid b. al-Walīd to summon people; he did not send him to fight. With him were Arabs of the tribes of Sulaym, Mudlij, and other tribes. They halted at al-Ghumayṣā', a watering place of the Banū Jadhīmah b. 'Āmir b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah, by their main body. Now the Banū Jadhīmah in the Time [1650] of Ignorance had killed 'Awf b. 'Abd 'Awf (the father of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf) and al-Fākih b. al-Mughīrah.[774] The two had come from Yemen as merchants; when they had halted among the Banū Jadhīmah, the latter had killed them and taken their possessions. When Islam came and the Messenger of God sent out Khālid b. al-Walīd, Khālid traveled and halted at that watering place. When the Banū Jadhīmah saw him, they took up their weapons. Khālid said to them, "Put down your weapons, for the people have become Muslims."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—a certain scholar—a man from the Banū Jadhīmah, who said: When Khālid commanded us to put down our weapons, one of our men, named Jaḥdam, said: "Alas for you, Banū Jadhīmah! It is Khālid. By God, after you lay down your weapons, it will be nothing but leather manacles, and after leather manacles it will be nothing but the smiting of necks. By God, I will never lay down my weapon!" Some of his fellow tribesmen took him and said: "Jaḥdam, do you want to cause our blood to be shed? The people have become Muslims. The war has ended, and the people are at peace." The people did not desist from him until they had taken away his weapon and had laid down their weapons because of what Khālid had said.

772. Ḥakīm b. Ḥakīm b. 'Abbād b. Ḥunayf al-Anṣārī al-Awsī is listed without dates in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, 448–49.

773. Abū Ja'far Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, surnamed Muḥammad al-Bāqir, was the fifth imam of the Shī'ah. He was born in 57/676 and died between 114/732 and 126/743. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 350–52; Momen, Introduction to Shi'i Islam, 37–38.

774. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf was a Meccan who became a Muslim, emigrated to Medina, and fought at Badr. See al-Ṭabarī, I, 1325–27. Al-Fākih b. al-Mughīrah, as mentioned below, was the paternal uncle of Khālid b. al-Walīd.

After the Banū Jadhīmah had laid down their weapons, Khālid ordered that their hands should be tied behind their backs; then he put them to the sword, killing some of them. When the news reached the Messenger of God, he raised his hands to heaven and said, "O God, I declare to Thee that I am innocent of what Khālid b. al-Walīd has done." Then he summoned 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and said, "'Alī, go out to these people, look into what has happened to them, and make an end to the ways of the Time of Ignorance." 'Alī set out and came to them; with him he had money that the Mes-[1651] senger of God had sent with him. He paid the Banū Jadhīmah blood money and compensation for their property that had been taken, down to a dog's water bowl; there remained no life or property for which he did not pay compensation. Because he had some money left over, 'Alī said to them when he finished, "Do any of you still have lives or property for which you have not been compensated?" "No," they replied. He said, "Then I give you the remainder of this money as a precaution for the Messenger of God with regard to what he does not know and you do not know." Having done this, he returned to the Messenger of God and gave him a report. "You have done right and well," he said. Then the Messenger of God turned toward the qiblah, standing and raising his hands until the whiteness under his shoulders could be seen, saying three times, "O God, I declare to Thee that I am innocent of what Khālid b. al-Walīd has done."

According to Ibn Isḥāq: Someone who excuses Khālid said that Khālid said: "I did not fight until 'Abdallāh b. Ḥudhāfah al-Sahmī commanded me to do so. He said, 'The Messenger of God has commanded you to kill them[775] because of their resistance to Islam.'"

When they laid down their weapons, Jaḥdam, seeing what Khālid was doing to the Banū Jadhīmah, said to them: "Banū Jadhīmah, all is lost! I warned you of what you have fallen into."

775. The parallel in IH, IV, 430 (tr. Guillaume, 562), reads "to fight them."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Salamah,[776] who said: According to the report that I have received, an exchange took place over this between Khālid b. al-Walīd and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf. 'Abd al-Raḥmān said to Khālid, "You acted in the time of Islam according to the ways of the Time of Ignorance." Khālid replied, "I only took vengeance for your father." 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf said: "You are lying. I have already killed my father's murderer. You only took vengeance for [1652] your paternal uncle, al-Fākih b. al-Mughīrah." This developed into a quarrel between them. When it was reported to the Messenger of God, he said: "Take it easy, Khālid. Leave my companions alone; for, by God, though you had a mountain of gold the size of Uḥud and spent it for the sake of God, you would in no wise become the equal of one of my companions."

According to Sa'īd b. Yaḥyā al-Umawi—his father [Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd]; and according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah; both accounts coming from Ibn Isḥāq—Ya'qūb b. 'Utbah b. al-Mughīrah b. al-Akhnas b. Sharīq—Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī—Ibn 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ḥadrad al-Aslamī—his father, 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ḥadrad, who said: I was among Khālid's horsemen that day. One of their young men—he was among the prisoners, his hands were tied to his neck with a rope, and some women were gathered not far from him—said to me, "Young man!" "Yes," I said. He said: "Will you take hold of this rope and lead me by it to these women, so that I can entrust them with a needful matter of business? Then you can bring me back to do as you all please with me." I said, "By God, what you have asked is a small thing." I took hold of his rope and led him by it until I had brought him to stand near them. He said, "Farewell, Ḥubayshah, as life runs out!"[777]

Tell me: when I sought you and found you [1653]
at Ḥalyah,[778] or found you at al-Khawāniq,
Was it not right for a lover to be rewarded

776. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Salamah al-Mājishūn al-Taymī, a mawlā of the al-Munkadir family, died in 106/724–25. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 243.

777. The poem, with variants, may also be found in W, III, 879; IH, IV, 433–34; and Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II, 107. In the first line, "you" (plural) refers to the tribe of the beloved.

778. Ḥalyah is a valley in Tihāmah. Its upper part belonged to Hudhayl, its lower part to Kinānah. Cf. Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, III, 331.

who tasked himself to travel in the nights and in the noonday heat?
No guilt was mine when I said, our people being together,
"Requite with affection before some misfortune occurs!"
Requite with affection before remoteness becomes great;
before the commander takes the departing loved one far away.
For I have divulged no secret lodged with me;
neither has anything pleased my eye after your face.
Now the misfortune that has befallen the people occupies my mind, and there is no memory except that of a tender lover.

She replied, "And you—may you be made to live ten and seven years uninterrupted and eight right after them!" Then I took him away. He was brought forward and beheaded.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Abū Firās b. Abī Sunbulah al-Aslamī—some of the old men [of the Banū Aslam]—some who were present there, who said: She went up to him when he was beheaded, and she threw herself down on him and kept kissing him until she died beside him.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah b. Mas'ūd, who said: The Mes-
[1654] senger of God stayed in Mecca after its conquest for fifteen nights, shortening the prayers.[779]

According to Ibn Isḥāq: The conquest of Mecca took place ten nights before the end of the month of Ramaḍān in the year 8.[780]

779. Arabic: yaqṣuru al-ṣalāh, normally applied to the abbreviation of prayers allowed when one is on a journey (cf. Lane, Lexicon, VII, 2533). The implication is that Muḥammad did not consider his residence in Mecca permanent and intended to return to Medina.

780. I.e., 20 Ramaḍān (11 January 630).

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME IX

The Last Years of the Prophet

TRANSLATED AND ANNOTATED BY ISMAIL K. POONAWALA

The Events of the Year 8 (cont'd)

(May 1, 629–April 19, 630)

An Account of the Messenger of God's Expedition against the Hawāzin[1] and the Battle of Ḥunayn[2] [1654]

Concerning the affairs of the Messenger of God, the Muslims, and the [clans of] Hawāzin, we have received an account on the authority of both ʿAlī b. Naṣr b. ʿAlī al-Jahḍamī[3] and ʿAbd al-Wārith b. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAbd al-Wārith[4]—ʿAbd al-Ṣamad [b. ʿAbd al-

1. A large North Arabian tribe or a group of tribes. They were bitterly hostile to Quraysh because of the trade rivalry between Mecca and al-Ṭā'if, since they were either the inhabitants of the latter city or in close alliance with its people. *EI*², s.v. Hawāzin; Kalbī, Jamharah, 115. See below n. 11.

2. A deep and irregular valley where the great battle took place. It is situated at a day's journey from Mecca on the road to al-Ṭā'if. *EI*², s.v. Ḥunayn; Ḥamīdullāh, Battlefields, 42–43. Watt's remarks in his Muhammad at Medina, 70–72, give proper perspective to this expedition, as both Hawāzin and Thaqīf were old enemies of Quraysh due to the trade rivalry. Lings, Muhammad, 304–6, gives a vivid description of the battle.

3. ʿAlī b. Naṣr b. ʿAlī b. Ṣahbān b. Abī al-Jahḍamī al-Baṣrī died in 187/802–3. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 390.

4. Died in 252/866–67. Ibid., VI, 443–44.

Wārith][5]—Abān al-ʿAṭṭār[6]—Hishām b. ʿUrwah[7]—ʿUrwah:[8] The Prophet had been staying in Mecca[9] during the year of its conquest for only a fortnight[10] when [he received the news that the clans of] Hawāzin and Thaqīf[11] [were marching against Mecca and] had already encamped at Ḥunayn intending to fight him. Ḥunayn is a valley next to Dhū al-Majāz.[12] Both the aforementioned tribes had assembled before [their march] after hearing about the Messenger of God's departure from Medina,[13] thinking that he was intending [to invade] them. When they learned that he had occupied Mecca, Hawāzin marched against him [to Mecca] with their women, children, and possessions. Their leader was Mālik b. ʿAwf[14] from the Banū Naṣr.[15] [The clans of] Thaqīf joined forces with them and encamped at Ḥunayn intending to fight the Prophet. When the Prophet, still in Mecca, was informed about them he decided to march against them.[16] He met them at Ḥunayn, and God, the Great and Mighty, inflicted defeat on

5. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAbd al-Wārith b. Saʿīd al-ʿAnbarī al-Baṣrī died ca. 206/821–22. Ibid., VI, 327–28; Dhahabī, Tadhkirah, I, 344.

6. Abān b. Yazīd al-ʿAṭṭār al-Baṣrī. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 101–2.

7. Hishām b. ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr died ca. 164/780–81. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 133; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 48–51; Dhahabī, Tadhkirah, I, 144–45 [died in 146/763]; Sezgin, GAS, I, 88; Duri, Rise, 46, 78, 143, 147.

8. ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr, whose mother was Asmāʾ bt. Abī Bakr, died in 94/712–13. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 31–35; Dhahabī, Tadhkirah, I, 62–63; Sezgin, GAS, I, 278–79; Duri, Rise, passim.

9. See EI[2], s.v. Makka; Fahd, Panthéon, 203 ff.

10. Balādhurī [Ansāb, I, 364]: Twelve days.

11. A tribe settled in the district of al-Ṭāʾif which was their urban center. Most of the Thaqīf consider themselves descendants of Hawāzin, probably due to their common interests and geographical proximity. EI[1], s.v. Thaḳīf; Kalbī, Jamharah, 118.

12. A marketplace of Hudhayl about 6 km from ʿArafah. Hamdānī, Ṣifat, I, 180; Bakrī, Muʿjam, IV, 1185; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 55.

13. See EI[2], s.v. al-Madīna; Philby, Pilgrim, 50–92, gives a good description of its surroundings.

According to Wāqidī, Ibn Saʿd, and Ibn al-Athīr, Hawāzın and Thaqīf decided to march against Mecca because they feared that after the conquest of Mecca, the Prophet might confront them. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 364.

14. A Bedouin chief of the powerful Qaysī tribes of Hawāzin who owed his fame to the battle of Ḥunayn. He was thirty years old when he commanded the forces of Hawāzin and Thaqīf. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 885; EI[2], s.v. Mālik. b. ʿAwf; Sezgın, GAS, II, 268.

15. A Group of Hawāzin tribes. Kalbī, Jamharah, 115.

16. The Prophet left Mecca on Saturday, the seventh of Shawwāl and reached Ḥunayn on Tuesday evening, the tenth of Shawwāl. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 108.

them. God has mentioned this battle in the Qur'ān.[17] Since they had marched with their women, children, and flocks, God granted [1655] them as booty to His Messenger, who divided the spoils among those Quraysh who had [recently] embraced Islam.

Ibn Ḥumayd[18]—Salamah[19]—Ibn Isḥāq:[20] When Hawāzin heard about the Messenger of God and that God had given him victory over Mecca, Mālik b. ʿAwf al-Naṣrī gathered [his people] together. With Hawāzin, all of Thaqīf joined him, followed by all Naṣr and Jusham,[21] Saʿd b. Bakr,[22] and a few people from the Banū Hilāl.[23] These [clans] were the only ones from Qays ʿAylān[24] who participated [in Ḥunayn]. Neither Kaʿb[25] nor Kilāb[26] from Hawāzin participated, and no one of any importance from [these tribes] took part in the battle. Among Jusham was Durayd b. al-Ṣimmah,[27] a very old chieftain whose only use [for the others] was to derive blessing from his counsel and his knowledge of war because he was an experienced old chieftain. Thaqīf had two leaders: Qārib b. al-Aswad b. Masʿūd [b. Muʿattib][28] over the Aḥlāf

17. Because of their great number, the Muslims were elated, and one of the companions remarked, "Today we will not be overpowered on account of small numbers." Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 889; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 108 (it was Abū Bakr who made the above remark); Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 365 (it was either Abū Bakr or someone else); Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, II, 263 (it was the Prophet himself who made the above remark).

After the initial setback, the Muslims rallied around the Prophet and won the battle. Qur'ān 9:25–26, stating that the Muslims were elated with joy at their great numbers, was revealed after the victory. Nöldeke-Schwally, Geschichte, I, 224.

18. Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd b. Ḥayyān al-Rāzī al-Tamīmī died in al-Rayy in 248/862. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 127–31; Khaṭīb, Taʾrīkh, II, 259–64.

19. Salamah b. al-Faḍl al-Anṣārī died in 191/806. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 153–54.

20. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Yasār, one of the main authorities on the life of the Prophet, died in Baghdād ca. 150/767. *EI*², s.v. Ibn Isḥāḳ; Sezgin, GAS, I, 288–90; Duri, Rise, passim.

21. A group of Hawāzin tribes. Kalbī, Jamharah, 116; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 270.

22. A group of Hawāzin tribes. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 265.

23. A group of Hawāzin tribes. Ibid., 273.

24. One of the two subdivisions of Muḍar reckoned as constituting the sons of ʿAdnān, the so-called Northern Arabs. Kalbī, Jamharah, 92; *EI*², s.v. Ḳays ʿAylān.

25. A clan of Hawāzin. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 288–92.

26. A clan of Hawāzin. Ibid., 282–88.

27. A leader of the Banū Jusham, and one of the most powerful Bedouin opponents of Muḥammad, was considered as the greatest fāris poet. *EI*², s.v. Durayd b. al-Ṣimma; Sezgin, GAS, II, 267–68.

28. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.

(confederates),[29] and Dhū al-Khimār Subay' b. al-Ḥārith [b. Mālik][30] called al-Aḥmar b. al-Ḥārith, over the Banū Mālik.[31] The general command was in the hands of Mālik b. 'Awf al-Naṣrī.

When Mālik [b. 'Awf] decided to march against the Messenger of God, he took with his men their possessions, wives, and children. After making camp at Awṭās,[32] the men gathered around him. Among them was Durayd b. al-Ṣimmah, who was carried in [1656] a howdah (shijār).[33] As soon as he had encamped he inquired what valley they were in. When he was told that it was Awṭās, he said: "What a wonderful place for cavalry! Neither a rugged hill, nor a soft lowland full of dust. But why do I hear the groaning of camels, the braying of asses, the bleating of sheep, and the crying of children?" They told him that Mālik b. 'Awf had brought his men's children, wives, and possessions. He inquired where Mālik was and summoned him.[34] Then he said, "O Mālik, you have become the leader of your people. Indeed, this is a battle which will have great consequences. Yet why do I hear the groaning of camels, the braying of asses, the bleating of sheep, and the crying of children?" When Mālik replied that he had brought them with the men, Durayd inquired the reason. Mālik explained [that his purpose in bringing them] was to put every man's family and possessions behind him, so that he would fight [to the death] in their defense. Durayd made a sound[35] [indicating his dismay] and said, "By God, [you are] a sheep-tender. [Do you think] that anything will turn back a fleeing man? If everything goes in your favor, nothing will help you except a man with his sword and lance; if it goes against you, then you will be disgraced with your family and possessions." [Then Durayd inquired][36] what had hap-

29. Thaqīf is subdivided into two branches: al-Aḥlāf and Banū Mālik. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 374; Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. ḥ-l-f.

30. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.

31. Corrected from Wāqidī. Text: Dhū al-Khimār Subay' b. al-Ḥārith over the Banū Mālik, and his brother al-Aḥmar b. al-Ḥārith over the Banū Hilāl.

32. A valley in the Hawāzin territory where the battle of Ḥunayn took place. Bakrī, Mu'jam, I, 212: Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 281.

33. It signifies the wooden frame of the howdah which when covered becomes a howdah. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. sh-j-r.

34. As in S. Text: He was summoned.

35. Wāqidī: Durayd clasped his hands. I prefer this reading.

36. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.

pened to Ka'b and Kilāb. When he was told that not a single person from those two clans were present, he said, "Bravery and ardor are missing. Were it a day of noble and lofty deeds, Ka'b and Kilāb would not have stayed away. I wish that you had done what they have done!" Then he asked what clans were with them. When told [that they were] 'Amr b. 'Āmir and 'Awf b. 'Āmir, he replied, "Those two clans are recently formed branches of the Banū 'Āmir[37] and can neither be useful nor harmful. O Mālik, you have done no good by sending forward the best troops of Hawāzin [1657] [to meet] the main body of the cavalry. Dispatch them to the high and inaccessible parts of their land and meet the apostates (al-ṣubbā')[38] on horseback. If the battle goes in your favor, those in the rear can join you, and if it goes against you, you will have saved your families and possessions."[39] Mālik replied, "By God, I won't do [it].[40] You are an old, senile man, and your senility has affected your judgment. O people of Hawāzin, you will either obey me, or I will lean on this sword until it comes out of my back." He detested giving Durayd any say or credit in the matter. [The people responded by saying that they would obey him.][41]

---

37. A clan of Hawāzin. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 272, 281.

38. Al-Ṣābi'ūn, pl. of al-Ṣābi', is used in the Qur'ān 2:62; 5:69, 22:17, but not the pl. al-Ṣubbā'. Various explanations have been given as to who they were. The Sabaeans mentioned in the Qur'ān, and placed along with the Jews and Christians, are apparently the Mandaeans, a Judaeo-Christian sect practicing the rite of baptism in Mesopotamia. They were also called Christians of John the Baptist. The pagan Sabaeans of Ḥarrān may have adopted this name to secure toleration accorded by the Qur'ān. EI[1], s.v. al-Ṣābi'a; Andrae, Mohammed, 108–9; Rodinson, Mahomet, 146; Blachère, Coran (the above verses). For al-Ṣābi'ah today see al-Majallah: The International News Magazine of the Arabs, no. 354, Nov. 19–25, 1986, 49–53.

The lexicographers and some commentators of the Qur'ān, on the other hand, explain that the term means one who departs from his religion to another. They further state that this appelation was first given to Muḥammad because he departed from the religion of Quraysh, and that it was applied later to those who embraced Islam. Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, II, 145–47; Ṭabarsī, Majma', I, 126; Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. ṣ-b-'; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ṣ-b-'; Shahrastānī, Milal, II, 61–63 (gives slightly different explanation).

39. Wāqidī (Maghāzī, III, 886–89) states that Durayd was very old and had almost lost his eyesight. Despite his warning, the Hawāzin stayed with Mālik because they feared that if they disobeyed him, Mālik, being a young man, might kill himself, and then they would be left with an old man, Durayd, who might not fight.

40. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.

41. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.

Durayd, therefore, retorted by saying that the [coming] battle was one he would not witness [as a warrior] and would not miss, [and recited]:

Would that I were young!
I would ride gently and advance
Leading long and bushy-haired steeds
As if they were young ewes.

Durayd was the chief of the Banū Jusham, their leader and the noblest of them, but old age had overtaken him to the point that he had become feeble. His full lineage was Durayd b. al-Ṣimmah b. Bakr b. ʿAlqamah b. Judāʿah b. Ghaziyyah b. Jusham b.
[1658] Muʿāwiyah b. Bakr b. Hawāzin. Then Mālik told his men that when they saw the foe they should break their scabbards and charge them as one man.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Umayyah b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān: [I was told] that Mālik b. ʿAwf sent out spies to keep watch and to obtain intelligence of the enemy, but that they came back with their joints dislocated. When Mālik, expressing his distress, asked what had happened to them, they said, "We saw white men on black and white horses, and, by God, before we could resist we were struck as you see."[42] [This news], however, did not deter Mālik from pursuing the course he intended.

Ibn Isḥāq states: When the Messenger of God heard about Hawāzin and Thaqīf, he sent ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Ḥadrad al-Aslamī[43] to them and ordered him to mingle with the crowds and to stay there until he could gather information about them and bring back news of them. Ibn Abī Ḥadrad, therefore, went and mingled with them and stayed with them until he learned that they had decided to fight the Messenger of God. He also learned about the dispositions of Mālik and Hawāzin and what they had decided. He then returned and informed the Messenger of God. The Messenger of God called for 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb[44] and informed him about what Ibn Abī Ḥadrad had told him. Thereupon 'Umar said that he was lying. Ibn Abī Ḥadrad replied, "O 'Umar, you may accuse me of lying, but you denied the truth for a long time."[45] 'Umar said, "O Messenger of God, do you not hear[46] what Ibn Abī Ḥadrad says?" The Messenger of God answered, "You were in error and God guided you, O 'Umar."

42. They were three men. Mālik detained them on their return, fearing that his men might be scared at the news. He then sent another person to gather intelligence and he too met with the same fate. Wāqidī, Maghāzi, III, 892; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 108.

43. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 108.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Abū Ja'far Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Ḥusayn:[47] When the Messenger of God [1659] decided to march against Hawāzin, he was told that Ṣafwān b. Umayyah[48] had armor and weapons. Therefore, he sent to him, although he was at that time a polytheist, saying, "Lend us these weapons of yours so that we may fight our enemy tomorrow." Ṣafwān said to the messenger, "[Are you demanding them] by force, O Muḥammad?" The Messenger of God replied, "[No,] just [lend them] to us as a loan and a trust until such time as we return them to you." Ṣafwān said that in that case he did not have any objection and gave one hundred coats of mail with an adequate supply of arms. They allege that the Messenger of God asked him to provide for its transport and that he complied with the request.

Abū Ja'far Muḥammad b. 'Alī states: Thus it became a sunnah[49] that a loan with a guarantee [of its return] must be returned [or paid back].[50]

---

44. He was the second caliph and is considered the second founder of Islam. He was assassinated in 23/644. See EI[1], s.v. 'Omar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.

45. Ibn Isḥāq: O 'Umar, if you accuse me of lying, then many a time you have denied the truth. You have accused the one who is better than me [i.e., the Prophet] of lying. Wāqidī: You accuse me of lying, then many a time you have denied the truth.

46. Wāqidī: Do you hear?

47. The fifth Shī'ī imām, and a recognized authority on tradition, was the grandson of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. On account of his learning he was given the honorific title al-Bāqir (one who goes deep into things). See EI[1], s.v. Muḥammad b. 'Alī.

48. He fought the Muslim army entering Mecca, then surrendered. He died during 'Uthmān's caliphate (23–35/644–56). Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 25–110 passim, III/1, 167; III/2, 79, 95; IV/1, 15, 146, 147; V, 16, 338.

49. Usually, it means exemplary behavior, custom, or practice. Generally, it is used as sunnah of the Prophet, meaning his deeds, utterances, and unspoken approval of something. These actions and sayings of the Prophet were later established as legally binding precedents. See EI[1], s.v. Sunna.

50. Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, II, 122; Mishkat (trans. Robson), I, 632.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr:[51] The Messenger of God marched with two thousand Meccans and ten thousand of his companions [who had marched with him and][52] with whose support God had facilitated the conquest of Mecca. Thus they were twelve thousand in all. The Messenger of God placed 'Attāb b. Asīd b. Abī al-'Īṣ b. Umayyah b. 'Abd Shams[53] in charge of Mecca [to look after] the men who stayed behind while he proceeded to confront Hawāzin.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah[54]—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jābir[55]—his father [Jābir b. 'Abdallāh]:[56] When we approached the valley of Ḥunayn, we descended through a valley of the Tihāmah[57] [which was] wide and sloping. We descended gradually in the twilight of daybreak after the enemy had preceded [us].[58] We were waylaid by them in its bypaths, sidetracks, and narrow passes. They had collected [themselves] and were fully prepared. By God, were we frightened! As we were descending, the squadrons made their assault upon us like one man. [Our] people were routed and fled, no one turning around to look back at the other. The Messenger of God withdrew to the right [of the valley] and cried, "Where are you, O men? Come to me! I am the Messenger of God! I am Muḥammad the son of 'Abdallāh!" [It was of] no avail. The camels bumped

[1660]

51. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī died in 130/747–48, or 135/752–53. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 164–65; Sezgin, GAS, I, 284; Duri, Rise, 27, 34.

52. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.

53. He was a young man from the clan of Umayyah and had accepted Islam after the Meccans surrendered. He kept his position until his death in 13/634 [according to Wāqidī], or in 22/642–43 [according to Ṭabarī]. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 105; V, 330; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 89–90.

54. 'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah al-Anṣārī, who transmitted the traditions from Jābir b. 'Abdallāh and Anas b. Mālik, was one of the early scholars of the sīrah and died ca. 120/738. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III/2, 26; V, 257; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 53–54; Sezgin, GAS, I, 279–80; Duri, Rise, 27, 34.

55. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 153.

56. A companion of the Prophet, and one of the main transmitters of traditions, who swore allegiance to the Prophet at the first 'Aqabah meeting. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III/2, 114, states that he did not leave behind any progeny; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 433–34.

57. The narrow strip of lowland along the southwestern coast of Arabia is called the Tihāmah, and its greatest breadth is in the hinterland of Jiddah. EI[1], s.v. Tihāma.

58. Addition from Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq.

into one another and the men ran away except a few from among the Muhājirūn,[59] the Anṣār,[60] and [the Prophet's] own family, who remained with the Messenger of God. Among the Muhājirūn who stood firm with him were Abū Bakr[61] and 'Umar; from his family were 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib,[62] al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib[63] and his son al-Faḍl,[64] Abū Sufyān b. al-Ḥārith,[65] Rabī'ah b. al-Ḥārith,[66] Ayman b. 'Ubayd (who is Ayman b. Umm Ayman),[67] and Usāmah b. Zayd b. Ḥārithah.[68]

A man of Hawāzin on a red camel [who was carrying] in his hand a black banner mounted on the head of a long lance was leading his men. When he overtook someone, he pushed him

---

59. The Emigrants, an appellation applied in the Qur'ān to those followers of Muḥammad who had migrated from Mecca to Medina with him. EI[1], s.v. Muhādjirūn.

60. The Helpers, the designation of those who supported Muḥammad in Medina. EI[2], s.v. Anṣār.

61. He was the first caliph and died in 13/634. See EI[2], s.v. Abū Bakr.

62. Cousin and son-in-law of Muḥammad, first Shī'ī imām and fourth caliph, was assassinated in al-Kūfah in 40/661. See EI[2], s.v. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib; EIr, s.v. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭāleb.

63. An uncle of the Prophet who had participated in warfare against the Muslims at Badr. He joined Muḥammad as he was marching on Mecca and died ca. 32/653. EI[2], s.v. al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib.

64. He took part in washing of the Prophet (see Ṭabarī below, I, 1830). The authorities differ as to when he died; some state that he died during the caliphate of Abū Bakr, while others state that he died during the caliphate of 'Umar. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 375–76; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 280.

65. He was the Prophet's cousin. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 109, 112; IV/1, 11; VIII, 32, 34. Ibn Isḥāq adds the name of his son [Ja'far] to the above list, but Ibn Hishām comments that according to some authorities it was Qutham, the son of al-'Abbās. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 85–86.

66. He was the Prophet's cousin and died at the beginning of 'Umar's caliphate. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 109; IV/1, 10, 31, 32–33; VIII, 31; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 253–54.

Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 365, adds the following names to this list: 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib, al-Zubayr, and 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr.

67. He is Ayman b. 'Ubayd b. Zayd al-Khazrajī (from Balḥārith of Khazraj), hence Wāqidī lists him with the Anṣār. His mother Umm Ayman used to look after Muḥammad as a child. She had accompanied Āminah, Muḥammad's mother, to Medina when she visited her family. She died shortly after the Prophet's death. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 922; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/1, 73; II/1, 109; Dhahabī, 'Ibar, I, 13.

68. The son of Zayd b. al-Ḥārithah, the Prophet's freedman, was born in the fourth year of the mission. Just before his death, the Prophet put him in command of an expedition to avenge his fallen father at Mu'tah (see Ṭabarī below, I, 1794). EI[1], s.v. Usāma b. Zayd; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 473–76.

with his lance. When the people escaped from his lance he lifted it to those behind him so that they would follow him. When [the Muslims] were put to flight and the uncouth fellows from Mecca who were with the Messenger of God saw [the Muslims] in total disarray, some of them spoke [in such a way as to disclose] the hatred they had harbored [against one another]. Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb[69] said, "Their stampede will not stop until they reach the ocean!" He had the divining arrows with him in his quiver. Kaladah b. al-Ḥanbal,[70] who was present with his half-brother Ṣafwān b. Umayyah b. Khalaf, shouted, "Indeed, sorcery is useless today." Ṣafwān, who was at that time [still] a polytheist during a [1661] grace period granted him by the Messenger of God, said to him, "Shut up! May God smash your mouth! By God, I would prefer to be ruled by a man from Quraysh rather than a man from Hawāzin!"

Shaybah b. ʿUthmān b. Abī Talḥah,[71] a brother of the Banū ʿAbd al-Dār,[72] said, "Today I will avenge my father's death [from Muḥammad][73] (for his father was killed at Uḥud).[74] Today I will kill Muhammad. I made for the Messenger of God in order to kill him,[75] but something happened. I was overcome by a state of 69. He was a prominent Meccan merchant and an arch opponent of Muḥammad. When the Prophet marched on Mecca, he came out and submitted, and the Prophet guaranteed safety to those who took refuge with him. He died ca. 32/653. *EI*², s.v. Abū Sufyān.

---

70. His mother was a black woman. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 910; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 338.

71. He had taken a vow with Ṣafwān, after they had joined the Muslims marching to Ḥunayn, that they would avenge themselves upon Muḥammad. The reason for that was that Ṣafwān's father Umayyah b. Khalaf was killed at Badr, while Shaybah's father ʿUthmān b. Abī Ṭalḥah was killed at Uḥud. Wāqidī describes vividly how Shaybah made for the Prophet in order to kill him, but he was protected by his uncle ʿAbbās from the right and by his cousin Abū Sufyān from the left. See Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 909–10; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 28.

72. A clan of Quraysh and the descendants of ʿAbd al-Dār b. Quṣayy. Kalbī, Jamharah, 4, 17; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 125–28; see below (n. 1370 to Ṭabarī, I, 1827).

73. Addition from Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq.

74. A mountain about three miles north of Medina, celebrated for the battle fought there in 3/624–25 which ended unfavorably for the Muslims, *EI*¹, s.v. Oḥod; Ḥamīdullāh, Battlefields, 22–28 (gives its topography and a map of the battlefield).

75. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Ibn al-Athīr: I went around him to kill him.

inertness and was unable to do it. I then realized that he was protected from me."

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī[76]—Kathīr b. al-ʿAbbās[77]—his father al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib: I was with the Messenger of God, holding the bit of his white mule which I myself had inserted into the mule's mouth. I was a big man with a strong voice. The Messenger of God was saying when he saw his men in disarray, "Where are you, O men?" When he saw that they did not pay heed [to him] he said, "O ʿAbbās, cry loudly, 'O community of the Anṣār, O comrades of the Acacia Tree (al-samurah)!'"[78] ʿAbbās did as requested and they answered, "Here we are, here we are!"[79] Each man would try to turn his camel but could not do so; then he would take his armor and throw it on [his camel's] neck, take his sword and shield, and leap from his mount, letting it go its own way. Then he would follow the voice until he came to the Messenger of God. Finally, a hundred men gathered around [the Prophet]; they confronted the enemy, and fought.[80] At first the cry was "O for the Anṣār! [i.e., help the Anṣār]" and finally "O for Khazraj!"[81] They were steadfast in the battle, and the Messenger of God, standing in his [1662] stirups, looked down at the brave warriors as they were fighting and said, "Now, the fighting is fierce (ḥamiya al-waṭīs)."[82]

---

76. Muḥammad b. Muslim b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī, a celebrated traditionist and a historian, died in 124/742. EI[1], s.v. al-Zuhrī; Sezgin, GAS, I, 280–83; Duri, Rise, passim.

77. He was a traditionist and a skilled faqīh. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/1, 2.

78. Ibn Saʿd (Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 109) adds: O people of Sūrat al-Baqarah.

Al-Samurah, considered as an abode of a deity, was a sacred tree. The sanctuary of al-ʿUzzā, an old Arabian goddess, in the valley of Nakhlah (on the road from al-Ṭāʾif to Mecca), consisted of three samurah trees, in one of which she had revealed herself. It was also a tree under which the pledge of al-Riḍwān took place at the time of al-Ḥudaybiyah. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, III, 330; EI[1], s.v. al-ʿUzzā; Ryckmans, Religions, 8, 15; Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 33, 35, 46, 51.

79. Wāqidī, and Ibn Saʿd: They turned back as if they were camels yearning for their young ones, saying, "Here we are, here we are!"

80. The group consisting of thirty-three Muhājirūn and sixty-seven Anṣār was proclaimed by Gabriel as "The Hundred Steadfast People." Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 900–902.

81. One of the two main Arab tribes in Medina, who were more enthusiastic Muslims than the other tribe of al-Aws. EI[1], s.v. Khazradj.

82. Literally, it means the oven became vehemently hot. It is used as a proverb for a fierce fighting. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ḥ-m-y.

Hārūn b. Isḥāq[83]—Muṣ'ab b. al-Miqdām[84]—Isrā'īl[85]—Abū Isḥāq[86]—al-Barā':[87] Abū Sufyān b. al-Ḥārith was leading the Prophet's mule [by its halter] on the day of Ḥunayn. When the polytheists overwhelmed [the Muslims], the Prophet got off his mount and started reciting verses (in the rajaz meter):

I am the Prophet, it is no lie,
I am the son of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib!

No man stronger than him was ever seen.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jābir—his father Jābir b. 'Abdallāh: While that man from Hawāzin, the banner-holder on his camel, was doing what he did, 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and a man from the Anṣār[88] came down making for him. 'Alī came upon him from behind and hamstrung his camel so that it fell on its backside; the Anṣārī jumped on the man and struck him a blow which cut off his foot[89] and half of his shank, and he was thrown from his saddle.[90] The men fought and, by God, when those who had fled returned they found captives [already] bound. The Messenger of God turned to Abū Sufyān b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, who was one of those who stood fast with him that day and who became an excellent Muslim when he embraced Islam, as he was holding the 83. Hārūn b. Isḥāq b. Muḥammad al-Hamdānī al-Kūfī died in 285/898. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 2–3.

84. Muṣ'ab b. al-Miqdām al-Khath'amī al-Kūfī died in 203/818–19. Ibid., X, 165–66.

85. Isrā'īl b. Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq al-Sabī'ī al-Kūfī died in 162/778. Ibid., I, 261–63; Dhahabī, Tadhkirah, I, 214–15; idem, Mīzān, I, 208–10.

86. Abū Isḥāq 'Amr b. 'Abdallāh al-Sabī'ī al-Kūfī died in 127/745. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 63–67; Dhahabī, Tadhkirah, I, 114–16; Sezgin, GAS, I, 283.

87. Al-Barā' b. 'Āzib b. al-Ḥārith al-Awsī al-Anṣārī was a companion of the Prophet. He espoused the cause of 'Alī and fought with him at the Battle of the Camel, Ṣiffīn, and Nahrawān, and died in al-Kūfah ca. 72/691–92. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/2, 80–83; VI, 10; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 425–26; Sezgin, GAS, I, 63; *EI*², s.v. al-Barā' b. 'Āzib.

88. He was Abū Dujānah. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 902.

89. S: Which sent his foot flying.

90. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 902, adds that another man from the Hawāzin came to his rescue, but he too was killed. 'Alī, Abū Dujānah, Ayman, and 'Uthmān were fighting in front of the Prophet.

crupper of the [Messenger of God's] saddle and asked who it was. He replied, "Your mother's son,[91] O Messenger of God."

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: [1663] The Messenger of God turned and saw Umm Sulaym bt. Milḥān[92] who was with her husband Abū Ṭalḥah.[93] She had wrapped her waist with a garment and was pregnant with [her son] 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ṭalḥah. She had her husband's camel with her and was afraid that it would overpower her, so she drew its head close to her and put her hand in its halter with the nose-ring. The Messenger of God cried, "[Are you] Umm Sulaym?" She replied, "Yes, may you be ransomed with my father and with my mother, O Messenger of God! Kill those who flee from you as you kill those who fight you, for they deserve it." The Messenger of God replied, "Rather, God will suffice, O Umm Sulaym." She had a dagger in her hand. Her husband [was amazed and] asked her what it was, and she replied, "A dagger. I took it with me. If a polytheist had come close to me I would have slit open [his belly] with it!" He said, "O Messenger of God, do you hear what Umm Sulaym says?"

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Ḥammād b. Salamah[94]—Isḥāq b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ṭalḥah[95]—Anas b. Mālik:[96] On the day of Ḥunayn, Abū Ṭalḥah alone took the spoils of twenty men whom he had killed.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—his father [Isḥāq b. Yasār][97]—Jubayr b. Muṭ'im:[98] Before the people fled and

---

91. "Mother" is used here in the sense of a grandmother. It is also said that he answered, "Your brother, may my father and mother be your ransom, Abū Sufyān b. al-Ḥārith." Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 900.

92. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 902–4; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/1, 86; V, 53–54.

93. He was an archer and fought with the Prophet at Badr, Uḥud, and other battles. He died in 34/654–55. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III/2, 64–66.

94. Ḥammād b. Salamah b. Dīnār al-Baṣrī died in 167/783–84. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 11–16.

95. He was an Anṣārī and died ca. 132/749–50. Ibid., I, 239–40.

96. A companion of the Prophet and one of the most prolific traditionists died in al-Baṣrah between 91/709 and 93/711. He was given by his mother to the Prophet as a servant after the hijrah when he was ten years old. *EI*², s.v. Anas b. Mālik.

97. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 257.

98. Jubayr b. Muṭ'im b. 'Adī b. Nawfal b. 'Abd Manāf accepted Islam after the conquest of Mecca and died between 56/675–76 and 59/678–79. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 360; VIII, 39–40; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 63–64.

men were [still] fighting one another I saw something like a black striped garment descending from the sky until it dropped between us and the enemy. I gazed, and lo, it was [a mass of] black ants strewn [everywhere], which filled the valley. I had no doubt that they were angels and that the enemy would be routed.[99]

[1664] Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: After Hawāzin were routed, the killing of the Banū Mālik from among Thaqīf was heavy and seventy of them were killed beneath their banner.[100] Among those [killed] were ʿUthmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Rabīʿah b. al-Ḥārith b. Ḥubayyib, grandfather of Ibn Umm Ḥakam b. Abī Sufyān.[101] Their banner was with Dhū al-Khimār. When he was killed, ʿUthmān b. ʿAbdallāh took it and fought by it until he was killed too.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿĀmir b. Wahb b. al-Aswad b. Masʿūd: When [the news of] ʿUthmān's death reached the Messenger of God he said, "May God deprive him of His mercy! He used to hate the Quraysh."

ʿAlī b. Sahl[102]—Muʾammil[103]—ʿUmārah b. Zādān[104]—Thābit[105]—Anas [b. Mālik]: On the day of Ḥunayn, the Prophet was riding a white mule called Duldul.[106] When the Muslims fled, the Prophet said to his mule, "Duldul, cling [to this place]!" The mule laid its belly on the ground. The Prophet took a handful of dust and tossed it in the faces of the enemy, saying, "Ḥā Mīm,[107]

---

99. The angels fought with the Muslims at Badr and their sign was white turbans flowing behind them. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 285–86; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 905–6.

100. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 907, states that a hundred of them were killed.

101. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 380.

102. ʿAlī b. Sahl b. Qādim, also called Ibn Mūsā al-Ḥarashī, died in 261/874–75. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 329.

103. Muʾammil b. Ismāʿīl al-ʿAdawī died in 206/821–22. Ibid., X, 380–81.

104. ʿUmārah b. Zādān al-Ṣaydalānī al-Baṣrī. Ibid., VII, 416–17.

105. Thābit b. Aslam al-Banānī al-Baṣrī died in 123/740–41 or 127/744–45. Ibid., II, 2–4.

106. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 897; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 109; see Ṭabarī below, I, 1783.

107. At the battle of Badr, the Prophet took a handful of small pebbles, turned toward Quraysh, and threw at them, saying, "May God render their faces ugly!" Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 280.

Ḥā Mīm are the beginning letters of sūrah 46. Scholars differ widely in their interpretation of these mysterious letters at the beginning of certain *sūrah*s. Some they will not be victorious!"[108] The polytheists retreated; no sword was drawn, no arrow was shot, and no lance was thrust.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ya'qūb b. 'Utbah b. al-Mughīrah b. al-Akhnas:[109] With 'Uthmān b. 'Abdallāh, his young, uncircumcised Christian slave was [also] killed. While one of the Anṣāris[110] was plundering the slain of Thaqīf, he stripped the slave and found that he was uncircumcised. He yelled at the top of his voice, "[O you Arabs,][111] God knows that [1665] Thaqīf are uncircumcised!" Mughīrah b. Shu'bah[112] seized him by his hand, for he was afraid that [this news] about them would get out among the Arabs. He swore by his parents and begged him not to say it [to anyone], for the man concerned was only a Christian slave of theirs. He then started to uncover the slain and showed him that they were circumcised.

The Aḥlāf's banner was with Qārib b. al-Aswad b. Mas'ūd. When they were routed, he leaned it against a tree, and fled with his cousins and his people; hence only two men of the Aḥlāf were slain, one called Wahb from the Banū Ghiyarah,[113] the other see them as abbreviations of God's names, while others see them as abbreviations of the basmalah. Yet some others offer a variety of explanations ranging from mystical signs to numerical values.

---

Western scholars, beginning with Nöldeke, have also attempted various explanations, none satisfactory or convincing. Nöldeke (Geschichte, 215f.) suggested that they were the initials of the owners of the manuscripts used by Zayd when he first compiled the Qur'ān. Later he abandoned this hypothesis and adopted a view that they were meaningless symbols (Nöldeke-Schwally, Geschichte, II, 68–78). Loth ("Korancommentar") advocated an abbreviation theory, that is, that the letters are cabalistic symbols standing for certain key words and phrases in the sūrahs and that they are part of the revelation. Bellamy ("Mysterious letters") proposed that those letters are abbreviations for the basmalah. Watt, Bell's introduction, 61–65; Blachère, Introduction, 140–49.

108. Wāqidī: They will be vanquished, by the Lord of the Ka'bah. Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 113) reports that when the Prophet tossed dust in the faces of the enemy, their eyes became full of dust and they heard a rattling sound.

109. He was a faqīh in Medina and died in 128/745–46. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 392.

110. According to Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 911, he was Abū Ṭalḥah.

111. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq. Wāqidī: O you the Anṣār, I swear by God . . . .

112. He is known as one of the chief dāhiyyahs (one who could get himself out of the most hopeless difficulty) of his time and died between 48/668 and 51/671. EI[1], s.v. al-Mughīra b. Shu'ba.

113. The Banū Ghiyarah b. 'Awf b. Thaqīf. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 377; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 268.

called al-Julāḥ[114] from the Banū Kunnah.[115] When [the news] of al-Julāḥ's death reached the Messenger of God he said, "Today the leader of Thaqīf's youth has been slain except for Ibn Hunaydah." "Ibn Hunaydah" was al-Ḥārith b. Aws.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: After the polytheists were defeated, they came to al-Ṭā'if[116] while Mālik b. 'Awf was with them. Some of them encamped in Awṭās, while the Banū Ghiyarah[117] of Thaqīf went toward Nakhlah.[118] The Messenger of God's cavalry followed those who went to Nakhlah, but not those who took to the narrow passes. Rabī'ah b. Rufay' b. Uhbān b. Tha'labah b. Rabī'ah b. Yarbū' b. Sammāl[119] b. 'Awf b. Imr al-[1666] Qays, who was called Ibn Ladh'ah after his mother, overtook Durayd b. al-Ṣimmah and seized his camel by its halter, thinking that he was a woman because he was in a howdah. But lo, it was a man. He made the camel kneel down beside him and [found that] the man was very old. He was Durayd b. al-Ṣimmah, [but] the young man did not know him. Durayd asked him what he wanted to do with him. The young man replied that he wanted to kill him. Durayd asked him who he was, and he replied that he was Rabī'ah b. Rufay' al-Sulamī. He then struck him with his sword, but to no effect. Thereupon Durayd said, "What a poor weapon your mother has armed you with! Take this sword of mine that is at the rear of the saddle in the howdah and strike me with it above the spine but below the brain, for I used to slay men in that way. Then when you go to your mother inform her that you have killed Durayd b. al-Ṣimmah. By God, how many times I have protected your women!" The Banū Sulaym allege that Rabī'ah said, "When I delivered him the blow, his clothes fell open, and lo, his perineum and the interior of his thighs were like paper from riding horses unsaddled." When Rabī'ah returned to his mother, he in-

114. Wāqidī: Al-Lajlāj.

115. Ibn Isḥāq: Banū Kubbah. The Banū Kunnah were from the Ghāmidī tribe of Yemen. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 907; Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. gh-m-d.

116. A town seventy-five miles southeast of Mecca about five thousand feet above sea level in the mountains of Sarāt. EI[1], s.v. Ṭā'if; Ḥamīdullāh, Battlefields, 43–45.

117. S and Wāqidī: Banū 'Anazah.

118. A valley about two nights' journey from Mecca. Hamdānī, Ṣifat, I, 127, 173; Bakrī, Mu'jam, IV, 1304; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 277.

119. S and Ibn Ḥazm (Jamharah, 262): Simāk.

formed her that he had killed [Durayd] and she said, "By God, he set free three mothers of yours."[120]

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: The Messenger of God sent [his men] in pursuit of those who went toward Awṭās. Mūsā b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Kindī[121]—Abū Usāmah[122]—Burayd b. 'Abdallāh[123]—Abū Burdah[124]—his father [Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī]:[125] When the Prophet came from Ḥunayn, he sent Abū 'Āmir [al-Ash'arī][126] with an army to Awṭās. He encountered Durayd b. al-Ṣimmah [1667] and killed him[127] and God routed Durayd's companions.

Abū Mūsā [al-Ash'arī]: The Messenger of God sent me with Abū 'Āmir. When Abū 'Āmir was hit by an arrow, which stuck in his knee, shot by a man from the Banū Jusham,[128] I came to him and said, "O uncle, who shot you?" Pointing to the man, he said, "That one is my killer! You see him, that one shot me!" Abū Mūsā went after him and overtook him, but when the man saw

120. Wāqidī adds: "At one early morning and sheared off your father's forelock." The youth replied, "I was not aware of [it]."

121. Mūsā b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Masrūq al-Kindī al-Kūfī died in 258/871–72. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 355–56.

122. Ḥammād b. Usāmah b. Zayd al-Qurashī al-Kūfī died in 201/816–17. Ibid., III, 2–3.

123. Burayd b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Burdah b. Abī Mūsā al-Ash'arī. Ibid., I, 431–32.

124. Abū Burdah 'Āmir b. Abī Mūsā al-Ash'arī was one of the first qāḍīs of al-Kūfah and died in 103/721–22 or 104/722–23. *EI*², s.v. al-Ash'arī, Abū Burda.

125. He was from Yemen, and after accepting Islam migrated to Abyssinia and returned to Medina on the conquest of Khaybar. He is known as a lukewarm supporter of 'Alī, whom he represented as an arbiter after the battle of Ṣiffīn, but he was outwitted by 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ. He died ca. 42/662–63. *EI*², s.v. al-Ash'arī, Abū Mūsā.

126. He had accepted Islam before the conquest of Mecca. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/2, 75; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 144.

127. It conflicts with the preceding report that Durayd was killed by Rabī'ah b. Rufay'. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 97, comments that the person who killed Durayd was 'Abdallāh b. Qunay' b. Uhbān b. Tha'labah b. Rabī'ah. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 366, reports that Abū 'Āmir was killed by Ibn Durayd b. al-Ṣimmah, who in turn was killed by al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ash'arī.

128. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 99–100, states that he was shot by two brothers, al-'Alā' and Awfā, sons of al-Ḥārith from the Banū Jusham b. Mu'āwiyah. One arrow hit his heart, while the other hit his knee. Abū Mūsā attacked and killed both of them. Ibn Hishām adds another note describing Abū 'Āmir's bravery and states that he was challenged to a duel by ten men, all of them brothers. Abū 'Āmir accepted the challenge, killed nine of them and allowed the tenth, who later became a Muslim, to escape. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 915–16, reports a similar story and states that Abū 'Āmir killed nine contestants but was killed by the tenth. Cf. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 109.

him he fled. Abū Mūsā pursued him, calling out [loudly], "Aren't you ashamed of (yourself)? Aren't you an Arab? Won't you make a stand?" So he turned back. They confronted each other and exchanged two blows. Abū Mūsā killed him with his sword and returned to Abū ʿĀmir telling him that God had killed his enemy. Abū ʿĀmir asked him to remove the arrow [from his knee], and when he removed it water flowed from [the wound]. So he said [to Abū Mūsā], "O my nephew, go to the Messenger of God, give him my salutation (salām), and ask him to seek (God's) forgiveness for me." He then appointed Abū Mūsā in charge of the army and died shortly thereafter.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: It is alleged that Salamah b. Durayd was the one who shot Abū ʿĀmir with an arrow that hit him in his knee and killed him. Salamah b. Durayd said in this regard:

If you ask about me I am Salamah,
The son of Samādīr[129] to one who observes closely.
I smite with the sword the heads of the Muslims.

Samādīr was his mother; hence he traced his descent to her.

[1668] After his defeat, Mālik b. ʿAwf fled and stopped with some of his horsemen at a narrow pass on the road, asking them to wait until the weak ones and the others had caught up with them. They stopped there until the men from the defeated army caught up with them.[130]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—one of the Banū Saʿd b. Bakr: That day, the Messenger of God said to the horsemen whom he sent [in pursuit] that if they could get hold of Bijād, a man from the Banū Saʿd b. Bakr, then they should not let him escape, for he had done something evil.[131] When the Muslims seized him they herded him with his family and his sister al-Shaymāʾ bt. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā,[132] foster-sister

129. The name of his mother. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 365. It means weakness of sight, or else it signifies an affliction resembling vertigo. Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. s-m-d-r; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. s-m-d-r.

130. For more details about Mālik's escape, see Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 916–17.

131. Ibid., III, 913, states that he had brutally dismembered a Muslim and then set the dead body on fire.

132. She used to carry and look after the Prophet as a child. Ibn Isḥāq, Kitāb al-Mubtadaʾ, 25; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/1, 69.

of the Messenger of God, [like cattle] and treated her roughly. She told the Muslims that she was the foster-sister of the Messenger of God, but they did not believe her until they brought her to the Messenger of God.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Abū Wajzah Yazīd b. 'Ubayd al-Sa'dī:[133] When Shaymā' was brought to the Messenger of God, she said, "O Messenger of God, I am your foster-sister."[134] He said, "What is the proof of that?" She replied, "The bite you gave me on my back when I carried you at my hip." The Messenger of God acknowledged the proof, spread out his robe for her and asked her to sit on it. He then gave her the choice either to live with him in affection and honor or to go back to her people with compensation. She replied that she would prefer to return to her folk and he complied with her wish. The Banū Sa'd b. Bakr [1669] allege that the Messenger of God gave her a slave called Makḥūl and a slave girl.[135] She married them off, one with the other, and their progeny survives to this day.

Ibn Isḥāq: The following men were martyred at Ḥunayn:

From the Banū Hāshim[136] of Quraysh: Ayman b. 'Ubayd, the son of Umm Ayman, the Messenger of God's freed bondmaid.

From the Banū Asad b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā:[137] Yazīd b. Zama'ah b. al-Aswad b. al-Muṭṭalib b. Asad.[138] His horse, called al-Janāḥ, threw him and he was killed.

From the Anṣār: Surāqah b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Adī b. Bal'ajlān [or Banū al-'Ajlān].[139]

From the Ash'ariyyūn:[140] Abū 'Āmir al-Ash'arī.

---

133. Died in 130/747–48. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 349.

134. As in S and Ibn Isḥāq. Text: Sister. Lings, Muhammad, 306–7, gives a lively description of the meeting.

135. Before she left, she embraced Islam and the Prophet gave her three slaves, a slave girl, and a number of animals. For details, see Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 913–14.

136. The Banū Hāshim are the descendants of Hāshim b. 'Abd Manāf, the great-grandfather of the Prophet. Kalbī, Jamharah, 4; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 14–17; EI², s.v. Hāshim b. 'Abd Manāf. Wāqidī lists Ayman b. 'Ubayd among the Anṣār, which is more correct; see above, n. 67.

137. They are the Banū Asad b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. Quṣayy. Kalbī, Jamharah, 19; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 117–25.

138. He is not listed by Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 922. Instead of him, he lists Ruqaym b. Thābit al-Anṣārī.

139. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 109; VIII, 310.

140. A South Arabian tribe, descendants of al-Ash'ar, whose name was Nabt b. Udad b. Zayd b. Yashjub. Kalbī, Jamharah, 273; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 397–98.

The captives of Ḥunayn, along with their possessions, were brought to the Messenger of God, Mas'ūd b. 'Amr al-Qārī[141] overseeing the spoils. The Messenger of God then ordered that the captives and their possessions be taken to al-Ji'rānah[142] and held there in custody.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: When the defeated men of Thaqīf came to al-Ṭā'if, they shut the gates of the city and made preparations for war. Neither 'Urwah b. Mas'ūd[143] nor Ghaylān b. Salamah[144] witnessed Ḥunayn or the seige of al-Ṭā'if, [because] they were in Jurash[145] learning the use of the testudo (al-dabbāb and al-ḍubūr][146] and the catapult (al-majānīq).

[The Siege of al-Ṭā'if]

'Alī b. Naṣr b. 'Alī [al-Jahḍamī]—'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-Wārith—'Abd al-Wārith b. 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-Wārith—his [1670] father—Abān al-'Aṭṭār—Hishām b. 'Urwah—'Urwah: When he had finished at Ḥunayn, the Messenger of God and his companions went directly to al-Ṭā'if and encamped there for a fortnight, waging war against Thaqīf.[147] Thaqīf fought the Muslims from behind the fort and none came out in the open. All of the surrounding people surrendered and sent their delegations to the Messenger of God. After besieging al-Ṭā'if for a fortnight, the

141. Ibn Isḥāq: Mas'ūd b. 'Amr al-Ghifārī; Wāqidī, and Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 266): Budayl b. Waraqā' al-Khuzā'ī.

142. A well about 24 km from Mecca on the way to al-Ṭā'if. Hamdānī, Ṣifat, I, 120; Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 384 (where it is said that the Iraqis pronounce it al-Ji'irānah); Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 142.

143. He was the uncle of al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah and was married to Abū Sufyān's daughter. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 52–53; II/1, 70; IV/1, 184; IV/2, 25; V, 369–70, 373; VIII, 175. See Ṭabarī below, I, 1687.

144. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 52, 53; V, 369.

145. A town about 40 km southeast of Abhā. Jāsir, Sarāt, 42–49. Both Bakrī (Mu'jam, II, 376) and Yāqūt (Mu'jam, II, 126) list it as being in Yemen; however demarcation of the borders between the Yemen and the Ḥijāz was a problem. Cf. Ḥamīdullāh, Battlefields, 45–46. See n. 603, Ṭabarī, below, I, 1730.

146. Dabbāb is a machine made of skins and wood. It is used in war, propelled to the lower part of the fortress in order to make a breach therein, while the ḍubūr is a part of the dabbāb (testudo) that defends the men entering into the dabbāb from what is thrown upon them from above. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. d-b-b, ḍ-b-r.

147. Khālid b. al-Walīd was sent as the vanguard with cavalry from Sulaym. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 923. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/I, 114, states that the Thaqīf had stored enough provisions to last them for a whole year.

Prophet left and halted at al-Jiʿrānah where the captives of Ḥunayn were held with their women and children. It is alleged that those captives taken from the Hawāzin numbered six thousand with women and children. When he reached al-Jiʿrānah, the delegations of Hawāzin came to the Prophet and embraced Islam. Therefore, he set all their women and children free and decided to make the lesser pilgrimage [directly] from al-Jiʿrānah. The month was Dhū al-Qaʿdah. After that, the Messenger of God returned to Medina, put [ʿAttāb b. Asīd][148] in charge of Mecca, and asked him to perform the greater pilgrimmage with the people and to ensure their safety. [He also left behind with him Muʿādh b. Jabal][149] to instruct [the people] in Islam. When he reached Medina, the delegations of Thaqīf arrived, brought the dispute (mentioned earlier) before him, and gave him the oath of allegiance, which consisted of a document that they wrote and signed with him.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—ʿAmr b. Shuʿayb:[150] The Messenger of God journeyed from Ḥunayn to al-Ṭāʾif by the way of Nakhlat al-Yamāniyyah,[151] Qarn,[152] al-Mulayḥ,[153] and Baḥrat al-Rughāʾ[154] of Liyyah.[155] There he built [i.e., at Baḥrat al-Rughāʾ] a mosque and prayed in it. After he arrived that day, he permitted [1671] retaliation for homicide. That was the first time [this practice]

148. Corrected by me. Text: Abū Bakr. It conflicts with all other sources and with al-Ṭabarī's own statement that ʿAttāb b. Asīd was appointed by the Prophet over Mecca. See n. 53 above and Ṭabarī below, I, 1685. It was ʿAttāb who led the people for the greater pilgrimage also. Cf. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/I, 105; V, 330.

149. Addition from text in Ṭabarī, below, I, 1685. The text in this place seems to be badly corrupted. Muʿādh b. Jabal al-Anṣārī was a prominent companion of the Messenger of God. He died in the plague of ʿAmwās in Syria in 18/639–40 when he was thirty-eight. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 107–9; III/2, 120–26.

150. ʿAmr b. Shuʿayb b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 180; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 48–55.

151. A valley about a night or two nights' journey from Mecca toward the Yemen. Bakrī, Muʿjam, IV, 1304; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 277–78.

152. Qarn al-Thaʿālib, about twenty-four hours' journey from Mecca, was a meeting place for the people of Najd. Bakrī, Muʿjam, III, 1067; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 332.

153. A valley near al-Ṭāʾif. Bakrī, Muʿjam, III, 1167–68; IV, 1259; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 196.

154. A place in the district of al-Ṭāʾif. Bakrī, Muʿjam, I, 229; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 346.

155. A valley about 13 km east of al-Ṭāʾif. Hamdānī, Ṣifat, I, 120–21; Bakrī, Muʿjam, III, 1167–68; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 30; Jāsir, Sarāt, 10–11.

was allowed in Islam. A man of the Banū Layth[156] had killed a man of Hudhayl,[157] so the Messenger of God killed him. While he was in Liyyah, the Messenger of God ordered that the fortress of Mālik b. 'Awf be demolished.[158] He then followed a road called al-Ḍayqah [i.e., the narrow, strait].[159] As he was passing through it he inquired about its name. When he was told that it was al-Ḍayqah, he said, "No, rather it is al-Yusrā [i.e., the easy]." Then he went by Nakhb[160] and halted under a lote tree called al-Ṣādirah near the property of a man of Thaqīf. The Messenger of God sent word to him either to come out or else his walled garden would be destroyed.[161] He refused to come out, so the Messenger of God ordered the walled garden to be destroyed.[162]

Then the Messenger of God went on until he halted near al-Ṭā'if and pitched his camp there. Some of his companions were killed by arrows, because the camp had been placed very close to the walls of al-Ṭā'if and the arrows were reaching them.[163] The Muslims were unable to get through its wall, for [the inhabitants] had shut the gate against them. When his comrades were killed by arrows, the Prophet moved to higher ground and pitched his camp near where his mosque stands today. He besieged them for some twenty days.[164] He had two of his wives with him, one of 156. The Banū Layth b. Bakr b. 'Abd Manāt b. Kinānah. Kalbī, Jamharah, 36; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 180, 183, 465.

157. A tribe of northern Arab descent that occupied much of the territory west and east of Mecca and up into the mountains toward al-Ṭā'if. It was closely related to Kinānah and consequently to Quraysh. *EI*², s.v. Hudhayl. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 924, states that the man of Layth, who had killed a man from the Hudhayl, was apprehended and brought before the Prophet. The people gathered and quarrelled in the Prophet's presence, so he turned the man over to the men of Hudhayl who killed him.

158. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 925, states it was burnt.

159. It is often used for a narrow wādī, perhaps impassable when in flood. Serjeant, "Translation," 9.

160. A valley near al-Ṭā'if. Bakrī [Mu'jam, IV, 1301–2]; Nakhib; Yāqūt [Mu'jam, V, 275]: Nakhib or Nakhab.

161. Wāqidī: Burnt.

162. Wāqidī: Burnt.

163. Al-Ḥubāb b. al-Mundhir had pointed out to the Prophet that the camp was very close to the fortress. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 925–26.

164. Ibn Hishām: It is said for seventeen days. Wāqidī: Some state eighteen days, others nineteen days, and yet others fifteen days. Ibn Sa'd: eighteen days.

whom was Umm Salamah bt. Abī Umayyah.[165] Al-Wāqidī states that the other was Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh.[166] He pitched two tents for them and prayed between the tents as long as[167] he stayed there. After Thaqīf surrendered, ʿAmr b. Umayyah[168] b. Wahb b. Muʿattib b. Mālik built a mosque over the place where the Messenger of God had prayed. There was a column in that mosque about which [1672] it is alleged that the sun never rises over it any day without a creaking noise being heard from it.[169] The Messenger of God besieged Thaqīf and fought them bitterly. Both sides shot arrows at each other[170] until the day when the wall of al-Ṭāʾif was stormed (shadkhah).[171] [That day] a number of the Messenger of God's companions went under a testudo and advanced up to the wall [to make a breach in it].[172] Thaqīf showered them with scraps of hot iron, so they came out from under [the testudo], and Thaqīf shot them with arrows, killing some of them. The Messenger of God then ordered that the vineyards of Thaqīf be cut down, and the men fell upon them, cutting them down.[173]

Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb and al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah went up to al-Ṭāʾif and cried out to Thaqīf to assure their safety so that they could speak to them. When they guaranteed them safety, they called upon the women of Quraysh and Banū Kinānah[174] to come out to them, for they were afraid that they would be taken cap-

---

165. See Ṭabarī, below, I, 1771.

166. See Ṭabarī, below, I, 1772–73.

167. Hisch and Ibn Isḥāq: Then; Wāqidī, Ibn Saʿd: As long as.

168. Corrected from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, Wāqidī, and Ibn Ḥazm (Jamharah, 268). Text: Abū Umayyah b. ʿAmr.

169. Wāqidī adds: More than ten times, hence the people considered that noise [a form of] glorification of God (tasbīḥ).

170. Ibn Hishām (Sīrah, IV, 126) adds: The Messenger of God shot at them with catapults. A person whom I trust related to me that the Messenger of God was the first to use the catapult in Islam, as he employed it against the people of al-Ṭāʾif.

171. Its literal meaning is to break or crush. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. sh-d-kh.

172. Addition from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Wāqidī. The testudo and the catapult were brought by the Muslims, cf. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 923, 927; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 366, 367.

173. For a different version, see Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 928–29.

174. A large Muḍarī tribe (Kinānah b. Khuzaymah b. Mudrikah b. al-Yās b. Muḍar b. Nizār b. Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān), which had its camping grounds in the territory around Mecca. Quraysh derived their origin from them. See *EI*², s.v. Kināna.

tive, but they refused [to come out]. Among them were Āminah bt. Abī Sufyān,[175] who was married to 'Urwah b. Mas'ūd, by whom she had [the son] Dāwūd b. 'Urwah.[176]

Al-Wāqidī[177]—Kathīr b. Zayd[178]—al-Walīd b. Rabāḥ[179]—Abū
[1673] Hurayrah:[180] When fifteen days of siege had passed at al-Ṭā'if, the Messenger of God consulted Nawfal b. Mu'āwiyah al-Dīlī[181] and asked his opinion about continuing [the siege]. He replied, "O Messenger of God, [they are like] a fox [hiding] in its den. If you persist [in your siege], you will capture it, and if you leave it, it will not harm you."

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: It has been reported that the Messenger of God said to Abū Bakr b. Abī Quḥāfah while he was besieging Thaqīf in al-Ṭā'if, "O Abū Bakr, I saw [in a dream] that I was presented with a large bowl filled with butter and that a cock pecked at it and spilt it." Abū Bakr replied, "O Messenger of God, I don't think that you will attain what you desire from them today." The Messenger of God responded that he did not think so either.[182]

Then Khuwaylah[183] bt. Ḥakīm b. Umayyah b. Ḥārithah b. al-

---

175. According to Ibn Hishām and Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 175), she was Maymūnah bt. Abī Sufyān. Āminah was married to someone else, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 129; VIII, 68.

176. Ibn Isḥāq adds two more names: And al-Firāsiyyah bt. Suwayd b. 'Amr b. Tha'labah, whose son was 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Qārib, and al-Fuqaymiyyah Umaymah, daughter of the intercalator Umayyah b. Qal'. Cf. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 929. When those women refused to come out, Ibn al-Aswad b. Mas'ūd spoke to Abū Sufyān and al-Mughīrah about saving his own property from destruction. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 126; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 926–27.

177. Abū 'Abdallāh Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī, an early Arab historian, died in 207/823 in Baghdād. EI[1], s.v. al-Wāḳidī; Sezgin, GAS, I, 294–97; Duri, Rise, passim.

178. Kathīr b. Zayd al-Aslamī died during the caliphate of al-Manṣūr (136–58/754–75) Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 413–15.

179. Walīd b. Rabāḥ al-Dawsī died in 117/735. Ibid., XI, 133.

180. Although he embraced Islam less than four years before the Prophet's death, he is noted as a prolific narrator of traditions. He died between 57/676–77 and 59/678–79. EI[2], s.v. Abū Hurayra.

181. He had fought against the Muslims at Uḥud, and accepted Islam after the conquest of Mecca. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/1, 81; II/1, 114; III/2, 57, 85, 119.

182. Dreams and their interpretations play an important role in the biography of the Prophet; see Fahd, Divination, 247ff.

183. Both Wāqidī (Maghāzī, III, 935) and Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, III/1, 292; VIII, 113) give her name as Khawlah. Khuwaylah is a diminutive form. Her husband Awqaṣ al-Sulamiyyah, wife of 'Uthmān b. Maẓ'ūn, requested the Messenger of God that if God granted him victory over al-Ṭā'if, he would give her the jewelry of Bādiyah bt. Ghaylān b. Salamah,[184] or that of al-Fāri'ah bt. 'Uqayl,[185] for they were the most be-jeweled[186] women of Thaqīf.

Ibn Isḥāq: It has been reported that the Messenger of God told her, "And if [the victory] over Thaqīf is not granted to me, O Khuwaylah?" Khuwaylah left and told 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb [what had happened], so he came to the Messenger of God and asked him whether what Khuwaylah had said was true. The Messenger of God replied, "Yes, I said it." [Thereupon 'Umar] said, "Is [victory] over them not to be granted, O Messenger of God?" On [1674] hearing the Messenger of God's answer [in the affirmative], 'Umar asked if he should give the order to depart, and after receiving permission he announced the departure.[187]

When the people began to move out, Sa'īd[188] b. 'Ubayd b. Asīd[189] b. Abī 'Amr b. 'Ilāj al-Thaqafī cried out that [al-Ṭā'if] was holding out [against the siege]. 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn[190] responded, "Yes, admirably and nobly!" One of the Muslims[191] said to him, "May God smite you, O 'Uyaynah! Do you praise the polytheists for holding out against the Messenger of God while you [yourself] have come to assist him?" He replied, "By God, I did not come to fight Thaqīf with you, but I wished Muḥammad to be victorious over al-Ṭā'if, so that I might obtain a slave girl from Thaqīf whom

---

'Uthmān b. Maẓ'ūn was one of the early converts and a very pious person. He died in 3/624–25 in Medina. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/1, 90, 114–15, 136; III/1, 286–92, 298.

184. She was later married to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 933, 935; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III/1, 90.

185. As vocalized in the text. In other sources it is not vocalized and could be 'Aqīl.

186. Wāqidī: Prettiest.

187. Some people were not happy to depart without the victory. Both Abū Bakr and 'Umar had to convince them that the Prophet was acting according to revelation. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 936–37; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 115; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 73.

188. Wāqidī: Sa'd.

189. C: Asad; Wāqidī: Asīd b. 'Amr.

190. 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn al-Fazārī had fought several times against the Muslims. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 932–33 (story about his hypocrisy); Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 180; II/1, 45, 47, 51–52, 58, 87, 110–11, 115–16; III/1, 65.

191. Wāqidī: 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ.

I might make pregnant[192] so that she might bear me a son, for Thaqīf are clever people (manākīr)."[193]

At al-Ṭā'if, twelve of the Messenger of God's companions were martyred, seven from Quraysh, one from Banū Layth, and four from the Anṣār.[194]

[The Division of the Booty Captured at Ḥunayn and Gifts of Conciliation]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Then the Messenger of God left al-Ṭā'if and went [by way] of Daḥnā[195] until he halted at al-Ji'rānah with the Muslims who were with him. When he marched to al-Ṭā'if, he had sent the captives of Hawāzin to be detained in al-Ji'rānah. Thus the delegations of Hawāzin came to him there. The Messenger of God held six thousand captives from the children and women, and innumerable camels and sheep.[196]

[1675] Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Amr b. Shu'ayb—his father[197]—his grandfather 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b.

---

192. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Wāqidī: Whom I might tread.

193. This is a pun, a play on the word manākīr, because its singular munkar generally means an action disapproved by sound intellect, or deemed to be bad, or anything pronounced to be abominable by the law. Here it is not used in this general sense but as rajul^{un} nakir^{un}, meaning a man who possesses intelligence with cunning. Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. n-k-r; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. n-k-r.

Wāqidī (Maghāzī, III, 937): For Thaqīf are gifted with a blessing (mubārakūn). He further states that, when 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb informed the Prophet what 'Uyaynah had said, he smiled and said, "[The man exhibits] an acceptable foolishness." (He is an agreeable fool.)

Ibn Isḥāq (Sīrah, IV, 127–28) states that during the siege of al-Ṭā'if some of the slaves came out, embraced Islam, and were set free by the Prophet. Cf. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 931–32 (they numbered from thirteen to nineteen).

194. For their names, see Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 129; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 938.

195. Wāqidī adds: Then passed by Qarn al-Manāzil and Nakhlah. Daḥnā is a district of al-Ṭā'if. Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 545–46; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 444.

196. According to Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq, and it concurs with what is stated earlier (see Ṭabarī, I, 1670). Text: Held a large number of captives from the women and children of Hawāzin, six thousand camels, and an immense number of sheep. According to Wāqidī (Maghāzī, III, 943–44), there were six thousand captives, twenty-four thousand camels, and about forty thousand sheep. In addition to that, the Muslims captured four thousand ūqīyahs [about 1/12 raṭl or forty dirhams to the ūqīyah; see n. 983 below] of silver. Cf. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 110.

197. Shu'ayb b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 356.

al-ʿĀṣ:[198] The deputation of Hawāzin came to the Messenger of God while he was in al-Jiʿrānah and embraced Islam. Then they said, "O Messenger of God, we are of noble origin and we are kinsfolk. The disaster which has befallen us is not hidden from you. Please show us favor, since God has granted you favor." Then a man of Hawāzin from [the clan of] the Banū Saʿd b. Bakr (it was this clan who nursed the Messenger of God) called Zuhayr b. Ṣurad[199] and nicknamed Abū Ṣurad, stood up and said, "O Messenger of God, among the detainees are your paternal and maternal aunts and the ones who suckled you and looked after you. Had we provided al-Ḥārith b. Abī Shimr[200] or al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir[201] with foster-parents[202] and then got into the situation in which you now hold us, we could hope for his favor and kindness. [We know that] you are the best of protectors."[203] Then he recited [the following] verses:

Have mercy on us, Messenger of God, out of generosity, for you are the man [from whom] we hope and treasure [as our own].
Grant favor to [your] kinfolk[204] whom fate has frustrated, and whose fortunes are shattered by the vicissitudes of fate.

---

198. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ accepted Islam before his father and died ca. 65/684–85. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 125; III/1, 180, 181; V, 132; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 337–38; Dhahabī, Tadhkirah, I, 41–42; Duri, Rise, 78, 93, 98n.

199. He headed the Hawāzın delegation which consisted of fourteen men. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/1, 72; II/1, 111.

200. ʿAbd al-Salām Hārūn (Nawādir al-makhṭūṭāt, II, 221) suggests the reading "Shamir." Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 325.

He was a Ghassānid king to whom the Prophet sent a letter inviting him to accept Islam. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 17; III/1, 66. About the Prophet's correspondence with foreign rulers, see below Ṭabarī, I, 1741, n. 677. The Ghassānids, the clients and auxiliaries of Byzantium, were swept away by the Muslim conquest of Syria, see *EI*², s.v. Ghassān; Shahîd, "Pre-Islamic Arabia," 22.

201. He was the last king of the house of the Lakhmids, the Arab client-kingdom of the Persians. *EI*¹, s.v. Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir; *EI*², s.v. Lakhm.

202. Ibn Hishām: Another tradition states: Had we shared our salt with.

203. C: The best of hosts.

204. Bayḍah literally means an egg. It is used metaphorically to signify a woman, likening her thereto in color and in respect of her being protected. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. b-y-ḍ.

The Messenger of God said, "Are your sons and wives dearer to you or your possessions?" They replied, "O Messenger of God, you have given us the choice between our honor and our possessions, so give us back our wives and sons, for they are dearer to us." He said, "As for what I and the Banū ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib have [of your goods], they are yours. When I have prayed [the noon prayer][205] with the people, then [stand up and][206] say, 'We ask the Messenger of God's intercession with the Muslims, and the Muslims' intercession with the Messenger of God for our sons and wives.' I will then give them to you and will request [the Muslims] on your behalf." When the Messenger of God had prayed the noon prayer with the people, they stood up and spoke as he had asked them, and he did what he had promised to do. The Muhājirūn said that what was theirs was the Messenger of God's, and the Anṣār said the same. Al-Aqraʿ b. Ḥābis [al-Tamīmī],[207] however, said that as far as he and the Banū Tamīm[208] were concerned, [they would not agree to give up their share]. ʿUyaynah b. Ḥiṣn also refused on behalf of himself and the Banū Fazārah,[209] and so did ʿAbbās b. Mirdās [al-Sulamī][210] for himself and the Banū Sulaym.[211] The Banū Sulaym, however, said, "[Yes],[212] what is ours is the Messenger of God's." Therefore, ʿAbbās said to them that they had rendered him a coward. Then the Messenger of God said, "He who holds to his share of these captives shall have six camels for every captive from the first booty we take." So the Muslims returned the women and children to their kinsfolk.[213]

[1676]

---

205. Addition from Wāqidī.

206. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.

207. Addition from S and Ibn Saʿd (Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 36, 40, 85, 145; II/1, 110–11, 116). He was a Bedouin chief.

208. For the Banū Tamīm, see Kalbī, Jamharah, 59; Ibn, Ḥazm, Jamharah, 207, 466–67.

209. A branch of Qays. Kalbī, Jamharah, 92, 130; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 255–59.

210. Addition from S. He was a leader of ʿAbs b. Rifāʿah of Sulaym, and was renowned as a warrior and as a poet. He died during the caliphate of ʿUthmān (23–35/644–56). *EI*², s.v. ʿAbbās b. Mirdās; Sezgin, GAS, II, 242–43.

211. They are a branch of Qays. Kalbī, Jamharah, 92, 122; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 261–64.

212. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.

213. For further details, see Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 952; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 111–12.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Abū Wajzah Yazīd b. 'Ubayd al-Sa'dī: From the captives of Ḥunayn, the Messenger of God gave 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib a slave girl called Rayṭah bt. Hilāl b. Ḥayyān b. 'Umayrah b. Hilāl b. Nāṣirah b. Quṣayyah b. Naṣr b. Sa'd b. Bakr; and he gave 'Uthmān b. 'Affān[214] a slave girl called Zaynab bt. Ḥayyān b. 'Amr b. Ḥayyān; and he gave 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb a girl whom 'Umar gave to [his son][215] 'Abdallāh.[216] [1677]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Nāfi'[217]—'Abdallāh b. 'Umar: The Messenger of God gave 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb a slave girl from the captives of Hawāzin and 'Umar gave her to me. I sent her to my maternal aunts from the Banū Jumaḥ[218] to prepare [and get her ready][219] for me until I had circumambulated the Ka'bah and returned to them, wanting to take her when I returned. When I had finished and came out of the mosque, the men were rushing away. When I asked the reason why, they told me that the Messenger of God had given them back their wives and children. I told them that that girl of theirs was with the Banū Jumaḥ and that they should go and get her, so they went and took her. As for 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn, he had taken an old widow of Hawāzin and said when he took her, "I see that she is an elderly lady of standing in the tribe. Perhaps her ransom might be high." When the Messenger of God returned the captives for six camels each, 'Uyaynah refused to return her. Zuhayr Abū Ṣurad told him to let her go, for her mouth was neither cold nor were her breasts swelling; she could not conceive, her milk was not rich, and her husband would not care. After Zuhayr had told him this, he returned her for six camels.[220] They allege that 214. The third caliph whose assassination in 35/656 led to the first civil strife in Islam. See EI[1], s.v. 'Othmān b. 'Affān.

215. Addition from Hisch and Ibn Isḥāq.

216. 'Abdallāh, son of the second caliph, was one of the prominent personalities of the first generation of Muslims and a frequently quoted authority for traditions. He died in 73/693. EI[2], s.v. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Umar. Most of the companions received a slave girl. For details, see Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 943–44.

217. A freedman of 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/1, 109, 121, 123, 125–26, 133.

218. They are Jumaḥ (= Taym) b. 'Amr b. Huṣayṣ b. Ka'b b. 'Adī. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/1, 105; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 159.

219. Addition from Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq.

220. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 952–54, gives a different version and states that in the beginning her son offered to pay a ransom of a hundred camels, but 'Uyaynah,

[when] 'Uyaynah met al-Aqra' b. Ḥābis he complained to him
[1678] about it, so he said, "By God, you did not take her as virgin[221] in her prime nor even full-figured in her middle age!"

The Messenger of God asked the Hawāzin delegation about Mālik b. 'Awf and what he did. They told him that he was in al-Ṭā'if with Thaqīf. The Messenger of God told them to inform him that if he came to him embracing Islam, he would restore his family and possessions to him and give him a hundred camels.[222] When Mālik was informed about it, he left al-Ṭā'if. He was afraid that Thaqīf might imprison him if they knew what the Messenger of God had said about him, so he ordered that his mount be prepared for him and that a horse be brought to him in al-Ṭā'if. He slipped away at night, came [to the place] where his mount was tethered,[223] mounted his horse, and rode off until he overtook the Messenger of God in al-Ji'rānah or Mecca. The Messenger of God returned him his family and property and gave him a hundred camels. He embraced Islam and became a good Muslim. The Messenger of God put him in charge of his kinfolk and the tribes around al-Ṭā'if who had embraced Islam. [Those tribes were] Thumālah, Salimah, and Fahm.[224] Then he began to fight Thaqīf with them; their flocks could not come out [of al-Ṭā'if] without being raided by him and he tightened the noose around them.[225] Abū Miḥjan b. Ḥabīb[226] b. 'Amr b. 'Umayr al-Thaqafī said:

Enemies have dreaded our vicinity, but now the Banū Salimah are engaged in warring and plundering us.
Mālik brought them on us, breaking his covenant and solemn word.

---

wanting a higher price, declined the offer. Finally, he had to release her without any ransom.

221. Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq: Of fair complexion.

222. Mālik's family were brought to Mecca and were lodged with their relatives. His possessions were also kept aside and were not divided with the other booty. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 954–55; Lings, Muhammad, 310.

223. It was in Daḥnā. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 955.

224. All the three were clans of Azd. Kalbī, Jamharah, 210, 211; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 376–79.

225. From those raids, Mālik used to send the khums to the Prophet. Once he sent a hundred camels and then a thousand sheep. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 955.

226. Wāqidī [Maghāzī, III, 930, 932, 935]: Ḥubayb. He was one of the leaders of Thaqīf.

They raided us in our settlements, though we were men who retaliated.[227]

(This is the end of Abū Wajzah's report. To return to the report of 'Amr b. Shu'ayb:)[228] After the Messenger of God had completed the return of the captives of Ḥunayn to their families, he rode [1679] away and the people[229] followed him, saying, "O Messenger of God, divide our booty of camels and small cattle among us," until they forced him back against a tree and his mantle was pulled away from him.[230] He said, "O men, give me back[231] my mantle! By God, if I had as many sheep as the trees of the Tihāmah I would have divided them among you. You have not found me miserly or cowardly or a liar." Then he stood near his[232] camel and took a hair from its hump and holding it aloft in his fingers said, "O men, by God, I do not have anything of your booty, even to this hair, except the fifth, and that fifth will be returned to you. So bring back the needle and the thread, for dishonesty will be a shame, a flame,[233] and a disgrace on the Day of Judgment."[234] A man from the Anṣār came with a ball of hair thread, and said, "O Messenger of God, I took this ball to make a pad for my sore camel." He replied, "As for my share in that, you can keep it." The man said, "If it has come to that, I don't want it," and he threw it away.[235] (This is the end of 'Amr b. Shu'ayb's report.)

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: The Messenger of God gave [gifts] to those "whose hearts were to be reconciled (al-mu'allafa qulūbuhum)," who were certain 227. For Mālik's reply, see Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 956.

---

228. See Ṭabarī, above, I, 1675.

229. Wāqidī: On the way the Bedouins kept on asking him.

230. Either it was caught by the tree or was pulled away by the Bedouins.

231. Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq: Bring back my mantle to me. Cf. Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 140; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1246; Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 183.

232. As in C. Text and Ibn Isḥāq: Near a camel.

233. It means a flame of hell-fire.

234. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 366.

235. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 135, relating another story, states that when the Prophet ordered his men to return whatever they might have taken, even to a needle, 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib returned the needle which he had taken.

236. It is used in the Qur'ān 9:60, where it states: "Charity is [meant] only for the poor, the needy, those working at [collecting and distributing] it, those [possible converts] whose hearts are being reconciled [to yours], for freeing captives and those who are in debt, and in the cause of God, and for the wayfarer, as a men of eminence, in order to conciliate them and to win over their hearts.[237] He gave a hundred camels each to the following:[238] [1680] Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb; his son Mu'āwiyah;[239] Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām;[240] al-Nuḍayr[241] b. al-Ḥārith b. Kaladah b. 'Alqamah, a brother of the Banū 'Abd al-Dār; al-'Alā' b. Ḥārithah al-Thaqafī,[242] an ally of the Banū Zuhrah;[243] al-Ḥārith b. Hishām;[244] Ṣafwān b. Umayyah; Suhayl b. 'Amr;[245] Ḥuwayṭib b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. Abī Qays;[246] 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn; al-Aqra' b. Ḥābis al-Tamīmī; Mālik b. 'Awf al-Naṣrī. These men [became known as] "Men of the Hundreds." He gave less than a hundred camels to the following men duty imposed by God." The term is applied here to certain tribal chiefs and influential men whose loyalty the Prophet endeavored to secure by lavish gifts given out of the khums. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 944, 948; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. a-l-f; Lings, Muhammad, 308–9.

---

Watt (Muhammad at Medina, 74, 348–52) argues that the above Qur'ānic term cannot be applied to the men who received gifts at al-Ji'rānah. Its application to the leading Meccans, who received fifty or a hundred camels, was probably the work of the "pious opposition" in Medina during the Umayyad period in the early part of the second/eighth century.

237. Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq: And to reconcile through them their people.

238. See the list compiled by Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 73–74.

239. He was the first Umayyad caliph. EI[1], s.v. Mu'āwiya. Abū Sufyān's son Yazīd also received a hundred camels. In addition to those camels, both the brothers and their father also received forty *ūqīyah*s each of silver. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 944–45; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 110. Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 75, states that the mention of Abū Sufyān's sons is doubtless a device to conceal the favor shown to him by Muḥammad.

240. He was a nephew of the Prophet's wife Khadījah. He asked for more camels and so was given some. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 945 (he got three hundred); Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 179; II/1, 97, 110; III/1, 27; IV/1, 6, 45 (he got two hundred).

241. Ibn Isḥāq: Al-Ḥārith; Ibn Hishām: Nuṣayr, it is possible that his name was al-Ḥārith. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 331–32, 352, gives his name as al-Nuḍayr b. al-Ḥārith B. 'Alqamah b. Kaladah b. 'Abd Manāf b. 'Abd al-Dār b. Quṣayy.

242. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 110 (he got fifty).

243. A clan of Quraysh. The Prophet's mother was from this clan. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/1, 50–51, 82, 137; II/1, 8; Kalbī, Jamharah, 4, 20; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 128, 464.

244. Al-Ḥārith b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. Makhzūm b. Yaqaẓah b. Murrah died in 18/639. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 946; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 110; III/1, 167; V, 1.

245. He headed the Meccan delegation which negotiated the treaty of Ḥudaybiyah. His son 'Abdallāh had accepted Islam and had migrated to Abyssinia. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 946; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 42, 70, 71, 88, 98, 110; III/1, 295–96.

246. He was one of the witnesses for the treaty of Ḥudaybiyah. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 946; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 25, 71, 88, 97, 110.

of Quraysh: Makhramah b. Nawfal b. Uhayb al-Zuhrī;[247] 'Umayr b. Wahb al-Jumaḥī;[248] Hishām b. 'Amr,[249] a brother of the Banū 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy.[250] The exact number [of camels] given to them is not preserved,[251] but it is known, as alleged, that it was less than a hundred. He gave fifty camels to Sa'īd b. Yarbū' b. 'Ankathah b. 'Āmir b. Makhzūm[252] and to al-Sahmī.[253] He gave 'Abbās b. Mirdās al-Sulamī some camels,[254] but he was not pleased with them and reproved the Messenger of God saying:

It was pillage that I acquired, [1681]
by charging on my colt in the rugged plain.
And I kept the people awake lest they should sleep.[255]
When they slept I kept watch.
My pillage and that of al-'Ubayd[256] is parceled out between 'Uyaynah[257] and al-Aqra'.[258]
In battle I repel the enemy, leaving myself unprotected. Yet I was given nothing except a few young camels, to the number of their four legs!
Neither Ḥiṣn nor Ḥābis excel Mirdās[259] in the assembly, and I am not inferior to either of them.
He whom you demean today will not be exalted.

---

247. His mother was a granddaughter of Hāshim. He was a genealogist, and the Prophet gave him fifty camels. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 946 (some authorities state that he did not get any); Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 110; III/1, 212; VIII, 35, 161–62, 180 (he got fifty).

248. He had fought against the Muslims at Badr. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 10 (not mentioned among those who received gifts); Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 161.

249. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 946; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 110 (he got fifty).

250. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 166.

251. Ibn Isḥāq: I do not remember [exactly] what was given to them, but I know that it was less than a hundred.

252. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 946; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 110.

253. Ibn Hishām: His name was 'Adī b. Qays.

254. Wāqidī (Maghāzī, III, 946–47) states that he was given four camels; Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 110) on the other hand, states that he got forty.

255. And I urged the warriors to journey in the night: Wāqidī (Maghāzī, III, 947); he also gives the Prophet's comment on this poem.

256. The name of his horse.

257. He is 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn. See above.

258. He is al-Aqra' b. Ḥābis. See above.

259. He is the poet's father.

The Messenger of God said [to them], "Go and cut off his tongue from me," so they gave him more [camels] until he was satisfied. This was what the Messenger of God meant by his order "to cut off his tongue."[260]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ḥārith:[261] One of the companions of the Messenger of God[262] said to him, "O Messenger of God, you have given ʿUyaynah b. Ḥiṣn and al-Aqraʿ b. Ḥābis a hundred camels each and left out Juʿayl b. Surāqah al-Ḍamrī."[263] He replied, "By Him in whose hand is my soul,[264] Juʿayl b. Surāqah is better than an entire world [1682] full of men like ʿUyaynah b. Ḥiṣn and al-Aqraʿ b. Ḥābis; but I have treated them generously so that they may embrace Islam, and I have entrusted Juʿayl b. Surāqah to his Islam."

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Abū ʿUbaydah b. Muḥammad[265]—Miqsam Abū al-Qāsim,[266] manumitted slave of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal:[267] I went with Talīd b. Kilāb al-Laythī to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ while he was circumambulating the Kaʿbah with his sandals in his hand, and we asked him whether he was present when the Tamīmī man spoke to the Messenger of God on the day of Ḥunayn. He replied affirmatively, saying that a man from the Banū Tamīm called Dhū al-Khuwayṣirah came and stood by the Messenger of God as he was giving gifts to the people and said, "O Muḥammad, I have seen what you have done today." The Messenger of God replied, "Well, what did you see?" He said, "I don't think you have been 260. Cf. Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 184; other sources supporting this interpretation are indicated.

Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 137–38, states that the Prophet gave gifts to some people of Quraysh and other tribal chiefs because they had accepted Islam. His list, as well as that of Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 945–46, contains some additional names.

261. His grandfather was a Muhājir and he died ca. 120/738. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 5–7.

262. Wāqidī, Ibn Saʿd (Ṭabaqāt, IV/1, 180–81): Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ.

263. He was one of the early converts and a destitute one of the Muhājirūn. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/1, 180–81.

264. Ibn Isḥāq: Muḥammad's soul.

265. Abū ʿUbaydah b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmmār b. Yāsir. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhib, XII, 160–61.

266. He died in 101/719–20. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 217, 346–47; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 288–89.

267. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib died in 79/698–99 or 84/703. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/1, 30; V, 217, 346–47; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 180–81.

fair." The Messenger of God became angry and said, "Woe to you! If justice is not to be found with me, then with whom is it to be found?" 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb asked the Messenger of God to allow him to kill the man, but he said, "No, leave him, for he will have a following that will penetrate so deeply into religion that they will come out of it as an arrow comes out of the target; one looks at the head and there is nothing on it; then one looks at its butt end and there is nothing on it; [then one looks at its notch and there is nothing on it].[268] It passed through [the target] before flesh and blood could stick to it."

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Abū Ja'far Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī: A similar account is reported, and the man's name is Dhū al-Khuwayṣirah al-Tamīmī.[269]

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: It is reported on the authority of Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī[270] that the man who uttered the above words was speaking to the Messenger of God about the booty which 'Alī had sent to the Messenger of God from Yemen, which he distributed among a group consisting of 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn, al-Aqra' [b. Ḥābis], and Zayd al-Khayl.[271] Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī then affirmed that the man was Dhū al-Khuwayṣirah.[272] [1683]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: A companion of the Prophet[273] who was present at Ḥunayn with him said, "By God, I was wearing rough sandals and riding my mount by the side of the Messenger of God. When my camel crowded his, the toe of my sandal hit the Messenger of God's leg and hurt him. He hit my foot with the whip and said, 'You have hurt me, get behind me!' and so I went behind. The following day, the Messenger of God was looking for me, and I thought it was because I had hurt his leg the day before, so I went 268. Addition from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq and Wāqidī (Maghāzī, III, 948–49; he gives a slightly different version).

269. Ibn Ishāq adds another chain of authorities to the same account.

270. Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī al-Anṣārī used to give legal opinions in Medina and died in ca. 63/682–83. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 124, 127; V, 132; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 78–80.

271. Zayd al-Khayl b. Muhalhil, known as Zayd al-Khayr, was the head of the Ṭayyi' delegation. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 59–60. See Ṭabarī, below, I, 1747–48.

272. For a different version, see Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, II, 540–41.

273. Abū Ruhm al-Ghifārī: Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 939–40; he also gives additional stories. This incident happened while the Prophet was returning from al-Ṭā'if to al-Ji'rānah. Cf. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/1, 179–80.

expecting [a reprimand]; but he said, 'Yesterday you hit my leg and hurt me, and I hit your foot with the whip. Because of this I have called you to recompense you for it,' and he gave me eighty female sheep for the one blow he struck me."

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah—Maḥmūd b. Labīd[274]—Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī: When the Messenger of God had distributed those gifts among Quraysh and the Bedouin tribes, and the Anṣār got nothing from it, this group of Anṣār took [the matter] to their hearts and talked volubly about it until one of them said, "By God, the Messenger of God has joined his kinsfolk!"[275] Sa'd b. 'Ubādah[276] went to the Messenger of God and said, "O Messenger of God, this group of Anṣār have a grudge against you for what you did with the booty and how you divided it among your own people, and by giving great [1684] gifts to the Bedouin tribes while this group of Anṣār got nothing." He said, "Where do you stand in this matter, O Sa'd?" He said, "I stand with my kinsfolk." The Prophet said, "Then gather your people in [this][277] enclosure." Sa'd went out and did so, and when a number of the Muhājirūn came, he allowed some to come in and sent back the others. When all of them had assembled, he went and informed the Prophet, who came to them. After due praise and exaltation of God, he addressed them saying: "O community of Anṣār, what is this talk I hear about you? [What is] the grudge you have harbored in your hearts [against me]? Did I not come to you when you were erring and God guided you; [were you not] needy and then made rich by God; [were you not] enemies and [did not] God reconcile your hearts?" They answered, "Yes

274. Maḥmūd b. Labīd al-Awsī al-Anṣārī died ca. 96/714–15 in Medina. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 65–66.

275. Wāqidī (Maghāzī, III, 956 ff.) adds: At the time of war we are his companions, but at the time of distribution [of spoils] his clan and people. We would like to know whether this is from God or his personal view. If it is from God, we will be patient, but if it is his personal view, then we will censure him. When this news reached the Messenger of God, he became very angry.

276. Sa'd b. 'Ubādah al-Khazrajī, who was present at the second pledge of al-'Aqabah, was a champion of Islam and several times had acted as standard-bearer in the expeditions. After the death of 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy, he became undisputed head of the Khazraj and was proposed by the Anṣār as their head after the Prophet's death. When Abū Bakr was elected caliph, he refused to give him his oath of allegiance and left Medina for Ḥawrān, where he died ca. 15/636–37. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 250; EI[1], s.v. Sa'd b. 'Ubāda. See Ṭabarī, below, I, 1817f.

277. Addition from: Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Wāqidī.

indeed, God and His Messenger are gracious and kind." He said, "Why do you not answer me [directly], O Anṣār?" They said, "What shall we answer you, O Messenger of God? Kindness and graciousness belong to God and His Messenger." He said: "Now then, by God, had you wished you could have said—and you would have spoken the truth and have been accepted as truthful—'You came to us [when your message] was rejected [by the Quraysh] and we believed in you; [you were] forsaken and we assisted you; [you were] evicted and we sheltered you; [you were] needy and we comforted you.' O Anṣār, you harbor a grudge [against me] because of the worldly things by which I conciliate a people so that they may embrace Islam, while I entrust you to your Islam. Are you not pleased, O Anṣār, that people should take away sheep and camels while you go back to your homes with the Messenger of God?[278] By Him in whose hand is the soul of Muḥammad, were it not for the migration (hijrah),[279] I would have been one of the Anṣār myself. If all the people went one way and the Anṣār another, I would take the way of the Anṣār.[280] O [1685] God, have mercy on the Anṣār, their sons and their sons' sons!" The people wept until the tears ran down their beards and said that they were pleased with the Messenger of God as their lot and good fortune. Then the Messenger of God departed and they dispersed.[281]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Then the Messenger of God left al-Ji'rānah to make a lesser pilgrimage,[282] and ordered 278. Some of the Anṣār said, "God forgive the Messenger of God! He is giving to Quraysh and leaving us out, yet our swords are dripping with their blood." Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 274; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1367–68; transmitted by both Bukhārī and Muslim.

279. The migration of the Prophet from Mecca to Medina in September 622. *EI*², s.v. Hidjra.

280. Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 275; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1368; transmitted by Bukhārī and Muslim.

281. Lings, Muhammad, 311–12. Ibn Hishām (Sīrah, IV, 140–41) has reproduced a poem of Ḥassān b. Thābit reproaching the Prophet for giving away those gifts to the Quraysh while the Anṣār got nothing. Contrary to Ibn Hishām's view, some authorities state that the poem in question was composed on the occasion of the conquest of Mecca, expressing the Anṣār's displeasure because the Prophet gave precedence to the Banū Sulaym and to Khālid b. al-Walīd over the Anṣār when the Muslims entered Mecca. See Dīwān of Ḥassān, I, 265–66.

282. He left al-Ji'rānah on Tuesday evening, the eighteenth of Dhū al-Qa'dah for the lesser pilgrimage, returned to al-Ji'rānah and then left on Thursday for Medina. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, III.

that the rest of the booty be held back in Majannah,[283] which is [located] near Marr al-Ẓahrān.[284] When the Messenger of God completed the lesser pilgrimage and returned to Medina, he appointed ʿAttāb b. Asīd in charge of Mecca.[285] He also left behind with him Muʿādh b. Jabal[286] to instruct the people in religion and to teach them the Qur'ān. He was followed by the remainder of the booty. The Messenger of God's lesser pilgrimage was in Dhū al-Qaʿdah, and he arrived in Medina in the same month or in Dhū al-Ḥijjah.[287] The people made the pilgrimage that year as the Arabs used to do. ʿAttāb b. Asīd made the pilgrimage with the Muslims that [same] year, which was 8/630. The people of al-Ṭā'if persisted in their polytheism and obstinacy within their city from the time the Messenger of God departed from it in Dhū al-Qaʿdah [of the year 8/March 630] until the month of Ramaḍān of the following year/January 631.

Al-Wāqidī states that when the Messenger of God distributed the spoils among the Muslims in al-Jiʿrānah, every man got four camels and forty sheep, while each horseman received an additional share for his horse.[288] The Messenger of God arrived in Medina from this expedition toward the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah/April 630.

[1686] In this year, the Messenger of God sent ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ[289] to collect alms (ṣadaqah)[290] from Jayfar and ʿAmr,[291] the two clans 283. It was one of the marketplaces in pre-Islamic Arabia near a mountain, called al-Aṣghar, about 24 km from Mecca. Hamdānī, Ṣifat, I, 180; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 58–59.

284. A town on the route between Medina and Mecca about thirteen miles from the latter. It is now called Wādī Fāṭimah. Ḥarbī, Manāsik, 464—65; Al-Wohaibi, Hijaz, 151–56, 337ff.

285. Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, IV, 143, states that his allowance was a dirham a day.

286. Wāqidī adds: And Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī.

287. Ibn Hishām comments that the Prophet arrived in Medina on the twenty-fourth of Dhū al-Qaʿdah.

288. The horseman received 12 camels and 120 sheep. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 949.

289. He was known as the most wily politician of his time, but his real fame was due to his conquest of Egypt. He died ca. 42/663. *EI*², s.v. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ.

290. Ṣadaqah is used in two different senses: (1) as synonymous with zakāt, which is obligatory and its amount is fixed (it is used in this sense in the Qur'ān 9:58, 103); and (2) in the sense of voluntary almsgiving. Here it is used in the former sense. *EI*¹, s.v. Ṣadaḳa; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ṣ-d-q. See Watt's comments on zakāt and ṣadaqah in his Muhammad at Medina, 369–72.

291. Ibn Saʿd (Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 18); Ḥamīdullāh (Majmūʿah, 128): ʿAbd; Ibn Ḥazm (Jamharah, 384): ʿAbbād. Both the brothers were heads of the ruling group, the Julandā, in ʿUmān and had accepted Islam.

of al-Julandā from the Azd.[292] They allowed 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ to collect the alms [without interference], and so he collected it [only] from the rich and returned [what he took] to the poor. He collected the poll tax (jizyah)[293] from the Zoroastrians (al-Majūs)[294] who were indigenous to that region, while the Arabs lived in the surrounding countryside.

In the same year, the Messenger of God married al-Kilābiyyah who was called Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Sufyān.[295] When she was given the choice [to select between this world and the hereafter] she preferred this world. It is said that she asked the Messenger of God's protection, so he left her. Ibrāhīm b. Wathīmah b. Mālik b. Aws b. al-Ḥadathān[296] narrated on the authority of Abū Wajzah al-Sa'dī that the Prophet married her in Dhū al-Qa'dah.

In this year, in the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, Māriyah[297] gave birth to Ibrāhīm, and the Messenger of God entrusted him to Umm Burdah bt. al-Mundhir b. Zayd b. Labīd b. Khidāsh b. 'Āmir b. Ghanm b. 'Adī b. al-Najjār (her husband was al-Barā' b. Aws b. Khālid b. al-Ja'd b. 'Awf b. Mabdhūl b. 'Amr b. Ghanm b. 'Adī b. al-Najjār) for nursing.[298] Māriyah had received Salmā, freed bondmaid of the Messenger of God, who went to Abū Rāfi'[299] and informed him that Māriyah had given birth to a son. Abū Rāfi' then announced the good news to the Messenger of God, who gave him a gift of a slave. When Māriyah gave birth to a son, the Messenger of God's wives became very jealous.

(Jamharah, 384): 'Abbād. Both the brothers were heads of the ruling group, the Julandā, in 'Umān and had accepted Islam.

292. An ancient Arab tribe in the highlands of 'Asīr and in 'Umān. *EI*², s.v. Azd.

293. A tax levied on the ahl al-dhimmah (i.e., the possessors of a written scripture) in an Islamic state.

294. *EI*², s.v. Madjūs.

295. See below, n. 903 to Ṭabarī, I, 1774.

296. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 101–2.

297. She was a Coptic maiden sent by the Muqawqis to Muḥammad in 6/627–28 as a gift of honor, and the Prophet made her his concubine. *EI*², s.v. Māriya. See Ṭabarī, below, I, 1775, 1777.

298. For details see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/1, 86–93; Lings, Muhammad, 315; and below, n. 910 to Ṭabarī, I, 1775.

299. He was Salmā's husband. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/1, 86–93.

The Events of the Year

[1687]

9

(April 20, 630–April 8, 631)

In this year, the deputation of the Banū Asad[300] reportedly came to the Messenger of God. They said, "O Messenger of God, we came [to you] before you could send a messenger to us." Concerning their statement, God revealed: "They bestow a favor upon you [Muḥammad] that they have embraced Islam. Say: 'Do not count your embracing Islam as a favor to me; nay but rather God confers a favor upon you, in that He has guided you to the faith'."[301]

In this year, the deputation of Balī[302] came in the month of Rabīʿ I [June 18–July 17, 630] and stayed with Ruwayfiʿ b. Thābit al-Balawī.[303]

---

300. A North Arabian tribe which occupied a spacious region extending right across Arabia from Medina to the Euphrates. *EI*², s.v. Asad.

301. Qur'ān 49: 17. It refers to the Bedouins who were offering their submission more from self-interest than from sincere belief in Islam. Some commentators state that those verses were revealed about the Bedouins of Banū Asad. Wāḥidī, Asbāb, 281; Ṭūsī, Tafsīr, IX, 355; Nöldeke-Schwally, Geschichte, I, 223; Blachère, Coran, 550.

302. A branch of Quḍāʿah. Kalbī, Jamharah, 329; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 440–42; Samʿānī, Ansāb, II, 323–25; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 287.

303. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 83; III/2, 35; IV/2, 73; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 287.

In this year, the delegation of the Dāriyyūn from Lakhm[304] came. There were ten of them.

According to al-Wāqidī, in this year, 'Urwah b. Mas'ūd al-Thaqafī came to the Messenger of God and accepted Islam.[305] I have received the following account about 'Urwah on the authority of Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: When the Messenger of God departed from the people of al-Ṭā'if, 'Urwah b. Mas'ūd b. Mu'attib followed in his wake until he caught up with the Prophet before he reached Medina. 'Urwah then embraced Islam and asked the Prophet that he might return to his people as a Muslim. The Messenger of God said, so his[306] folk report, "They will fight you,"[307] for the Messenger of God knew the proud spirit of resistance that was in them. 'Urwah responded: "O Messenger of God, I am dearer to them than their firstborn."[308] He was indeed loved and obeyed by his people, so he went out summoning his people to Islam and hoping that they would not oppose him because of his position among them. When he appeared above them from his upper balcony, after having already summoned them to Islam and announcing to them his [new] [1688] religion, they shot arrows at him from every direction. One arrow struck ['Urwah] and killed him. The Banū Mālik allege that one of their men, whose name was Aws b. 'Awf,[309] brother of the Banū Sālim b. Mālik, killed him. But the Aḥlāf allege that one of their men called Wahb b. Jābir from the Banū 'Attāb b. Mālik killed him. 'Urwah was asked, "What do you think about your blood [being shed]?"[310] He replied: "[It is] an honor which God has 304. A clan of Lakhm. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 442; *EI*², s.v. Lakhm. For the delegates' names, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 75; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 287.

305. He returned from Jurash after the Prophet had left al-Ṭā'if [see Ṭabarī, above, I, 1669]. It is said that he was inspired by God to embrace Islam, so he went to Medina and accepted Islam. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 960ff., narrates his story with graphic detials. See also Lings, Muhammad, 313.

306. As in Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq. Text: Their folk.

307. Ibn Shabbah (Ta'rīkh, II, 470): I am afraid that they might kill you.

308. Hisch., Ibn Hishām: Eyesight; Wāqidī, Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 52): Their firstborn children. Ibn Shabbah (in another version): If they find me asleep, they will not awaken me [i.e., disturb me].

309. Later on he came to the Prophet with the Thaqīf delegation and accepted Islam. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 373–74.

310. It means: Should it be avenged? 'Urwah belonged to the Aḥlāf group (see Ṭabarī, above, I, 1655, n. 29), and his clan took up arms to avenge his blood, but he instructed them not to fight and gave up his blood for the sake of God. See Wāqidī for details.

bestowed on me and [an act of] martyrdom to which God has led me. I am only like the martyrs killed with the Messenger of God before he departed from you; so bury me with them." They did so and allege that the Messenger of God said about him that he was among his [own] folk like Yā Sīn[311] was among his.[312]

In this year, the deputation of the people of al-Ṭā'if came to the Messenger of God. It is said that they came in the month of Ramaḍān [December 12, 630–January 11, 631].

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: After killing 'Urwah, Thaqīf held out a few months. Then they deliberated among themselves [and determined][313] that they did not have the strength to fight the Arabs surrounding them who had given their oath of allegiance [to the Messenger of God], and who had accepted Islam.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ya'qūb b. 'Utbah b. al-Mughīrah b. al-Akhnas b. Sharīq al-Thaqafī: 'Amr b. Umayyah, brother[314] of the Banū 'Ilāj, had shunned 'Abd Yālīl b. 'Amr,[315] and there was ill feeling between the two. 'Amr b. Umayyah was one of the most cunning of the Arabs. He ambled over to 'Abd Yālīl b. 'Amr and entered his dwelling place. He then sent word to him that 'Amr b. Umayyah said, "Come out to me." 'Abd Yālīl said to the messenger: "Woe to you! Has 'Amr sent [1689] you?" The messenger replied: "Indeed, he is standing here in your dwelling place." 'Abd Yālīl then retorted, "I would not have thought that of 'Amr. He knows how to protect himself better than that." [So he came out],[316] and when he saw 'Amr he welcomed him. 'Amr said: "We have been dealt a situation from which there is no escape (hijrah).[317] Indeed, you have seen what

311. These are the mysterious letters at the beginning of the Qur'ān sūrah 36, generally construed as a title of the Prophet. Qurṭubī, Tafsīr, XV, 4–5; Blachère, Coran, 469 (abbreviation of yā insān, i.e., O men!). See also above (Ṭabarī, I, 1664, n. 107).

312. Ibn Shabbah adds: Who called his people to God and they killed him.

313. Addition from Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq.

314. Wāqidī: One of.

315. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 371. Yālīl was a name of a divinity, cf. Fahd, Panthéon, 197–99.

316. Addition from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Wāqidī.

317. The author makes a pun on this word as it has different meanings. The common meaning is attached to the Prophet's emigration from Mecca to Medina, but it is not intended here.

has transpired as regards this man [i.e., the Messenger of God]. All the Arabs have embraced Islam and you do not have the strength to make war against them, so consider your situation." Thereupon, Thaqīf deliberated among themselves, some saying to one another, "Don't you see that your herd is not safe, and none of you can dare go out without being cut off [from the town]." They deliberated [further] and decided to send a man to the Prophet as they had [previously] sent 'Urwah. They spoke to 'Abd Yālīl b. 'Amr b. 'Umayr, who was of the same age as 'Urwah b. Mas'ūd, but he declined to undertake the task. Fearing that he would be dealt with as was 'Urwah on his return, he said, "I am not doing anything until you send someone with me." Thus they agreed to send two men from the Aḥlāf and three from the Banū Mālik. There were six [all told]: 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ b. Bishr b. 'Abd Duhmān, brother of the Banū Yasār; Aws b. 'Awf, brother of the Banū Sālim [b. 'Awf];[318] Numayr b. Kharashah b. Rabī'ah, brother of Balḥārith;[319] and from the Aḥlāf, al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr b. Wahb b. Mu'attib and Shuraḥbīl b. Ghaylān b. Salimah b. Mu'attib.[320] 'Abd Yālīl then departed with them as leader of his folk and in charge of their affairs. He took them [i.e., the other five] with him because he feared he would be dealt with as was 'Urwah b. Mas'ūd, and he hoped that each man among them would keep his [own] clan occupied on their return to al-Ṭā'if.

When they drew close to Medina and dismounted at Qanāt,[321] they met al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah taking his turn at pasturing the mounts of the Messenger of God's companions (the task of pasturing the mounts was taken up in turn by each of the companions). When he saw them, al-Mughīrah left the mounts [with the Thaqafīs][322] and dashed off to give the Messenger of God the good tidings that they were coming to him. Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq met him[323] before he reached the Messenger of God, so he informed [1690]

318. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.

319. Ibn Isḥāq: Banū al-Ḥārith.

320. There were additional people in the delegation, see Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 963; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 53; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 283–84.

321. One of the three valleys of Medina. Ḥarbī, Manāsik, 411; Bakrī, Mu'jam, III, 1096; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 401.

322. Addition from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Wāqidī.

323. Wāqidī adds: At the door of the mosque.

Abū Bakr that a group of riders from Thaqīf had arrived with the intention of giving the oath of allegiance and embracing Islam, so that conditions might be set down for them and put in writing [in the presence of] the Messenger of God, guaranteeing [safety] to their folk, their land, and their possessions. Abū Bakr begged al-Mughīrah: "I swear by God on your behalf, don't beat me to the Messenger of God, so that I might be the first to break this news to him." Al-Mughīrah complied with this request, so Abū Bakr went to the Messenger of God and informed him that a group of riders from Thaqīf had arrived. Following that, al-Mughīrah[324] went back to his [Thaqafī] companions and brought the mounts back with them. He taught them how to greet the Messenger of God, as they were only used to the pagan salutation. [Narrators] allege that when they came to the Messenger of God, he erected a dome-shaped tent for them in the vicinity of his mosque (fī nāḥiyat masjidihi).[325] Khālid b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ[326] acted as intermediary between them and the Messenger of God until their treaty was written, and it was Khālid who drafted the treaty with his own hand. They would not eat the food sent to them from the Messenger of God until Khālid ate of it. [This behavior continued] until they embraced Islam, rendered their oath of allegiance and completed the drafting of their treaty.

Among the things which they had requested of the Messenger of God was that he should leave al-Ṭāghiyyah [i.e., the idol al-Lāt][327] alone, and not demolish it for three years. The Messenger of God refused that request of theirs, but they continued to ask

---

324. Al-Mughīrah went to the Prophet after Abū Bakr. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 964.

325. That is, because the Prophet spent most of his time in the courtyard of his mosque; it was here that he received delegates, conducted business, and addressed his followers. The mosque was, in fact, the center for the secular as well as the religious life of the community.

Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 965, states that the delegates stayed with al-Mughīrah and three tents were erected in the mosque so that they would sit there and observe the Muslims while praying and reciting the Qur'ān. Cf. Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, II, 502.

326. He was a rich member of the Umayyad clan. According to some traditions, he was the fourth convert to Islam and served the Prophet as one of his scribes. He refused to recognize Abū Bakr and offered his support to 'Alī. He died in 13/635. EI², s.v. Khālid b. Sa'īd; Jafri, Origins, 53.

327. The terms al-Ṭāghiyyah (literally means insolent or tyrannical), al-Ṭāghūt, and Rabbah (sovereign) were used for the idol al-Lāt. It was an old Arabian god-him to do it for a year or two, and he kept on refusing.[328] Finally, they asked if he could desist for a single month after their return [home], but the Messenger of God declined to allow the idol to remain for any specified time. [By persisting in their request] and showing their desire to leave [the idol alone], they were seeking to [1691] be safe from the fools among them [as well as from] their women and children. They did not wish to alarm their fellow tribesmen by destroying the idol until Islam had entered their [hearts]. The Messenger of God not only refused that request but sent Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb and al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah, who subsequently demolished it. In addition to leaving al-Ṭāghiyyah, they had asked that they be exempted from prayer and from smashing their idols with their own hands. The Messenger of God responded, "As for smashing your idols with your own hands, we shall let you off, but as for prayer there is no good in a religion which has no prayer." They said. "O Muḥammad, we will give in to you on this issue even though it is demeaning."[329]

When they had embraced Islam and the Messenger of God had drawn up their treaty for them, he appointed 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ[330] to be their leader, although he was the youngest among them. This was because he was the most zealous in his desire to study Islam and to learn the Qur'ān. Abū Bakr told the Messenger of God, "O Messenger of God, indeed I have seen this youth to be the most zealous among them in his desire to study Islam and to learn the Qur'ān."[331]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Ya'qūb b. 'Utbah: When they left the Messenger of God and turned toward their home-

---

dess whose sanctuary was near al-Ṭā'if, where a white stone, hung with all sorts of decorations, was her symbol. EI[2], s.v. al-Lāt; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ṭ-gh-a; Wellhausen, Skizzen, III, 25–29; Ryckmans, Religions, 15; Andrae, Mohammed, 17; Fahd, Panthéon, 111–20.

328. As in Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq. Text: And he refused.

329. The delegation asked that they be exempted from several other things, such as the interdictions on adultery, ribā (usury), and wine, which they considered troublesome obligations. Cf. Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, II, 502–3; Buhl, Leben, 332; Rodinson, Mahomet, 306.

330. According to Wāqidī (Maghāzī, III, 966), Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, VII/1, 26–27), and Ibn Shabbah, he had secretly embraced Islam soon after his arrival in Medina, and used to visit the Prophet, Abū Bakr and Ubayy b. Ka'b to learn the Qur'ān.

331. After accepting Islam, they fasted the remainder of Ramaḍān. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 185–86; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 968.

land, the Messenger of God dispatched Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb and al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah to demolish al-Ṭāghiyyah. The two traveled with the deputation until they approached al-Ṭā'if, at which point al-Mughīrah asked Abū Sufyān to precede him. Abū Sufyān re-[1692] fused, saying, "Go to your kinsfolk yourself,"[332] and stayed at his estate in Dhū al-Harm.[333] When al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah entered [al-Ṭā'if], he mounted the idol and struck it with a pickaxe while his folk, the Banū Mu'attib, stood by him, fearing that he might be shot at or struck as 'Urwah had been. The women of Thaqīf came out with their heads uncovered and said, lamenting the [loss of the] idol [i.e., the goddess]:

Oh, shed tears for the protector![334]
Ignoble ones have forsaken her, those not competent in wielding swords.

He said: While al-Mughīrah was striking the idol with the axe, Abū Sufyān was saying, "Alas for you, alas!"[335] When al-Mughīrah had demolished it, he took its treasure and ornamentation and sent [it] to Abū Sufyān. Its ornamentation was made up of various items, while its treasure consisted of gold and onyx. The Messenger of God had previously instructed Abū Sufyān to pay the debts of 'Urwah and al-Aswad, the sons of Mas'ūd,[336] from the property of al-Lāt, so he discharged their debts.[337]

In this year, the Messenger of God carried out the military expedition to Tabūk.[338]

---

332. That is, because al-Mughīrah was a Thaqafī from al-Ṭā'if.

333. Bakrī, Mu'jam, IV, 1352. It is also said that it was 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib's estate in al-Ṭā'if. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 403.

334. It is in rhymed prose. For Ibn Hishām's comment, see Sīrah, IV, 186.

335. As in C, Cairo, and Ibn Isḥāq. Text: Alas for you, welcome (ahlan) to you!

336. After the death of 'Urwah, his son Abū Malīḥ and his cousin Qārib b. al-Aswad left al-Ṭā'if, went to Medina, and embraced Islam. Before the Thaqīf delegation left Medina, they had requested the Prophet that the debts of their fathers be paid from the treasure of al-Lāt. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 186–87; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 962, 971; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 370.

337. On their return home, the delegation was received with hostility, and it took two or three days before the people of al-Ṭā'if abandoned the idea of waging war against the Prophet. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 969–71. For the text of the treaty, see Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 187; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 973. Rodinson, Mahomet, 306, states that the actual text of this treaty is lost.

338. A town on the northern frontier of Arabia beyond which Byzantine territory began. It was a way station on the pilgrim route between Damascus and Medi-

An Account of the Military Expedition to Tabūk

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: After his return from al-Ṭā'if, the Messenger of God stayed in Medina from Dhū al-Ḥijjah to Rajab [May 19–October 14, 631]; then he ordered the people to prepare for a military expedition against the Byzantines.[339]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq on the authority of al-Zuhrī, Yazīd b. Rūmān,[340] ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr and ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. Qatādah and others: Everyone transmitted what he had learned about the expedition to Tabūk and some people reported what others did not. All the reports agree, however, that the Messenger of God ordered his companions to prepare for the military expedition against the Byzantines.[341] This was a season when people were hard pressed; the heat was oppressive and the country was passing through a dry spell. At the time, fruit was ripe and shade was dearly sought. People love to stay where they have shade and fruit [trees], and find leaving them distasteful. The Messenger of God would seldom go out on a military expedition without alluding to a destination and announcing [publicly] that he meant [a place][342] other than that intended. The Tabūk expedition was the exception, in that he explained [the particulars of the expedition openly] to the people. This was because of the long distance, the difficult season, and the enemy's numerical superiority. He wanted the people to be fully prepared, so he ordered [1693] na. For its topography, pictures, and historical geography, see Musil, Ḥeǧâz, 161–70, 318–21; Philby, Midian, 113ff.; Jāsir, Shimāl, 423ff., 488–90; Al-Wohaibi, Hijaz, 272–76; EI[1], s.v. Tabūk, 339. It was the largest and the best-equipped army the Prophet had ever led. Wāqidī (Maghāzī, III, 1002, 1041) and Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 368) state that thirty thousand people took part in it. Lings, Muhammad, 317–19, gives a vivid description. For the Prophet's northern policy, see Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 105–17; Rodinson, Mahomet, 309ff.

---

340. Yazīd b. Rūmān al-Asadī died in 130/747–48. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 325.

341. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 989–92, 1019, states that the Prophet had received the news that the Byzantines were gathering troops and threatening to attack Medina. After reaching Tabūk, the Prophet discovered that the information he had received was exaggerated and decided to return to Medina. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 368.

For the question as to whether Muḥammad was trying to liberate the Arab auxiliary army in the service of the Emperor, or was trying to expand Islam beyond the boundaries of Arabia, see Buhl, Leben, 322–23; Andrae, Mohammed, 168.

342. Addition from Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq.

them to make ready and informed them that his objective was the Byzantines. They prepared themselves despite their dislike for that approach and what it entailed, as well as their respect for the Byzantines and their fighting ability.

One day, while the Messenger of God was making preparations for this expedition, he said to Jadd b. Qays,[343] brother[344] of the Banū Salimah:[345] "Would you like, O Jadd, to fight the Banū Aṣfar [sons of the Yellow/Red One][346] this year?" He said: "O, Messenger of God, please excuse me [from this] and do not tempt me. By God, my folk know no better admirer of women than I. I fear that if I see the women of the Banū Aṣfar I shall not be able to control myself." The Messenger of God turned away from him saying, "I excuse you." It was about al-Jadd that the following verse was revealed: "Among them is a man who says, 'Grant me exemption [to stay at home] and tempt me not [into trial].' Have they not already fallen into trial? Indeed hell encompasses the unbelievers."[347] ["Tempt me not"] meant that he feared tempta-[1694] tion from the women of the Banū Aṣfar. But was it not [also] temptation that he had fallen into, by staying behind [while] the Messenger of God [went to battle]? By falling prey to human desires, he had fallen into a greater temptation. Indeed, hell is at his back.

One[348] of the hypocrites, feeling an aversion to battle, being 343. Although he had accepted Islam, he was a hypocrite. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 73; III/2, 112.

344. Ibn Isḥāq: One of.

345. A clan of Khazraj. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 358.

346. Wāqidī: Would you like, O Abū Wahb, to join us this year [in an expedition]? Perhaps you might capture a woman of the Banū Aṣfar.

The Byzantines were called Banū Aṣfar by the Arabs in contrast to aswad (black), a description of non-Arabs as light-skinned. The genealogists were not satisfied with the color explanation and considered Aṣfar, (Ṣefō of Genesis 36:11) the grandson of Esau (in the Septuagint, Genesis 36, 10) and the father of Rūmīl (Genesis 36, 11), as the ancestor of the Rūm. EI[2], s.v. Aṣfar; Goldziher, Muslim studies, I, 243; Lewis, Muslim discovery, 141. Ibn Ḥazm (Jamharah, 511), on the other hand, states that the Banū Aṣfar were the descendants of 'Iṣab b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, who lived in the mountains of al-Sharāt between Syria and al-Ḥijāz.

347. Qur'ān 9:49. Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XIV, 286–89; Ṭūsī, Tafsīr, V, 270–71; Nöldeke-Schwally, Geschichte, I, 224; Blachère, Coran, 219. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 992–93, states that his son 'Abdallāh, who had fought with the Muslims at Badr and who was a half-brother of Mu'ādh b. Jabal, exchanged harsh words with his father for his refusal to participate in the expedition.

348. Ibn Isḥāq: A group of hypocrites. According to Wāqidī, he was Jadd b. Qays.

skeptical of the truth, and spreading false rumors about the Messenger of God, said to another that they should not go out in the heat. With regard to them, God revealed: "They said, 'Do not march out in the heat'; say, 'The heat of hell is far more intense, if only they understand!' So, let them laugh a little, for they will weep more in retribution for [the sins] they have accumulated."[349]

The Messenger of God went ahead earnestly with his preparations for the expedition and ordered the men to get ready quickly. He urged and persuaded the people of means [to help in meeting] the expenses and [to provide] mounts for the cause of God. The men of means provided mounts [in anticipation of] God's reward. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān spent a huge sum, more[350] than anyone had ever done, on this expedition.

Seven Muslims, known as "The Weepers," from among the Anṣār and others, came to the Messenger of God and asked him to provide them with mounts, for they were without means. He said: "I do not have any mount to provide you with." They turned back and their eyes flowed with tears out of grief that they had not the wherewithal to meet the expense [of the expedition].[351]

[Ibn Isḥāq] states: I have received a report that Yāmīn b. 'Umayr b. Ka'b al-Naḍrī met Abū Laylā 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ka'b and 'Abdallāh b. Mughaffal as they were weeping, and asked, "What makes you cry?" They responded, "We went to the Messenger of God [asking him] for mounts, but he had none to give us and we do not have anything to sustain us in order to go forth with him." Thereupon he gave them a camel upon which water was carried [from a well], so they mounted it. He provided them with some [1695] dates, and they went off with the Messenger of God.[352]

Some Bedouins who had excused themselves [from going] came

---

349. Qur'ān 9:81–82. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1069; Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XIV, 399–403; Ṭūsī, Tafsīr, V, 311–13; Blachère, Coran, 224. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 160–61, states that the hypocrites used to assemble in the house of Suwaylim, the Jew, keeping men back from joining the expedition.

350. Ibn Isḥāq: No one had ever spent like him. Ibn Hishām states that 'Uthmān had spent one thousand dīnārs on this expedition. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 991, gives a list of people who contributed toward the expenses and states that 'Uthmān provided for a third of the army. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 368.

351. Qur'ān 9: 92. For their names, see Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 161.

352. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 994; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 112.

to apologize, but God would not accept their excuse. I have been told that they were from the Banū Ghifār,[353] and Khufāf b. Imā' b. Raḥḍah was one of them.

When the Messenger of God was prepared and determined to set off, a number of Muslims, whose intentions had prevented them from [following] the Messenger of God, lagged behind without any doubts or misgivings. Among them were Ka'b b. Mālik b. Abī Ka'b,[354] brother of the Banū Salimah; Murārah b. al-Rabī', brother of the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf; Hilāl b. Umayyah, brother of the Banū Wāqif[355] and Abū Khaythamah, brother of the Banū Sālim b. 'Awf.[356] They were sincere people whose Islam was beyond reproach.

After the Messenger of God had set out, he pitched his camp by Thaniyyat al-Wadā',[357] whereas 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl[358] pitched his camp separately below him facing Dhubāb,[359] a mountain in al-Jubbānah below Thaniyyat al-Wadā'. [The narrators] allege that the latter's camp was not the smaller of the two camps. When the Messenger of God set out, 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy stayed behind with the hypocrites and waverers.[360] 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy was a brother of the Banū 'Awf b. al-Khazraj; 'Abdallāh b. Nabtal was a brother of the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf; and Rifā'ah b. Zayd b. al-Tābūt was a brother of the Banū Qaynuqā'. They were the 353. A clan of Kinānah. Kalbī, Jamharah, 42; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 186.

354. He was one of the poets supporting the Prophet and was from the clan of Salimah of Khazraj. He died between 50/670 and 55/675. *EI*², s.v. Ka'b b. Mālik; Sezgin, GAS, II, 293–94.

355. The Banū Wāqif were the allies of the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 344.

356. The Banū Sālim b. 'Awf were a clan of Khazraj. Ibid., 354.

For those who stayed behind, see Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 997–98; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 119.

357. A narrow pass in a mountain overlooking Medina through which one enters the city. Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, I, 269–70; Bakrī, Mu'jam, IV, 1372; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 86; Ḥamīdullāh, Battlefields, 10.

358. He was a chief of Sālim, a section of the 'Awf clan of the Khazraj. The sources suggest that but for the emigration of Muhammad he might have been the leader of Medina. Although he had accepted Islam, he was not a devoted Muslim and had the reputation of being the leader of the hypocrites. He died shortly after the Prophet's return from this expedition. *EI*², s.v. 'Abd Allāh b. Ubayy.

359. Dhubāb or Dhibāb, a mountain near Medina. Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 609; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 3.

360. Most of them were afraid to fight the Byzantines. See Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 995–96.

chief men among the hypocrites[361] and were doing harm to Islam and its people by their artful machinations.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Amr b. 'Ubayd[362]—al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī:[363] Concerning them, God revealed: "They had [1696] sought to stir up sedition before, and turned things upside down for you, [but truth came out in the end and God's will prevailed, even though they did not like it]."[364]

Ibn Isḥāq: The Messenger of God left 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib behind to look after his family and ordered him to stay with them, and he left Sibā' b. 'Urfuṭah, a brother of the Banū Ghifār, in charge of Medina.[365] The hypocrites spread false rumors about 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, saying that he had been left behind because he was a burden to the Messenger of God and he wanted to relieve himself of him. [After] hearing [these accusations] 'Alī took his weapons and set off until he caught up with the Messenger of God while he was [camped][366] in al-Jurf,[367] saying, "O Prophet of God, the hypocrites allege that you have left me behind because you found me burdensome and wanted to get rid of me." He replied, "They lied. I left you behind because of [what I have left][368] behind, so go back and represent me in my family and yours. Are you not pleased, O 'Alī, that you are in the same position in relation to me as Aaron (Hārūn) was in relation to Moses (Mūsā), except that there will be no prophet after me?"[369] 'Alī returned to Medina and the Messenger of God went on his expedition.

---

361. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 274ff.

362. 'Amr b. 'Ubayd b. Bāb, also known as Ibn Kaysān al-Tamīmī, died ca. 142/759–60. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 70–75.

363. He was a famous preacher of the Umayyad period in al-Baṣrah and died in 110/728. *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī; Sezgin, GAS, I, 591–94.

364. Qur'ān 9: 48. See also Wāḥidī, Asbāb, 172; Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XIV, 283–86; Ṭabarsī, Majma', III, 35–36.

365. According to another report, it was Muḥammad b. Maslamah al-Anṣārī. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 162; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 995; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 44, 77, 119; IV/2, 54. In addition to above reports, Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 235–36, cites another report according to which 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was put in charge of Medina.

366. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.

367. Located about 6 km from Medina on the way to Syria where the Muslims used to camp before going out on an expedition, Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 377; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 128.

368. Addition from Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq.

369. Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, II, 300; Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, VII, 120; Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 242; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1340.

Some days after the Messenger of God had set out, Abū Khaythamah,[370] a brother of the Banū Sālim, returned to his family on a hot day. He found his two wives in huts [made of palm sticks] in his garden [of palm trees surrounded by a fence]. Each had sprinkled her hut and cooled water for him in it and prepared food for him there. When he entered the garden, he stood at the door of the hut and looked at his wives and what they had prepared for him and said, "The Messenger of God is exposed to the heat of the sun and the blowing of the winds, while Abū [1697] Khaythamah is in cool shade, [has] cool water, prepared food, and rests with a pretty woman[371] in his estate. This is not fair." Then he added, "By God, I will not enter either of your huts, but will join the Messenger of God; so get some provisions ready for me." They did so and he brought forth his camel upon which water was carried [from a well] and mounted it. He set out in search of the Messenger of God until he overtook him where he had camped in Tabūk. 'Umayr b. Wahb al-Jumaḥī,[372] who was also looking for the Messenger of God, had overtaken Abū Khaythamah on the way, so they traveled together. When they approached Tabūk, Abū Khaythamah said to 'Umayr b. Wahb, "I have done wrong. If you don't mind, stay behind me until I go to the Messenger of God." 'Umayr complied with his request. When Abū Khaythamah drew near the Messenger of God as he halted in Tabūk, the people called [the Prophet's] attention, saying that a rider was approaching on the way. The Messenger of God said, "[It must] be Abū Khaythamah!" They said, "O Messenger of God, he is, by God, Abū Khaythamah." Having dismounted he came and greeted the Messenger of God, who responded by saying, "Woe to you, O Abū Khaythamah!" He then informed the Messenger of God what had happened and [the Prophet] spoke to him well and invoked a blessing upon him.[373]

When the Messenger of God passed by al-Ḥijr,[374] he halted and

370. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 998–99; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 119.

371. Wāqidī: With two pretty women.

372. Wāqidī states that he overtook Abū Khaythamah at Wādī al-Qurā.

373. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 164, has reproduced the verses composed by Abū Khaythamah on this occasion.

374. An ancient ruined site in northwestern Arabia near Madā'in Ṣāliḥ. It was a commercial town second only to Petra in importance during the Nabatean period.

the people drew water from its well. Having departed from there, the Messenger of God said, "Do not drink any of its water nor perform ablutions with it. If you have used it for making dough, then eat none of it, and feed it to the camels. Let none of you go out at night alone except with a companion."[375] The people did as the Messenger of God had ordered them, except for two men from the Banū Sā'idah:[376] one went out to relieve himself, while the other went to look for his camel. The one who had gone out to [1698] relieve himself was choked on his way, and the other who had gone to look for his camel was carried away by the wind and was thrown to earth at the two mountains of Ṭayyi'. When the Messenger of God was informed about them he said, "Did I not forbid you from going out alone without a companion?" He then prayed for the one who was choked on his way and he recovered, and the other who was thrown to earth at the two mountains of Ṭayyi' was presented to the Messenger of God by a man of Ṭayyi' when he arrived in Medina.

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] states that the story of the two men was reported by Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr—al-'Abbās b. Sahl b. Sa'd al-Sā'idī.[377]

When the people woke up in the morning and had no water, they complained to the Messenger of God. So he prayed, and God sent a cloud, which rained so much so that they not only quenched their thirst but carried away all the water they needed.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah: I said to Maḥmūd b. Labīd,[378] "Did the people recognize hypocrisy among them?" He replied, "Yes, by God, if a

---

Several water wells are located in that plain. The Qur'ān relates that it was inhabited by a godless people, and the Prophet forbade his soldiers to refresh themselves at these wells, because it was an accursed spot. *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥidjr; Ryckmans, Religions, 12; Al-Wohaibi, Hijaz, 77–80.

Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 165, states that when the Messenger of God passed by al-Ḥijr he covered his face with his cloak and urged his camel on, saying, "Do not enter the dwellings of those who sinned unless you are lamenting, for fear that you may meet with the same fate that befell them." Cf. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1007.

375. Because it was very windy. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1006.

376. A clan of Khazraj. Kalbī, Jamharah, 187; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 365, 472.

377. He died ca. 120/738. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 118.

378. He was an Anṣārī from the tābi'ūn or "followers" and used to give legal opinions in Medina. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 132; IV/2, 79.

man knew that hypocrisy [exited] in his brother, father, uncle, or his kinsfolk, they would cover it up for each other." Then Maḥmūd said, "Some of my clansmen have informed me that a hypocrite, whose hypocrisy was notorious,[379] used to go with the Messenger of God wherever he went. When the incident of rain happened at al-Ḥijr and the Messenger of God prayed as he did, and God sent a cloud which rained until the people were satisfied, we went to him and said, 'Woe to you! Is there anything more to say after this?' He replied, '[It was] a passing cloud!' "

Then the Messenger of God moved on. On the way his camel [1699] strayed and his companions went in search of it. There was a man called 'Umārah b. Ḥazm[380] with the Messenger of God who was present at al-'Aqabah[381] and Badr[382] and who was the uncle of the Banū 'Amr b. Ḥazm. In his camp was Zayd b. Luṣayb[383] al-Qaynuqā'ī[384] who was a hypocrite. Zayd, while he was in 'Umārah's camp and 'Umārah was with the Messenger of God, said, "Does not Muḥammad allege that he is a prophet and informs you of news from heaven when he doesn't know where his camel is?"[385] The Messenger of God said while 'Umārah was with him, "A man has said that this Muḥammad tells you that he is a prophet and alleges that he informs you of heavenly matters when he doesn't 379. According to Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1009, he was Aws b. Qayẓī or Zayd b. al-Luṣayt.

380. He was present at the second 'Aqabah and was killed in the battle of the Yamāmah in 12/633. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III/1, 67; III/2, 50–51, 77, 140; VIII, 117.

381. A mountain pass between Minā and Mecca, where the Prophet had secret meetings with the Medinese at the pilgrimages of the year 621 and 622 which paved the way for his subsequent migration to Medina. In 621, at "the first 'Aqabah," twelve people were present, and in 622, at "the second 'Aqabah," seventy-three people were present who promised to defend Muḥammad, if necessary, by arms. *EI*², s.v. 'Aḳaba; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 239–54; Ḥamīdullāh, Battlefields, 7–8.

382. A town and a marketplace southwest of Medina, a night's journey from the coast and at the junction of a road from Medina with the caravan route from Mecca to Syria, where the first great battle of Islam was fought in Ramaḍān 2/March 624. *EI*², s.v. Badr; Ḥamīdullāh, Battlefields, 13–21, gives topographical details and a map of the battlefield.

383. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, Wāqidī: al-Luṣayt. Ibn Hishām: al-Luṣayb. Wāqidī states that he was a Jewish convert to Islam.

384. Qaynuqā' was one of the three main Jewish tribes of Medina. After they were expelled, a few of them embraced Islam and some of them were hypocrites. *EI*², s.v. Ḳaynuḳā'.

385. It was the Prophet's camel al-Qaṣwā'. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1009. See Ṭabarī, below (I, 1784).

know where his camel is. By God, I know nothing except that which God has taught me, and He has indicated to me where it is. It is in the[386] valley on such-and-such a mountain trail. It is caught up in a tree by its halter; so go and bring it to me." They went and brought it. 'Umārah b. Ḥazm returned to his camp[387] and said, "By God, what a wonderful thing the Messenger of God has just told us about something said by someone of which God has informed him." He then repeated the words as uttered by Zayd b. al-Luṣayb. A man who was in the camp of 'Umārah but was not present with the Messenger of God, exclaimed, "By God, Zayd uttered those words [just] before you came." Consequently, 'Umārah advanced on Zayd beating him on the neck and saying, "O servants of God, by God, a great distressing thing happened in my camp and I did not know of it. [Addressing Zayd] Get out of my camp, O enemy of God, and do not accompany me." Some people allege that Zayd repented after that, while others say that he was suspected of evil until he died.

Then the Messenger of God continued his march and men began to fall behind. When they told the Messenger of God that so-and-so had fallen behind, he responded, "Leave him, for if there is any good in him God will unite him with you; if not, God has relieved you of him." Finally, it was reported to him that Abū Dharr[388] had fallen behind and his camel had delayed him. He said, "Let him be, for if there is any good in him God will join him to you; if not, God has relieved you of him." Abū Dharr remained on his camel until it slowed down with him. Then he took his baggage, lifted it onto his back and started following the trail of the Messenger of God. When the Messenger of God had halted at one of his halting places, an onlooker called his attention to a lonely man walking on the way. The Messenger of God said that he wished it was Abū Dharr. When the people looked attentively, they said that it was indeed Abū Dharr. The Messenger of God said, "May God have mercy on Abū Dharr! He walks alone, will die alone, and will be raised alone." [1700]

386. Hisch. Ibn Isḥāq: This valley.

387. As in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Wāqidī. Text: To his family.

388. Abū Dharr al-Ghifārī, a companion of the Prophet, was noted for his humility, asceticism, and religious learning. He died in 32/652–53 and is considered one of the four pillars of the early Shī'ah. *EI*², s.v. Abū Dharr; Jafri, Origins, 52.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Buraydah b. Sufyān al-Aslamī[389]—Muḥamad b. Ka'b al-Qurażī:[390] When 'Uthmān exiled Abū Dharr, he came down to al-Rabadhah[391] where he died and there was no one with him except his wife and slave. [Abū Dharr] instructed them to wash him and to wrap him in a shroud and lay him on the open road and to tell the first caravan that passed by that he was Abū Dharr, a companion of the Messenger of God, and that they should help [his wife and slave] bury him. When he died, they did [as they were told] and put his body on the open road. 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd[392] had been approaching that place with a group of men from Iraq on a lesser pilgrimage when suddenly they noticed the bier on the road,[393] the camels nearly treading on it. [Abū Dharr's] slave went to them and said, "This is Abū Dharr, the Messenger of God's companion. Help us to bury [1701] him." 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd broke into tears saying, "The Messenger of God spoke the truth. You will walk alone, die alone, and be raised alone." Then he and his companions got down and buried him, and he told them Abū Dharr's story and what the Messenger of God had said to him on his way to Tabūk.[394]

A band of hypocrites, among them Wadī'ah b. Thābit, a brother[395] of the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf, and a man from Ashja',[396] a confederate of the Banū Salimah called Makhshī[397] b. Ḥumayyir, 389. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/1, 173; VI, 172; VII/1, 84, Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 433–34.

390. He was from the Banū Qurayẓah. It was probably his father or grandfather who was converted to Islam. He died between 108/726–27 and 120/738. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 272–73; VII/2, 193; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 420–22.

391. A village about three days' journey from Medina on the way to al-Ḥijāz. Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 633–37; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 24.

392. He was one of the early converts to Islam and became famous as a reader of the Qur'ān. He is also known for his Qur'ānic exegesis and is regarded as the head of the Kūfan transmitters. *EI*², s.v. Ibn Mas'ūd.

393. Ibn Isḥāq: In the middle of the road. Wāqidī: On the open road.

394. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/1, 161–75, gives the same account with additional isnād. Cf. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1000–1001. After citing Wāqidī's report, Balādhurī [Ansāb, V, 55–56] gives another report which states that Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Bajalī and Mālik al-Ashtar, who were passing through al-Rabadhah in a caravan from al-Kūfah, performed the last rites of Abū Dharr.

395. Wāqidī [Maghāzī, III, 1003]: One of. He also gives two additional names.

396. A clan of Ghaṭafān. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 249.

397. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: Mukhashshin [all the subsequent occurrences are the same.]

were going[398] with the Messenger of God as he was proceeding to Tabūk. Some of them said to others, "Do you think that fighting the Banū Aṣfar is like fighting others?[399] By God, it looks to me as if you will be tied with ropes tomorrow in order to intimidate and frighten the faithful." Makhshī b. Ḥumayyir[400] said, "By God, I wish I could swear before a judge that every one of us should be flogged a hundred lashes if we could escape from God's revealing a verse about us because of what you have said."[401]

The Messenger of God, as it was reported to me, said to 'Ammār b. Yāsir,[402] "Overtake that band, for they have forged lies, and ask them what they said. If they deny it, tell them, 'Yes indeed, you said such-and-such.'" 'Ammār went and told them [what the Prophet had said], and they came to the Messenger of God making excuses. The Messenger of God had stopped on his camel, and Wadī'ah b. Thābit started speaking while he held its girth: "O Messenger of God, we were simply playing and speaking nonsense." Then God revealed about them: "And if you question them, then assuredly they will say, 'We were only speaking nonsense and playing.'"[403] Makhshī b. Ḥumayyir said, "O Messenger of God, my name and my father's name have withheld me [from attaining honor]."[404] The man who was pardoned in the above verse was Makhshī b. Ḥumayyir,[405] and so he was called [1702]

398. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: Were pointing to.

399. Ibn Isḥāq: Is like fighting the Arabs (with each other)?

400. Wāqidī: Al-Julās b. Suwayd.

401. It suggests the powerful influence of the Qur'ānic verses. The Qur'ān 9:64, states: "The hypocrites fear lest a sūrah be revealed concerning them to notify them as to what is in their hearts. Say: Mock on; God will bring forth what you dread."

402. He and his wife were early converts to Islam and suffered severe tortures. He is known for his learning, great piety, and devotion to Islam. He lost his life at Ṣiffīn in 37/657 and is considered one of the four pillars of the early Shī'ah. *EI*², s.v. 'Ammār b. Yāsir; Jafri, Origins, 52.

403. Qur'ān 9:65. Wāḥidī, Asbāb, 174–75; Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XIV, 332–35; Blachère, Coran, 222. Ṭabarsī, Majma', III, 44–46, states that a band of fourteen men tried to ambush the Prophet near a mountain pass while he was returning from Tabūk. Cf. Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 236–37.

404. Makhshī means a person who is feared, and Ḥumayyir is a diminutive form of ḥimār, meaning a little donkey.

405. Qur'ān 9:66, states: "Make no excuses! You have disbelieved following your profession of faith. If We should pardon one faction of you, We will still punish another faction since they have been such criminals." "One faction" in the above verse means one person, and he was Makhshī. Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XIV, 336.

'Abd al-Raḥmān.[406] He asked God to make him die as a martyr in a place not known [by anyone]. He was killed on the day of al-Yamāmah[407] and no trace of him was found.

When the Messenger of God reached Tabūk, Yuḥannah b. Ru'bah, governor of Aylah,[408] came to him, made a treaty with him, and offered him the poll tax (jizyah). The people of Jarbā'[409] and Adhruḥ[410] also offered him the poll tax, and the Messenger of God wrote a document for each of them which is still in their possession.

Then the Messenger of God summoned Khālid b. al-Walīd[411] and sent him to Ukaydir at Dūmah.[412] This was Ukaydir b. 'Abd al-Malik, a man from Kindah[413] who was a king of Dūmah and a Christian. The Messenger of God told Khālid that he would find him hunting wild cows. Khālid b. al-Walīd rode out until he came 406. Wāqidī adds: Or 'Abdallāh.

---

407. Al-Yamāmah is a district in central Arabia where the battle of al-Yamāmah was fought between the Muslims led by Khālid b. al-Walīd, and the Banū Ḥanīfah led by "the false prophet" Musaylimah. The Muslims were victorious but suffered heavy losses. EI[1], s.v. Yamāma; Philby, Heart of Arabia, II, 31–34; Hitti, History, 141.

408. A seaport at the north end of the Gulf of 'Aqabah near the biblical site of Ezion-geber and Elath. It was an important way station on the pilgrim route between Egypt and Mecca. Now it is called al-'Aqabah. EI[2], s.v. Ayla; Buhl, Leben, 327–28; Musil, Ḥeǧâz, 81–87; Jāsir, Shimāl, 461; Al-Wohaibi, Hijaz, 43–51, 315ff.

For the treaty, see Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 169; Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 87–89.

409. It was an ancient fortress situated on the Roman road leading from Buṣrā to the Red Sea, about one mile north of Adhruḥ. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 118–19, states that its inhabitants were Jews. EI[2], s.v. Djarbā'.

410. It was a Roman camp between Ma'ān and Petra in the Judhām country and was visited by the caravans of Quraysh. It became famous in Islamic history on account of the arbitration conference which took place there after the battle of Ṣiffīn. EI[2], s.v. Adhruḥ. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1032, has reproduced the treaty. Cf. Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 90–91.

411. He had fought against the Muslims at Uḥud but was converted to Islam in 6/627 or 8/629. He became one of the well-known commanders at the time of the early Islamic conquests and died in 21/642. EI[2], s.v. Khālid b. al-Walīd.

412. Dūmat al-Jandal, an oasis at the head of the Wādī Sirḥān, linking central Arabia and the mountains of Ḥawrān and Syria, is situated on the route between Damascus and Medina. The entire basin with its settlements is now called al-Jawf. EI[2], s.v. Dūmat al-Djandal. For its topography and historical geography, see Musil, Arabia, 157–64, 458–74, 531–53; Jāsir, Shimāl, 99ff., 528–33. This expedition against Dūmah was the third.

413. A South Arabian tribal group that spread all over Arabia in the fifth and sixth centuries from the south to the center to the north, and played a decisive role in the history of Arabia before the rise of Islam. EI[2], s.v. Kinda.

within sight of his fort. It was a moonlit summer night and Ukaydir was on the roof terrace with his wife. The wild cows had been scratching the palace gate with their horns all night. His wife asked him if he had ever seen anything like that, and he said, "No indeed." Then she said, "Who would allow this?" He responded, "No one." He then came down and called for his horse, which was saddled. A group of men from his family, among them his brother Ḥassān, took their hunting spears, mounted [their horses], and rode off. On their way they encountered the Messenger of God's cavalry, and [Ukaydir] was seized and his brother Ḥassān was killed. Ḥassān was wearing a silk brocade gown woven with gold in the form of date-palm leaves. Khālid stripped him of it and sent it to the Messenger of God before his arrival.[414]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah—Anas b. Mālik: I saw Ukaydir's gown when it was brought to the Messenger of God. The Muslims were feeling [1703] it with their hands and admiring it. The Messenger of God said, "Are you amazed at it? By Him in whose hand is Muḥammad's soul, the kerchiefs of Sa'd b. Mu'ādh[415] in paradise are better than this."

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Khālid brought Ukaydir to the Messenger of God, who spared his blood and made peace with him on the condition that he paid the poll tax.[416] Then he released him, and he returned to his village.

[Now the report goes back to Yazīd b. Rūmān at the beginning of the military expedition to Tabūk.] [See Ṭabarī, I, 1692, above] The Messenger of God stayed in Tabūk no more than ten nights

414. It was sent with 'Amr b. Umayyah al-Ḍamrī. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1026. Cf. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 36–37, 48; II/1, 119–20; III/2, 13; Buhl, Leben, 328.

415. Sa'd b. Mu'ādh died in 5/627 as a result of injuries suffered during the siege of Medina when he was thirty-siven years old. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, III, 262–64; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III/2, 2–13; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 84–85; EI[1], s.v. Sa'd b. Mu'ādh.

The tradition states: A silk robe was presented to the Messenger of God, and his companions began to feel it with their hands and marvel at its softness, so he said, "Do you marvel at the softness of this? Sa'd b. Mu'ādh's headband in paradise is better and softer than it." Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 272; Mishkat [trans. Robson], II, 1365; transmitted by both Bukhārī and Muslim.

416. According to one report, Ukaydir surrendered peacefully. Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 190. For the text of the treaty, its translation, and comments, see Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 246–47; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 362–65.

and departed, returning to Medina. On the way there was water issuing from a rock in a valley called al-mushaqqaq [i.e., the cracked, furrowed],[417] enough to quench the thirst of two or three riders. The Messenger of God ordered that whoever should get there before him must not draw any water from it until he came. A number of hypocrites[418] got there first and drew the water that was there. When the Messenger of God came and halted, he found no water. He inquired as to who had got there first, and was told that so-and-so had. He exclaimed, "Did we not forbid them to draw any water from it until we came?" He then cursed them and invoked God against them. Then he alighted and put his hand under the rock, and water started to sprinkle into his hand as God willed. He then sprinkled the rock with that water, rubbed it with his hand and prayed as God willed him to pray. The water gushed forth, as one who heard it said, with the sound of thunder. The [1704] people drank and drew water from it for their needs, and the Messenger of God said, "Those[419] of you who live will indeed hear about this valley that it is more fertile than others in its vicinity."

The the Messenger of God proceeded until he halted in Dhū Awān,[420] a town an hour's daytime journey from Medina. The people who had built the Mosque of Dissent (masjid al-ḍirār) had come to him while he was preparing for Tabūk, saying, "O Messenger of God, we have built a mosque for the sick and needy and for rainy and cold nights, and we would like you to visit us and pray for us in it."[421] [The Prophet] said that he was on the verge of traveling, and was preoccupied, or words to that effect, and that when he returned, God willing, he would come to them and pray for them in it.

When he stopped in Dhū Awān, news of the mosque[422] came to him, and he summoned Mālik b. al-Dukhshum, a brother of the 417. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 135; Jāsir, Shimāl, 595–96.

418. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1039, names four hypocrites who got there first.

419. Hisch.: If you live, or those of you who live.

420. Bakrī, Mu'jam, I, 208–9; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 275. Some ruins located about 4 km from Medina were said to be of the Mosque of Dissent. Philby, Pilgrim, 86.

421. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1045–46, names five persons who had come to the Prophet with the invitation to visit the mosque. Cf. Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, I, 52–55.

422. Wāqidī adds: And the people who built it came to him from the heaven.

Banū Sālim b. ʿAwf, and Maʿn b. ʿAdī, or his brother ʿĀṣim b. ʿAdī, brothers of the Banū al-ʿAjlān,[423] and said, "Go to this mosque whose owners are unjust people and destroy and burn it." They went out briskly[424] until they came to the Banū Sālim b. ʿAwf who were Mālik b. al-Dukhshum's clan. Mālik said to Maʿn, "Wait for me until I bring fire from my people." He went to his kinsfolk and took a palm branch and lighted it. Then both of them ran until they entered the mosque, its people inside, set fire to it and destroyed it and the people dispersed.[425] Concerning them it was revealed in the Qurʾān: "And those who have taken a mosque for [working] mischief and disbelief, as well as disunion among the faithful and as an outpost for those who already fought God and His Messenger, will swear, 'We desired nothing but good.' God witnesses what sort of liars they are."[426]

Those who built [the mosque] were twelve men:[427] Khidām[428] b. Khālid from the Banū ʿUbayd b. Zayd, one of the Banū ʿAmr b. ʿAwf, (the Mosque of Dissent was built as an extension onto his house); Thaʿlabah b. Ḥāṭib from the Banū ʿUbayd, attributed to [1705] the Banū Umayyah b. Zayd;[429] Muʿattib b. Qushayr from the Banū Ḍubayʿah b. Zayd; Abū Ḥabībah b. al-Azʿar from the Banū Ḍubayʿah b. Zayd; ʿAbbād b. Ḥunayf, the brother of Sahl b. Ḥunayf, from the Banū ʿAmr b. ʿAwf; Jāriyah b. ʿĀmir and his two sons Mujammiʿ and Zayd; Nabtal b. al-Ḥārith from the Banū Ḍubayʿah; Baḥzaj from the Banū Ḍubayʿah; Bijād b. ʿUthmān from the Banū Ḍubayʿah; and Wadīʿah b. Thābit from the Banū Umayyah, the clan of Abū Lubābah b. ʿAbd al-Mundhir.

---

423. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III/2, 35–36.

424. Wāqidī adds: On foot.

425. Wāqidī states that the fire was set after the evening prayer.

426. Qurʾān 9:107. The Prophet had received some information which made him suspect the ulterior motives of the builders of this mosque. Probably they were linked to those who had planned an attempt on the Prophet's life when he was returning from Tabūk. It was also suspected that they were acting in concert with Abū ʿĀmir, an opponent of the Prophet. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 281–83; Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XIV, 468–75; Ṭabarsī, Majmaʿ, III, 72–73; Buhl, Leben, 329; Nöldeke-Schwally, Geschichte, I, 224–25; Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 186–88; Blachère, Coran 227–28; Rodinson, Mahomet, 314–15.

427. Wāqidī states that it was built by fifteen men.

428. Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 277): Khidhām.

429. Banū Umayyah b. Zayd and Banū Ḍubayʿah b. Zayd were clans of the Banū ʿAmr b. ʿAwf of Aws. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 322.

The Messenger of God arrived in Medina [and found that] a group of hypocrites had stayed behind. From among the Muslims, Ka'b b. Mālik, Murārah b. al-Rabī', and Hilāl b. Umayyah had also stayed behind, but without doubt or hypocrisy. The Messenger of God ordered that no one should speak to the three.[430] Then the hypocrites who had stayed behind came to him making excuses and swearing oaths so he forgave them, but neither God nor His Messenger ever absolved them from guilt. The Muslims refrained from speaking to those three until God revealed: "God has forgiven the Prophet and the Emigrants (Muhājirūn) and the Helpers (Anṣār) who followed him in the hour of difficulty, after the hearts of a section of them were about to swerve aside; He then turned to them [in His mercy]; surely He is kind and compassionate with them. As for the three who were left behind [he did not forgive them], until, when the earth became straitened for them, despite all its breadth, and their souls became straitened, so that they thought there was no shelter from God except in Him, He then turned to them, that they might also repent; surely God accepts repentance, and is all-compassionate. O believers, fear God, and be with those who are truthful."[431]

The Messenger of God returned to Medina from Tabūk in the month of Ramaḍān. In that month, the deputation of Thaqīf, those whose report has been mentioned before, came to him.

[An Account of the People Who Accepted Islam]

[1706] In this year (i.e., A.H. 9), the Messenger of God dispatched 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib with an army (sariyyah)[432] to the land of Ṭayyi' in the month of Rabī' II.[433] He raided them and took captives and seized 430. For details, see Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 175–81; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1049–56; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 119; Lings, Muhammad, 320.

431. Qu'rān 9:117–19. Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XIV, 539–57; Blachère, Coran, 229.

432. The term sariyyah, pl. sarāyā, is applied to an army sent by the Prophet in contradistinction to ghazwah (pl. ghazawāt, also maghāzī, meaning raiding expedition), wherein the Prophet himself participated. Originally it was applied to a portion of an army marching by night; it could consist of from five persons to four hundred. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. s-r-y.

433. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 290–91; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 984–89; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 172; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 382, 522. It is known as the sariyyat 'Alī to Fulus (or Fals, or Fils), which was an idol in Najd worshipped by Ṭayyi'. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 273–74; Wellhausen, Skizzen, III, 48–49; Ryckmans, Religions, 9, 17; Fahd, Panthéon, 75–77.

two swords that were in the temple, one called "rasūb"[434] and the other "mikhdham."[435] The two swords were well-known and were presented to the temple by al-Ḥārith b. Abī Shimr.[436] ʿAdī b. Ḥātim's[437] sister was among the captives.

Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī]: The reports about ʿAdī b. Ḥātim that have reached me do not specify time and do not mention what al-Wāqidī reported concerning ʿAdī b. Ḥātim's sister being taken as a captive by ʿAlī.[438]

Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā [al-Baṣrī][439]—Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar[440]—Shuʿbah[441]—Simāk:[442] I heard ʿAbbād b. Ḥubaysh [al-Kūfī][443] reporting from ʿAdī b. Ḥātim, who said: The Messenger of God's cavalry came, or the Messenger of God's messengers came, and they took my paternal aunt and some other people captive and brought them before the Prophet, where they were lined up. [My aunt] said "O Messenger of God, the man who should speak for me [wāfid][444] is far away, my son has been separated [from me], and I am an old woman of no service [to anyone]. Be kind to me and God will be kind to you, O Messenger of God." He said, "Who is the man who should speak for you?" "ʿAdī b. Ḥātim," she said. He said, "[The one] who fled from God and His Messenger." He then granted her request, and a man next to her, who was apparently ʿAlī, told her to ask him for a mount. She asked for one and the Messenger of God ordered it for her.

---

434. A sword that penetrates into, or disappears in, the thing struck with it. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. r-s-b.

435. A sharp sword. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. kh-dh-m. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 988, states that there were three swords and three coats of arms. The third sword was called al-Yamānī.

436. See Ṭabarī above I, 1675, n. 200.

437. He was a son of the celebrated poet Ḥātim al-Ṭāʾī and was a supporter of ʿAlī. He died in 68/687–88. *EI*², s.v. ʿAdī b. Ḥātim.

438. According to Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 988–89, ʿAdī b. Ḥātim fled as he got the news of ʿAlī's expedition. It was ʿAdī's sister who was taken as a captive. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 60, states that according to some reports, she was captured during Khālid's expedition. Cf. Lings, Muhammad, 315–16.

439. Died ca. 252/866. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 425–27.

440. Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar al-Hudhalī al-Baṣrī died ca. 193/808–9. Ibid., IX, 96–98.

441. Shuʿbah b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Baṣrī died in 160/776–77. Ibid., IV, 338–46.

442. Simāk b. Ḥarb al-Kūfī died in 123/740–41. Ibid., IV, 233–34.

443. Ibid., V, 91.

444. Wāfid is a man coming to a king, or to a great man, as an ambassador. Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. w-f-d; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. w-f-d. For its original meaning, see Fahd, Divination, 241.

'Adī b. Ḥātim: She came to me and said, "You have done something which your father would not have done. Go to him [i.e., the Messenger of God] with earnestness and fear. So-and-so went to him and he was treated properly." So I went to him and lo, a woman and two boys, or a boy, were with him. [Then the narrator [i.e., 'Abbād b. Ḥubaysh] recounted their closeness [of rela-[1707] tionship] to the Prophet.][445] And so I knew that he was neither like Khusraw (Kisrā)[446] nor like Caesar (Qayṣar).[447] He said to me, "O 'Adī b. Ḥātim, what made you flee from saying, 'There is no God except Allāh'? Is there any God except Allāh? What made you flee from saying, 'God is great'? Is there any thing greater than Allāh?" So I embraced Islam and saw in his face that he was rejoicing.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Shaybān b. Sa'd al-Ṭā'ī: It has been reported to me that 'Adī b. Ḥātim of Ṭayyi' used to say, "No Arab disliked the Messenger of God when he first heard about him more than I. As far as I was concerned, I was a noble man, a Christian, traveling about among my people and collecting the fourth part of their spoils (mirbā').[448] I professed my own religion, and the way I was treated was as if I were a king among my people. When I heard the Messenger of God I disliked him and said to an Arab slave of mine who was herding my camels, 'May you have no father![449] Prepare for me some docile, fat, and old camels, and keep them near me. When you hear of Muḥammad's army treading this country, inform me.'" He did that, and one morning he came to me and said, "O 'Adī, whatever you were going to do when Muḥammad's cavalry should descend upon you, do it now, for I have seen banners and when I inquired about them I was told that they were Muḥammad's army." I asked him to bring my camels, which he did, and I took my family and children and told him that I would join my fellow 445. The reference is to Fāṭimah, the Prophet's daughter, and her two sons, Ḥasan and Ḥusayn.

446. An Arabic form of the Persian Khusraw, used especially for the Sāsānid kings. *EI*², s.v. Kisrā.

447. An Arabic name for the Roman and Byzantine emperor. *EI*², s.v. Ḳayṣar.

448. See below, n. 456.

449. It is used as a proverb for an imprecation and rough speech against whom it is addressed; however, it is not said with the desire of its having effect, but rather on an occasion of intense love. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. a-b-w.

Christians in Syria. I traveled to al-Jūshiyyah[450] and left one of Ḥātim's daughters in that settlement. When I reached Syria I stayed there.

The Messenger of God's cavalry followed me when I turned away from [that settlement] and took Ḥātim's daughter among the captives. She was brought to the Messenger of God among the captives of Ṭayyi' and he received the news of my flight to Syria. Ḥātim's daughter was put in the enclosure by the door of the mosque where the captives were detained.[451] When the Messenger of God passed by her she went to him and, being an intelligent woman, said, "O Messenger of God, [my] father is dead, and the man who should speak for me has gone away. Grant me a favor and God will grant one for you." "Who is the man who should speak for you?" he asked. When she replied that it was 'Adī b. Ḥātim he exclaimed, "The one who has fled from God and His Messenger." Then he walked away and left her. On the following day he passed by her[452] while she was in despair. A man behind [the Prophet] motioned her to go to him and speak [to him]. She went to him and said, "O Messenger of God, [my] father is dead, and the man who should speak for me is absent. Be kind to me and God will be kind to you." He replied, "I have done so, but do not rush to leave until you find someone of your own people whom you can trust and take you to your country, then call on me." She states: I asked about the man who had motioned to me to speak and was told that it was 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. I stayed until some riders from Balī or Quḍā'ah[453] came. What I wanted was to go to my brother in Syria. I went to the Messenger of God and said, "O Messenger of God, a group of my people who are trustworthy and reputable have arrived." He provided me with clothing, put me on a mount and gave me money, and I departed with them until I arrived in Syria. [1708]

450. As in C, Ibn Isḥāq, and Yāqūt (Mu'jam, II, 185). Text, and Ibn Hishām: al-Ḥūshiyyah. Al-Jūshiyyah is a place between Najd and Syria.

451. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 988, states that she was lodged with Ramlah bt. al-Ḥārith.

452. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: And exactly the same thing happened. On the third day he passed by her and she was in despair. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 989, states that her request was granted on the fourth day.

453. A South Arabian tribe. Kalbī, Jamharah, 274, 279; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 440.

[1709] ʿAdī said: By God, I was sitting among my family when I saw a woman riding in a howdah pointing to me and leading her way to us. I exclaimed, "[Is it] Ḥātim's daughter?" and it was she. When she got to me she reviled me, saying, "You, the unjust one who broke with your relatives, you carried away your family and children and abandoned your father's (little) daughter[454] and honor." I replied, "O [my] little sister, do not say anything except good, for by God, I have no excuse. I did do what you stated." Then she dismounted and stayed with me. Because she was a prudent woman, I asked her what she thought of [the Prophet]. She replied, "By God, I think that you should join him forthwith, for if the man is a prophet, then the one who joins him first will have an exquisite virtue; and if he is a king, you will not be humbled in the glory of the Yemen, you being what you are." I said, "By God, this is a good suggestion," and so I left until I came to the Messenger of God in Medina. I went to him while he was in his mosque and greeted him, and he asked who I was. When I said that I was ʿAdī b. Ḥātim, he got up and took me to his house. By God, as he was leading me an old feeble woman ran to him and asked him to stop. He stopped for a long while as she spoke to him of her needs. I said to myself, "By God, this is no king." Then he continued until we entered his house, reached out for a leather cushion stuffed with palm fibers and threw it to me, saying, "Sit on this." I said, "No, rather you sit on it." He said, "No, you," and so I sat on it and he sat on the ground. I said to myself, "By God, this is not the way a king conducts himself." Then he said "Now, ʿAdī b.
[1710] Ḥātim, are you not half Christian and half Sabaean (rakūsī)?"[455] I replied, "Yes." "Didn't you go among your people collecting the fourth part of their spoils?"[456] he asked. When I admitted it, he said, "But that is not lawful for you in your religion." I said, "Certainly, it is true," and realized that he was a prophet sent by 454. The diminutive form is used to express endearment. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: Baqiyyah [i.e., remainder, survival] of your father.

455. A term applied to a person who professes a religion which is a mixture of Christianity and the Sabaeans (al-Ṣābiʾah), see Ṭabarī, above, I, 1657, n. 38. Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. r-k-s.

456. According to the Arab lexicographers, pre-Islamic practice was to allot one-quarter of the booty to the leader as commander-in-chief. It was also the South Arabian practice. In Islam, one-fifth of the booty was set aside for God before the general division. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. r-b-ʿ; Beeston, Warfare, 15.

God who knows what is not known. Then he said, "O ʿAdī b. Ḥātim, perhaps it is the poverty that you see which prevents you from embracing this religion, but, by God, [so much] wealth will soon flow among them that there will not be enough people to take it. Perhaps it is because you see how few they are and how many are their enemies which prevents you from joining this religion. But by God, you will hear of a woman traveling on her camel from al-Qādisiyyah[457] to visit this House [i.e., the Kaʿbah][458] without fearing [any one] except God. Perhaps it is because you see that others have kingship and power, but, by God, soon you will hear that the white castles of Babylon (Bābil][459] have been conquered." Then I embraced Islam.

ʿAdī b. Ḥātim used to say that two things [mentioned above by the Prophet] occurred and that the third remained, but, by God, that too would certainly come to pass. I have seen the white castles of Babylon being conquered, and I have seen a woman traveling on her camel from al-Qādisiyyah to this House to make the pilgrimage without any fear. By God, the third will happen and wealth will flow until there will not be anyone to take it.

Al-Wāqidī: In this year, the deputation of the Banū Tamīm[460] came to the Messenger of God.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. Qatādah and ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr: ʿUṭārid b. Ḥājib b. Zurārah b. ʿUdas[461] al-Tamīmī came to the Messenger of God in a large [1711] deputation with the nobility of Tamīm. Among them were al-Aqraʿ b. Ḥābis; Zibriqān b. Badr al-Tamīmī, one of the Banū Saʿd;

457. A place southwest of al-Ḥīrah and south-southwest of where al-Kūfah was later founded. It is famous as the site of the Muslim victory over the Sāsānids between 14/635 and 16/637. *EI*², s.v. al-Ḳādisiyya.

458. *EI*², s.v. Kaʿba.

459. *EI*², s.v. Bābil. Ibn Isḥāq, Kitāb al-Mubtadaʾ, 267–68, gives different versions of what the Prophet said to ʿAdī. One version states: O ʿAdī b. Ḥātim, the last hour will come only when the treasures of Kisrā and Qayṣar would have been conquered . . . the last hour will come only when a woman would travel on her camel, from al-Ḥīrah [to Mecca] to circumambulate the Kaʿbah, without protection . . . the last hour will come only when a man carrying a sack of money would roam [about the country] and would not find anyone who would take it.

460. An Arab tribe. *EI*¹, s.v. Tamīm. The following account of a challenge to a boasting competition, including the poem of Ḥassān, seem to be the product of later years. See Arafat, "An interpretation"; Monroe, "Poetry."

461. Ibn Ḥazm (Jamharah, 232): ʿUdus. He was from the clan of Banū ʿAbdallāh b. Dārim of the Tamīm.

ʿAmr b. al-Ahtam; al-Ḥutāt b. so-and-so;[462] Nuʿaym b. Zayd;[463] and Qays b. ʿĀṣim, a brother of the Banū Saʿd. With them was ʿUyaynah b. Ḥiṣn b. Ḥudhayfah al-Fazārī.[464]

Al-Aqraʿ b. Ḥābis and ʿUyaynah b. Ḥiṣn had been with the Messenger of God when Mecca was conquered[465] and [466] al-Ṭāʾif was besieged. When the deputation of the Banū Tamīm came, they were with them. As the deputation entered the mosque, they called out to the Messenger of God from behind the [inner] apartments, "Come out to us, O Muḥammad."[467] That loud call of theirs annoyed the Messenger of God, and he came out. They said, "O Muḥammad, we came to compete with you in boasting, so allow our poet and orator [to start]." He replied, "Yes I permit your orator, let him speak." ʿUṭārid b. Ḥājib stood up and said: "Praise be to God who granted us His favors and who is worthy of praise. [It is He] who has made us kings and has granted us great wealth with which we are generous, and has made us the mightiest people of the East, the greatest in number, and best armed; so who among the people is our equal? Are we not the leaders of men and their superiors? Let him who competes with us enumerate what we have enumerated. Had we wished we could have said more, but we are too modest[468] to speak much of what He has 462. Ibn Isḥāq: Al-Ḥabḥāb b. Yazīd. Ibn Hishām: Al-Ḥutāt b. Yazīd. Ibn Shabbah [Taʾrīkh, II, 527]: Al-Ḥuthāt b. Yazīd. For their genealogy, see Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 206–7.

---

463. Ibn Shabbah adds: Qays b. al-Ḥārith.

464. There were more than eighty people in the delegation. The reason of their coming is explained by Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 404; II/1, 116, as follows:

The Tamīmīs had attempted to prevent the Khuzāʿah tribe from paying the alms to the Prophet's agent. Although the Khuzāʿites were able to drive the Tamīmīs away, the Prophet's agent fled back to Medina. Subsequently, the Prophet sent a force of fifty horsemen under the leadership of ʿUyaynah b. Ḥiṣn to punish the Tamīmīs. In a surprise raid, ʿUyaynah captured about fifty men, women, and children and brought them back to Medina. It was then that the delegation came. When their women and children saw them, they began to cry. This explains the sense of urgency and impatience displayed by the delegation in their attempt to reach the Prophet.

465. Ibn Isḥāq adds: And at the battle of Ḥunayn.

466. Ibn Shabbah adds: [The battle of] Ḥunayn [was fought], and.

467. The delegation on its arrival in Medina passed by the Tamīmī prisoners. When the women and children saw them, they burst into tears, hence the delegation went hurriedly to the mosque calling the Prophet from behind the inner apartments.

468. C and Ibn Shabbah: We are afraid to elongate.

granted us, and we are known [for that].[469] Now, I will say that you may bring forward the like of our speech and anything better than ours." Then he sat down.

The Messenger of God said to Thābit b. Qays b. Shammās,[470] a [1712] brother of Balḥārith[471] b. al-Khazraj, "Get up and answer the man's speech." Thābit got up and said:[472] "Praise belongs to God who created heaven and earth and carried out His command therein, and His knowledge encompasses His Throne. Nothing exists but by His bounty. By His power He made us kings and chose the best of His creation as a prophet who is the noblest in lineage, the most truthful in speech, and the best in noble descent. He sent down to him His book and entrusted him with His creatures. He was the chosen one of God from the worlds. Then he summoned people to faith, and the Emigrants from his people and his kinsfolk believed in the Messenger of God. They are the most noble people in lineage, the most prominent, and the best in deeds. Then the first of creation to answer and respond to God when the Messenger of God summoned them were ourselves. We are the Helpers of God and the viziers of His Messenger, and we fight people until they believe in God. He who believes in God and His Messenger has protected his life and possessions [from us]; as for one who disbelieves, we will fight him forever in the cause of God and killing him is a small matter to us. I say this and ask God's forgiveness for myself and the believing men and the believing women. Peace be upon you."

Then they said, "O Muḥammad, permit our poet [to speak]," and he did. Al-Zibriqān b. Badr got up and said:

We are the nobles, no tribe can match us, from us are the kings and in[473] our midst houses of worship are built.
How many tribes have we plundered and subjugated, for excellence in glory is to be sought after!

469. Addition from Hisch. and Ibn Shabbah.

470. He was the Prophet's orator and a scribe. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 35, 40, 82; II/1, 46, 116; III/1, 284; V, 22; VIII, 83, 262, 326.

471. Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Shabbah: Banū al-Ḥārith.

472. Ibn Shabbah gives a slightly different version of Thābit's speech.

473. Ibn Hishām: And we collect the fourth [of the spoils].

[1713] In times of drought when no tattered clouds are seen, we feed meat to the hungry in our banquet halls.
You can see leaders coming to us humbly from every land, and we feed them.[474]
We are delighted to slaughter a herd of camels for our guests, when they come to us they eat their fill.
You will see not a tribe whom we challenge, except in submission or with its head nearly cut off.
We scorn others but none scorns us, similarly, we are exalted in pride.
He who would challenge us [in these matters] knows us, so he withdraws his challenge, and the news is listened to seriously.

Ḥassān b. Thābit[475] was absent [at the time], so the Messenger of God sent for him. Ḥassān said: When the runner came and informed me that the Messenger of God had called me to answer the Banū Tamīm's poet, I went to him while reciting:[476]

We protected the Messenger of God when he settled down among us,[477] whether Ma'add liked it or not.[478]
We defended him when he dwelt among our houses,[479] with our swords against every transgressor and oppressor, in a unique house whose glory and wealth[480] is in Jābiyat al-Jawlān[481] among the foreigners.
Is glory [nothing] but the reiteration of domination and generosity, and the dignity of kings and the enduring of great misfortunes?

---

474. Ibn Hishām: And we are obeyed.

475. The "Poet Laureate" of the Prophet was a Khazrajī and died ca. 40/659. *EI*², s.v. Ḥassān b. Thābit; Sezgin, GAS, II, 289–92; Brockelmann, GAL, I, 37; SI, 67.

476. See Dīwān of Ḥassān, I, 109–10.

477. Dīwān: We aided and sheltered the Prophet Muḥammad.

478. As in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Dīwān. Text: From every Ma'addī [Arab] tyrant and oppressor. Ma'add, son of 'Adnān, a descendant of Ismā'īl, the son of Ibrāhīm, is considered as the ancestor of the Northern Arabs. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 9.

479. Dīwān: We aided him when he dwelt among us.

480. Dīwān: In a unique tribe whose source and honor.

481. A village in the district of Damascus toward al-Jawlān. Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 355; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 91–92; he cites the above verses.

When I came to the Messenger of God and the tribal poet [of Tamīm] had recited what he recited, I replied in the same pattern and rhyme. [1714]

When al-Zibriqān b. Badr had finished his recitation, the Messenger of God said to Ḥassān, "Arise, O Ḥassān, and answer the man for what he has said." Ḥassān recited:[482]

The nobles are from Fihr[483] and their sister tribes; they have shown a way of life to be followed.
Everyone who fears God and does all manner of good commends them.[484]
They are a people such that when they fight they harm their enemies, and when they help their adherents they benefit.
That is their nature and not a newly acquired habit; be informed[485] that the worst of personal traits is innovation.
If there are people who surpassed them and came after them, then every preceding people would have precedence.
People do not repair what their hands have destroyed in defense, nor do they destroy what they have repaired.
If they compete with others, they win by virtue of their [1715] precedence; if weighed against the people of glory and generosity, their scales are heavy.
Chaste are those whose chastity is mentioned in revelation; they are not rapacious[486] nor can greed harm them.
They are not stingy with an act of generosity toward a neighbor,[487] nor are they touched by the stain of covetousness.
When we declare war on a tribe, we do not creep silently, like a calf crawling to the wild cow.

---

482. See Dīwān of Ḥassān I, 101–3.
483. He is the ancestor of Quraysh. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 12.
484. Dīwān: Is pleased with them and with the mission they have begun.
485. Dīwān: Indeed.
486. As in the Dīwān. Text: Not disposed by nature.
487. Dīwān: A client.

We stand tall when the claws of war reach us, when the hordes are humbled by its nails.
They do not boast[488] when they overpower their enemy, and if they are beaten, they neither languish nor despair.
In battle, when death is at hand, they are like lions of Bīshah[489] with crooked claws.
[1716] Take what they give you willingly when they are angered, and think not about what they withheld.
To fight them is to plunge into poison[490] and ruin, so do not antagonize them.
How noble are a people who[491] have the Messenger of God in their midst, when [other] factions and parties become divided![492]
I dedicate my eulogy to them from my heart, aided in its beloved task by an eloquent and ready tongue,
For they are the best of all people in matters both grave and gay.

When Ḥassān b. Thābit had finished his speech,[493] al-Aqraʿ b. Ḥābis said,[494] "By my father, this man has a helper. Indeed, his orator and his poet are better than ours and their voices are louder[495] than ours." When they were through, they embraced Islam and the Messenger of God gave them valuable gifts. [Before com-

488. Dīwān: They do not rejoice.

489. As in the Dīwān. Text and Ibn Isḥāq: Ḥalyah. Bīshah, a place about five days' journey from Mecca toward Yemen, is known for its lions. Bakrī, Muʿjam, I, 293–94; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 529. For its topography see Philby, Arabian Highlands, 28ff.

490. Dīwān: A bitter tree. A kind of tree when pressed issues a juice resembling milk which spirts into the eyes and produces an effect like that of a flame of fire and weakens the sight.

491. Dīwān: Whose leader is the Messenger of God.

492. Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq: And parties differ.

493. For additional poetry, see Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 211–12.

494. Ibn Shabbah's version states that both al-Aqraʿ and ʿUyaynah consulted with each other before accepting Islam. The report further states that both of them were among those "whose hearts were to be reconciled," hence the Messenger of God gave them a hundred camels each. Next, ʿAbbās b. Mirdās's verses are cited. It is obvious that this passage is an interpolation, see Ṭabarī, above, I, 1681 (distribution of the booty of Ḥunayn).

495. Ibn Isḥāq: Sweeter.

ing to the Messenger of God] they had left 'Amr b. al-Ahtam [who was the youngest of them][496] behind with their mounts. Qays b. 'Āṣim, who hated 'Amr b. al-Ahtam, said, "O Messenger of God, there is a man among us with our saddle bags who is but a young boy," and he belittled him. The Messenger of God, however, gave him the same as he had given the others. When 'Amr heard that Qays b. 'Āṣim had [belittled him], he satirized him, saying:

When you defamed me to the Prophet you exposed [1717] yourself; you neither spoke the truth nor hit the mark.
If you hate us, well, Byzantine[497] is your origin, but the Byzantines do not harbor hatred against the Arabs.
We have ruled and our authority is ancient, but yours[498] is left behind at the root of the rump and the tail.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Rūmān: Concerning them, God revealed: "Surely those who call unto you from behind the private apartments [i.e., the Banū Tamīm], most of them have no sense."[499] This is a preferable reading.

Al-Wāqidī: In this year, 'Abdallāh b. Ubayy b. Salūl died. He got sick during the last days of Shawwāl and died in Dhū al-Qa'dah. His illness lasted for twenty days.[500]

In this year, a letter from the kings of Ḥimyar[501] [announcing] their acceptance of Islam arrived to the Messenger of God with

---

496. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.

497. Rūm in Arabic meant the land of the Rhomaeans or Byzantines. EI[1], s.v. Rūm.

498. Ibn Isḥāq:
We ruled you voluntarily but your authority is sitting on the tail and showing its teeth.

499. Qur'ān 49:4. Wāḥidī, Asbāb, 274–77; Ṭabarsī, Majma', V, 129–30; Nöldeke-Schwally, Geschichte, I, 220; Blachère, Coran, 548.

500. Although he was the chief opponent, the Prophet, in a conciliatory spirit, visited him before he died and attended his funeral. Some Muslims, especially 'Umar did not like it and protested to the Prophet. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1057–60; Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, III, 863–64; Lings, Muhammad, 321–22; Rodinson, Mahomet, 315.

501. Ḥimyar was one of the last ancient southwest Arabian kingdoms which ruled Yemen before its conquest by the Muslims. They claim Qaḥṭānī descent. Kalbī, Jamharah, 176, 274; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 432–38; Shahīd, "Pre-Islamic Arabia," 6f.

their messenger in the month of Ramaḍān. [Those kings were] al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd Kulāl, Nuʿaym b. ʿAbd Kulāl, and al-Nuʿmān, prince of Dhū Ruʿayn.[502]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr: On his return from Tabūk, a letter from the kings of Ḥimyar [announcing] their Islam came to the Messenger of God [1718] with their messenger. [They were] al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd Kulāl, Nuʿaym b. ʿAbd Kulāl, and al-Nuʿmān, prince of Dhū Ruʿayn, Hamdān,[503] and Maʿāfir.[504] Zurʿah Dhū Yazan[505] sent Mālik b. Murrah al-Rahāwī with [news of] their acceptance of Islam and their abandonment of polytheism and its followers.

Then the Messenger of God wrote to them:[506] "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. From Muḥammad, the Messenger of God, and His Prophet to al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd Kulāl, Nuʿaym b. ʿAbd Kulāl, and al-Nuʿmān, prince of Dhū Ruʿayn, Hamdān, and Maʿāfir. I praise God to you. There is no God except Him.

"Now then: Your messenger reached us on our return from Byzantine territory and met us in Medina. He conveyed your message and told us your news and informed us of your [acceptance of] Islam and your killing of the polytheists. Indeed, God has guided you with His guidance. If you [wish to] do well and obey God and His Messenger [you must] perform prayers, pay the zakāt tax,[507] give God's fifth of booty,[508] the share of His Mes-

502. It is a name both of a district and a clan in the southwest of Yemen. Hamdānī, Ṣifat, I, 90, 98, 101. Cf. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 20, 84; V, 386–87.

503. It is a name both of a district and a well-known large Arab tribe of Yemen. Hamdānī, Ṣifat, I, passim; *EI*², s.v. Hamdān.

504. A district at the beginning of the Sarāt mountains in Yemen. The inhabitants of that district are known as al-Maʿāfir b. Yaʿfur. Hamdānī, Ṣifat, I, 67, 68, 71, 98, 99.

505. A Ḥimyarī king. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 386.

506. A transcription of this letter on parchment in Himyarite characters was discovered in Beirut. See Cohen, "Manuscrit"; Ḥamīdullāh, Majmūʿah, 180–84.

507. It is one of the principal obligations of Islam. This tax is levied on definite kinds of property and is distributed among eight categories of persons as stated in the Qurʾān 9:60, *EI*¹, s.v. Zakāt; Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, I, 557–611; Mishkat [trans. Robson], I, 371–416.

508. "Know that with anything you may acquire as spoils, a fifth of it belongs to God and the Messenger, close relatives and orphans, paupers and the wayfarer, if you believe in God and what We have sent down to Our servant. . ." Qurʾān 8:41. Maghniyyah, Fiqh, 220–23.

senger, his selected portion (ṣafiyy),[509] and alms (ṣadaqah)[510] to the poor, which is incumbent on the faithful. [The required zakāt is:] from land one tenth of that watered by springs and rain, and one twentieth of that watered by the leathern bucket;[511] from camels, a milch camel for every forty camels, and a young male camel for every thirty camels; a sheep for every five camels; two sheep for every ten camels;[512] one cow for every forty cows; a bull calf or a cow calf for every thirty cows;[513] a sheep for every forty sheep at pasture.[514] This is God's ordinance, which He has made obligatory on the faithful with regard to alms. If anyone adds more thereto, it is to his credit. He who professes this and bears witness to his Islam and helps the faithful against the polytheists [1719] is one of the faithful with his rights and obligations as theirs, and has the protection of God and His Messenger. If a Jew or a Christian embraces Islam, then[515] he has the same rights and obligations as the faithful. He who holds fast to his religion, Judaism or Christianity, is not to be tempted from[516] it. It is incumbent on him to pay the poll tax: for every adult, male or female, free or slave, one full dīnār (denarius),[517] or its value in al-ma'āfir,[518] or its substitute in clothes. He who pays that to the Messenger of God has the protection of God and His Messenger, and he who holds back from it is the enemy of God and His Messenger.

---

509. It signifies the portion of the spoils, which the chief chooses for himself before the division. It could be anything from armor to a horse, a camel, or a slave, and it is taken out before the khums. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 514–18; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ṣ-f-y.

510. See Ṭabarī, above, I, 1686, n. 290.

511. Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, I, 259; Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, I, 567; Mishkat (trans. Robson), I, 380.

512. Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, I, 252–53; Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, I, 565–67; Mishkat (trans. Robson), I, 378–79.

513. Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, I, 254.

514. Ibid., I, 252–53; Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, I, 565–67; Mishkat (trans. Robson), I, 378–79.

515. Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq add: He is among the faithful and.

516. Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq: He should not be dissuaded from it.

517. *EI*², s.v. Dīnār.

518. C: Al-Ma'āfirī. Ma'āfir, without the relative adjective ending in yā', is also used meaning Ma'āfirī cloth. Ma'āfir enjoyed a certain reputation as weavers. According to legend, Tubba' As'ad Kāmil was the first to cover the Ka'bah with Ma'āfir cloths. The poll tax of a dīnār of full weight of the Ma'āfir standard could also be paid in articles of clothing of that Ma'āfir material. Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. '-f-r; EISupp, s.v. Ma'āfir.

"Now then: The Messenger of God, Muḥammad the Prophet, has sent to Zur'ah Dhū Yazan that when my messengers Mu'ādh b. Jabal, 'Abdallāh b. Zayd,[519] Mālik b. 'Ubādah,[520] 'Uqbah b. Namir,[521] and Mālik b. Murrah[522] and their companions come to you, I commend them to your good care. Collect the alms and the poll tax from your districts and hand them over to my messengers. Their leader is Mu'ādh b. Jabal, and let him not return unless he is satisfied. Muḥammad witnesses that there is no god but God and that he is His servant and messenger.

"Mālik B. Murrah al-Rahāwī has reported to me that you were the first from Ḥimyar to embrace Islam and that you have killed[523] the polytheists, so rejoice at your good fortune. I order [1720] you to treat Ḥimyar well. Do not be treacherous and do not forsake each other. The Messenger of God is the master of [both] your rich and your poor. Alms are neither lawful to Muḥammad nor to his family; it is a purifying tax to be spent on poor Muslims and the wayfarer. Mālik has conveyed only the necessary information but has kept [others'] secrets to himself, so I order you to treat him well. I have sent to you some of the most virtuous of my people, the most religious and the most learned, so I order you to treat them well, for he [i.e., Mu'ādh b. Jabal] will be accountable for them. May the Peace, Mercy, and Blessings of God be on you."

Al-Wāqidī: In this year, the deputation of Bahrā'[524] [consisting of] thirteen men came to the Messenger of God, and they stayed with al-Miqdād b. 'Amr.[525]

In this year, the deputation of the Banū al-Bakkā'[526] came.

---

519. 'Abdallāh b. Zayd al-Khazrajī was the one who was inspired with the call to prayer (adhān). He also acted several times as a scribe of the Prophet and died in 32/652–53. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III/2, 87.

520. Ibid., V, 387.

521. Ibid.

522. Ibid., VI, 18; his name is given as Mālik b. Murārah al-Ruhāwī.

523. Ḥamīdullāh (Majmū'ah, 182): You have deserted.

524. They are the Banū Bahrā' b. 'Amr b. al-Ḥāfī, a clan of Quḍā'ah. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 440–41; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 66.

525. He was a Bahrānī from South Arabia and was the only (or one of the two) Muslim horseman at Badr. He was one of seven early converts and is considered one of the four pillars of the early Shī'ah and died in 33/653–54. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III/1, 114–16; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, IV, 1480; Jafri, Origins, 52.

526. A clan of the Banū 'Āmir. The delegation consisted of three people. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 47–48; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 151.

In this year, the deputation of the Banū Fazārah[527] arrived. They were some ten men. Among them was Khārijah b. Ḥiṣn.

In this year, the Messenger of God mourned the loss of the Negus (al-Najāshī) who died in the month of Rajab, in the year 9/630.

In this year, Abū Bakr made the pilgrimage with the people. Abū Bakr departed from Medina with three hundred people and took with him five camels [for sacrifice], while the Messenger of God sent twenty camels [for sacrifice].[528] ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf[529] also made the pilgrimage and sacrificed.

The Messenger of God sent ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib immediately after Abū Bakr had left. He overtook him at al-ʿArj,[530] and ('Alī) read the declaration of dispensation (al-Barā'ah)[531] on the day of sacrifice at al-ʿAqabah.[532]

I have received an account on the authority of Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn[533]—Aḥmad b. al-Mufaḍḍal[534]—Asbāṭ[535]—al-Suddī:[536] When these verses [1 to 40 from Sūrat al-Barā'ah] were revealed, the Messenger of God sent them with Abū Bakr and appointed him as leader of the pilgrimage. After Abū Bakr had reached al-Shajarah of Dhū al-Ḥulayfah,[537] ʿAlī followed him and took those verses [1721]

527. They are the Banū Fazārah b. Dhubyān b. Baghīd b. Rayth b. Ghaṭafān. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 255.

528. For details, see Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1076–78.

529. He was a prominent early convert from the Banū Zuhrah of Quraysh. He was one of the six members of the shūrā who played a key role in the selection of ʿUthmān and he died in 31/652. *EI*², s.v. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān; Jafri, Origins, 58–79.

530. A village near Medina on the way to Mecca. Bakrī, Muʿjam, III, 930–31; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 98–99.

531. According to C. Text adds: On him. See Qurʾān, sūrah 9. The title of the Dispensation (or Release) comes from the opening verse which states: "Dispensation [comes] from God and His Messenger for those idolaters with whom you have made a treaty." The alternate title of Repentance is found in verses 5, 11, and 103. This episode later became a cause of conflict between the Shīʿīs and the Sunnīs. Tendentious reporting is reflected in the following report of al-Suddī.

532. A place about 4 km from Mecca where the pilgrims throw pebbles. See Ṭabarī, above I, 1699, n. 381.

533. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn b. Ibrāhīm al-ʿĀmirī al-Baghdādī died in 261/874–75. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 121–22.

534. Aḥmad b. al-Mufaḍḍal al-Qurashī died in 214/829–30 or 215/830–31. Ibid., I, 81.

535. He is Asbāṭ b. Naṣr al-Hamdānī. Ibid., I, 211–12.

536. Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Suddī died in 127/744–45. Ibid., I, 313–14.

537. A place about 12 km from Medina. Bakrī, Muʿjam, II, 464–65; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 325.

from him, so Abū Bakr came back to the Prophet[538] and said, "O Messenger of God, may you be ransomed with my father and mother! Was anything revealed about me?" "No," he replied, "but no one except me or someone from my family should communicate [the declaration of dispensation].[539] Aren't you pleased, O Abū Bakr, that you were with me in the cave,[540] and that you shall be my companion at the cistern?"[541] "Yes, indeed, O Messenger of God," he answered, and left as the head of the pilgrims, while ʿAlī announced the declaration of immunity. ʿAlī stood up on the day of sacrifice[542] and announced, saying: "No polytheist shall come near the Holy Mosque after this year,[543] and no one shall circumambulate the House [i.e., the Kaʿbah] naked. Those who have a covenant between themselves and the Messenger of God will have his covenant until [the end of] its term.[544] These are the days of eating and drinking [i.e., celebration]. God will allow only the one who is Muslim to enter Paradise." [The polytheists] said, "We declare ourselves free from your covenant and that of your cousin except to strike." Then the polytheists went back blaming each other and saying, "What will you do? The Quraysh have accepted Islam, and so you had better embrace Islam."

I have received an account on the authority of al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad[545]—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abān[546]—Abū Maʿshar[547]—Muḥammad b. Kaʿb al-Quraẓī and others: The Messenger of God sent Abū Bakr as a leader of the pilgrimage in the year 9/631 and sent ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib to read thirty or forty verses from Sūrat al-

538. According to both Ibn Isḥāq (Sīrah, IV, 188–90), and Wāqidī (Maghāzī, III, 1077), Abū Bakr did not return to Medina. See also Masʿūdī, Murūj, II, 297; idem., Tanbīh, 237; Lings, Muhammad, 323.

539. Balādhurī's (Ansāb, I, 383) report ends here.

540. The reference is to the Qur'ān 9:40.

541. Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 222; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1322–23.

542. The tenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah is called yawm al-naḥr (the day of sacrifice) when animals are sacrificed. A rock near ʿAqabah was held to be the most auspicious site for sacrifice, but sacrifice could be made anywhere in Minā.

543. Qur'ān 9:28; Blachère, Coran, 216.

544. Qur'ān 9:4; Blachère, Coran, 212–13.

545. Al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad b. Abī Usāmah al-Tamīmī died in 282/895–96. Dhahabī, Tadhkirah, II, 619–20; idem, Mīzān, I, 442–43.

546. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abān al-Umawī al-Kūfi died in 207/822–23. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 329–31.

547. Abū Maʿshar Ziyād b. Kulayb al-Tamīmī al-Kūfī died ca. 120/738. Ibid., III, 382.

Barā'ah to the people, giving the polytheists four months to travel in the land. 'Alī read the proclamation of dispensation on the day of 'Arafah[548] thus giving the polytheists [the remaining] twenty days of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, and the months of Muḥarram, Ṣafar, Rabī' I, and ten days of Rabī' II. He also read it to them in their settlements, stating that no polytheist would be allowed for the pilgrimage after that year and that no one would be allowed to circumambulate the House naked.

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: In this year, alms (al-Ṣadaqāt) were made obligatory, and the Messenger of God dispatched his agents to collect them.[549] [1722]

In this year, the following verse was revealed: "Take alms from their wealth to purify them."[550] The reason for its revelation was the story about the affair of Tha'labah b. Ḥāṭib mentioned by Abū Amāmah al-Bāhilī.[551]

Al-Wāqidī: In this year, the Messenger of God's daughter Umm Kulthūm[552] died in Sha'bān, and she was washed by Asmā' bt. 'Umays and Ṣafiyyah bt. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. It is said that she was washed by the Anṣārī women, among whom was a woman called Umm 'Aṭiyyah. Abū Ṭalḥah descended into her grave.

In this year, the deputation of Tha'labah b. Munqidh came.[553]

In this year, the deputation of Sa'd Hudhaym[554] came.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Salamah b. Kuhayl[555] and

548. 'Arafah or 'Arafāt is a plain about 21 km east of Mecca and is the site of the central ceremonies of the annual pilgrimage to Mecca. The day of 'Arafah is the ninth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah. On that day, the pilgrims halt in the plain of 'Arafah, in front of the jabal al-raḥmah and pray, without which the ḥajj is not valid. The halt lasts from the moment after midday until sunset. *EI*², s.v. 'Arafāt; *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥadjdj.

549. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1084–85.

550. Qur'ān 9:103; Blachère, Coran, 227.

551. Tha'labah b. Ḥāṭib al-Anṣārī, who was a poor man, once requested the Prophet to pray for him, saying that if he became rich he would look after the needy. After he became rich, he changed and even refused to give alms. For details, see Wāḥidī, Asbāb, 175–76.

552. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 297; al-Dhahabī, 'Ibar, I, 5; *EI*¹, s.v. Umm Kulthūm. See Ṭabarī, below I, 1767, n. 876; idem, Dhuyūl, 498.

553. They were four people, and they embraced Islam. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 43.

554. A clan of Quḍā'ah. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 447–48; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 65.

555. Salamah b. Kuhayl al-Kūfī died ca. 121/739. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 155–57.

Muḥammad b. al-Walīd b. Nuwayfi' [al-Asadī][556]—Kurayb,[557] a freed slave of Ibn 'Abbās—'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās: The Banū Sa'd b. Bakr sent Ḍimām b. Tha'labah to the Messenger of God.[558] He came and made his camel kneel at the door of the mosque, hobbled it, then entered the mosque as the Messenger of God was sitting with his companions. Ḍimām was a robust and hairy man with two forelocks. He came forward until he stood over the Messenger of God and said, "Which of you is 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib's son?" The Messenger of God replied, "I am the son of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib." Ḍimām asked, "[Are you] Muḥammad?" He replied, "Yes." Ḍimām said, "O son of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, I am going to ask [1723] you [something] and will speak rudely about the matter, so don't take it amiss." [The Prophet] replied, "I will not, so ask what comes to your mind." Ḍimām said, "I adjure you by God, your God, the God of those who went before you, and the God of those who will come after you, has God sent you as a messenger to us?" [The Prophet] replied, "O God! Yes." Ḍimām then adjured him to answer the following questions: "Has He ordered you to command[559] us to worship Him alone and not to associate anything with Him and to renounce these rival deities which our forefathers used to worship instead[560] of Him? Has He ordered you to command us to pray these five prayers?" [The Prophet] replied, "O God! Yes." Then Ḍimām began to mention the obligatory acts of Islam one by one, zakāt tax, fasting, pilgrimage, and all the laws of Islam, and adjured him to answer. When he was finished he said, "I testify that there is no god but God alone. Who has no associate, and I testify that Muḥammad is His[561] Messenger; and that I will discharge these obligations, and will avoid what you have forbidden me from doing; I will neither add to nor diminish [anything] from them." Then he withdrew to his camel.[562] When

556. Ibid., IX, 504.

557. Kurayb b. Abī Muslim al-Hāshimi died in 98/716–17 in Medina. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 211; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 433.

558. According to Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 43–44, he came to Medina in Rajab 5/627–28.

559. Ibn Shabbah (Ta'rīkh, II, 522): That we worship Him alone [who] has no associate.

560. Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq: Along with Him.

561. Ibn Shabbah adds: His servant and.

562. Ibn Isḥāq adds: Returning home.

he turned away, the Messenger of God said, "If [this] man with the two forelocks is sincere, he will go to Paradise."

Ḍimām came to his camel, freed it from its hobble, and traveled until he came to his people, who gathered around him. The first thing he said was, "How evil are al-Lāt and al-ʿUzzā!"[563] They said, "Refrain from this, O Ḍimām; beware of white leprosy (baraṣ), beware of true leprosy (judhām), and beware of madness!" He replied, "Woe to you! Both [al-Lāt and al-ʿUzzā] can neither heal nor harm. God has sent a messenger and has sent down to him a book. By means of it I seek to deliver you from your present state [of ignorance]. [As for me], I bear witness that there is no god except God, the One without a partner, and that Muḥammad is [1724] His servant and messenger. I have brought to you what he has commanded you to do and what he has forbidden you from doing." By God, before the evening was over that day [there was] not a single man or woman in his tribe who had not become Muslim. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās said that they had not heard of any tribal delegate better than Ḍimām b. Thaʿlabah.

563. Al-ʿUzzā is an old Arabian goddess, whose name means "the Strong, the Powerful." Her main sanctuary was in the valley of Nakhlah. In Mecca, she formed a trinity with al-Lāt and Manāt and they were called the three "daughters of Allāh." Wellhausen, Skizzen, III, 30–42. See Ṭabarī, above I, 1161, n. 78.

The Events of the Year

10

(April 9, 631–March 28, 632)

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: In this year, in the month of Rabī' II (it is said in the month of Rabī' I, or in Jumādā I), the Messenger of God sent Khālid b. al-Walīd with an army of four hundred to the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b.[564]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: The Messenger of God sent Khālid b. al-Walīd in the month of Rabī' II, or Jumādā I, in the year 10/631 to the Balḥārith[565] b. Ka'b in Najrān, [566] and ordered him to invite them to Islam for three days before he fought them. If they should respond to him [with the acceptance of Islam], then he was to accept it from them,[567] and to stay with them and teach them the Book of God, the sunnah of His prophet, and the requirements of Islam (ma'ālim al-islām); if they should decline, then he was to fight them.

564. A clan of a South Arabian tribe. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 416–17. See also Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 72; II/1, 122.

565. Ibn Isḥāq: Banū al-Ḥārith.

566. Name of a town and a district in northern Yemen. EI[1], s.v. Nadjrān. For its topography see Philby, Arabian Highlands, 213ff.

567. Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq: And if they declined he was to fight them.

Khālid departed and came to them, sending out riders in every direction inviting them to Islam and saying, "O people, accept Islam, and you will be safe." So they embraced Islam and responded to his call. Khālid stayed with them, teaching them Islam, the Book of God, and the sunnah of His prophet.[568]

Then Khālid wrote to the Messenger of God:[569] "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful, to Muḥammad the Prophet, the Messenger of God, from Khālid b. al-Walīd. Peace be upon [1725] you, O Messenger of God, and God's mercy and blessings. I praise God unto you, the only God. Now then: O Messenger of God, God bless you. You sent me to the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b and ordered that, when I came to them, I should not fight them for three days and that I should invite them to Islam. [You also ordered that] if they accepted it, I should accept it from them and teach them the requirements of Islam, the Book of God, and the sunnah of His Prophet. If they did not accept Islam, I was to fight them. I came to them and invited them to Islam for three days as the Messenger of God commanded me, and I sent riders among them [announcing], 'O Banū al-Ḥārith, embrace Islam, and you will be safe.' They have surrendered and did not fight, and I am staying in their midst ordering them [to do] what God has ordered, forbidding them from [doing] what God has forbidden, and teaching them the requirements of Islam and the sunnah of the Prophet until the Messenger of God writes to me. Peace be upon you, O Messenger of God, and God's mercy and blessings."

The Messenger of God wrote to him:[570] "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful, from Muḥammad, the Prophet, the Messenger of God, to Khālid b. al-Walīd. Peace be upon you. I praise God, the only God, unto you. Now then: Your letter has reached me via your messenger[571] with the news[572] that the Banū al-Ḥārith [b. Ka'b][573] surrendered before they fought[574] and re-

568. Addition in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: For that was what the Messenger of God had ordered him to do if they accepted Islam and did not fight.

569. See Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 131.

570. See Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 132.

571. As in Ibn Isḥāq and Ḥamīdullāh (Majmū'ah, 132). Text: Messengers.

572. Hisch. and Ḥamīdullāh (Majmū'ah): Informing [me].

573. Addition from Ḥamīdullāh.

574. Hisch., Ḥamīdullāh: Before you fought them.

sponded to your invitation to Islam and pronouncement (of[575] the shahādah) that there is no god except God alone, who has no associate, and that Muḥammad is His Servant and Messenger. God has guided them with His guidance, so give them good tidings and warn them and return, and let their deputation come with you. Peace be upon you, and God's mercy and His blessings."

Then Khālid b. al-Walīd came back to the Messenger of God and with him came the deputation of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b. Qays b. al-Ḥuṣayn b. Yazīd b. Qanān Dhū al-Ghuṣṣah, Yazīd b.
[1726] 'Abd al-Madān,[576] Yazīd b. al-Muḥajjal, 'Abdallāh b. Qurayẓ[577] al-Ziyādī, Shaddād b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Qanānī, and 'Amr b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḍabābī were among the delegation. When they came to the Messenger of God, he saw them and asked who those people were, because they looked like Indians. He was told that they were the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b. When they stood before the Messenger of God, they greeted him and said, "We testify that you are the Messenger of God and that there is no god but Allāh." He replied, "And I testify that there is no god but Allāh, and that I am the Messenger of God." Then he said, "You are the ones who when driven away would push forward." They became silent and none of them answered him. He repeated it three times and none of them replied. When he repeated it the fourth time Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Madān replied, "Yes, O Messenger of God, we are the ones who, when driven away, pushed forward," and he repeated it four times. The Messenger of God said, "Had Khālid b. al-Walīd not written to me that you had surrendered and had not fought, I would have thrown your heads underneath your feet." Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Madān answered, "By God, O Messenger of God, we did not eulogize you, nor did we eulogize Khālid." "Then whom did you eulogize?" he asked. They said, "We exalted God who guided us through you." "You have spoken the truth," he said, and then asked them, "With what did you overpower those who fought you in pre-Islamic times (al-jāhiliyyah)?"[578] "We did not prevail over anyone," they replied. "Yes, indeed, you did prevail over

575. Hisch., Ḥamīdullāh: And they pronounced.
576. Ibn Sa'd adds: 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Madān.
577. Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Sa'd: Qurād.
578. See *EI*², s.v. Djāhiliyya.

those who fought you," he said. They replied, "O Messenger of God, we used to overpower those who fought us because we were the sons of slaves and[579] were united, not divided, and never committed an injustice against anyone." "You have spoken the truth," he said, and appointed Qays b. al-Ḥuṣayn as their leader.[580] [1727]

The deputation of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b returned to their people at the end of Shawwāl or the beginning of Dhū al-Qa'dah. After their return there did not pass but four months before the Messenger of God died.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: I have received an account on the authority of 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: After the deputation of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b returned, the Messenger of God sent 'Amr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī and later someone from the Banū al-Najjār[581] to instruct them in religion, to teach them the sunnah and the requirements of Islam, and to collect alms from them. The Messenger of God wrote a letter for 'Amr entrusting him with his commands. [It read]:[582]

"In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. This is a declaration from God and His Messenger. 'O you the believers, fulfill your contracts.'[583] [This is a] deed from Muḥammad, the Prophet, to 'Amr b. Ḥazm when he sent him to the Yemen. He orders him to fear God (taqwā) in all his doings for 'Surely God is with those who are god-fearing, and those who are doers of good.'[584] He commands him to observe the truth as God has commanded, that he should give the people tidings of good (al-khayr), command them to follow it, teach them the Qur'ān, instruct them in religion, and forbid them [from wrongdoing], because 'None but the purified shall touch the Qur'ān.'[585] [He]

---

579. We were . . . and: Omitted from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq.

580. According to Ibn Sa'd, the Prophet gave him twelve ūqīyahs [of silver] as a gift.

581. 'Amr b. Ḥazm was from the Banū Najjār, a clan of al-Khazraj. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 21; V, 49–50; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 347–49.

582. See Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 173–77, where it is analyzed into twenty-two themes.

583. Qur'ān 5:1.

584. Ibid., 16:128.

585. Ibid., 56:79.

should inform the people of their privileges and obligations and be gentle to them when right is with them, but be severe with them when they are unjust, for God abhors injustice and forbids it, and states, 'Surely the curse of God shall rest upon the evildoers.'[586]

"He should give the people good news of paradise and the way to attain it,[587] and should warn them of hell-fire and the way to earn it. [He] should court the friendship of the people until they comprehend religion and should teach them the rites of pil-[1728] grimage, its practices, its obligations, and what God has commanded about it with regard to the greater pilgrimage (al-ḥajj al-akbar)[588] and the lesser pilgrimage (al-ḥajj al-aṣghar), the latter being the 'umrah.[589] [He must] prohibit people from praying in one small garment unless it be a garment whose ends[590] could be doubled over the shoulders.[591] [He must] forbid them from wrapping themselves in one garment which would expose [what decency requires to be concealed][592] and forbid men to braid their hair when it is long on the back of the head. [He must] forbid them from appealing to tribes and kinsfolk when there is a dispute among them, but let their appeal be to God alone who has no associate. He who does not appeal to God but [instead] to tribes and kinsfolk should be smitten with the sword, so that the appeal is made to God alone who has no associate. [He must] command the people to perform the ablution thoroughly with plentiful water—washing the face, washing the hands and the forearms up to the elbows, washing the feet up to the ankles, and rubbing [the wet hands] on the head as God has commanded.[593]

"He orders him to offer prayer at the appropriate times with proper bowing and humility; the morning prayer at daybreak, the

586. Ibid., 11:18.
587. Hisch., Ḥamīdullāh: And its distinguished mark.
588. For the ḥajj, see EI[2], s.v. Ḥadjdj.
589. See EI[1], s.v. 'Umra.
590. As in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq. Text: End.
591. As in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq. Text: Shoulder.
592. The tradition states: None of you should pray in a single garment of which no part comes over his shoulders. Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, I, 236–40; Mishkat (trans. Robson), I, 153–55. Transmitted by both Bukhārī and Muslim.
593. For details, see Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, I, 125–34; Mishkat (trans. Robson), I, 82–87.

noon prayer at noon when the sun declines, the afternoon prayer when the sun is declining, the sunset prayer when the night approaches [it should not be delayed until the stars appear in the sky], and the evening prayer at the beginning of the night.[594] [He must] order them to go to the congregational prayer when they are summoned, and to wash the whole body (ghusl) before going [to the congregational prayer].[595]

"He orders him to take God's fifth from booty and those alms enjoined on the faithful from landed property—one tenth from the land watered by streams[596] and rain, and one twentieth from land watered by a leathern bucket; two sheep for every ten camels [1729] and four sheep for every twenty camels; a cow for every forty cows and a bull or a cow calf for every thirty cows; one sheep for every forty sheep at pasture. This is the ordinance of God which He has enjoined on the faithful concerning alms. He who adds thereto earns merit. A Christian or a Jew who embraces Islam sincerely, out of his own accord, and follows the religion of Islam, is among the faithful with the same privileges and the same obligations. He who holds fast to his Christianity or Judaism is not to be seduced[597] from it. On every adult, male or female, free or slave, [the poll tax] is one full dīnār, or its substitute ('arḍuhu)[598] in clothes. He who pays [the poll tax] has the protection of God and His Messenger, and he who withholds it is the enemy of God, His Messenger, and all the faithful."

Al-Wāqidī: When the Messenger of God died, 'Amr b. Ḥazm was his agent ('āmil) in Najrān.

Al-Wāqidī: In this year, the deputation of Salāmān came to the Messenger of God in Shawwāl. They were seven people headed by Ḥabīb al-Salāmānī.[599]

---

594. Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, I, 184ff.; Mishkat (trans. Robson), I, 118ff.

595. Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, I, 427–40; Mishkat (trans. Robson), I, 284–92.

596. As in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Ḥamīdullāh (Majmū'ah 175). Text: Al-Ba'l. It signifies what imbibes with its roots, without irrigation or rain; or palm trees growing in land whereof the supply of water is near to the surface, so that it needs no irrigation. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. b-'-l. See Ṭabarī above, I, 1718.

597. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Ḥamīdullāh (Majmū'ah, 175): Not to be turned from it.

598. It means width but is also used meaning compensation, substitute. (Lane, Lexicon, s.v. '-r-ḍ]. Ibn Isḥāq: 'iwaḍuhu [i.e., substitute].

599. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 67, states that everyone in the delegation received five ūqīyahs [of silver] as a gift. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 295.

In this year, the deputation of Ghassān[600] came in Ramaḍān.
In this year, the deputation of Ghāmid came in Ramaḍān.[601]
In this year, the deputation of al-Azd headed by Ṣurad b. ʿAbdallāh came, and they were ten odd.[602]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr: Ṣurad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Azdī came to the Messenger of God with the deputation from al-Azd, embraced Islam, and be-[1730] came a good Muslim. The Messenger of God invested him with authority over those of his people who had embraced Islam and ordered him to fight the polytheists from the tribes of the Yemen with them. Ṣurad b. ʿAbdallāh then left with an army by the Messenger of God's command and alighted at Jurash,[603] which at that time was a closed city inhabited by Yemenī tribes. Khathʿam[604] had sought refuge with them, and when they heard that the Muslims were marching they shut themselves in it. The Muslims besieged them for about a month but the tribes refrained from coming out of the city. Ṣurad withdrew from them, appearing to return. While he was near a mountain called Kashar,[605] the inhabitants of Jurash, thinking that he had fled from them, came out in pursuit of him. When they overtook him he turned on them and inflicted a heavy loss on them.

The people of Jurash had sent two of their men to the Messenger of God while he was in Medina to explore and see [what was taking place]. One evening, after the afternoon prayer, while they were with the Messenger of God, he inquired in what country Shakar was. The two men from Jurash got up and replied, "O Messenger of God, there is a mountain in our country called Kashar, and the people of Jurash call it likewise." "It is not Kashar but Shakar," he replied. They said, "What is [the news] of it, O Messenger of God?" He replied, "Camels brought for sacrifice to God [at Mecca] are being slaughtered there now." Then the two 600. Ibn Saʿd. Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 71–72, states that the delegation accepted Islam, but they kept their conversion secret because their people did not accept Islam. See also Ṭabarī, above, I, 1675, n. 200.

601. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 76–77. They were ten.
602. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 71; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 295.
603. See Ṭabarī, above, I, 1669, n. 145.
604. A South Arabian tribe related to Azd. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 387, 390. See also Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 78.
605. Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Saʿd: Shakar. For Shakar, see Jāsir, Sarāt, 45–46.

men sat with Abū Bakr, or with 'Uthmān, who said to them, "Woe to you! The Messenger of God has just now announced to you the death of your people, so go to him and ask to pray to God to remove [that affliction] from your people." They went and did so, and he did pray for them. Then they left the Messenger of God and returned to their people, and discovered that they were killed on the day Ṣurad attacked them, which was the very day and at the very hour in which the Messenger of God had uttered those words.

The deputation of Jurash returned to the Messenger of God and [1731] embraced Islam, and he declared the environs of their city to be a sanctuary (ḥim^{an}) with well-known marks[606] for horses, mounts, and ploughing oxen. Anyone who pastured his cattle elsewhere (other than in the sanctuary), then his cattle could be seized and destroyed with impunity.[607] A man from al-Azd said with regard to that raid that Khath'am used to attack Azd in pre-Islamic times and used to invade them in the sacred month:

O what a raid! We never raided before with such success, with mules, horses, and asses,
Until we came to Ḥumayr in its strongholds—where Khath'am had assembled and were given warnings.
If I could satisfy the thirst for revenge which I carried,
I should not care whether they followed Islam or were infidels.

In this year, the Messenger of God dispatched 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib with an army to the Yemen in Ramaḍān.[608]

Abū Kurayb[609] and Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Hayyāj[610]—Yaḥyā b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Azajī[611]—Ibrāhīm b. Yūsuf[612]—his fa-

606. It refers to the landmarks, probably whitewashed cairns. Ryckmans, Religions, 9; Serjeant, "Translation," 6.

607. For the document, see Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 242–43.

608. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 290–91; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1079–83; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 122.

609. Muḥammad b. al-'Alā' b. Kurayb al-Hamdānī al-Kūfī died in 248/862. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 385–86.

610. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Hayyāj al-Hamdānī al-Kūfī died in 255/869. Ibid., IX, 362–63.

611. Ibid., XI, 250 (al-Azjī al-Kūfī).

612. Died in 198/813–14. Ibid., I, 183.

ther[613]—Abū Isḥāq—al-Barā' b. 'Āzib:[614] The Messenger of God sent Khālid b. al-Walīd to the people of the Yemen inviting them to Islam, and I was among those who went with him. He persisted in the matter for six months, but they did not respond, so the Messenger of God sent 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and ordered him that [1732] Khālid and those who were with him should return, but if any of them would like to follow him he should allow them. Al-Barā' said, "I was one who followed 'Alī, and as we reached the borders of the Yemen the people got the news. They gathered around him and 'Alī led us in the morning prayer. When he had finished [the prayer], he lined us up in one row. Then he moved before us, praised and extolled God, and then read to them the letter of the Messenger of God.[615] All of Hamdān embraced Islam in one day, and he wrote to the Messenger of God about it. When the Prophet read 'Alī's letter he fell down, prostrating himself to God.[616] Then he sat up and said, 'Peace be upon Hamdān, peace be upon Hamdān!' [After the conversion of Hamdān] the people of the Yemen followed in succession with their acceptance of Islam."

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: In this year, the deputation of Zubayd[617] came to the Prophet with their acceptance of Islam.[618]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: 'Amr b. Ma'dīkarib[619] came to the Messenger of God with men from the Banū Zubayd and embraced Islam. He had told Qays b. Makshūḥ al-Murādī when the Messenger of God's news reached them: "O Qays, you are the leader of your tribe today. We have been told that a man from Quraysh called Muḥammad has appeared in the Ḥijāz[620] and claims that he is a prophet. So come with us in order that we may learn about him. If he is a prophet as 613. Yūsuf b. Isḥāq b. Abī Isḥāq al-Sabī'ī died in 157/773–74. Ibid., XI, 408–9.

614. He was from the tribe of Khazraj and an ardent supporter of 'Alī. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, IV, 364; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, al-Istī'āb, I, 155; Jafri, Origins, 52.

615. See Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 132–33.

616. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 300.

617. A clan of Yām of Hamdān. Kalbī, Jamharah, 227, 229: Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 394.

618. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 64; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 297–98.

619. He was a famous warrior and poet of a noble Yemenite family. After the Prophet's death he apostatized, supported al-Aswad al-'Ansī, and fought against the Muslims. He was taken captive but was freed later. Probably he was killed at al-Qādisiyyah or Nihāwand. EI², s.v. 'Amr b. Ma'dīkarib.

620. The northwestern part of Arabian Peninsula. EI², s.v. Ḥidjāz.

he says, then it will not be hidden from you, and when we meet him we will follow him. If he is other than that we shall know about him." But Qays b. Makshūḥ declined and called [ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib's] idea foolish. Thereupon ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib rode off and came to the Messenger of God, attested his truthfulness, and embraced Islam. When Qays learned about it he criticized ʿAmr and threatened[621] him, saying that he had gone against him and rejected his counsel. With regard to that, ʿAmr said:

On the day of Dhū Ṣanʿā' I counseled you, [1733] counsel which was plainly upright.
I counseled you to fear God, practice goodness, and come to its understanding.
Out of worldly desires you went off, like a donkey[622] beguiled by its lust.
He wished to meet me on a horse,
which I ride like a lion,
Wearing a wide coat of mail glittering like a pool, whose water is purified against hard level ground.
Mail that repels lances with their heads bent, with broken shafts flying around.
If you had encountered me,
you would have encountered a lion with a flowing mane.
You would confront a lion with rough claws and lofty back, Vying with his rival for glory;
if the rival heads for him he grasps him in his arms, Seizes him and lifts him up, throws him down and kills him,
Dashes out his brains and shatters him, tears him apart and devours him,
Admitting none a share in what his teeth and claws could take.[623]
Whenever he feeds on the prey, he is received coolly.

621. As in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq. Text: Became vigilant.
622. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: A little donkey.
623. The following verses are omitted from Ibn Isḥāq. Ibn Hishām states that some of the above verses were recited differently to him.

He shakes like the shaking of a stallion, whose drink is covered with foam, [1734] Become afflicted with gnats, and deprived of reaching his country.
Do not wish to encounter me, wish for someone else with soft shoulders.
Provide me with a country for him, where the people around him will be numerous.

ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib stayed with his people the Banū Zubayd while Farwah b. Musayk al-Murādī[624] was their chieftain. When the Messenger of God died, ʿAmr apostatized and said:

We found Farwah's reign the worst of reigns,
a donkey sniffing at dirt.[625]
If you had looked at Abū ʿUmayr, you would have seen him like a caul filled with filth and treachery.

Farwah b. Musayk al-Murādī had come to the Messenger of God in this year [i.e., 10/631] before the coming of ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib, disassociating himself from the kings of Kindah.[626]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr: Farwah b. Musayk al-Murādī came to the Messenger of God, withdrawing himself from the kings of Kindah[627] out of hostility toward them. Shortly before [the advent of] Islam, there was a battle between Murād[628] and Hamdān wherein the latter gave a sound thrashing to the former in an encounter called al-razm.[629] The person who led Hamdān over Murād was al-Ajdaʿ b. Mālik, who put them to disgrace on that day. Concerning that [engagement], Farwah b. Musayk said:

---

624. He headed the Murād delegation, and the Prophet appointed him as the head of the Murād, Zubayd, and Madhḥij. Ibn Saʿd, Tabaqāt, I/2, 63–64.

625. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: Thafr. It means the vulva of an animal of prey. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. th-f-r.

626. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 295–97.

627. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: And distancing himself from them.

628. A clan of Madhḥij. Kalbī, Jamharah, 258; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 406.

629. Hisch., and Ibn Isḥāq: Al-Radm. Razm means death, while radm means a thing that intervenes between two other things, an obstruction, a barrier. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. r-d-m.

If we are victorious, we were victors of old,[630] [1735] and if defeated, we were not defeated before.[631]
If we are killed,[632] it is not (because of) cowardice, but (because of) our fate and the bait[633] of others.
Likewise is the fate whose wheel turns now for and now against.
When it is with us we are delighted and rejoice in it, though its opulence has shielded us for years.
When the wheel of fate turns,
those who were envied are found ground to pieces,
And those who were envied with the turn of fate will find the turn of time deceptive.
If kings remained forever we would be immortal, and if the noble endured we would endure.
But those leaders of my people are annihilated, like the annihilation of previous generations.

When Farwah b. Musayk headed for the Messenger of God, separating himself from the kings of Kindah, he said:

When I saw the kings of Kindah turning away, like a man's foot letting him down by his leg's sinew,
I turned to my camel, leading the way to Muḥammad, hoping for the virtues and good earth of Medina.

When he reached him, the Messenger of God asked him, "It has [1736] been reported to me, O Farwah, that you were upset at what happened to your people on the day of al-razm." He replied, "O Messenger of God, what befell my people on that day would upset any person if it happened to his people." The Messenger of God answered that if it were so, Islam would bring only good to his people, and appointed him [as a leader] over Murād, Zubayd, and

630. Additional verse in Ibn Isḥāq:
They passed by Lufāt with sunken eyes, tugging at reins as they turned.
Lufāt is a place name in the Murād country.
631. Ibn Isḥāq:
. . . if we are conquered we were not conquered before.
632. Ibn Isḥāq and Ibn al-Athīr:
And our nature is not cowardice.
633. Ibn al-Athīr: And the good fortune of others.

Madhḥij[634] and sent with him Khālid b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ in charge of the alms. Khālid remained with Farwah in his country until the Messenger of God died.

Abū Kurayb and Sufyān b. Wakī'[635]—Abū Usāmah—Mujālid[636]—'Āmir—Farwah b. Musayk: The Messenger of God asked me, "Are you distressed about your people's encounter with Hamdān?" "Yes, by God, it annihilated my kinsfolk and near relatives," I replied. He said, "It is better for those who survived."

In this year, the deputation of 'Abd al-Qays[637] arrived.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Al-Jārūd b. 'Amr b. Ḥanash b. al-Mu'allā, a brother of 'Abd al-Qays, who was a Christian, came to the Messenger of God with a deputation of 'Abd al-Qays.[638]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Ḥasan b. Dīnār[639]—al-Ḥasan [al-Baṣrī]: When al-Jārūd reached the Messenger of God, he spoke to him, and the Messenger of God proposed Islam to him, invited him to embrace it, and made him desirous of Islam. He answered, "O Muḥammad, I followed a religion, and now if I [1737] leave it for yours will you guarantee my religion?"[640] The Messenger of God replied, "Yes, I guarantee that what God has guided you to is better than that [i.e., which you practice]." So he and his companions embraced Islam. Then they asked the Messenger of God for mounts, and when he replied that he had none they said, "O Messenger of God, between us [i.e., Medina] and our country there are some stray beasts that strayed from their owners. Can we ride them to our country?" He replied, "No, beware of them. Indeed, it [leads to] hell-fire."

Al-Jārūd then left for his people. He was a good Muslim, steadfast in his religion until he died, having lived through the period

634. A South Arabian tribe. Kalbī, Jamharah, 176, 258; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 476–77.

635. Sufyān b. Wakī' b. al-Jarrāḥ al-Kūfī died in 247/861. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 123–24.

636. Mujālid b. Sa'īd al-Hamdānī al-Kūfī died in 144/761–62. Ibid., X, 39–41.

637. A branch of Rabī'ah. Kalbī, Jamharah, 141, 168; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 295–96.

638. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 54, states that they stayed in Medina for ten days and the Prophet gave them gifts before they departed. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 298.

639. Al-Ḥasan b. Dīnār, Abū Sa'īd al-Baṣrī. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 275–76.

640. As in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq. The text is without the interrogative particle.

of apostasy (al-riddah).[641] When some of his people who had embraced Islam went back to their earlier religion with al-Gharūr[642] al-Mundhir b. al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir, al-Jārūd stood up, confessed his Islam and invited them back to it saying, "O people, I testify that there is no god but God, and Muḥammad is His servant and His Messenger. I am done with him[643] who does not pronounce the shahādah."

The Messenger of God had sent al-'Alā' b. al-Ḥaḍramī to al-Mundhir b. Sāwā al-'Abdī before the conquest of Mecca,[644] and he embraced Islam and became a good Muslim. Al-Mundhir died after the Messenger of God but before the apostasy of the people of al-Baḥrayn,[645] while al-'Alā', who was the Messenger of God's amīr (deputy) over al-Baḥrayn, was with him.

In this year, the deputation of the Banū Ḥanīfah[646] came.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: The deputation of the Banū Ḥanīfah came to the Messenger of God and among them was Musaylimah b. Ḥabīb,[647] the arch liar. They stayed with the daughter of al-Ḥārith,[648] a woman of the Anṣār from the Banū Najjār.[649]

---

641. It is generally translated as "the wars of apostasy," because in the traditional sources it is reported as a religious movement directed against Islam. This view was first challenged by Wellhausen (Skizzen, VI, 7–37), and Caetani (Annali, II, 549–831), who argued that it was essentially political in nature. The leaders of the riddah, often called "the false prophets," represented themselves as possessing prophetic aspirations; hence it was not wholly devoid of religious character. Cf. Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 147–48. Its character and extent are analyzed by Shoufani, al-Riddah, 71–106.

642. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: Gharūr b. al-Mundhir.

643. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: I regard him an infidel.

644. According to Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 19, 27–28, 41, the Prophet sent al-'Alā' to al-Mundhir b. Sāwā, who was Khusraw's governor over al-Baḥrayn after he had returned from al-Ji'rānah. See also Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 112–15.

645. In pre-Islamic and early Islamic times, this name was applied to the mainland of Eastern Arabia, embracing the oases of al-Qaṭīf and Hajar (al-Ḥasā). Later, it was restricted to the archipelago offshore. *EI*², s.v. al-Baḥrayn.

646. A large section of this ancient Arab tribe revolted against Medina under Musaylimah. *EI*², s.v. Ḥanīfa. For the delegation, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 55–56; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 298.

647. Musaylimah, diminutive of Maslamah (which was his real name), was the theocratic lord of a sacred ḥaram. According to one report, he had set up this sacred enclave in Yamāmah before the Prophet's hijrah. He thus controlled an extensive area of the eastern Arabia. *EI*¹, s.v. Musailima; Serjeant, "Early Arabic Prose," 127.

648. She was Ramlah bt. al-Ḥārith. Ibn Sa'd.

649. A clan of Khazraj. Kalbī, Jamharah, 185, 186; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 347–52.

[1738] Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: I have received an account on the authority of some of our Medinese scholars: The Banū Ḥanīfah brought Musaylimah to the Messenger of God, veiling him with a garment, while the Messenger of God was seated among his companions, holding a palm branch with some leaves on its upper end. When he approached the Messenger of God while being veiled with garments, he spoke to him [and asked][650] [for a gift]. The Messenger of God replied, "If you had asked me for this palm branch which I hold, I would not have given it to you."

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—a shaykh of the Banū Ḥanīfah from the people of al-Yamāmah:[651] The story of Musaylimah differs from the one mentioned before. [This shaykh] alleged that the deputation of the Banū Ḥanīfah came to the Messenger of God and left Musaylimah behind with their baggage. When they embraced Islam, they mentioned to the Prophet where he was, saying, "O Messenger of God, we have left behind a companion of ours to guard our camels and baggage." The Messenger of God ordered for him the same as he had ordered for them, saying, "His position, guarding the property of his companions, is not worse than yours." This is what the Messenger of God meant.

Then they left the Messenger of God and brought Musaylimah what the Prophet had given him.[652] When they reached al-Yamāmah, Musaylimah (the enemy of God) apostatized, posed as a prophet, and played the liar, saying, "I have been made a partner with him [i.e., Muḥammad] in the affair." He then said to his deputation, "Did not the Messenger of God say to you when you mentioned me to him that my position is no worse than yours? What could it mean except that he knew I have been made his associate?"[653] Then he began to speak in rhyming speech (saj')[654] and in imitation of the Qur'ān: "God has bestowed favors upon the pregnant woman; He has brought forth from her a living being 650. Addition from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq.

651. See Ṭabarī, above, I, 1702, n. 407.

652. Ibn Sa'd adds: Musaylimah said, "The Prophet knows that after him the authority belongs to me."

653. He is said to have proposed sharing power over Arabia. See Ṭabarī, below, I, 1749.

654. It was used for expressing an oracle. Fahd, Divination, 151–53.

that moves from between the bowels and peritoneum."[655] He rid them of the burden of prayer, and permitted them to drink wine and fornicate and so forth, [yet][656] he acknowledged the Messenger of God as a prophet. The Banū Ḥanīfah agreed with him on that. God knows best what the truth was. [1739]

Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī]: In this year, the deputation of Kindah headed by al-Ashʿath b. Qays al-Kindī arrived.[657]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī: Al-Ashʿath b. Qays came to the Messenger of God with sixty[658] riders from Kindah, and went to him in his mosque. They had combed their locks and darkened their eyelids with kohl, and were wearing striped robes (of the Yemenī fabric) bordered with silk. When they entered, the Messenger of God asked, "Have you not embraced Islam?" "Yes, indeed," they answered. "Why, then, is this silk hanging round your necks?" he asked. So they tore it off and threw it away. Then al-Ashʿath said, "O Messenger of God, we are the sons of those who eat bitter herbs and so are you."[659] He smiled and said, "Ascribe this ancestry to al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib and Rabīʿah b. al-Ḥārith." Both were merchants. When they traveled in Arab lands and were asked who they were, they would reply that they were sons of those who ate bitter herbs, and were proud of that because Kindah were kings. Then the Messenger of God said, "We are the sons of al-Naḍr b. Kinānah. We neither follow our mother's [line of descent] nor disown our father's." Al-Ashʿath b. Qays said, "Do you know, O men of Kindah, by God, if I hear a man saying [such a thing] after today, I will thrash him with the prescribed punishment of eighty strokes."[660]

---

655. He followed the kāhin style of rhymed prose and looked to the Heaven for revelation, and preached in the name of al-Raḥmān. See Serjeant, "Early Arabic Prose," 127–28.

656. Addition from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq.

657. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 64, states that they were ten odd, while Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, 298, states that they were sixty.

658. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: Eighty.

659. Ibn Shabbah (Taʾrīkh, II, 547): "O Messenger of God, we think that you are from us [i.e., having the same ancestry]." The Messenger of God replied, "We are the sons. . . ."

660. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq (Sīrah, IV, 232–33): "Are you finished, O men of Kindah? By God, if I hear a man saying [such a thing], I will thrash him with eighty Al-Wāqidī: In this year, the deputation of Muḥārib[661] came.

In this year, the deputation of al-Rahāwiyyūn[662] came.

[1740] In this year, the deputation of al-ʿĀqib and al-Sayyid[663] from Najrān came, and the Messenger of God wrote a peace treaty for them.[664]

In this year, the deputation of ʿAbs[665] came.

In this year, the deputation of Ṣadif[666] arrived and rendered their full [homage] to the Messenger of God at the Farewell Pilgrimage.

In this year, ʿAdī b. Ḥātim al-Ṭāʾī[667] came in [the month of] Shaʿbān.

In this year, Abū ʿĀmir al-Rāhib died at the court of Heraclius [the Byzantine emperor], so Kinānah b. ʿAbd Yālīl and ʿAlqamah b. ʿUlāthah disputed about his inheritance. [Heraclius] decided in favor of Kinānah b. ʿAbd Yālīl, saying that both were city dwellers while ʿAlqamah b. ʿUlāthah was a tent dweller.

In this year, the deputation of Khawlān[668] came. They were ten people.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb:[669] During the truce of al-Ḥudaybiyah[670] and before [the conquest of] strokes." Ibn Hishām adds a long note stating that al-Ashʿath b. Qays was, from his mother's side, a descendant of "the eater of bitter herbs."

---

661. A branch of ʿAbd al-Qays. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 297. See also Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 43; they were ten; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 298.

662. A clan of Madhḥij, a South Arabian tribe. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 412–13. See also Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 76; they were fifteen; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 298.

663. Al-ʿĀqib, whose name was ʿAbd al-Masīḥ al-Kindī, was the head of the delegation. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 84–85; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 293–95.

664. The treaty is reproduced by Ḥamīdullāh, Majmūʿah, 140–58.

665. A branch of Ghaṭafān (Qays ʿAylān). Kalbī, Jamharah, 92, 132; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 250–52. See also Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 41–42; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 298.

666. A branch of Ḥaḍramawt. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 461. See also Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 64–65; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 298.

667. See Ṭabarī, above, I, 1706.

668. A South Arabian tribe of great antiquity. After the death of the Prophet, they at first joined the revolt against Medina, but were brought back to Islam by an expeditionary force. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 61; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 298; *EI*², s.v. Khawlān.

669. His name was Suwayd al-Azdī, and he died in 128/745–46. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 318–19.

670. It is known after the village situated on the edge of the ḥaram (sacred territory) of Mecca where the truce was negotiated and signed. *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥudaybiya.

Khaybar,[671] Rifā'ah b. Zayd al-Judhāmī[672] al-Ḍubaybī came to the Messenger of God, presented him a slave, and embraced Islam. He became a good Muslim, and the Messenger of God gave him a letter addressed to his people. In it was written: "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. This is a letter from Muḥammad, the Messenger of God, to Rifā'ah b. Zayd. I have sent him to his people in general and those who have joined them [in Islam] to invite others to God and His Messenger. Whoever responds belongs to the party of God and His Messenger, and whoever turns away will have two months' truce."[673] When Rifā'ah came to his people they responded and embraced Islam. Then they went to al-Ḥarrah (the volcanic tract, lava field),[674] the Ḥarrah of al-Rajlā',[675] and camped there.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—one who could be trusted from the men of Judhām who were knowledgeable: When Rifā'ah b. Zayd came [to his people][676] with the Messenger of God's letter [1741] inviting them to Islam, they responded. Soon [the following incident happened]. When Diḥyah b. Khalīfah al-Kalbī, who was returning from Caesar,[677] the Byzantine king,[678] [to whom he] was sent by the Messenger of God with some of his merchandise,[679]

671. A famous oasis and settlement about 150 km from Medina, which owes its renown to the events which took place during its conquest in the year 7/628–29. *EI*², s.v. Khaybar. For its topography and historical geography, see Doughty, Travels, II, 77ff.; Philby, Midian, 31ff.; Ḥamīdullāh, Battlefields, 48–52; Jāsir, Shimāl, 217ff.; Al-Wohaibi, Hijaz, 113–19.

672. Judhām is an Arab tribe which claims descent from Kahlān b. Sabā' of Yemen. They had settled in pre-Islamic times on the borders of Byzantine Syria and Palestine. *EI*², s.v. Djudhām.

673. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, II, 557; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 82–83. See also Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 233–34.

674. Doughty, Travels, glossary of Arabic words.

675. A place in the Judhām country. Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 436; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 246.

676. Addition from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq.

677. The mission of Diḥyah must have been in the summer of 6/627, since a punitive expedition to punish the Judhām plunderers was sent around October 627. Ibn Sa'd [Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 16; IV/1, 184–85], on the other hand, states that Diḥyah was sent by the Prophet in the year 7/628–29 inviting the Byzantine king to Islam. See also Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 83–86.

It is one of the six embassies sent by the Prophet to the rulers of the surrounding countries inviting them to embrace Islam. This story is not accepted by the scholars as it stands; see Buhl, Leben, 294–98; Caetani, Annali, I, 725–39; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 43–44, 345.

678. Probably the Byzantine governor nearest to Arabia.

679. Probably the Byzantine presents to Muḥammad.

reached a valley called Shanār,[680] al-Hunayd b. ʿŪṣ[681] and his son ʿŪṣ b. al-Hunayd al-Ḍulayʿī, a clan of Judhām, attacked him and seized everything that he had. This news reached some people of the Banū Ḍubayb, the kinsfolk of Rifāʿah who had embraced Islam. They responded and went after al-Hunayd and his son; al-Nuʿmān b. Abī Jiʿāl of the Banū Ḍubayb was among them. When they encountered them, a skirmish followed. On that day, Qurrah b. Ashqar al-Ḍifārī, who traced his ancestry from the clan of al-Ḍulayʿ, said, "I am the son of Lubnā." He shot al-Nuʿmān b. Abī Jiʿāl with an arrow, hitting him in his knee, saying, "Take it, I am the son of Lubnā." He had a mother who was called Lubnā. Ḥassān b. Mallah al-Ḍubaybī had been a friend of Diḥyah b. Khalīfah al-Kalbī before that [incident] and had taught him the Umm al-Kitāb [i.e., the first chapter of the Qur'ān]. They rescued what was in the hands of al-Hunayd and his son ʿŪṣ and restored it to Diḥyah. Then Diḥyah left and came to the Messenger of God, informed him what had happened, and sought that he be allowed to kill al-Hunayd and his son.

The Messenger of God sent Zayd b. Ḥārithah with a force against them, which was what provoked the raid of Zayd on Ju-[1742] dhām. All of Ghaṭafān of Judhām, Wā'il,[682] those of Salāmān, and Saʿd b. Hudhaym[683] had set out when Rifāʿah b. Zayd came with the Messenger of God's letter and camped in al-Ḥarrah (the volcanic tract) of al-Rajlā', while Rifāʿah b. Zayd was in Kurāʿ Rabbah[684] with some people of the Banū al-Ḍubayb, not knowing [what had happened]. At the same time, the rest of the Banū al-Ḍubayb were in a valley [of Madān][685] in the region of the volcanic tract where it stretches to the east.

Zayd b. Ḥārithah's army approached from the direction of al-Awlāj[686] and raided al-Faḍāfiḍ[687] from the direction of the vol-

680. Ibn Saʿd (Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 65–66): Reached [a place called] Ḥismā. See also Bakrī, Muʿjam, II, 446–48.
681. Ibn Saʿd: B. ʿĀriḍ, and his son ʿĀriḍ.
682. A clan of Judhām. Kalbī, Jamharah, 245.
683. A clan of Balī. Ibid., 330.
684. A place in the Judhām country. Bakrī, Muʿjam, IV, 1122.
685. Addition from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq.
686. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 282.
687. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: Al-Māqiṣ. They are place names, see Bakrī, Muʿjam, III, 1025.

canic tract. They rounded up the cattle and men they found, and killed al-Ḥunayd and his son and two men from the Banū al-Aḥnaf[688] and one from the Banū Khaṣīb.[689] When the Banū al-Ḍubayb and the army, who were in the flat plain of Madān,[690] heard about [the raid], Ḥassān b. Mallah, Unayf b. Mallah, and Abū Zayd b. ʿAmr rode to them. Ḥassān rode on Suwayd b. Zayd's horse called al-ʿAjājah, and Unayf on Mallah's horse called Righāl, and Abū Zayd on his own horse called Shamir. They went on until they approached the army, at which time Abū Zayd[691] said to Unayf b. Mallah, "Hold back from us and leave, for we are afraid of your tongue." So he left and held himself back. The two had hardly left him when his horse began to scrape the ground and jump. He said [to the horse], "I am more withholding from the two men than you are from the two horses," and he slackened the reins until he overtook them. They said to him, "If you are going to do what you have done, then spare us your tongue and don't bring us bad luck today." They agreed among themselves that only Ḥassān b. Mallah should speak. Now they had a word [1743] which they learned from one another in the pre-Islamic days. If someone wanted to strike with his sword he said "thūrī."[692] When they approached the army, the men came running to them and Ḥassān told them that they were Muslims. The first man to meet them was riding a deep black horse with his lance stretched out as if he had fixed it on the withers of his horse, and was saying, "Forward, overtake," while he advanced, leading the others. Unayf said "thūrī," and Ḥassān told him to take it easy. When they stood before Zayd b. Ḥārithah, Ḥassān said, "We are Muslims." Zayd replied, "Then recite the Umm al-Kitāb." When Ḥassān recited it, Zayd b. Ḥārithah said, "Proclaim to the army that God has forbidden us their land except from those who were unfaithful to their covenant."

Ḥassān b. Mallah's sister, the wife of Abū Wabr b. ʿAdī b. Umayyah b. al-Ḍubayb, was among the prisoners. Zayd told him

688. Hisch., Ibn Hishām: Al-Ajnaf.

689. Both Banū Aḥnaf and Banū Khaṣīb are clans of Judhām. Kalbī, Jamharah, 245.

690. Bakrī, Muʿjam, IV, 1200 (Mudān); Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 74.

691. Addition in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: And Ḥassān.

692. Addition in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: Or būrī.

to take her and she clung to his waist. Umm al-Fazr of al-Ḍulayʿ said, "Are you going away with your daughters and leaving behind your mothers?" One of the Banū Khaṣīb said, "She is from the Banū al-Ḍubayb and their tongues cast spells all day long." Someone from the army heard that and told Zayd b. Ḥārithah about it, so he ordered that the hands of Ḥassān's sister be loosed from his waist and told her to sit with the daughters of her uncle until God decided about them. So, they [i.e., Ḥassān's party] went back and [Zayd] forbade the army to go down into the valley whence they had come. They [i.e., Ḥassān's party] passed the night with their people and milked the camels of Suwayd b. Zayd at nightfall. After they had drunk their night draught of milk, they rode off to Rifāʿah b. Zayd [among those who went were Abū [1744] Zayd b. ʿAmr, Abū Shammās b. ʿAmr, Suwayd b. Zayd, Baʿjah b. Zayd, Bardhaʿ b. Zayd, Thaʿlabah b. ʿAmr,[693] Makhrabah[694] b. ʿAdī, Unayf b. Mallah, and Ḥassān b. Mallah], until they came to Rifāʿah b. Zayd in the morning in Kurāʿ Rabbah in the plain of the volcanic tract by a well there in Ḥarrat Laylā.[695] Ḥassān b. Mallah said to him, "You sit milking goats while the women of Judhām are dragged off as prisoners. The letter which you have brought with you has deceived them." Rifāʿah asked for his camel and began to saddle it while reciting:

"Are you alive or do you call the living?"

In the early morning, they and he, with Umayyah b. Ḍafārah, the brother of the slain Khaṣībī, left the plain of the volcanic tract and journeyed for three nights to the plains of Medina. When they entered the city and arrived at the mosque, a man looked at them and said, "Don't make your camels kneel—otherwise their legs will be cut off." So they dismounted while the camels were standing. When they came to the Messenger of God, he saw them and waved them with his hand to advance [toward him] from behind the people. As Rifāʿah began to speak, a man [from the gathering] got up and said, "O Prophet of God, these men are sorcerers," and repeated it twice. Rifāʿah replied, "May God forgive him who does not treat us well today." Then he handed over the letter to the 693. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: Zayd.

694. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: Mukharribah.
695. Bakrī, Muʿjam, II, 436; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 247–48.

Messenger of God which he had written for him, saying, "It falls short of your [dignity], O Messenger of God; it was written long [1745] ago but its violation is very recent." The Messenger of God asked a young man to read it openly. When he had read it, he asked what had happened. After they had told him the news, he said, "What am I to do about the slain?" and repeated it three times. Rifā'ah replied, "You, O Messenger of God, know best. We do not make unlawful what you consider to be lawful and we do not make lawful what you consider to be unlawful." Abū Zayd b. 'Amr said, "Release, O Messenger of God, those who are alive and overlook those who are dead." He answered, "Abū Zayd spoke the truth. O 'Alī, ride with them." 'Alī replied, "O Messenger of God, Zayd will not obey me." He replied, "Take [this] sword of mine," and gave him his sword. Then 'Alī told him that he did not have a beast to ride. The Messenger of God mounted him on a camel called al-Mikḥāl belonging to Tha'labah b. 'Amr, and they departed. Suddenly a messenger from Zayd b. Ḥārithah appeared on a camel of Abū Wabr called al-Shamir. They dismounted from him and he asked 'Alī, "What have I done?" 'Alī replied, "It is their property, they recognized it and took it back." They continued until they met the army at Fayfā' al-Faḥlatayn[696] and took back the property which was in their possession, even to a woman's saddle cloth from beneath a saddle.[697]

The Deputation of the Banū 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah[698]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah: The deputation of the Banū 'Āmir came to the Messenger of God, and among them were 'Āmir b. al-Ṭufayl, Arbad b. Qays b. Mālik[699] b. Ja'far, and Jabbār b. Sulmā[700] b. Mālik b. Ja'far. These [1746] three were the chiefs and mischief-makers (shayāṭīn) of the tribe. 'Āmir b. al-Ṭufayl[701] came to the Messenger of God intending to 696. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 237.

697. Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, IV, 264–65, cites a poem of Abū Ji'āl.

698. A branch of Hawāzin. Kalbī, Jamharah, 93; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 272–73.

699. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: Jaz' b. Khālid b. Ja'far. Ibn Sa'd: Arbad b. Rabī'ah b. Mālik b. Ja'far.

700. Ibn Isḥāq: Salmā.

701. The enemy of God: Addition in Ibn Isḥāq. He was responsible for the massacre of the Muslim deputation at Bi'r Ma'ūnah. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, III, 193 ff.; Lings, Muhammad, 322–23.

act perfidiously. His people had urged him to embrace Islam because others had embraced it, but he said, "By God, I have sworn that I would not cease [to attain power] until the Arabs follow me. Am I to follow the footsteps of this youth from Quraysh?" Then he said to Arbad, "When we[702] come to the man, I will divert his attention from you, and as I do that, cleave him with the sword." When they came to the Messenger of God, ʿĀmir b. al-Ṭufayl said, "O Muḥammad, can I [talk to you] privately?"[703] He replied, "No, by God, [I will not talk to you] until you believe in God alone." [ʿĀmir b. al-Ṭufayl] repeated his request for privacy and went on talking to him, expecting that Arbad would act as he had told him, but Arbad did not return a word in reply. When ʿĀmir saw that Arbad did not respond, he again repeated his request and the Messenger of God gave him the same reply. When the Messenger of God refused, he said, "Then, by God, I will fill the land with red horses[704] and men against you." When he turned away, the Messenger of God said, "O God, protect me from ʿĀmir b. al-Ṭufayl."[705] On their return, ʿĀmir said to Arbad, "Woe to you, Arbad! What happened to that with which I had charged you? By God, there was no man on the face of the earth whom I feared more than you, but by God, I shall never fear you after today." [1747] "May you have no father, don't be hasty with me," Arbad replied, "By God, whenever I tried to do what you had asked me to do, you got in my way so that I could not see anything but you. Was I to strike you with the sword?" ʿĀmir b. al-Ṭufayl said:[706]

---

702. As in Ibn Isḥāq. Text: I.

703. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 51–52, gives a different version. He states: ʿĀmir asked, "What would I get, O Muḥammad, if I accept Islam?" "You have the same rights and obligations as the Muslims," the Prophet replied. He asked, "Would you invest me with authority after you?" "That is neither for you nor for your people," the Prophet answered. He asked, "Would you grant me [authority] over tent dwellers and [you] exercise [authority] over city dwellers?" "No," the Prophet replied, "but I would appoint you as commander of the cavalry, because you are a warrior." He said, "Then, by God, I will fill . . ." Cf. Ibn Shabbah, Taʾrīkh, II, 515–21, for a similar version. Ibn al-Athir's (Kāmil, II, 298–99) report is similar to that of al-Ṭabarī.

704. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Ibn Shabbah (according to one report): Horses.

705. Ibn Saʿd adds: Give guidance to the Banū ʿĀmir and spare Islam of ʿĀmir b. al-Ṭufayl! Ibn Shabbah: O God, if you cannot guide ʿĀmir, then protect me from him!

706. The following verses are omitted from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq.

The Messenger sent what you see, as if we were intending to raid the troops of horsemen.
Our horses became lean while bringing us to Medina, and they killed the Anṣār in their midst.

While they were on their way back to their country, God afflicted ʿĀmir b. al-Ṭufayl's neck with a fatal disease [a tumor] and killed him while he was in the house of a woman from the Banū Salūl.[707] He began to say, "O Banū ʿĀmir, a lump like the lump of a young camel, and death[708] in the house of a woman from the Banū Salūl!" When they buried him, his companions left for the country of the Banū ʿĀmir. When they arrived there, their people came to them and asked Arbad what had happened. He replied, "Nothing, by God. He [i.e., Muḥammad] called on us to worship something. I wish he were near me now, and I would shoot him with this arrow of mine and kill him." A day or two after he had uttered those words, he went out with his camel to sell[709] it, and God sent a thunderbolt which scorched him and his camel.[710] Arbad b. Qays was brother of Labīd b. Rabīʿah by the same mother.

The deputation of Ṭayyiʾ came to the Messenger of God and talked to him, and he proposed Islam to them. Their leader, Zayd al-Khayl,[711] was among them.[712] They embraced Islam and be- [1748] came good Muslims.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—some men of Ṭayyiʾ: The Messenger of God said, "Every Arab man that has been spoken of to me in the highest terms has fallen short of what was said about him after I met him except Zayd al-Khayl. Indeed, all that was

707. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 282, states that he died in 5/626–27. The Banū Salūl was a clan related to the Banū ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah noted for its meanness. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 271–72.

708. And death: Omitted from Ibn Isḥāq. Ibn Hishām: A lump like the lump of a camel, and death in a Salūlī house. ʿĀmir's saying is used proverbially where one of the two things is more wicked than the other. Maydānī, al-Amthāl, II, 57–58.

709. Ibn Isḥāq: With his camel behind him. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 282.

710. Ibn Hishām cites some Qurʾānic verses [13:9–14] revealed concerning Amir and Arbad. Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, IV, 215–19, quotes elegies of Labīd b. Rabīʿah for the death of Arbad.

711. Al-Khayl means horses, cavalry.

712. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 59–60, states that they were fifteen men; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 299.

said about him does not render full justice [to all his attainments]." Then [the Prophet] named him Zayd al-Khayr,[713] granted him Fayd[714] and some lands with it, and wrote a document for him to that effect. As he left, returning to his people, the Messenger of God said that he hoped Zayd would escape the fever of Medina. The Messenger of God called it something other than fever and other than umm mildam,[715] but [the reporter] could not ascertain which. After Zayd had reached one of the watering places in Najd[716] called Fardah,[717] he was struck with the fever and died there. When he felt that his end was near he said:

Are my kinsfolk setting out eastward tomorrow, while I am to be left in a house in Fardah of Najd?
Oftentimes if I fell sick, women would visit me, not worn out, but tired by the journey.

When he died, his wife took the documents granted to him by the Messenger of God and burnt them[718] in the fire.

In this year, Musaylimah wrote to the Messenger of God alleging that he was his associate in prophethood.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr:
[1749] Musaylimah b. Ḥabīb, the arch-liar wrote to the Messenger of God:[719] "From Musaylimah the Messenger of God to Muḥammad the Messenger of God. Peace be upon you. Indeed, I have been made a partner with you in authority. To us belongs half of the land and to Quraysh the other half, but Quraysh are a transgressing people."[720] This letter was brought to the Messenger of God by two couriers.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—a Shaykh of Ashja'ī. Ibn Ḥumayd states: As for 'Alī b. Mujāhid,[721] he reports from Abū 713. Al-Khayr means good, excellent.

714. A place name. Bakrī, Mu'jam, III, 1032–35; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 282–83.
715. A kind of fever. Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. l-d-m.
716. The highlands of Arabia, above the coastal plain, the upper part of which is formed by the Tihāmah and the Yemen and the lower by Syria and Iraq. EI[1], s.v. Nedjd; Musil, Northern Neǵd (for its topography).
717. A place name. Bakrī, Mu'jam, III, 1017–18; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 248–49.
718. Ibn Sa'd: Tore them into pieces.
719. See Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 256–57.
720. Ibn Shabbah (Ta'rīkh, II, 572): Because [Quraysh] are just people.
721. Died after 182/798. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 377–78.

Mālik al-Ashja'ī[722]—Salamah b. Nu'aym b. Mas'ūd al-Ashja'ī[723]—his father Nu'aym:[724] I heard the Messenger of God saying to the two couriers after they had read Musaylimah's letter, "What do you say about it?" They replied that their answer was what [Musaylimah] had said. "By God," he replied, "were it not that messengers are not to be killed I would have beheaded you."[725] Then he wrote to Musaylimah:[726] "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. From Muḥammad, the Messenger of God, to Musaylimah the arch-liar. 'Peace be upon him who follows [God's] guidance.'[727] Now then: 'Surely the earth belongs to God, who bequeaths it to whom He will among His servants. The ultimate issue is to the God-fearing.'"[728] This was at the end of the year 10/632.

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: It is said that the pretension of Musaylimah and of those who falsely alleged prophethood during the time of the Prophet actually took place after the Prophet had returned from his pilgrimage called the "Farewell Pilgrimage" and during the illness in which he died.[729]

'Ubaydallāh b. Sa'īd al-Zuhrī[730]—his uncle Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm[731]—Sayf b. 'Umar.[732] Al-Sarī[733] wrote about it to me [i.e., al-Ṭabarī], saying that he had received an account on the authority of Shu'ayb b. Ibrāhīm al-Tamīmī—Sayf b. 'Umar al-Tamīmī al-Usayyidī—'Abdallāh b. Sa'īd b. Thābit b. al-Jidh' al-Anṣārī— [1750]
'Abdallāh b. Ḥunayn,[734] the Messenger of God's freedman—Abū

722. His name is Sa'd b. Ṭāriq al-Kūfī, and he died ca. 140/757–58. Ibid., III, 472–73.

723. He was a companion of the Prophet. Ibid., IV, 159.

724. Nu'aym b. Mas'ūd al-Ashja'ī died during 'Uthmān's caliphate [23–35/644–56], or at the Battle of the Camel. Ibid., X, 466.

725. Ibn Shabbah gives a different version.

726. See Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 257.

727. Qur'ān 20:47.

728. Ibid., 7:128.

729. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 299–300.

730. 'Ubaydallāh b. Sa'd [not Sa'īd] al-Zuhrī, a great-grandson of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf, died in 260/873–74. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 15–16.

731. Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm al-Zuhrī died in 208/823–24. Ibid., XI, 380–81.

732. Sayf b. 'Umar al-Tamīmī al-Kūfī, who represents the Iraqi historical school, died in 180/796. Ibid., IV, 295–96; Duri, Rise, 7, 46–47, 140, 143, 144, 154.

733. Al-Sarī b. Ismā'īl al-Hamdānī al-Kūfī. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 459–60.

734. Died during the reign of Yazīd II [101–5/720–24]. Ibid., V, 193–94.

Muwayhibah,[735] the Messenger of God's freedman: When the Prophet returned to Medina after performing the Pilgrimage of Completion [or Perfection of Religion] (ḥajjat al-tamām),[736] he began to have a complaint of illness. As travel was allowed [after the pilgrimage], the news of the Prophet's illness spread; so both al-Aswad[737] and Musaylimah leapt at [the opportunity and claimed prophethood for themselves]—the former in the Yemen and the latter in al-Yamāmah, and their news reached the Prophet. After the Prophet had recovered, Ṭulayḥah[738] leapt at [the opportunity and claimed prophethood] in the land of the Banū Asad. Then in Muḥarram the Prophet complained of the pain from which he died.

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: The Messenger of God dispersed his representatives to every land where Islam had entered to collect the alms (al-ṣadaqāt).

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: The Messenger of God sent out his officials and representatives to every district wherein Islam had set foot to collect the alms. He sent al-Muhājir b. Abī Umayyah b. al-Mughīrah to Ṣan'ā',[739] and al-'Ansī rebelled against him while he was there. He sent Ziyād b. Labīd, a brother of the Banū Bayāḍah al-Anṣārī, to Ḥaḍramawt. He sent 'Adī b. Ḥātim to collect the alms from Ṭayyi' and Asad. He sent Mālik b. Nuwayrah to the Banū Ḥanẓalah. He divided [the task of collecting] the alms from the Banū Sa'd between two of their own men: [Zibriqān b. Badr and Qays b. 'Āṣim, each in charge of a district].[740] He sent al-'Alā' b. al-Ḥaḍramī to al-Baḥrayn, and 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib to Najrān to collect their alms and bring their poll tax to him.

---

735. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 180.

736. It was during this pilgrimage that the verse "Today I have perfected your religion, and completed My favor toward you, and have consented to grant you Islām as a religion," (Qur'ān 5:3) was revealed. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 135. See Tabarī, below, I, 1794.

737. Al-Aswad b. Ka'b al-'Ansī, from Madhḥij, was a leader of the first riddah in the Yemen. His occupation of Ṣan'ā' lasted only a month or two, for he is said to have died before the Prophet, EI[2], s.v. al-Aswad.

738. Ṭulayḥah b. Khuwaylid, one of the tribal leaders, who headed the riddah as a prophet, gained the support of the Banū Fazārah and an important section of Ṭayyi' and joined the revolt in Central Arabia. EI[1], s.v. Ṭulaiḥa.

739. The capital city of Yemen. EI[1], s.v. Ṣan'ā'.

740. Addition from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq and Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 301).

When the month of Dhū al-Qa'dah started this year, that is, the year 10/632, the Prophet made preparations for the pilgrimage and ordered the people to get ready. [1751]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Qāsim[741]—his father[742]—'Ā'ishah the Prophet's wife:[743] The Prophet departed for the pilgrimage on the twenty-fifth of Dhū al-Qa'dah.[744] Neither he nor the people talked of anything but the pilgrimage, until when he was in Sarif[745] and had driven with him the sacrificial animals as some nobles had also done, he ordered the people to remove their pilgrim garments, except for those who had brought the sacrificial animals [with them].[746] That day my menses started. He called on me while I was weeping and said, "What is the matter with you, O 'Ā'ishah? Are you in your menses?" "Yes," I replied, "I wished I had not come with you on this journey this year." "Don't do that," he said, "Don't say that, for you can carry out [all the rites] performed by a pilgrim except that you will not circumambulate the Ka'bah." The Messenger of God entered Mecca and his wives and everyone who did not have a sacrificial animal with him took off the pilgrim 741. Died ca. 126/743–44. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 254–55.

742. Qāsim b. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddīq died ca. 106/724–25. Ibid., VIII, 333–35.

743. See Ṭabarī, below, I, 1767; *EI*², s.v. 'Ā'ishah bint Abī Bakr.

744. Ibn Hishām adds: The Prophet appointed Abū Dujānah al-Sā'idī—others say Sibā' b. 'Urfuṭah al-Ghifārī—over Medina.

745. About six miles from Mecca. Ḥarbī, Manāsik, 465–66; Bakrī, Mu'jam, III, 735–36.

746. Those without the sacrificial animals should be content with the 'umrah, because those who perform the pilgrimage must sacrifice an animal.

Before the pilgrim arrives in Mecca, he puts on the iḥrām. He is then muḥrim, in a state of holiness. The rites on arrival at Mecca are the same for all, for the ḥajj is in a way an 'umrah, which is a rite of visiting the Ka'bah and the Holy Places around it. The 'umrah consists of circumambulating the Ka'bah seven times (ṭawāf), praying two rak'ahs facing the Maqām Ibrāhīm and the Ka'bah, and walking [fast] (sa'y) seven times between Ṣafā and Marwah. What follows after it depends on the intention of the pilgrim made at the time of assuming the iḥrām. If he intended to perform either the ḥajj alone (ifrād), or the 'umrah and the ḥajj together (qirān), then in neither case does he relinquish the state of holiness after having performed the rites of arrival. If he wants to perform the 'umrah first and then to enjoy the freedom of a normal life (tamattu'), not resuming the state of holiness again until the last minute (i.e., on the eighth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah), he deconsecrates himself by having a few locks of hair cut off. In this case, he will have to offer a sacrifice within the sacred territory within a specified period. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥadjdj; Fahd, Panthéon, 203ff . . .

garment. On the day of sacrifice, beef[747] was brought to me and put in my house. When I asked what it was, they said that the Messenger of God had sacrificed some cows on behalf of his wives. On the night of ḥaṣbah,[748] he sent me with my brother ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr to perform the ʿumrah from al-Tanʿīm[749] in place of the ʿumrah which I had missed.[750]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Ibn Abī Najīḥ:[751] The Messenger of God had sent ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib to Najrān and met him in Mecca while he was still in a state of iḥrām. [When he arrived,] ʿAlī went into Fāṭimah,[752] the Messenger of God's daughter, and found that she was not in her pilgrim garments and was prepared [to receive him]. He asked her, "What is the matter [1752] with you, O daughter of the Messenger of God?" She replied, "The Messenger of God ordered us to remove the pilgrim garments, so we did." Then he went to the Messenger of God. After he had finished reporting about his journey, the Messenger of God told him to go and circumambulate the Kaʿbah and remove the pilgrim garments as his companions had done. He replied, "O Messenger of God, I have decided to sacrifice an animal as you did." He said, "Remove the pilgrim garments as your companions have done." ʿAlī replied, "O Messenger of God, when I put on the pilgrim garments I said, 'O God, I will invoke your name over a

747. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: A large portion of beef.

748. It is the following day of the last throwing of pebbles in the valley of Minā, or the night after the days called Ayyām al-tashrīq, that is, the fourteenth night of Dhū al-Ḥijjah. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ḥ-ṣ-b.

749. A place about four miles from Mecca. Ḥarbī, Manāsik, 467; Bakrī, Muʿjam, I, 321; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 49–50.

750. Ibn Isḥāq adds: When the Messenger of God ordered his wives to remove the pilgrim garments, they asked him, "What prevents you, O Messenger of God, from doing the same with us?" "I have sent my sacrificial animals and have matted my hair [labbada shaʿarahu, means the pilgrim, in the state of holiness, puts upon his head some kind of gum so that his hair become compacted together and might not become shaggy, Lane, Lexicon, s.v. l-b-d]," the Prophet replied, "so I shall not be free from the iḥrām until I sacrifice my animals."

Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1092, also states that the Prophet performed both the ʿumrah and the ḥajj together. For a different opinion, see Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 369.

751. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ died in Mecca in 132/749–50. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 355; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 54–55.

752. Fāṭimah, daughter of the Prophet and Khadījah, wife of ʿAlī, mother of Ḥasan and Ḥusayn, was the only daughter of the Prophet to have survived him by six months and to enjoy great renown. *EI*², s.v. Fāṭima. See Ṭabarī, below, I, 1767, 1825.

sacrifice as your servant and Messenger does.'" [The Prophet] asked ['Alī] whether he had a sacrificial animal, and when he replied that he did not have one, the Messenger of God made him a partner in his sacrificial animal. 'Alī retained his pilgrim garments with the Messenger of God until both of them had completed the pilgrimage and the Messenger of God slaughtered the animals on behalf of them both.[753]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī 'Amrah[754]—Yazīd b. Ṭalḥah b. Yazīd b. Rukānah: When 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib came from the Yemen to meet the Messenger of God in Mecca, he hurried to him and left one of his companions in charge of his army. That man dressed some of the men[755] in the army with linen clothes that were entrusted to 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. When the army approached [Mecca], he went out to receive them and found that they were dressed in the linen clothing. "Woe to you," he said, "what is this?" "I dressed them so that they might look handsome when they came to the people," the man replied. 'Alī asked him to remove [the clothing] before he came to the Messenger of God. He did so and returned them to the booty, but the army expressed resentment at their treatment.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ma'mar b. Ḥazm[756]—Sulaymān b. Muḥammad b. Ka'b b. 'Ujrah—his paternal aunt Zaynab bt. Ka'b b. 'Ujrah [1753] who was married to Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī—Abū Sa'īd [al-Khudrī]: When the people [i.e., the army] complained [about the behavior] of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, the Messenger of God stood up to address us, and I heard him say, "O people, do not complain of 'Alī. By God, he is too tough in the matters of God or in the way of God [to be blamed]."[757]

753. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 370, states that the Prophet had brought with him a hundred camels, sixty of which he sacrificed himself and 'Alī the remainder. Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 200, considers the above report, without any reason, a Shī'ī legend.

754. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 241–42.

755. Ibn Isḥāq: Every man.

756. He was qāḍī of Medina during the reign of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz (99–101/717–20). Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 297.

757. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq. See also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 301; Lings, Muhammad, 335.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ: Then the Messenger of God proceeded to perform his pilgrimage, showing the people its rites and teaching them its customs.[758] Then he addressed them in a speech and elucidated [certain things]. After he had praised and glorified God, he said, "O people, listen to my words. I do not know whether I shall ever meet you again in this place after this year. O people, your blood and your property are sacrosanct until you meet your Lord, just as this day and this month of yours are sacred. Surely you will meet your Lord and He will question you about your deeds. I have [already] made this known. 'Let he who has a pledge return it to the one who entrusted him with it;'[759] all usury is abolished,[760] but 'your capital belongs to you. Wrong not and you shall not be wronged.'[761] God has decreed that there will be no usury, and the usury of ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib is abolished, all of it.[762] All blood shed in the pre-Islamic days is to be left unavenged. The first such claim I revoke is that of Ibn Rabīʿah[763] b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib,[764] who was nursed among the Banū Layth[765] and was slain by the Banū Hudhayl. His is the first blood shed in the pre-[1754] Islamic days with which I shall set an example. O people, indeed Satan despairs of ever being worshipped in this land of yours. He will be pleased, however, if he is obeyed in a thing other than that, in matters you minimize. So beware of him in your religion, O people, 'Intercalating a month is an increase of unbelief whereby the unbelievers go astray; one year they make it profane, and hallow it another, [in order] to agree with the number that God has hallowed, and so profane what God has hallowed, and hallow what God has made profane.'[766] Time has completed its cycle [and is] as

758. For details, see Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1097–1102; Lings, Muhammad, 332–35.

759. Qur'ān 2:283; 4:58.

760. Ibid., 2:279.

761. Ibid.

762. Wāqidī [Maghāzī, 1103]: All the usury of pre-Islamic days is abolished. The first such usury I abolish is that of al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib.

763. Wāqidī [Maghāzī, III, 1103, 1111]: Iyās b. Rabīʿah. Ḥamīdullāh [Majmūʿah, 307]: ʿĀmir b. Rabīʿah.

764. It was Rabīʿah's infant son Ādam who was killed in pre-Islamic days. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/1, 32; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 254.

765. Wāqidī: The Banū Saʿd.

766. Qur'ān 9:37. For the Islamic calendar, see Ryckmans, Religions, 13; Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 547–48.

it was on the day that God created the heavens and the earth. 'The number of the months with God is twelve: [they were] in the Book of God on the day He created the heavens and the earth. Four of them are sacred,'[767] the three consecutive [months][768] and the Rajab, [which is called the month of][769] Muḍar,[770] which is between Jumādā [II] and Sha'bān."[771]

"Now then, O people, you have a right over your wives and they have a right over you. You have [the right] that they should not cause anyone of whom you dislike to tread your beds; and that they should not commit any open indecency (fāḥishah).[772] If they do, then God permits you to shut them in separate rooms and to beat them, but not severely. If they abstain from [evil], they have the right to their food and clothing in accordance with custom (bi'l-ma'rūf). Treat women well, for they are [like] domestic animals ('awān^{in}) with you and do not possess anything for themselves. You have taken them only as a trust from God, and you have made the enjoyment of their persons lawful by the word of God, so understand and listen to my words, O people. I have conveyed the Message, and have left you with something which, if you hold fast to it, you will never go astray: that is, the Book of God and the sunnah of His Prophet.[773] Listen to my words, O people, for I have conveyed the Message and understand [it]. Know for certain that every Muslim is a brother of another Muslim, and that all Muslims are brethren. It is not lawful for a person [to take] from his brother except that which he has given him willingly, so do not wrong yourselves. O God, have I not [1755]

767. Qur'ān 9:36.

768. Wāqidī (Maghāzī, III, 1112) adds: Dhū al-Qa'dah, Dhū al-Ḥijjah, and Muḥarram. [It is in the Prophet's address on the Day of Sacrifice.]

769. Addition from Wāqidī.

770. It was so called because Muḍar used to treat it as sacred with the utmost dignity. Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. r-j-b.

771. Wāqidī adds: The month [consists of] twenty-nine and thirty days.

772. It means an immoral act or a sexual offense. It seems that the pre-Islamic Arabs cared little for adultery, provided it was not performed openly. The Prophet's prohibiting a man, long absent from his home, to return to his family at night, is corroborated by Ibn Mujāwir, Ta'rīkh, I, 26. It also concurs with the confinement prescribed in the Qur'ān 4:15, but it contravenes the punishment prescribed in the Qur'ān 24:2. Philby, Sheba's Daughters, 46; idem, Arabian Highlands, 28; Serjeant, "Translation," 9; idem, "Early Arabic Prose," 121–22. See Ṭabarī, below, I, 1821, n. 1321.

773. The sunnah of His Prophet: Omitted from Wāqidī.

conveyed the message?" It was reported [to me][774] that the people said, "O God, yes," and the Messenger of God said, "O God, bear witness."[775]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. ʿAbbād b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr[776]—his father ʿAbbād:[777] The man who used to repeat the Messenger of God's words loudly to the people when he was on ʿArafah was Rabīʿah b. Umayyah b. Khalaf. The Messenger of God would say to him. "Say: O people, the Messenger of God says, do you know what month this is?" and they would say, "The sacred month." Then he would say, "Say to them: God has made your blood and your property sacrosanct until you meet your Lord, like the sanctity of this month of yours." Then he said [to him], "Say: the Messenger of God says, O people, do you know what land this is?" Rabīʿah would call out loudly and they would say, "The Holy Land." He would say, "Say: God has hallowed your blood and your property until you meet your Lord like the sanctity of this land of yours." Then he said, "Say: O people, do you know what day this is?" Rabīʿah repeated [this] to them and they said, "The day of the Greater Pilgrimage." He said, "Say: God has made your blood and your property sacrosanct until you meet your Lord like the sanctity of this day of yours."[778]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Najīḥ: When the Messenger of God stood on ʿArafah he said, "This station is for the mountain that is above it, so all of ʿArafah is a station." When he stood on Quzaḥ on the morning of al-Muzdalifah he said, "This station and all of al-Muzdalifah is a

774. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.

775. In his "L'allocution," Blachère has shown that this address deals with certain general problems, probably paraphrased from the Prophet's sayings on different occasions. The versions of Ibn Isḥāq, Wāqidī, Ibn Saʿd, and Ṭabarī are, more or less, consistent in content. Blachère has pointed out seventeen themes in this address. See also Ḥamīdullāh, Majmūʿah, 306–9.

776. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 234–35.

777. Ibid., V, 98.

778. Ibn Isḥāq adds [with a different isnād]: "O people, God has given everyone his due. Testamentary bequests to an heir are not permitted. The child belongs to the bed and the adulterer must be stoned. He who claims as father him who is not his father, or a client claims a master (mawlā) who is not his master, is cursed by God, the angels, and the mankind. Neither repentance (ṣarf) nor ransom (ʿadl) shall be accepted from him by God." Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ʿ-d-l; ṣ-r-f.

station." Then when he had slaughtered [the sacrificial animals] in the slaughtering place [in Minā][779] he said, "This slaughtering place and all of Minā is a slaughtering place." The Messenger of [1756] God completed the pilgrimage, showed the people its rites, and taught them what was required of them for their pilgrimage, [including] the stations, the throwing of pebbles,[780] the circumambulation of the Ka'bah, and what God had permitted them [to do] and what He had forbidden them [from doing]. It was the Farewell Pilgrimage (ḥajjat al-wadā')[781] and the Pilgrimage for Conveying the Message (ḥajjat al-balāgh),[782] because the Messenger of God did not make any pilgrimage after that.

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: The military expeditions (ghazawāt)[783] in which the Messenger of God personally participated were twenty-six. Some say that they were twenty-seven. Those who maintain the number as twenty-six count the Prophet's expedition to Khaybar and the expedition from there to Wādī al-Qurā[784] as one, because after accomplishing the victory he did not return from Khaybar to his abode but marched from there to Wādī al-Qurā. Those who say that [the expeditions] were twenty-seven 779. Quzaḥ, Muzdalifah, and Minā are sacred places visited by the pilgrim during the pilgrimage. Minā is a place in the hills east of Mecca on the road from it to 'Arafah. Muzdalifah is a place halfway between Minā and 'Arafah where the pilgrims returning from 'Arafah spend the night. see EI[2], s.v. Ḥadjdj; EI[1], s.v. Minā, Muzdalifa.

780. For its interpretation, see Fahd, Divination, 188–95.

781. It is so called because the Prophet bade farewell to the people and died shortly thereafter. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 368; Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 240.

782. Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 240, states that it is so called because the Prophet announced that time had completed its cycle and was as it had been on the day that God created the heavens and the earth. [Probably, he implies the cancellation of intercalating a month.]

Ibn Sa'd states that the Muslims call this pilgrimage the ḥajjat al-islām. It was probably so-called because the Ka'bah and other sacred precincts were now purified of all pagan presence and heathen rites. It was made clear that all rites were now dedicated to Allāh and to His worship. The Prophet had taken every opportunity to free the rites from their pagan associations. His performance of the rites during this pilgrimage became a sunnah to be followed by the faithful. Cf. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1089; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 368, See Ṭabarī, below, I, 1794.

783. See above, n. 432.

784. An ancient town and a prosperous region in the northern Ḥijāz on the old trading route from South Arabia to Syria, where the Egyptian and Syrian pilgrim caravans to Mecca also converge. It is now called al-'Ulā. EI[1], s.v. Wādī 'l-Ḳurā; Al-Wohaibi, Hijaz, 293–300, 315ff.

count the Khaybar expedition as one and the Wādī al-Qurā expedition as another, making the number as twenty-seven.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: The total number of military expeditions in which the Messenger of God personally took part were twenty-six.[785] The raid on Waddān,[786] which is the expedition of al-Abwā',[787] was the first, [followed by] the expedition of Buwāṭ[788] in the direction of Raḍwā.[789] Then [the following]: the expedition of al-'Ushayrah,[790] in the valley of Yanbu';[791] the first expedition at Badr in pursuit of Kurz b. Jābir; the [great][792] battle of Badr in which the chiefs of Quraysh and their nobles were slain and [many] were captured; the expedition of the Banū Sulaym, [which continued] until he reached their watering place al-Kudr;[793] the expedition of al-Sawīq in pursuit of Abū Sufyān until he reached Qarqarat al-Kudr; the expedition of Ghaṭafān toward Najd, which is the expedition of Dhū Amarr;[794] the expedition of Baḥrān,[795] a
[1757] mine above al-Furu' in the Ḥijāz; the expedition of Uḥud;[796] the expedition of Ḥamrā' al-Asad;[797] the expedition of the Banū al-Naḍīr;[798] the expedition of Dhāt al-Riqā' of Nakhl;[799] another expedition at Badr; the expedition of Dūmat al-Jandal;[800] the ex-

785. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: Twenty-seven. For details, see Ibn Hishām, Sīrah; Wāqidī, Maghāzī; and Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 287–371; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 339–43.

786. A settlement about eight miles from al-Abwā'. Al-Wohaibi, Hijaz, 290–92.

787. A place name on the route between Medina and Mecca where the Prophet's mother was buried. Ḥarbī, Manāsik, 453–56; Al-Wohaibi, Hijaz, 35–40.

788. A mountain in the direction of Raḍwā. Bakrī, Mu'jam, I, 283; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 503.

789. A chain of the Tihāmah mountains about seven marāḥil from Medina. Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 655–59; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 51.

790. A place between Mecca and Medina in the direction of Yanbu'. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 127.

791. A place near Raḍwā. Bakrī, Mu'jam, IV, 1402; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 449–50.

792. Addition from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq.

793. Bakrī, Mu'jam, IV, 1119; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 441–42.

794. A place in Najd. Bakrī, Mu'jam, I, 192–93; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 252–53.

795. About four nights' journey from Medina. Bakrī, Mu'jam, I, 228; III, 1020–21; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 252.

796. See Ṭabarī, above, I, 1661, n. 74.

797. A place about 16 km from Medina. Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 468; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 301.

798. One of the three Jewish tribes settled in Medina. ShEI, s.v. Naḍīr.

799. A place about three days' journey from Medina. Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 664–65; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 56.

800. See Ṭabarī, above I, 1702, n. 412.

pedition of al-Khandaq[801] [the siege of Medina]; the expedition of the Banū Qurayẓah;[802] the expedition of the Banū Liḥyān of Hudhayl;[803] the expedition of Dhū Qarad;[804] the expedition of the Banū al-Muṣṭaliq of Khuzā'ah;[805] the expedition of al-Ḥudaybiyah, during which he did not intend to fight but the polytheists blocked the passage [to Mecca for the lesser pilgrimage]; the expedition of Khaybar; he performed the lesser pilgrimage, the Lesser Pilgrimage of Fulfillment ['umrat al-qaḍā'];[806] the Expedition of the Conquest [the conquest of Mecca]; the expedition of Ḥunayn; the expedition of al-Ṭā'if; the expedition of Tabūk. He actually fought in nine of them: Badr, Uḥud, al-Khandaq, Qurayẓah, al-Muṣṭaliq, Khaybar, the conquest of Mecca, Ḥunayn, and al-Ṭā'if.

Al-Ḥārith[807]—Ibn Sa'd[808]—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Sahl b. Abī Ḥathmah—his father—his grandfather:[809] The Messenger of God carried out twenty-six expeditions. Then he cited a report similar to that of Ibn Ḥumayd on the authority of Salamah [as cited above].

Muḥammad b. 'Umar: The Messenger of God's expeditions are well-known and [their number is] agreed upon. No one disputes about their number, which is twenty-seven, but the authorities differ among themselves with regard to their sequence.

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Mu'ādh b.

---

801. Khandaq means a ditch, a trench. It is applied to the "Expedition of the Khandaq," because the Muslims foiled a Meccan attempt to storm Medina by digging a trench at those parts of the city which were open to attack by cavalry. *EI*², s.v. Khandak.

802. One of the three Jewish tribes of Medina. *EI*², s.v. Ḳurayẓa.

803. Kalbī, Jamharah, 58.

804. A well about two nights' journey from Medina toward Khaybar. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 321–22. It is also known as the "Expedition of al-Ghābah."

805. Kalbī, Jamharah, 196. It is also called the "Expedition of al-Muraysī'," after the name of a well.

806. So-called because in the previous year when the Prophet left Medina intending to make the lesser pilgrimage, the Quraysh blocked his way, and subsequent negotiations resulted in the truce of Ḥudaybiyah. His intention was, however, fulfilled the following year when he made the lesser pilgrimage.

807. See Ṭabarī, above, I, 1721, n. 545.

808. Muḥammad b. Sa'd al-'Awfī died in 276/888. Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh, V, 322–23.

809. Sahl b. Abī Ḥathmah, a companion of the Prophet, died during the early part of Mu'āwiyah's reign (41–60/661–80). Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 248–49, IX, 199, states that Muḥammad b. Sahl b. Abī Ḥathmah and Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. Abī Ḥathmah transmitted from him.

Muḥammad al-Anṣārī[810]—Muḥammad b. Thābit al-Anṣārī:[811] Ibn 'Umar was asked how many expeditions the Messenger of God carried out and he said, "Twenty-seven campaigns." Then it was said to him, "In how many did you participate with him?" He replied, "Twenty-one; the first was al-Khandaq and I missed six. I was eager to take part and offered myself to the Prophet for all of them, but he turned me down and did not permit me [to take part] until al-Khandaq."

[1758] Al-Wāqidī states that the Messenger of God fought in eleven expeditions. He mentioned nine of them, which I have reported on the authority of Ibn Isḥāq, enumerating with them the expedition of Wādī al-Qurā. He stated that he fought there with his slave Mid'am, who was shot by an arrow and killed. Al-Wāqidī [also] states that he fought on the day of al-Ghābah and that some of the polytheists as well as Muḥriz b. Naḍlah were killed on that day.

Disagreement about the Number of the Armies and the Raiding Parties (Sarāyā) Sent by the Messenger of God[812]

Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr: The armies and the raiding parties sent by the Messenger of God between the time he came to Medina and the time in which he died number thirty-five:[813] The expedition of 'Ubaydah b. al-Ḥārith to the tribes of Thaniyyat al-Marah,[814] which is a well in the Ḥijāz; the expedition of Ḥamzah b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib to the coast in the direction of al-'Īṣ[815] [some people date Ḥamzah's expedition before that of 'Ubaydah's]; the expedition of Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ to al-Kharrār[816] in the Ḥijāz; the expedition of 810. Ibid., X, 193–94.

---

811. Ibid., IX, 84.

812. See above, n. 432. Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 339–43, has given a comprehensive list of those expeditions.

813. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: Thirty-eight. Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 304) states: It is said thirty-five, or forty-eight. For details, see Ibn Hishām, Sīrah; Wāqidī, Maghāzī; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 371–84, lists about sixty.

814. A valley in the Tihāmah. Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 612–13; IV, 1209.

815. A valley containing several villages on the Red Sea. Al-Wohaibi, Hijaz, 81–83.

816. A watering place of the Banū Ḍamrah. Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 492.

'Abdallāh b. Jaḥsh to Nakhlah;[817] the expedition of Zayd b. Ḥārithah to al-Qardah,[818] one of the wells in Najd;[819] the expedition of Marthad b. Abī Marthad al-Ghanawī to al-Rajī';[820] the expedition of al-Mundhir b. 'Amr to Bi'r Ma'ūnah;[821] the expedition of Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ to Dhū al-Qaṣṣah[822] on the way to Iraq; the expedition of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb to Turabah[823] in the country of the Banū 'Āmir; the expedition of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib to the Yemen; the expedition of Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh al-Kalbī, the Kalb of Layth, to al-Kadīd,[824] [where] he inflicted losses on the Banū al-Mulawwaḥ; the expedition of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib to the Banū 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd, the inhabitants of Fadak;[825] the expedition [1759] of Ibn Abī al-'Awjā' al-Sulamī to the land of the Banū Sulaym where he and all of his companions were killed; the expedition of 'Ukkāshah b. Miḥṣan to al-Ghamrah;[826] the expedition of Abū Salamah b. 'Abd al-Asad to Qaṭan,[827] one of the wells of the Banū Asad toward Najd, where Mas'ūd b. 'Urwah was killed; the expedition of Muḥammad b. Maslamah, a brother of the Banū al-Ḥārith, to al-Qurata'[828] of Hawāzin; the expedition of Bashīr b. Sa'd to the Banū Murrah in Fadak; another expedition of Bashīr b. Sa'd to Yumn[829] and Jināb,[830] [which are] towns in the land of 817. A valley, later known as the "Bustān of Ibn 'Āmir," was the last major halt before Mecca on routes from al-Kūfah, al-Baṣrah, Najd, and the Yemen. Al-Wohaibi, Hijaz, 166–83.

818. Bakrī, Mu'jam, III, 1062; it is spelled al-Qardā.

819. Addition in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq; The raid of Muḥammad b. Maslamah on Ka'b b. al-Ashraf.

820. A well of Hudhayl between Mecca and al-Ṭā'if. Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 641–43; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 29.

821. A watering place between Mecca and Medina. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 302.

822. Bakrī, Mu'jam, III, 1076–77; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 366.

823. Bakrī, Mu'jam, I, 308–9.

824. A place between Mecca and Medina. Ibid., IV, 1119.

825. An ancient town in the northern Ḥijāz, near Khaybar, which was a colony of Jewish agriculturists. It owes its fame in Islamic history to the fact that its surrender was obtained through an agreement between the Prophet and its inhabitants, and that it gave rise to a disagreement between Fāṭimah and Abū Bakr. It is now known as al-Ḥā'iṭ. *EI*², s.v. Fadak. For its historical geography, see Jāsir, Shimāl, 295ff., 510. See Ṭabarī, below, I, 1825, n. 1355.

826. A well near Medina, in the direction of Najd. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 212.

827. Bakrī, Mu'jam, III, 1083–84.

828. A clan of the Banū Bakr of Kilāb. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 56; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 282.

829. Yumn or Yamn is a well of Ghaṭafān. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 449.

830. Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 395–96; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 164.

Khaybar (it is said that Yumn and Jabār[831] are lands in the land of Khaybar); the expedition of Zayd b. Ḥārithah to al-Jamūm[832] in the land of the Banū Sulaym; another expedition of Zayd b. Ḥārithah to Judhām in the land of Ḥismā[833] (its report has been cited before); another expedition of Zayd b. Ḥārithah to Wādī al-Qurā, where he encountered the Banū Fazārah; the expedition of ʿAbdallāh b. Rawāḥah to Khaybar twice,[834] on one occasion of which God killed Yusayr b. Rizām.

It is reported about Yusayr b. Rizām, the Jew, that he was gathering Ghaṭafān in Khaybar to attack the Messenger of God, so the latter sent ʿAbdallāh b. Rawāḥah with a number of his companions, among whom were ʿAbdallāh b. Unays, an ally of the Banū Salamah. When they came to him they spoke to him, made promises, treated him nicely, and said, "If you come to the Messenger of God he will give you an assignment and honor you."
[1760] They continued [urging him] until he went with them, accompanied by a number of Jews. ʿAbdallāh b. Unays mounted him on his camel and rode behind him. When he was in al-Qarqarah,[835] about six miles from Khaybar, Yusayr b. Rizām regretted going to the Messenger of God. ʿAbdallāh b. Unays perceived his intention as he was getting ready to draw his sword, so he leapt at him and struck him with his sword, severing his leg. Yusayr hit him with a stick (with a crooked head) of shawḥaṭ[836] wood which was in his hand, aiming at his head. God killed Yusayr, and each one of the Messenger of God's companions fell upon their Jewish traveling companions and killed them, except for one person who escaped on his mount.[837] When ʿAbdallāh b. Unays came to the Messenger of God the Prophet spat on his head wound, and it did not fester or hurt him.

The expedition of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAtīk to Khaybar where he killed

831. Jubār: in Bakrī, Muʿjam, II, 363; and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 98.
832. Bakrī, Muʿjam, II, 394.
833. It is after Wādī al-Qurā. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 258–59.
834. The following report forms a separate account in Ibn Isḥāq and is not included in the summary.
835. It is Qarqarat al-Kudr. Bakrī, Muʿjam, III, 1065–66.
836. A species of tree in the Sarāt mountains from which bows are made. The name varies according to the excellence of the place of growth, and shawḥaṭ is that which grows on the lowest part of the mountain. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. sh-ḥ-ṭ.
837. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: On his foot.

Abū Rāfiʿ. Between the battles of Badr and Uḥud, the Messenger of God sent Muḥammad b. Maslamah with his companions to Kaʿb b. al-Ashraf, and they killed him. The Messenger of God sent ʿAbdallāh b. Unays to Khālid b. Sufyān b. Nubayḥ al-Hudhalī while he was in Nakhlah or ʿUranah[838] preparing to attack the Messenger of God and killed him.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar b. al-Zubayr[839]—ʿAbdallāh b. Unays:[840] The Messenger of God called me and said, "It has reached me that Khālid b. Sufyān b. Nubayḥ al-Hudhalī is gathering a force to attack me. He is either in Nakhlah or ʿUranah, so go to him and kill him." I replied, "O Messenger of God, describe him to me so that I might know him." He said, "When you see him he will remind you of Satan. [A sure] sign between you and him is that when you see [1761] him you will feel a shudder." I went out, girding on my sword, until I came to him while he was in howdah with the women, seeking a halting place for them at the time for afternoon prayer. When I saw him I found him to be as the Messenger of God had described. I advanced toward him, but fearing that there might be acrimony between me and him which would distract me from the prayer, I prayed, making gestures with my head as I walked toward him. When I got to him he asked who I was, and I replied, "An Arab who has come to you because he has heard about you and your gathering [a force] against this fellow [i.e., Muḥammad]." He said, "Yes, I am doing that." I walked a short distance with him and when it was feasible for me I struck him with my sword and killed him. Then I departed, leaving his women to throw themselves at him. When I came to the Messenger of God and greeted him, he looked at me and asked, "Is the objective accomplished?" I replied, "I have killed him." "You have said the truth," he replied. Then he stood up and went[841] into his house and gave me a stick, saying, "Keep this stick with you O ʿAbdallāh b. Unays." When I went out with it the people asked me what that stick was. I told them that the Messenger of God had given it to me and asked me to keep it with me. They told me to go back 838. Bakrī, Muʿjam, III, 935.

839. He died between 110/728–29 and 120/738. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 93.
840. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 35–36; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 151.
841. Ibn Isḥāq: And took me to his house.

to him and ask him the reason for that. So I went back to him and said, "O Messenger of God, why did you give me this stick?" He replied, "[As a] sign between me and you on the day of resurrection. There will be a few men at that time who will carry sticks tied to their waists (al-mutakhaṣṣirūn)." 'Abdallāh, therefore, fastened the stick to his sword, where it remained with him until his death, when he ordered that it should be fastened to his body with the shroud and buried with him.

(Now the report goes back to 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr who states:) The expedition of Zayd b. Ḥārithah, Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib, and 'Abd-[1762] allāh b. Rawāḥah to Mu'tah[842] in the land of Syria;[843] the expedition of Ka'b b. 'Umayr al-Ghifārī to Dhāt Aṭlāḥ[844] in the land of Syria, where he and his companions were killed; the expedition of 'Uyaynah b. Ḥiṣn to the Banū al-'Anbar of the Banū Tamīm. It is reported by them that the Messenger of God sent 'Uyaynah to them, who raided them, killed some of their people, and took the others captive.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatādah: 'Ā'ishah said to the Messenger of God, "O Messenger of God, I must free a slave of the sons of Ismā'īl." He replied, "These captives of the Banū al-'Anbar are coming now. We will give you one, and you can set him free." Ibn Isḥāq states: When their captives were brought to the Messenger of God, a deputation of the Banū Tamīm rode with them until they arrived before the Messenger of God. Among them were Rabī'ah b. Rufay', Sabrah b. 'Amr, al-Qa'qā' b. Ma'bad, Wardān b. Muḥriz, Qays b. 'Āṣim, Mālik b. 'Amr, al-Aqra' b. Ḥābis, Ḥanẓalah b. Dārim, and Firās b. Ḥābis.[845] Among their women who were taken captive on that day were Asmā' bt. Mālik; Ka's bt. Arī; Najwah bt. Nahd; Jumay'ah bt. Qays; and 'Amrah bt. Maṭar.

(The report goes back to 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr, who states:) The expedition of Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh al-Kalbī, the Kalb of Layth, to [1763] the land of the Banū Murrah, in which Mirdās b. Nahīk, an ally of 842. A village near Syria. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 219–20.

843. Ibn Isḥāq adds: In which all were killed.

844. A place after Wādī al-Qurā. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 218.

845. Addition in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: They spoke to the Messenger of God about the captives. [The Prophet] liberated some and accepted ransom for others. 'Abdallāh b. Wahb; his two brothers; Shaddād b. Firās; and Ḥanẓalah b. Dārim were among the Banū al-'Anbar who were killed that day.

theirs from al-Ḥuraqah of Juhaynah, was killed by Usāmah b. Zayd and a man of the Anṣār.[846] It is he about whom the Prophet said to Usāmah, "Who will absolve you [from ignoring] the shahādah?" The expedition of ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ to Dhāt al-Salāsil;[847] the expedition of Ibn Abī Ḥadrad and his companions to the valley of Iḍam;[848] another expedition of Ibn Abī Ḥadrad al-Aslamī to al-Ghābah;[849] the expedition of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf. The Messenger of God sent an army to the seashore commanded by Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ, which was the expedition of al-Khabaṭ.

Al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar: The armies and the raiding parties sent by the Messenger of God were forty-eight.

Al-Wāqidī states: In this year, in [the month of] Ramaḍān, Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī came to the Messenger of God accepting Islam, so he sent him to Dhū al-Khalaṣah [an idol],[850] which he demolished.

In this year, Wabar b. Yuḥannas came to the descendants of the Persian soldiers (al-abnāʾ) living in the Yemen, inviting them to Islam. He stayed with the daughters of al-Nuʿmān b. Buzurj [Buzurg], who embraced Islam. He sent word to Fayrūz al-Daylamī, who embraced Islam, and [he also sent word] to Markabūd and his son ʿAṭāʾ, as well as to Wahb b. Munabbih.[851] Wahb b. Munabbih and ʿAṭāʾ b. Markabūd were the first to collect (jamaʿa) the Qurʾān in Ṣanʿāʾ.

---

846. Ibn Isḥāq: Usāmah said: When I and a man from the Anṣār overtook him and attacked him with our weapons, he pronounced the shahādah, but we did not stay our hands and killed him. When we came to the Messenger of God we told him what had happened and he said, "Who will absolve you [from ignoring] the shahādah?"

847. A watering place in the Judhām country. Bakrī, Muʿjam, III, 744.

848. It is near Medina. Ibid., I, 165–66.

849. It is near Medina. Ibid., II, 521–24; III, 989. See above, n. 804.

850. A sacred stone worshiped by the tribes of Daws, Khathʿam, Bajīla, the Azd of the Sarāt mountains and the Arabs of Tabālah. The sanctuary was in Tabālah at a place called al-ʿAblāʾ between Mecca and the Yemen. As a rallying point for a good many tribes, the sanctuary was called al-Kaʿbah al-Yamāniyyah in contrast to the Meccan sanctuary, which was called al-Kaʿbah al-Shāmiyyah.

In the lower part of Mecca there was an idol bearing the name of al-Khalaṣah, but it is not certain whether it can be identified with the above divinity. Wellhausen, Skizzen, III, 42–45; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. kh-l-ṣ; Jāsir, Sarāt, 338ff.; *EI*², s.v. Dhu 'l-Khalaṣa.

851. He is probably the ancestor of Wahb b. Munabbih, who died in 114/732 and is known for his accounts of the Yemenite history and tales of the ancient Israelites. Duri, Rise, passim.

In this year, Bāzān embraced Islam and sent [a messenger] to the Prophet with his acceptance of Islam.

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] states: The above report [about the sarāyā] is at variance with what is reported by 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr [that the sarāyā were thirty-five] and those who stated that the Messenger of God's expeditions were twenty-six.

[1764] Abū Kurayb Muḥammad b. al-'Alā'—Yaḥyā b. Ādam[852]—Zuhayr[853]—Abū Isḥāq—Zayd b. Arqam:[854] I heard that the Messenger of God carried out nineteen expeditions, and that he made one pilgrimage after he emigrated [to Medina]. He did not make any pilgrimage other than the Farewell Pilgrimage. Ibn Isḥāq mentioned a pilgrimage at the time of the conquest of Mecca. Abū Isḥāq states: I asked Zayd b. Arqam, "How many expeditions did you take part in with the Messenger of God?" He replied, "Seventeen."

Ibn al-Muthannā—Muḥammad b. Ja'far—Shu'bah—Abū Isḥāq: 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd al-Anṣārī went out with the people to pray for rain. He offered two *rak'ah*s and then prayed for rain. That day I met Zayd b. Arqam. There was only one person between me and him. I asked him, "How many expeditions did the Messenger of God undertake?" "Nineteen," he replied. I asked, "How many did you participate in with him?" "Seventeen," he replied. I asked, "What was the first expedition he carried out?" He said, "Dhāt al-'Usayr, or al-'Ushayr." Al-Wāqidī alleges that [the report] is erroneous.

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Isrā'īl—Abū Isḥāq al-Hamdānī: I asked Zayd b. Arqam, "How many expeditions did you participate in with the Messenger of God?" "Seventeen expeditions," he replied. I asked, "How many expeditions did the Messenger of God carry out?" "Nineteen expeditions," he replied.

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—al-Wāqidī: When I narrated this report to 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far, he said, "This is the chain of narrators for the people of Iraq, who state [the affair] thus. The first expedition in which Zayd b. [al]-Arqam took part was al-Muraysī', while he was still a young boy. He was present in the expedition of Mu'tah as a 852. Died in 203/818–19. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 175–76.

853. Zuhayr b. Mu'āwiyah died ca. 172/788–89. Ibid., III, 351–52.

854. He was a companion of the Prophet and died in 66/685–86 or 68/687–88. Ibid., III, 394–95.

rear man for ʿAbdallāh b. Rawāḥah, and only participated with the Prophet in three or four expeditions." [1765]

That which al-Ḥārith reported to me is also reported from Makḥūl. [This report is received on the authority of] Ibn Saʿd—Ibn ʿUmar—Suwayd b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz—al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir[855]—Makḥūl: The Messenger of God carried out eighteen expeditions, out of which he personally fought in eight. The first of them was Badr, then Uḥud, then al-Aḥzāb, and then Qurayẓah.

Al-Wāqidī states: Both of these reports, that of Zayd b. al-Arqam and of Makḥūl, are wrong.

Report about the Messenger of God's Pilgrimages

ʿAbdallāh b. Ziyād—Zayd b. al-Ḥārith—Sufyān al-Thawrī[856]—Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad[857]—his father [Muḥammad al-Bāqir]—Jābir: The Prophet made three pilgrimages, two before the Emigration and one after. [The latter was also performed] with the lesser pilgrimage (ʿumrah).[858]

ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Bayān[859]—Isḥāq b. Yūsuf[860]—Sharīk[861]—Abū Isḥāq—Mujāhid[862]—Ibn ʿUmar:[863] The Messenger of God performed two *ʿumrah*s before performing the pilgrimage. When this report reached ʿĀ'ishah, she said, "The Messenger of God performed four *ʿumrah*s.[864] ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar knew that. One of [the *ʿumrah*s] was with the pilgrimage."

---

855. Died in 132/749–50. Ibid., X, 457.

856. Died in 161/777–78. Ibid., IV, 111–15.

857. He is the sixth Shīʿī imām, who died in 148/765 in Medina. See *EI*², s.v. Djaʿfar al-Ṣādiḳ.

858. Some authorities state that he made one pilgrimage before the Emigration, while others state that he made two. Wāqidī (Maghāzī, III, 1088–89) considers the report that the Prophet made only one pilgrimage from Medina, known as ḥajjat al-wadāʿ, to be more authentic. See also Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 429.

859. Bayān: Corrected from Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 111; he died in 244/858–59. Text: Banān.

860. Died in 195/810–11. Ibid., I, 257.

861. Sharīk b. ʿAbdallāh al-Nakhaʿī al-Kūfī died ca. 177/793–94. Ibid., IV, 333–37.

862. Mujāhid b. Jabr al-Makkī died ca. 101/719–20. Ibid., X, 42–44.

863. See Ṭabarī, above, I, 1677, n. 216.

864. They are: ʿumrat al-Ḥudaybiyyah in A.H. 6, ʿumrat al-qaḍāʾ in A.H. 7, ʿumrat al-Jiʿrānah in A.H. 8, and the ʿumrah with the Farewell Pilgrimage in A.H. 10. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1088, enumerates the first three only. Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 429.

Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan b. Sharīq: I heard my father saying: I have received an account on the authority of Abū Ḥamzah—Muṭarrif[865]—Abū Isḥāq—Mujāhid: I heard Ibn ʿUmar saying that the Messenger of God performed three *ʿumrah*s. When [this report] reached ʿĀ'ishah, she said that Ibn ʿUmar knew that he performed four, and that one of them was combined with the pilgrimage.

[1766] Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr[866]—Manṣūr[867]—Mujāhid: Once ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr and I entered the mosque while Ibn ʿUmar was sitting near ʿĀ'ishah's room. We asked him, "How many *ʿumrah*s did the Prophet perform?" "Four," he replied, "One of them was in Rajab."[868] We disliked contradicting and refuting him, but we heard the noise of ʿĀ'ishah in the room cleaning her teeth with the siwāk.[869] ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr said, "O my mother, O Mother of the Faithful, do you not hear what Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān says?" "What does he say?" she asked. He replied, "He says that the Prophet performed four *ʿumrah*s, and that one of them was in Rajab." She replied, "May God treat Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān with mercy! The Prophet did not perform any ʿumrah when he was not present, and he did not perform [any] ʿumrah in Rajab."

Report about the Messenger of God's Wives, Those Who Survived Him, Those Who Left Him, the Reason for Which They Left, and Those Who Died before Him

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Hishām b. Muḥammad:[870] My father reported to me that the Messenger of God married fifteen women 865. Muṭarrif b. Ṭarīf al-Ḥarithī died between 133/750–51 and 143/760–61. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 172–73.

866. Jarīr b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd al-Ḍabbī died in 188/803–4. Ibid., II, 75–77.

867. Manṣūr b. al-Muʿtamir al-Kūfī died in 132/749–50. Ibid., X, 312–15.

868. ʿUmrah during the month of Rajab was considered solemn by the Quraysh. Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 201.

869. A piece of stick [from a tree called arāk] with which the teeth are cleaned, the end of it being made like a brush by chewing it. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. s-w-k.

870. Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib al-Kalbī died in 204/819 or 206/821 in al-Kūfah. Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, VI, 196–97. The isnād implied here is: His father—Abū Ṣāliḥ—Ibn ʿAbbās. The same isnād is cited in Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt. See also *EI*², s.v. Kalbī, Hishām b. Muḥammad.

and consummated his marriage with thirteen. He combined eleven at a time and left behind nine.[871]

He married Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid b. Asad b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā in pre-Islamic days when he was twenty and some years old.[872] She was the first [woman] whom he married. Before that she was married to ʿAtīq[873] b. ʿĀbid b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. Makhzūm. Her mother was Fāṭimah bt. Zāʾidah b. al-Aṣamm b. Rawāḥah b. Ḥajar b. Maʿīṣ b. Luʾayy. From ʿAtīq she gave birth to a girl,[874] after which he died. She was then married to Abū Hālah b. Zurārah b. Nabbāsh b. Zurārah b. Ḥabīb b. Salāmah b. Ghuzayy b. Jurwah b. Usayyid b. ʿAmr b. Tamīm, who was of the Banū ʿAbd [1767] al-Dār b. Quṣayy. From Abū Hālah she gave birth to Hind bt. Abī Hālah,[875] after which he died. When the Messenger of God married [Khadījah], she had Hind bt. Abī Hālah with her. She bore eight children with the Messenger of God: al-Qāsim, al-Ṭayyib, al-Ṭāhir, ʿAbdallāh, Zaynab, Ruqayyah, Umm Kulthūm, and Fāṭimah.[876]

---

871. Ibn Hishām (Sīrah, IV, 293): He married thirteen women and left behind nine. Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 307), reporting on the authority of Ibn al-Kalbī, gives the same account as that of Ṭabarī. See also Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 580. Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 393–99, and Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 223–33, give a comprehensive list. The latter tries to justify Muḥammad's nine wives (at the same time) by the Qur'ānic verse 4:3, by adding the numbers two, three, and four. The sequence of his marriages, as given by Ibn Isḥāq, Kitāb al-Mubtada', 227–50, is as follows: First Khadījah, then Sawdah, then ʿĀʾishah, then Ḥafṣah, then Zaynab bt. Khuzaymah, then Umm Ḥabībah, then Umm Salamah, then Zaynab b. Jaḥsh, then Juwayriyyah, then Ṣafiyyah, and then Maymūnah.

872. Muḥammad's age at the time of his marriage with Khadījah is generally given as twenty-five, but some sources state that he was twenty-one, or thirty. Her age, on the other hand, is generally given as forty; however, according to some reports she was either twenty-eight or two years older than Muḥammad. She died in Ramaḍān, tenth year of the mission (or three years before the Emigration). Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 7–27; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 581.

873. Ibn Hishām: Utayyiq. Ibn Isḥāq (Kitāb al-Mubtada', 229): ʿAtīq b. ʿĀʾidh.

874. Ibn Hishām adds: And ʿAbdallāh. Ibn Saʿd adds: Called Hind, hence she was called Umm Hind.

875. Ibn Hishām adds: And Zaynab bt. Abī Hālah. Ibn Isḥāq (Kitāb al-Mubtada', 229): [From Abū Hālah] she gave birth to a boy and a girl.

876. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 202, names three male children as al-Qāsim, al-Ṭāhir, and al-Ṭayyib. Ibn Isḥāq, Kitāb al-Mubtada', 229, cites two reports: (i) it states that she gave birth to seven children, four female and three male, al-Qāsim, al-Ṭāhir, and al-Ṭayyib; (ii) it states that she gave birth to six children, four female and two male, al-Qāsim, and ʿAbdallāh. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 307, names eight children as given in Ṭabarī, but Ibn Saʿd lists seven and states that ʿAbdallāh was Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: The Messenger of God did not marry another woman during the life of Khadījah until she passed away. When she died, the Messenger of God got married, but [opinions] differ as to whom he married first after Khadījah. Some say that it was 'Ā'ishah bt. Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddīq, while others say that it was Sawdah bt. Zam'ah b. Qays b. 'Abd Shams b. 'Abd Wudd b. Naṣr. As for 'Ā'ishah, when he married her she was very young and not yet ready for consummation,[877] whereas Sawdah was already married before. Before the Prophet, her husband was al-Sakrān b. 'Amr b. 'Abd Shams. Al-Sakrān was one of the emigrants to Abyssinia (al-Ḥabashah), who became a Christian and died there. The Messenger of God married her while he was in Mecca.[878]

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] states: All those knowledgeable about the Messenger of God's life agree that the Messenger of God consummated his marriage with Sawdah before [consummating his marriage with] 'Ā'ishah.

---

also called Ṭāhir. Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 581–83, also names three male children: al-Qāsim, al-Ṭayyib, and al-Ṭāhir. They died in their infancy: al-Qāsim and Ṭāhir before the mission, while Ṭayyib after the mission. Some scholars state that Ṭāhir and Ṭayyib are names of 'Abdallāh. Zaynab, the eldest daughter, was married to her cousin Abū al-'Āṣ b. al-Rabī'ah before the mission. Her husband fought against the Muslims at Badr and was taken captive. She died in 8/629. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib married her daughter Amāmah after the death of Fāṭimah.

Both Ruqayyah and Umm Kulthūm were betrothed to Abū Lahab's sons before the mission, but were divorced after the revelation of sūrah 111. Ruqayyah was later married to 'Uthmān. After her death in Ramaḍān 2/624, Umm Kulthūm was married to 'Uthmān in Rabī' I, 3/624, and she died in Sha'bān 9/631. Fāṭimah, born five years before the mission, was the youngest daughter and survived her father for a few months. For details, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 7–27; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 396–407; Ṭabarī, Dhuyūl, 493–94, 498–99; Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 233–36; *EI*², s.v. Khadīdja.

877. She was six years old when the Prophet married her in Shawwāl, tenth year of the mission. The marriage was consummated in Shawwāl in Medina when she was nine years old. She died in Ramaḍān 58/678. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 39–56; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 409–21.

878. Ibn Isḥāq (Kitāb al-Mubtada', 238) states that the couple returned to Mecca and al-Sakrān died there while he was a professing Muslim. The Prophet married her in Ramaḍān, tenth year of the mission. At one time, during the later Medinan period, the Prophet divorced her, but she came back pleading and he agreed to take her back. She died in 23/644 or at a later date. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 35–39; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 407–8; *EI*¹, s.v. Sawda bint Zam'a.

The Reason Why the Messenger of God Asked for the Hands of Both ʿĀ'ishah and Sawdah in Marriage and the Received Reports as to with Whom He First Contracted the Marriage

Saʿīd b. Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd al-Umawī[879]—his father[880]—Muḥammad b. ʿAmr—Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥāṭib[881]—ʿĀ'ishah: When Khadījah died, Khawlah bt. Ḥakīm b. Umayyah b. al-Awqaṣ, wife of ʿUthmān b. Maẓʿūn, who was in Mecca, said [to the Messenger of God], "O Messenger of God, will you not marry?" He replied, "Whom?" "A maiden," she said, "if you like, or a non-maiden." He replied, "Who is the maiden?" "The daughter of the dearest creature of God to you," she answered, "ʿĀ'ishah bt. Abī Bakr." He asked, "And who is the non-maiden?" "Sawdah bt. Zamʿah b. Qays," she replied, "she has [long] believed in you and has followed you." [So the Prophet] asked her to go and propose to them on his behalf. [1768]

She went to Abū Bakr's house, where she found Umm Rūmān, mother of ʿĀ'ishah, and said, "O Umm Rūmān, what a good thing and a blessing has God brought to you!" She said, "What is that?" Khawlah replied, "The Messenger of God has sent me to ask for ʿĀ'ishah's hand in marriage on his behalf." She answered: "I ask that you wait for Abū Bakr, for he should be on his way." When Abū Bakr came, Khawlah repeated what she had said. He replied, "She is [like] his brother's daughter. Would she be appropriate for him?" When Khawlah returned to the Messenger of God and told him about it he said, "Go back to him and say that he is my brother in Islam and that I am his brother [in Islam], so his daughter is good for me." She came to Abū Bakr and told him what the Messenger of God had said. Then he asked her to wait until he returned.

Umm Rūmān said that al-Muṭʿim b. ʿAdī had asked ʿĀ'ishah's hand for his son, but Abū Bakr had not promised anything. Abū Bakr left and went to Muṭʿim while his wife, mother of the son for 879. Died in 249/863. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 97–98.

880. Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd b. Abān b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ died in 194/809–10. Ibid., XI, 213–14.

881. Died in 104/722–23. Ibid., XI, 249–50.

whom he had asked ʿĀ'ishah's hand, was with him. She said, "O son of Abū Quḥāfah, perhaps we could marry our son to your daughter if you could make him leave his religion and bring him [1769] in to the religion which you practice." He turned to her husband al-Muṭʿim and said, "What is she saying?" He replied, "She says [what you have just heard]." Abū Bakr left, [realizing that] God had [just] removed the problem he had in his mind. He said to Khawlah, "Call the Messenger of God." She called him and he came. Abū Bakr married [ʿĀ'ishah] to him when she was [only] six years old.

Then Khawlah left and went to Sawdah, saying, "O Sawdah, what a good thing and a blessing has God brought to you!" She said, "What is that?" Khawlah replied, "The Messenger of God has sent me with a marriage proposal." Sawdah said, "I want you to go to my father and tell him about it." Khawlah states: He was a very old man and had stayed away from the pilgrimage. I went to him and greeted him with the pre-Islamic salutation and told him that Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib had sent me to ask for Sawdah's hand in marriage. "A noble match," he replied, "What does your friend[882] say?" "She likes it," Khawlah replied. He said, "Call her to me." She was called and he said, "O Sawdah, [this woman] alleges that Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib has sent her to propose marriage to you, which is a noble match. Do you wish that I marry you to him?" "Yes," she replied. Then he called for him. [The Prophet] came and he married her to him. Her brother ʿAbd b. Zamʿah came from the pilgrimage and [when he found out about the marriage] began to pour dust over his head. After he had embraced Islam he said, "I was a fool who poured dust over his head the day the Messenger of God married Sawdah bt. Zamʿah."

ʿĀ'ishah states: We came to Medina and Abū Bakr took up quarters in al-Sunḥ among the Banū al-Ḥārith b. al-Khazraj. The Messenger of God came to our house and men and women of the Anṣār gathered around him. My mother came to me while I was being swung on a swing between two branches and got me down.
[1770] Jumaymah, my nurse, took over and wiped my face with some water and started leading me. When I was at the door, she stopped so I could catch my breath. I was then brought [in] while the Messenger of God was sitting on a bed in our house. [My mother] made me sit on his lap and said, "These are your relatives. May God bless you with them and bless them with you!" Then the men and women got up and left. The Messenger of God consummated his marriage with me in my house when I was nine years old. Neither a camel nor a sheep was slaughtered on behalf of me. Only Sa'd b. 'Ubādah sent a bowl of food which he used to send to the Messenger of God.

882. As in IA [Ibn al-Athīr, Usd al-ghābah]. Text: His friend.

'Alī b. Naṣr—'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Abd al-Wārith—'Abd al-Wārith b. 'Abd al-Ṣamad—his father—Abān al-'Aṭṭār—Hishām b. 'Urwah—'Urwah: He wrote to 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān[883] stating that he had written to him about Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid, asking him about when she died. She died three years or close to that before the Messenger of God's departure from Mecca, and he married 'Ā'ishah after Khadījah's death. The Messenger of God saw 'Ā'ishah twice—[first when] it was said to him that she was his wife (she was six years old at that time), and later [when] he consummated his marriage with her after coming to Medina when she was nine years old.

(The report goes back to Hishām b. Muḥammad. See above, I, 1766.) Then the Messenger of God married 'Ā'ishah bt. Abī Bakr, whose name is 'Atīq b. Abī Quḥāfah, who is 'Uthmān, and is called 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Uthmān b. 'Āmir b. 'Amr b. Ka'b b. Sa'd b. Taym b. Murrah. [The Prophet] married her three years before the Emigration, when she was seven years old, and consummated [1771] the marriage when she was nine years old, after he had emigrated to Medina in Shawwāl. She was eighteen years old when he died. The Messenger of God did not marry any maiden except her.

Then the Messenger of God married Ḥafṣah bt. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb b. Nufayl b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā b. Riyāḥ b. 'Abdallāh b. Qurṭ b. Ka'b.[884] Before that she was married to Khunays b. Ḥudhāfah b.

883. He was the fifth Umayyad caliph (65–86/685–705). *EI*², s.v. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān.

884. The Prophet married her in Sha'bān 3/February 625 before the battle of Uḥud. She was his fourth wife. One day, when she returned from her father's house, she found the Messenger of God with Māriyah in her house and burst into hysterical behavior. The situation was further aggravated by 'Ā'ishah's chattering tongue. According to Ibn Isḥāq (Kitāb al-Mubtada', 240) the Prophet had divorced her once but then took her back. She died in Sha'bān 45/665. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, Qays b. ʿAdī b. Saʿd b. Sahm[885] who was a Badrī, for he was present at Badr with the Messenger of God. He was the only one from the Banū Sahm to be present at Badr, and she did not bear any children with him.

Then the Messenger of God married Umm Salamah, and her name is Hind bt. Abī Umayyah b. al-Mughīrah b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. Makhzūm.[886] Previously, she was married to Abū Salamah b. ʿAbd al-Asad b. Hilāl b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. Makhzūm,[887] who was present at Badr with the Messenger of God. He was an intrepid warrior of his clan and died of wounds suffered on the day of Uḥud. He was the Messenger of God's cousin [son of the Prophet's paternal aunt] and foster brother, whose mother was Barrah bt. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib. She bore with him ʿUmar, Salamah, Zaynab, and Durrah.[888] When Abū Salamah died, the Messenger of God said nine *takbīrah*s [during the prayer over him]. When he was asked whether he was distracted or had forgotten [the proper number], he replied, "I was neither distracted nor had I forgotten. Even if I had said a thousand *takbīrah*s [during the prayer] over Abū Salamah, he was worthy of it," and he prayed for the surviving members of his family. The Messenger of God married [Umm Salamah] in the year 3/624,[889] before the battle of al-Aḥzāb. Salamah, son of Abū Salamah, married the daughter of Ḥamzah b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib.[890]

VIII, 56–60; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 423–27; Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 230–31; Rodinson, Mahomet, 317–20; *EI*², s.v. Ḥafṣa.

885. He died in 2/624. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III/1, 285–86; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 214–15.

886. Both she and her husband were early converts to Islam and had migrated to Abyssinia. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 60–67, gives an interesting conversation between her and the Prophet when the latter proposed marriage to her. According to some authorities, she died in Dhū al-Qaʿdah 59/679, while according to others she died after the massacre of Karbalāʾ. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 429–32; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 308; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VIII, 221–25.

887. He died because of injuries suffered at Uḥud. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III/1, 170–72.

888. Hisch., Ibn Hishām: Ruqayyah.

889. The date given by Ibn Saʿd and Balādhurī that the Prophet married her in Shawwāl 4/626 seems to be more likely, because the battle of Uḥud took place in Shawwāl 3/625 and Abū Salamah died thereafter.

890. On his conversion the uncle of the Prophet became one of the bravest champions of Islam. He was slain fighting heroically at Uḥud. *EI*², s.v. Ḥamza b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib.

Then the Messenger of God married Juwayriyyah[891] bt. al-Ḥārith b. Abī Ḍirār b. Ḥabīb b. Mālik b. Jadhīmah, who is al-Muṣṭaliq b. Sa'd b. 'Amr, in the year of al-Muraysī' [i.e., the expedition against the Banū Muṣṭaliq] (the year 5/626–27). Previously, she was married to Mālik b. Ṣafwān Dhī al-Shafr b. Abī Sarḥ b. Mālik b. al-Muṣṭaliq, but did not bear any children with him. She was chosen (ṣafiyyah) by the Messenger of God for himself on the day of al-Muraysī' [from the captives and at which time], he freed her and married her.[892] She asked the Messenger of God to release what was in his possession from her people, and he did so. [1772]

Then the Messenger of God married Umm Ḥabībah[893] bt. Abī Sufyān b. Ḥarb. She was [previously] married to 'Ubaydallāh b. Jaḥsh b. Ri'āb b. Ya'mur b. Ṣabirah b. Murrah b. Kabīr b. Ghanm b. Dūdān b. Asad. Both she and her husband were among the emigrants to Abyssinia. Her husband embraced Christianity and tried to make her follow him, but she refused and maintained her religion. He died as a Christian, so the Messenger of God sent [his marriage proposal] to the Negus. The Negus said to [her husband's] companions, "Who is more entitled [to take care] of her?" They said, "Khālid b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ." The Negus said [to Khālid], "Marry her to your Prophet." He did so and the Negus gave her four hundred dīnārs as dowry (mahr). It is, however, said that the Messenger of God asked 'Uthmān b. 'Affān for her hand in marriage, and after he allowed [the Prophet] to marry her, the Messenger of God sent to the Negus for her. The latter gave her dowry

---

891. Ibn Sa'd: Her name was Barrah and the Prophet gave her a new name, Juwayriyyah.

892. Both Ibn Hishām and Wāqidī state that she had fallen to the lot of Thābit b. Qays b. al-Shammās al-Anṣārī. She was very beautiful, and she haggled with him to write a written contract with her that she should pay a certain sum as the price of herself, and on the payment thereof be free. Probably, he was unwilling to part with her, hence she went to the Messenger of God asking for his help in the matter. He said, "Would you like something better than that?" "What is that?" she asked. "I will pay the sum on your behalf and marry you," he replied. "Yes," she answered, and he married her.

Another version of the story states that her father came to the Messenger of God with the ransom and accepted Islam. The Messenger of God gave her back to her father, she accepted Islam, and he asked her father for her hand in marriage. She died in 50/670 or 56/676. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 295–96; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, I, 410–12; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 83–85; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 441–42.

893. Ibn Hishām and Ibn Sa'd add: Whose name was Ramlah.

on behalf of the Messenger of God and sent her back to him.[894]

Then the Messenger of God married Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh b. Ri'āb b. Ya'mūr b. Ṣabirah.[895] Previously, she was married to Zayd b. Ḥārithah b. Sharāḥīl, freedman of the Messenger of God, but she did not bear any children with him. [It was] about her that God [1773] revealed: "When you said to him whom God had blessed and you had favored, 'Keep your wife to yourself and fear God,' you concealed within yourself that which God was about to reveal. You feared other men, but it is more fitting that you should fear God. When Zayd had accomplished the necessary [formality of divorce] from her, We gave her in marriage to you, so that there should not be any fault for the believers in respect to the wives of their adopted sons, after they have performed the necessary formality [of divorce] from them. And God's command must be fulfilled."[896] God married her to him and sent Gabriel concerning that matter. She used to boast to the other wives of the Prophet, saying, "I am the most honored among you because of the One who gave me in marriage and the one who was my intermediary [i.e., Gabriel] (akramukunna waliyy^{an} wa akramukunna safīr^{an})."[897]

Then the Messenger of God married Ṣafiyyah bt. Ḥuyayy b. Akhṭab b. Sa'yah b. Tha'labah b. 'Ubayd b. Ka'b b. al-Khazraj b. Abī Ḥabīb b. al-Naḍīr. Previously, she was married to Sallām b. Mishkam b. al-Ḥakam b. Ḥārithah b. al-Khazraj b. Ka'b b. al-

---

894. The Prophet married her in 7/628–29 and she died in 44/664–65. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 68–71, provides more details of the marriage. See also Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 438–40.

895. She was the Prophet's cousin and he married her in Dhū al-Qa'dah 5/627. She died in 20/641, and it is said that she was the first one to die from among his wives. For details see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 114; VIII, 71–82; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 433–37; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VII, 667–70; Lings, Muhammad, 337.

896. Qur'ān 33:37. This marriage of the Prophet has been discussed widely. According to some, it served as a legal test case against the prevailing notion of adoption. Andrae, Mohammed, 153–54; Rodinson, Mahomet, 238–41.

897. It refers to her marriage. She states that God was her walī, who gave her away in marriage, and that Gabriel was the intermediary (safīr). Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 435.

Ibn Sa'd reports: One day Zaynab [bragging about herself] said to the Prophet, "I am not, O Messenger of God, like other wives of yours. All of them were married to you either by their fathers, brothers, or guardians except me. It was God who gave me in marriage to you." See also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 309; Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 226–27.

Khazraj. After his death she was married to Kinānah b. al-Rabī' b. Abī al-Ḥuqayq, who was killed by Muḥammad b. Maslamah at the Prophet's order. He was struck on the neck until he died. When the Prophet scrutinized the captives on the day of Khaybar, he threw his cloak over Ṣafiyyah. Thus she was his chosen one (ṣafiyyah)[898] on the day of Khaybar.[899] Then he proposed Islam to her and she accepted, so he freed her. That was in the year 6/627–28.

Then the Messenger of God married Maymūnah bt. al-Ḥārith b. Ḥazn b. Bujayr b. al-Huzam b. Ruwaybah b. 'Abdallāh b. Hilāl. Previously, she was married to 'Umayr[900] b. 'Amr of the Banū 'Uqdah b. Ghiyarah b. 'Awf b. Qasī, who was [from] Thaqīf. She did not bear any children with him, and she was the sister of Umm al-Faḍl, wife of 'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. The Messenger of God married her in Sarif during his Lesser Pilgrimage of Fulfillment ('umrat al-qaḍā').[901] Al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib married her to him.

The Messenger of God married all the women we have mentioned [above], and when he died all of them except Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid were alive.[902] [1774]

The Messenger of God married a woman of the Banū Kilāb b. Rabī'ah called al-Nashāt bt. Rifā'ah. The Banū Kilāb were the

---

898. See Ṭabarī, above, I, 1718, n. 509.

899. According to one report, she fell in the lot of Diḥya al-Kalbī, and the Prophet bought her from him. She died in 50/670 or 52/672. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 85–92; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 442–44.

900. Ibn Hishām: She was married to Abū Ruhm b. 'Abd al-'Uzzā. Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 444): She was married to Abū Sabrah b. Abī Ruhm. Ibn Hishām further adds: It is said that it was she who gave herself to the Prophet because she received his marriage proposal while she was on her camel. She said, "The camel and what is on it belongs to God and His messenger." So God revealed: "A believing woman who bestows herself upon the Prophet, provided the Prophet wants to marry her." [Qur'ān 33:50]. See also EI[1], s.v. Maimūna.

It is said that the one who bestowed herself upon the Prophet was Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh, or Umm Sharīk Ghaziyyah bt. Jābir. Others state that it was a woman from the Banū Sāmah b. Lu'ayy and that the Prophet postponed the matter.

901. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 94–100, gives a long report whether the Prophet was in the state of iḥrām or not when he married her. See also Ibn Isḥāq, Kitāb al-Mubtada', 247–48. She died in 61/680–81, and it is said that she was the last of the Prophet's widows to die.

902. Ibn Hishām: The Messenger of God consummated his marriage with eleven women, two of whom died before him: Khadījah bt. Khuwaylid and Zaynab bt. Khuzaymah.

allies of the Banū Rifā'ah of the Qurayẓah. [The authorities] differ about her.[903] Some call her Sanā and trace her lineage as Sanā[904] bt. Asmā' b. al-Ṣalt al-Sulamiyyah, while others say that she is Sabā bt. Asmā' b. al-Ṣalt of the Banū Ḥarām of the Banū Sulaym. They say that she died before the Messenger of God consummated his marriage with her. Some, ascribing her lineage, state that she is Sanā bt. al-Ṣalt b. Ḥabīb b. Ḥārithah b. Hilāl b. Ḥarām b. Sammāl b. 'Awf al-Sulamī.

The Messenger of God married al-Shanbā' bt. 'Amr al-Ghifāriyyah, whose tribe were also the allies of the Banū Qurayẓa. Some [authorities] allege that she was a Quraẓiyyah, and that her lineage is not known because the Banū Qurayẓah perished. It is also said that she was a Kināniyyah. She menstruated when she entered [the house of] the Messenger of God, and [the Prophet's son] Ibrāhīm died before she took her ritual purification bath. She said, "If he were a prophet, the person who is dearest to him would not have died," so the Messenger of God dismissed her by [giving her] divorce.[905]

The Messenger of God married Ghaziyyah[906] bt. Jābir of the Banū Abī Bakr b. Kilāb. [The news of] her beauty and skill had reached the Messenger of God, so he sent Abū Usayd al-Anṣārī al-Sā'idī asking her hand in marriage. Being in a state of infidelity [1775] when she came to the Prophet, she said, "I was not consulted [about this marriage], and I seek refuge from you in the name of God." He replied, "One who seeks God's protection is inviola-

903. Her name is given differently by different authorities, such as Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḍaḥḥāk, 'Amrah bt. Yazīd, al-'Āliyyah bt. Ẓabyān, and Sabā bt. Sufyān.

Ibn Hishām states: "[Among the women whom the Prophet married but did not consummate the marriage was] 'Amrah bt. Yazīd al-Kilābiyyah. Being recently in a state of infidelity, when she came to the Messenger of God she sought refuge from him. The Prophet replied, '[One who seeks God's protection] is inviolable,' and returned her to her folk." He further adds: "Others state that the one who sought God's refuge was a woman of Kindah, a cousin of Asmā' bt. al-Nu'mān. It is said that when the Messenger of God summoned her, she said, 'We are a people to whom others come, we go to none.' The Messenger of God returned her to her people." Cf. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 100–112, 159–60; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 454–55; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 587; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VIII, 64.

904. Sabā, or Shanbā: in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 309.

905. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 309; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 580. She is not mentioned by Ibn Sa'd.

906. Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 310): 'Adhiyyah, or 'Arabah. Ibn Sa'd: She is called Umm Sharīk.

ble," and returned her to her people.[907] It is said that she was from Kindah.

The Messenger of God married Asmā' bt. al-Nu'mān b. al-Aswad b. Sharāḥīl b. al-Jawn b. Ḥujr b. Mu'āwiyah al-Kindī. When he went to her he found that she was suffering from leprosy, so he gave her a compensation [for divorce], provided her [with some provision], and returned her to her people. It is also said that it was al-Nu'mān who sent her to the Messenger of God and that she defamed him.[908] When she went to him she also sought refuge from him, so he sent her to her father saying, "Is she not your daughter?" He replied that she was. The Prophet said to her, "Are you not his daughter?" She replied that she was. Al-Nu'mān said, "Take her, O Messenger of God, she is . . . ," and he praised her excessively. He replied that she would never be useful. The Messenger of God did with her what he did with al-'Āmiriyyah. It is not known whether it was because of her pronouncement or that of her father that the Messenger of God said that she would never be useful.

God granted Rayḥānah bt. Zayd of the Banū Qurayẓah to his Messenger [as booty].[909] Māriyah the Copt was presented to the Messenger of God, given to him by al-Muqawqis, the ruler of Alexandria, and she gave birth to the Messenger of God's son Ibrāhīm.[910] These were the Messenger of God's wives; six of them were from the Quraysh.[911]

907. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 110–12, gives quite a different account. It was she who gave herself to the Prophet and the Qur'ānic verse 33:50 refers to her. Because the Prophet did not marry her, she did not marry anyone else. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 422.

908. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 102–5, states that Nu'mān came to the Prophet, accepted Islam and offered his daughter in marriage. It was in Rabī' I, 9/630, but when the Prophet entered into her presence she sought God's refuge, so he divorced her. For a slightly different version, see Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 456–57.

909. Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 92–94) and Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 453–54) state that the Prophet freed her after she accepted Islam and married her in Muḥarram 6/627. She died soon after the Prophet's return from the Farewell Pilgrimage. See also Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, III, 256.

910. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 153–56, and Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 448–53, for details about Māriyah and Ibrāhīm.

911. Ibn Hishām: Among the Prophet's wives, six were Qurayshite: Khadījah, 'Ā'ishah, Ḥafṣah, Umm Ḥabībah, Umm Salamah, and Sawdah. The Arab women and others were seven: Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh, Maymūnah bt. al-Ḥārith, Zaynab bt. Khuzaymah, Juwayriyyah bt. al-Ḥārith, Asmā' bt. al-Nu'mān, and 'Amrah bt. Yazīd. Ṣafiyyah bt. Ḥuyayy was a non-Arab.

Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī] states: Among the marriages not mentioned by Hishām [b. Muḥammad] in this report is the one related from the Messenger of God according to which he married Zaynab bt. Khuzaymah. She is the one called Umm al-Masākīn (Mother of the Poor),[912] [and was] from the Banū ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah. She is Zaynab bt. Khuzaymah b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿAbd Manāf b. Hilāl b. ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah. Previously, she was married to al-Ṭufayl[913] b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Muṭṭalib, brother of ʿUbaydah b. al-Ḥārith. She died in Medina while she was married to the Messenger of God. It is said that no one from the Messenger [1776] of God's wives died while he was alive except her, Khadījah, Sharāf bt. Khalīfah (sister of Diḥyah b. Khalīfah al-Kalbī),[914] and al-ʿĀliyyah bt. Ẓabyān.[915]

Ibn ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Ḥakam[916]—Shuʿayb b. al-Layth[917]—ʿUqayl[918]—Ibn Shihāb [al-Zuhrī]: The Messenger of God married al-ʿĀliyyah,[919] a woman of the Banū Abī Bakr b. Kilāb. He gave her gifts [compensation for divorce] and left her. He [also] married Qutaylah bt. Qays b. Maʿdīkarib, sister of al-Ashʿath b. Qays, but he died before consummating his marriage with her,[920] and she 912. Ibn Hishām adds: Because of her kindness to them. Ibn Saʿd: She was called by that name in pre-Islamic days.

913. Ibn Hishām: Previously, she was married to ʿUbaydah b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbd Manāf, and before that to Jahm b. ʿAmr b. al-Ḥārith, who was her cousin. Ibn Saʿd (Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 82): She was married to Ṭufayl, and after he divorced her she married ʿUbaydah b. al-Ḥārith. The Prophet married her in Ramaḍān 3/625, and she died eight months later. Cf. Ibn Isḥāq, Kitāb al-Mubtadaʾ, 241; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 429.

914. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 115, lists her among those to whom the Prophet proposed but did not marry. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 460, states that she died before the marriage was consummated. Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 587, states that she was the maternal aunt of Khawlah bt. Hudhayl and that she died on her way to Medina.

915. She is not mentioned by Ibn Saʿd. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 310, states that the Prophet married her and then divorced her. See also Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 586–87.

916. It could be either of the two brothers Muḥammad or ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. The former died in 268/881–82 and the latter in 257/870–71. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 208; IX, 260–62.

917. Died in 199/814–15. Ibid., IV, 355–56.

918. ʿUqayl b. Khālid b. ʿAqīl al-Umawī died ca. 141/758–59. Ibid., VII, 255–56.

919. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 455, states that al-ʿĀliyyah bt. Ẓabyān b. ʿAmr of the Banū Kilāb was divorced because she used to peep through her door at the people in the mosque.

920. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 105–6, states that her brother al-Ashʿath b. Qays apostatized from Islam with her brother. He [also] married Fāṭimah bt. Shurayḥ.[921] It is reported from Ibn al-Kalbī that the Messenger of God married Ghaziyyah bt. Jābir, who is [called] Umm Sharīk. She was previously married and had a son called Sharīk from [the first husband], so she was called by that surname [of relationship]. When the Prophet went to her he found her to be an old woman, so he divorced her.[922] She embraced Islam and used to call on the Qurashī women and invite them to Islam. It is said that he married Khawlah bt. al-Hudhayl b. Hubayrah b. Qabīṣah b. al-Ḥārith.[923]

The [above] is reported on the authority of al-Kalbī—Abū Ṣāliḥ[924]—Ibn ʿAbbās. With the same chain of authority [it is reported] that Laylā bt. al-Khaṭīm b. ʿAdī b. ʿAmr b. Sawād b. Ẓafar b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Khazraj approached the Prophet while his back was to the sun, and clapped him on his shoulder. He asked who it was, and she replied, "I am the daughter of one who competes with the wind. I am Laylā bt. al-Khaṭīm. I have come to offer myself [in marriage] to you, so marry me." He replied, "I accept." She went back to her people[925] and said that the Messenger of God had married her. They said, "What a bad thing you have done! You are a self-respecting woman, but the Prophet is a womanizer.[926] Seek an annulment from him." She went back to the Prophet and asked him to revoke the marriage and he complied with [her request].[927] [It is reported] without the above chain of authorities that the Prophet married ʿAmrah bt. Yazīd,[928] a woman of the Banū Ruʾās b. Kilāb. [1777] offered her in marriage to the Prophet while she was still in Ḥaḍramawt; but by the time she left the Yemen, the Prophet had died.

---

921. Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 310): Fāṭimah bt. Sara'. She is not mentioned by Ibn Sa'd.

922. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 110–12, gives a different account and lists her among the women to whom the Prophet proposed but did not marry. It was she who gave herself to the Prophet and the Qur'ānic verse 33:50 refers to her.

923. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 114–15, states that she died on her way to Medina. See also Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 460; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 587.

924. Abū Ṣāliḥ Mīzān al-Baṣrī. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 385–86.

925. Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 459): To her womenfolk.

926. Balādhurī: The Messenger of God has many wives. We fear that you will be jealous and he might invoke [God] against you and you will be ruined.

927. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 107–8, for more details.

928. This name is given by Ibn Sa'd as one of the names of the Kilābī woman (see

An Account of Those Women to Whom the Prophet Proposed But Did Not Marry

Among them was Umm Hāni' bt. Abī Ṭālib, whose name is Hind. The Messenger of God proposed marriage to her but did not marry her because she said that she was with child.[929] He asked the hand of Ḍubā'ah bt. 'Āmir[930] b. Qurṭ b. Salamah b. Qushayr b. Ka'b b. Rabī'ah b. 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah in marriage from her son Salamah b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah. He said that he would seek her permission. [Salamah] came to her and told her that the Prophet had proposed to her. She said, "What did you tell him?" He replied, "I told him [to wait] until I sought your permission." She said, "Has permission to be sought for the Prophet? Go back and marry him [to me]." He went back but the Prophet did not say anything because he was informed that she was too old.[931] Reportedly, it is said that he proposed to Ṣafiyyah bt. Bashshāmah, sister of the one-eyed al-'Anbarī. She was taken as a captive, so he allowed her to choose between him and her husband. She chose her husband and he sent her back.[932] He proposed to Umm Ḥabīb[933] bt. al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, but discovered that al-'Abbās was his foster-brother; Thuwaybah had nursed them both. He asked for the hand of Jamrah bt. al-Ḥārith b. Abī Ḥārithah[934] in marriage, [but] her father—so it is reported—said above]. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 456, and Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 580, give her name as 'Amrah bt. Yazīd al-Ghifāriyyah. The Prophet married her, but when he discovered that she had leprosy he divorced her. For a similar report see Ibn Isḥāq, Kitāb al-Mubtada', 248.

---

929. She said that because of her young child, she would not be able to do justice to her husband. For details, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 108–9; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 459.

930. Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 310): Sā'ah bt. 'Umar.

931. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 109–10; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 460, states that in pre-Islamic days she had circumambulated the Ka'bah naked because she did not have the special clothes. In pre-Islamic days, if the Arabs did not have the garments of the Ḥums, then they would circumambulate the Ka'bah either in their ordinary clothes (which had to be discarded afterwards) or they would go round naked. Ibn Isḥāq, Kitāb al-Mubtada', 81–82; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 214–15.

932. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 110; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 459.

933. Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 310) and Ibn Kathīr (Sīrah, IV, 598): Umm Ḥabībah. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 462–63. She is not mentioned by Ibn Sa'd. For a different version see Ibn Isḥāq, Kitāb al-Mubtada', 248–49.

934. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 462; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 310–11; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 598. She is not mentioned by Ibn Sa'd.

that she was suffering from something, although [in reality] she was not. When he returned, he found that she had already been afflicted with leprosy.[935]

An Account of the Messenger of God's Slave Concubines

They were Māriyah bt. Sham'ūn, the Copt, and Rayḥānah bt. Zayd al-Quraẓiyyah, who, it is said, was of the Banū al-Naḍīr. An account of them has been given above. [1778]

935. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 106–7, 113–14, mentions Mulaykah bt. Ka'b al-Laythī, Bint Jundub, and Sabā bt. al-Ṣalt among the women whom the Prophet married but did not consummate the marriage and then divorced them. Khawlah bt. Ḥakīm and Amāmah bt. Ḥamzah were among the women to whom the Prophet proposed but did not marry.

The Events of the Year 10 (cont'd)

(April 9, 631–March 28, 632)

An Account of the Messenger of God's Freedmen

Among them were [the following]: Zayd b. Ḥārithah[936] and his son Usāmah b. Zayd, whose account we have mentioned before.

Thawbān.[937] The Messenger of God set him free but he remained with [the Prophet] until his death. Then he settled in Ḥimṣ (Homs),[938] where he had a house which was bequeathed [to him] as a religious endowment. It is reported that he died in the year 54/673–74, during the caliphate of Mu'āwiyah. Some [authorities] state that he lived in al-Ramlah[939] and that he did not have any progeny.

---

936. He was bought from Syria and sold to Khadījah who presented him to Muḥammad. His father came to Mecca to buy his freedom, but Zayd refused to leave Muḥammad, who thereupon freed him and adopted him. He was one of the very first converts to Islam and died in 8/629 as commander of the Mu'tah expedition. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 467–73; EI[1], s.v. Zaid b. Ḥāritha. For Usāmah, see Ṭabarī, above I, 1660, n. 68.

937. Thawbān b. Bujdud was from the Yemen. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 67, 180; II/2, 20; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 480–82; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 621.

938. A town in Syria between Damascus and Ḥalab (Aleppo). EI[2], s.v. Ḥimṣ.

939. A town in Palestine, 25 miles from Jerusalem. EI[1], s.v. al-Ramla.

Shuqrān.[940] He was from Abyssinia and his name was Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAdī. [The authorities] disagree about his affair. It is reported on the authority of ʿAbdallāh b. Dāwūd al-Khuraybī that the Messenger of God inherited him from his father, while others state that he was from Persia and was named Ṣāliḥ b. Ḥawl b. Mihrbūdh. His lineage, according to those who ascribe to him a Persian ancestry, is alleged to be Ṣāliḥ b. Ḥawl b. Mihrbūdh b. Ādharjushnas b. Mihrbān b. Fīrān b. Rustam b. Fīrūz b. Māy b. Bahrām b. Rashtharī. It is alleged that [his ancestors] were landowners (dahāqīn) of al-Rayy.[941] It is reported on the authority of Muṣʿab al-Zubayrī,[942] who said that Shuqrān belonged to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf, that the latter presented him to the Prophet. He left behind offspring, the last of whom was Maʾubā, a man from his progeny who lived in Medina and who had descendants in al-Baṣrah.[943]

Ruwayfiʿ.[944] He was Abū Rāfiʿ, The Messenger of God's freedman. His name was Aslam, [but] some state that his name was Ibrāhīm. [Authorities] differ about his affair. Some state that he belonged to al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib and that the latter presented him to the Messenger of God, who set him free, while others state that Abū Rāfiʿ belonged to Abū Uḥayḥah Saʿīd b. [1779] al-ʿĀṣ al-Akbar and that his sons inherited him. Three of them set free their share of him and all of them were killed on the day of Badr, when Abū Rāfiʿ was present with them. Khālid b. Saʿīd donated his share of him to the Messenger of God, who set him free.

His son al-Bahī, whose name was Rāfiʿ,[945] and his brother ʿUbaydallāh b. Abī Rāfiʿ. Al-Bahī used to serve ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib as 940. He participated in Badr and was in charge of the captives, and died during ʿUmar's caliphate. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, I, 105; Ibn Saʿd Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 180; III/1, 34; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 478–79; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 626–28.

941. An ancient town in Persia, situated near the present capital Tehran. EI[1], s.v. al-Raiy.

942. He was the governor of al-Baṣrah for his brother ʿAbdallāh b. Zubayr and was killed in battle against the Umayyads in 72/691. EI[1], s.v. Musʿab b. al-Zubair.

943. A town in lower Mesopotamia which grew out of the military camp built by the caliph ʿUmar. EI[2], s.v. al-Baṣra.

944. Ibn Saʿd Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 180; IV/1, 51, 52; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 618–19. Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 477–78, 482–83), on the authority of Ibn al-Kalbī, states that Abū Rāfiʿ Aslam belonged to ʿAbbās, while Rāfiʿ (or Ruwayfiʿ) belonged to Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ.

945. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2 180; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 621–22.

a scribe.[946] When 'Amr b. Sa'īd[947] became the governor of Medina, he called al-Bahī and asked him, "Who is your master?" When he answered, "The Messenger of God," he was flogged a hundred times. Again he was asked, "Whose freedman are you?" He replied, "The Messenger of God's freedman," and was again flogged a hundred times. Every time he was asked whose freedman he was he continued to give the same answer until he had been flogged five hundred times. Then he was asked, "Whose freedman are you?" and replied, "Your master's." When 'Abd al-Malik[948] killed 'Amr b. Sa'īd, al-Bahī b. Abī Rāfi' said:

The oath was correct and did not become crippled but harmed its enemy.
An oath which spilled Ibn Sa'd's lifeblood.
He is the son of a rebellious father[949] again and again, but is related to a family whose ancestors were good.

Salmān al-Fārisī,[950] surnamed Abū 'Abdallāh, who was from the inhabitants of the village of Iṣbahān.[951] It is said that he was [actually] from the village of Rāmhurmuz,[952] fell into captivity at the hands of some people of Kalb, and was sold to some Jews in the district of Wādī al-Qurā. He made a written contract with his Jewish master that he should pay a certain sum as his ransom, and on the payment thereof be free. The Messenger of God and the Muslims helped him [to meet his contractual obligations]

946. Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 483) states on the authority of Ibn al-Kalbī that 'Alī's scribe was 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Rāfi'.

947. He was an Umayyad governor of Mecca, and in 60/680 was appointed by Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah as governor of Medina. *EI*², s.v. 'Amr b. Sa'īd.

948. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān was the fifth Umayyad caliph and reigned from 65/685 to 86/705. *EI*², s.v. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān.

949. It is a pun on the word Ibn al-'Āṣ (the name of 'Amr's father) and Ibn al-'Āṣī ("son of a rebellious father").

950. One of the most popular figures in Muslim legend; he was an ardent supporter of 'Alī and died ca. 35/655–56. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 485–89; *EI*¹, s.v. Salmān al-Fārisī; Jafri, Origins, 52.

951. Iṣfahān (in the Persian form), a town and province in Persia. *EI*², s.v. Iṣfahān.

952. Ibn Isḥāq (Kitāb al-Mubtada', 66) and Ibn Hishām (Sīrah, I, 228): From a village called Jayy. Both the sources state that Salmān was betrayed and sold into slavery by a party of Kalbite merchants whom he accompanied from Syria to Arabia. Rām-Hormoz (in the Persian form), a town and district in Khūzistān about fifty-five miles southeast of Ahwāz. *EI*¹, s.v. Rām-Hormuz.

until he was set free. Some Persian genealogists state that Salmān was from the villages of Sābūr[953] and that his name was Mābih b. Būdhakhshān b. Dih Dīrih.

Safīnah,[954] the freedman of the Messenger of God. He belonged to Umm Salamah, who set him free on the condition that he should serve the Messenger of God during his lifetime. It is said that he was black. [Authorities] disagree about his name. Some state that his name was Mihrān, while others state that his name was Rabāḥ. Some of them state that he was Persian and his name was Sabīh [or Subayh] b. Mārqīh [or Mārqayh]. [1780] Anasah,[955] nicknamed Abū Musarraḥ or Abū Masrūḥ, was a slave boy [born among the Arabs] of al-Sarāt.[956] [The people] used to ask his permission [to see] the Messenger of God when the latter sat [to receive the visitors]. He was present at Badr, Uḥud, and all the expeditions of the Messenger of God. Some state that he was of Persian descent, that his mother was Abyssinian and his father Persian, and that his father's name in Persian was Kardaway b. Asharnīdah b. Adawhar b. Mihrādar b. Kaḥankān, of the Banū Mihjwār b. Yūmāst.

Abū Kabshah.[957] His name was Sulaym. It is said that he was a slave boy [born among the Arabs] of Mecca. It is [also] said that he was a slave boy [born among the Arabs] of the land of Daws.[958] The Messenger of God bought him and set him free. He was present at Badr, Uḥud, and other expeditions with the Messenger of God. He died the very day 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb succeeded to the caliphate, in the year 13/634–35.

Abū Muwayhibah.[959] It is said that he was a slave boy [born

953. Shāpūr (in Persian), the name of the ancient capital of the Shāpūr Khūra district of Fārs. EI[1], s.v. Shāpūr.

954. Ibn Sa'd Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 180; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 480; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 623–26.

955. He participated in Badr and died during Abū Bakr's caliphate. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, I, 9, 24, 146, 153; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 180; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 478; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 619.

956. A chain of mountains which run along the western side of the Arabian plateau. EI[1], s.v. Sarāt.

957. He participated in Badr. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, I, 24, 153; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 180; III/1, 33; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 478; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 637–40.

958. The tribes of Daws were the furthest north of the Azd Sarāt group. EI[2], s.v. Azd.

959. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 180; II/2, 9, 10; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 483–84; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 640. See Ṭabarī, below, I, 1799.

among the Arabs] of Muzaynah,[960] who was bought by the Messenger of God and set free.

Rabāḥ al-Aswad.[961] [The people] used to obtain his permission [in order to see] the Messenger of God.

Faḍālah,[962] the freedman of the Messenger of God, who reportedly [later] settled in Syria.

Mid'am,[963] the freedman of the Messenger of God. He was a slave of Rifā'ah b. Zayd al-Judhāmī,[964] who presented him to the Messenger of God. He was killed at Wādī al-Qurā on the day that [1781] the Messenger of God halted there. He was hit by an arrow from an unknown quarter which killed him.

Abū Ḍumayrah.[965] Some Persian genealogists allege that he was a desendant of the king Kushtāsib of Persia, and that his name was Wāḥ b. Shīraz b. Bīrūwīs b. Tārīshmih b. Māhwash b. Bākmihrīr. Others state that he was among those who fell to the Messenger of God's lot during one of his expeditions and that [the Prophet] set him free and drafted a document to that effect. He is the grandfather of Abū Ḥusayn b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḍumayrah b. Abī Ḍumayrah. The document [of manumission] was long in the hands of his grandchildren and his family. When Ḥusayn b. 'Abdallāh came to the ['Abbāsid caliph] al-Mahdī,[966] the document was with him. The caliph took it, placed it on his eyes, and awarded him three hundred dīnārs.

Yasār.[967] He was, reportedly, a Nubian. He fell to the Messenger of God's lot during one of his expeditions, and he set him free. He was killed by al-'Uraniyyūn, who raided the Messenger of God's milch camels.[968]

---

960. A branch of Tamīm. Kalbī, Jamharah, 59, 88.

961. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 180, 184; II/1, 59; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 484; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 622. See Safīnah above.

962. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 180; he was from the Yemen; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 480; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 629–30.

963. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 180; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 631; he was born in Ḥismā, in the Syrian desert.

964. Or of Farwah b. 'Amr al-Judhāmī: Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 484.

965. Abū Ḍamrah or Abū Ḍumayrah was of Arab descent. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 484. Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 635–36; he was from the Yemen.

966. The third 'Abbāsid caliph reigned from 158/775 to 169/785. *EI*², s.v. al-Mahdī, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad.

967. He fell to the Prophet's lot on the expedition of Qarārat al-Kudr. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, I, 183; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 180; II/1, 67, 86; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 479–80; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 633.

968. See Ṭabarī, below, 1784.

Mihrān.[969] He narrated traditions from the Messenger of God.

The Messenger of God also had a eunuch called Mābūr,[970] who was presented to him by al-Muqawqis with two slave girls; one of them was called Māriyah, whom he took as a concubine, and the other [was called] Sīrīn,[971] whom he gave to Ḥassān b. Thābit after Ṣafwān b. al-Muʿaṭṭal had committed an offense against him.[972] Sīrīn gave birth to a son called ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥassān. Al-Muqawqis had sent this eunuch with the two slave girls in order to escort them and guard them on the way [to Medina]. He presented them to the Messenger of God when they arrived. It is said that he was the one [with whom] Māriyah was accused of [1782] [wrongdoing], and that the Messenger of God sent ʿAlī to kill him. When he saw ʿAlī and what he intended to do with him, he uncovered himself until it became evident to ʿAlī that he was completely castrated, not having anything left at all of what men [normally] have, so [ʿAlī] refrained from killing him.

While the Messenger of God was laying siege to al-Ṭāʾif, four slaves came out to him, whom he set free. Abū Bakrah[973] was among them.[974]

An Account of the Messenger of God's Scribes

It is reported that ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān used to write for him at times, while ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, Khālid b. Saʿīd, Abān b. Saʿīd,[975] and al-ʿAlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī[976] also used to write at times. It is said that the first person to write for him was Ubayy b. Kaʿb,[977] and that 969. Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 631. See Safīnah above.

970. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 153; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 630–31.

971. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 153; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 630; she was called Shīrīn.

972. Ṣafwān, who was the accused party in the scandal against ʿĀʾishah, assaulted Ḥassān because of the latter's part in spreading the rumors. Whether Ṣafwān did it out of a sense of personal injury or on the Prophet's orders to stop the gossipers is not clear, but it seems certain that Ṣafwān went unpunished for this assault. The Prophet's gift to Ḥassān seems to be an act of reconciliation. See Arafat, "Controversial incident."

973. His name was Nufayʿ b. Masrūḥ. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 931, 932; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 114, 115; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 489–506.

974. More freedmen are listed in Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 180; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 482, 483, 484, 485, 506; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 616–40.

975. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 154; IV/2, 77; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 669.

976. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/2, 76–79; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 692.

977. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, passim; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 670–71.

when he was absent Zayd b. Thābit[978] wrote for him. 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd b. Abī Ṣarḥ[979] used to write for him. He apostatized from Islam and later returned to Islam on the day of the conquest of Mecca. Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān and Ḥanẓalah al-Usayyidī[980] [also] wrote for him.[981]

The Names of the Messenger of God's Horses

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Sahl b. Abī Ḥathmah—his father:[982] The first horse owned by the Messenger of God was the one he bought in Medina from a man of the Banū Fazārah for ten awāq.[983] Its name as given by the Bedouin was al-Ḍaris,[984] but the Messenger of God named it al-Sakb.[985] The first expedition he undertook on it was Uḥud. At that time, the Muslims did not have any other horse except the one belonging to Abū Burdah b. Niyār,[986] which was called Mulāwiḥ.[987]

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar: I asked Muḥam-

978. He is best known for the collection of the Qur'ān and died ca. 45/665–66. EI[1], s.v. Zaid b. Thābit; Watt, Bell's Introduction, 4off.; Blachère, Introduction, 3off.

979. He is supposed to have arbitrarily altered the revelation, or to have boasted of doing so after his apostasy from Islam; hence the Prophet, after the conquest of Mecca, wanted to execute him, but 'Uthmān succeeded in obtaining pardon for him. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 531–32; EI[2], s.v. 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd.

980. Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 673–75; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 134–35.

981. For the detailed list of kuttāb al-waḥy, see Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 669–97.

982. It is worth noting that, except the first two transmitters (i.e., al-Ḥārith and Ibn Sa'd), the remaining chain of authorities are the same in Ibn Sa'd's Ṭabaqāt. Ibn Sa'd reports directly from Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī while al-Ṭabarī (in this case) reports indirectly from al-Wāqidī through al-Ḥārith.

983. Awāq, pl. of ūqīyah, is a measure of weight. Hinz, Masse und Gewichte, 34. See also Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 174.

984. It means a man having set his teeth on edge, or angry by reason of hunger. It also implies stubbornness. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ḍ-r-s.

985. Al-Sakbā': Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 509. It means a swift or an excellently running horse, and is likened to water pouring forth. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. s-k-b. See also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 314.

986. He was present at the second pledge of 'Aqabah and fought at Badr. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III/2, 25.

987. It means a slender horse or one having excellent and large bones. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. l-w-ḥ.

mad b. Yaḥyā b. Sahl b. Abī Ḥathmah about al-Murtajiz,[988] and he said that it was the horse [the Messenger of God] purchased from a Bedouin for whom Khuzaymah b. Thābit bore witness. The Bedouin was from the Banū Murrah.[989] [1783]

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Ubayy b. 'Abbās b. Sahl[990]—his father[991]—his grandfather:[992] The Messenger of God had three horses: Lizāz,[993] al-Ẓarib,[994] and al-Luḥayf;[995] they were presented to him by al-Muqawqis, Rabī'ah b. Abī al-Barā', and Farwah b. 'Amr al-Judhāmī. The Messenger of God rewarded Rabī'ah b. Abī al-Barā' [for al-Luḥayf] with camels [that were taken in payment of zakāt] from the herds of the Banū Kilāb.

Tamīm al-Dārī presented a horse called al-Ward[996] to the Messenger of God, and he gave it to 'Umar, who rode it in the cause of God and [later] found out that it was sold [in the market].[997]

Some [authorities] allege that the Messenger of God had a horse called al-Ya'sūb[998] in addition to the horses I have mentioned.

---

988. It was so-called because of the intense but pleasing sound of its neighing. The name of the Bedouin was Sawād b. al-Ḥārith b. Ẓālim. Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. r-j-z. See also Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 509; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 314.

989. Kalbī, Jamharah, 36, 44. See also Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 174.

990. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 186–87.

991. 'Abbās b. Sahl b. Sa'd al-Anṣārī al-Khazrajī died ca. 120/738. Ibid., V, 118.

992. It is said that Sahl was the last companion of the Prophet to die in Medina ca. 91/709–10. Ibid., IV, 252–53. See also Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 174–75.

993. Lizāz is a piece of wood with which the door is fastened, hence it is applied to one who cleaves to a thing. Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. l-z-z. See also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, 314.

994. Literally, it means a stone projecting from a mountain and having a sharp point. The horse was so-called because of its strong body, like a rock. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 314; Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. ẓ-r-b.

995. As in Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 175), Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 314), Ibn Kathīr (Sīrah, IV, 713), and Fīrūzābādī (Qāmūs, s.v. l-ḥ-f). Text: Lukhayf. Luḥayf was so called because it used to cover the ground with its big tail. Lakhf, on the other hand, means a delicate foam. See also Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 509–10.

996. A horse of a bright, or yellowish, bay color, or of a red color inclining to yellow. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. w-r-d.

997. Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 510) adds: So, he took it back.

998. It is used for a horse when it is likened for the slenderness of its body to a certain flying thing. It also means a blaze or a white mark on a horse's face. Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. '-s-b; Lane, Lexicon s.v. '-s-b. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 314, states that it was so-called because it was the best horse of the Prophet, like the king of the bees (ya'sūb).

The Names of the Messenger of God's Mules

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm[999]—his father:[1000] Duldul,[1001] the Prophet's mule, was the first mule seen in Islam. It was presented to him by al-Muqawqis with a donkey called 'Ufayr.[1002] The mule survived until the time of Mu'āwiyah.

Al-Hārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Ma'mar[1003]—al-Zuhrī: Duldul was given to the Prophet by Farwah b. 'Amr al-Judhāmī.[1004]

[1784] Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Sabrah[1005]—Zāmil b. 'Amr: Farwah b. 'Amr gave the Prophet a mule called Fiḍḍah[1006] and he gave it to Abū Bakr [along with] his donkey Ya'fūr.[1007] The donkey died after his return from the Farewell Pilgrimage.

The Names of the Messenger of God's Camels

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm al-Taymī—his father: Al-Qaṣwā'[1008] was from the camels of the Banū al-Ḥarīsh,[1009] and was bought with another camel by Abū Bakr for eight hundred dirhams (drachmas). The Messenger of God bought it from Abū Bakr for four hundred 999. Died ca. 151/768. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 368–69.

---

1000. Died ca. 120/738. Ibid., IX, 5–7.

1001. Daldala means one who moves his head and limbs in walking. Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. d-l-l.

1002. A diminutive form of a'far. It had slight white color. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 511; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 315. It was also called Ya'fūr, meaning dust-colored. Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. '-f-r. See also Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 175–76.

1003. Ma'mar b. Rāshid al-Azdī died ca. 152/769. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 243–46.

1004. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 175.

1005. Died in 162/778–79. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 27–28.

1006. It means silver. See also Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 175.

1007. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 511, states that it was given by Farwah b. 'Amr al-Judhāmī.

1008. A slit-eared she-camel. Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. q-ṣ-y.

1009. Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 511) and Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 315): Al-Ḥuraysh; Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 176): Al-Ḥarīs. The Banū Ḥarīsh were a clan of the Banū 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah.

[dirhams],[1010] and it remained with him until it died. It was the camel on which he emigrated [from Mecca to Medina].[1011] When he came to Medina it was seven years old [rabā'iyyah].[1012] Its name was al-Qaṣwā', al-Jad'ā',[1013] or al-'Aḍbā'.[1014]

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Ibn Abī Dhi'b[1015]—Yaḥyā b. Ya'lā—Ibn al-Musayyib:[1016] Its name was al-'Aḍbā' and it had a slit on the side of its ear.

The Names of the Messenger of God's Milch Camels

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Mu'āwiyah b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Rāfi': The Messenger of God had milch camels which were raided by the Bedouins [while they were grazed] in a thicket [ghābah].[1017] They were twenty and the Messenger of God's family lived on [their milk]. Every evening, two big waterskins filled with milk were brought to him. Among those camels were some which yielded abundant milk. [They were] al-Ḥannā',[1018] al-Samrā', al-'Arīs, al-Sa'diyyah, al-Baghūm,[1019] al-Yasīrah, and al-Rayyā.[1020] [1785]

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Hārūn b. Mu-

1010. Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 511) adds: The more reliable report is that it was given to the Prophet by Abū Bakr.

1011. Ibid., I, 266.

1012. It means the tooth between the central incisor (thaniyyah) and the canine tooth (nāb), which determines the age for camels of about seven years old. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. r-b-'.

1013. A she-camel having the sixth or the fourth part of her ear cut off. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. j-d-'.

1014. A slit-eared she-camel or a she-camel with a "short foreleg." Ibid., s.v. '-ḍ-b. It was the same camel which got lost during the Tabūk expedition and which 'Alī rode to Mecca to deliver al-Barā'ah. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 190; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1009, 1077.

1015. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Dhi'b died ca. 158/774–75. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 303–7.

1016. Sa'īd b. al-Musayyib al-Qurashī al-Makhzūmī died in 100/718–19. Ibid., IV, 84–88.

1017. A dense forest of tamarisk bushes at the extreme north end of the Medinan oasis in the broad sandy bed of Wādī al-'Aqīq. Philby, Pilgrim, 75.

1018. Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 315): Al-Ḥasnā'.

1019. A she-camel uttering a yearning cry for her young one. Ibid.

1020. Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 177); Al-Dabbā'.

ḥammad[1021]—his father[1022]—Nabhān,[1023] freedman of Umm Salamah: I heard Umm Salamah saying that the diet, or the greater part of the diet, of the Messenger of God's family consisted of milk. The Messenger of God had milch camels in the thicket which he allotted to his wives. Among them was a milch camel called al-'Arīs. From it [Umm Salamah] used to get whatever amount of milk she desired. 'Ā'ishah had a milch camel called al-Samrā' which used to yield abundant milk, unlike that of Umm Salamah. The herdsman later brought the milch camels to a nearer pasture in the district of al-Jawwāniyyah,[1024] after which they were brought to the women's houses in the evening and were given to them to be milked. [The Messenger of God's][1025] milch camel was more abundant in milk than the two milch camels [of 'Ā'ishah and Umm Salamah], being almost equal to them or more.

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—'Abd al-Salām b. Jubayr—his father: The Messenger of God had [seven][1026] milch camels which were kept at Dhū al-Jadr[1027] and al-Jammā'[1028] and their milk was brought to him. [One of the] milch camels was called Muhrah.[1029] It was given [to him] by Sa'd b. 'Ubādah from the herd of the Banū 'Uqayl[1030] and was abundant in milk. Al-Rayyā[1031] and al-Shaqrā' were bought from the Banū 'Āmir in the Nabatean (al-Nabṭ)[1032] market. Al-Burdah, al-Samrā', al-'Arīs, al-Yasīrah, and al-Ḥannā' were milked every night and their milk was brought to him. The Prophet's slave named Yasār [who looked after those camels] was killed [during the Bedouins' raid].[1033]

1021. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 10.

1022. Muḥammad b. Bakkār b. Bilāl al-'Āmilī died in 216/831. Ibid., IX, 416.

1023. Loc. cit.

1024. A village near Medina. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 175.

1025. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 177.

1026. Addition from ibid., I/2, 178. Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 512): Ten.

1027. A place in Medina. Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 371.

1028. A place near Medina. Ibid., II, 393–94.

1029. Addition in Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 178): A milch camel called al-Shaqrā', a milch camel called al-Dabbā'. The Muhrah was sent by Sa'd . . . .

1030. Ibn Sa'd: 'Aqīl.

1031. Ibn Sa'd: Al-Dabbā'.

1032. They are the Arabs who lived in ancient times in Arabia Petraea. EI[1], s.v. Nabataeans. Shahîd, Rome and the Arabs, 5, 19; idem, Byzantium and the Arabs, 23.

1033. See Ṭabarī, above, I, 1781.

The Names of the Messenger of God's Milch Sheep (Manā'iḥ)[1034] [1786]

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Zakariyā' b. Yaḥyā—Ibrāhīm b. 'Abdallāh from the descendants of 'Utbah b. Ghazwān: The Messenger of God's milch sheep were seven: 'Ajwah, Zamzam, Suqyā, Barakah, Warisah,[1035] Aṭlāl,[1036] and Aṭrāf.[1037]

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad [b. 'Umar]—Abū Isḥāq—'Abbād b. Manṣūr[1038]—'Ikrimah[1039]—Ibn 'Abbās: The milch goats of the Messenger of God were seven in number, and they were tended by Ibn Umm Ayman.[1040]

The Names of the Messenger of God's Swords

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Sabrah[1041]—Marwān b. Abī Sa'īd b. al-Mu'allā: The Messenger of God took three swords from the armor of the Banū Qaynuqā'[1042] which were called Qala'ī,[1043] Battār ["very sharp"], and al-Ḥatf ["death"].[1044] After that he had al-Mikhdham ["sharp"],[1045] and Rasūb ["that is wont to sink"], which he took from [the property of] al-Fils [a shrine].[1046]

It is said that when the Messenger of God came to Medina he 1034. Plural of manīḥah, means a milch sheep or goat that is lent for the sake of her milk for a certain period and then restored to the lender. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. m-n-ḥ.

1035. Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 315): Warasah.

1036. Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 178) and Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 514): Iṭlāl.

1037. Ibn Sa'd, and Balādhurī: Iṭrāf.

1038. Died in 152/769. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 103–5.

1039. 'Ikrimah b. Khālid b. al-'Āṣ. Ibid., VII, 258–59.

1040. For further details, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 178–79.

1041. Died in 162/778–79. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 27–28.

1042. One of the three Jewish tribes of Yathrib (Medina). EI², s.v. Ḳaynuḳā', Banū.

1043. Qala'a means to pluck out, to extirpate. Qala'ī is called after a place al-Qala'ah known for its swords. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 522; Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. q-l-'.

1044. Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 316): Al-Khīf [feared]. The editor states in the footnote that "al-Ḥatf" is a variant reading.

1045. It was formerly the sword of al-Ḥārith al-Ghassānī. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. kh-dh-m.

1046. See Ṭabarī, above, I, 1706, n. 434.

[1787] had two[1047] swords with him. One was called al-'Aḍb ["sharp"], with which he participated at Badr.[1048] The sword called Dhū al-Faqār[1049] was obtained as booty at Badr. It had [previously] belonged to Munabbih b. al-Ḥajjāj.

The Names of the Messenger of God's Bows and Lances

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Sabrah—Marwān b. Abī Sa'īd b. al-Mu'allā: The Messenger of God took three lances and three bows from the weapons of the Banū Qaynuqā'. The names of the bows were al-Rawḥā',[1050] a shawḥaṭ bow called al-Bayḍā' ["white"], and a yellow bow called al-Ṣafrā' [made] of nab'[1051] wood.

The Names of the Messenger of God's Coats of Mail

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Sabrah—Marwān b. Abī Sa'īd b. al-Mu'allā: The Messenger of God took two coats of mail from the weapons of the

---

1047. Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 171) and Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 521): He had one sword with him which was handed down to him from his father. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 316, seems to be reporting from al-Ṭabarī.

1048. Balādhurī states that it was given by Sa'd b. 'Ubādah.

1049. Dhū al-faqār means "having the vertebrae of the back." It is the most celebrated sword of the Prophet and, afterwards, of 'Alī. It had previously belonged to al-'Āṣ b. Munabbih, who was slain at Badr by 'Alī, who gave it to the Prophet. It was so named because there were small, beautiful hollows or scallops in the edge, for more easy cleaving of coats of mail. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. f-q-r. For further details, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 171–72; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 521; Ibn Kathīr, Sīrah, IV, 707–8.

According to the Shī'ī belief, this sword, the coats of mail, and other weapons of the Prophet were inherited by 'Alī and the imāms as a token of their being the rightful successors of the Prophet. Kulaynī, al-Kāfī, I, 232–36.

1050. It means "most conducive to ease, or wide." Probably it is called after a place name, Rawḥā', about 75 km from Medina toward Mecca. Ḥarbī, Manāsik, 444–46; Al-Wohaibi, Hijaz, 226–30.

1051. A species of tree of which bows are made. Shawḥaṭ and nab' are one; the name varies according to the excellence of their places of growth. What is upon the summit is called nab', while what is in the depressed tract by its base is called shawḥaṭ. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. sh-ḥ-ṭ. See Ṭabarī, above I, 1760, n. 836.

Banū Qaynuqāʿ: one was called al-Saʿdiyyah[1052] and the other Fiḍḍah ("silver").

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Mūsā b. ʿUmar—Jaʿfar b. Maḥmūd[1053]—Muḥammad b. Maslamah:[1054] On the day of Uḥud I saw the Messenger of God [wearing] two coats of mail, Dhāt al-Fuḍūl[1055] and Fiḍḍah; I saw him on the day of Khaybar [wearing] two coats of mail, Dhāt al-Fuḍūl and al-Saʿdiyyah.[1056]

The Names of the Messenger of God's Shields

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—ʿAttāb b. Ziyād[1057]—ʿAbdallāh b. al-Mubārak[1058]—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Yazīd b. Jābir:[1059] I heard [1788]
Makḥūl saying: The Messenger of God had a shield with a sculptured image of a ram's head which he disliked, and one morning when he woke up, God caused that image to disappear [from the shield].[1060]

The Messenger of God's Names

Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā[1061]—Ibn Abī ʿAdī[1062]—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān (that is, al-Masʿūdī)[1063]—ʿAmr b. Murrah[1064]—Abū 1052. It is called after a place near Medina known for its coats of mail. Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. s-ʿ-d.

1053. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 106.

1054. A companion of the Prophet. Ibid., IX, 454–55.

1055. It was so-called because it had redundant portions or ampleness. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. f-ḍ-l. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 521, 523, states that either this coat of mail or al-Fiḍḍah was presented to the Prophet by Saʿd b. ʿUbādah.

1056. On the day of Ḥunayn, the Prophet wore two coats of mail, al-Mighfar and al-Bayḍah. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 897; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 172–73; II/1, 109.

1057. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 92.

1058. Died in 181/797–98. Ibid., V, 382–87.

1059. Ibid., VI, 297–98.

1060. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 173.

1061. Died ca. 252/866. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 425–27.

1062. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Abī ʿAdī died ca. 194/809–10. Ibid., IX, 12–13.

1063. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Masʿūdī died in 160/776–77. Ibid., VI, 210–12.

1064. ʿAmr b. Murrah b. ʿAbdallāh al-Murādī al-Kūfī died ca. 118/736. Ibid., VIII, 102–3.

'Ubaydah[1065]—Abū Mūsā [al-Ash'arī]: The Messenger of God named himself to us [in various ways] from which we remember him saying, "I am Muḥammad the [one who is praised], Aḥmad [the most praiseworthy], al-Muqaffī [the follower], al-Ḥāshir [the gatherer], Nabī al-tawbah wa'l-raḥmah[1066] [the Prophet of repentance and mercy].

[Muḥammad] Ibn al-Muthannā—Abū Dāwūd[1067]—Ibrāhīm [that is, Ibn Sa'd][1068]—al-Zuhrī—Muḥammad b. Jubayr b. Muṭ'im[1069]—his father:[1070] The Messenger of God told me, "I have several names. I am Muḥammad, Aḥmad, al-'Āqib [the last in succession], and al-Māḥī [the obliterator]." Al-Zuhrī states: Al-'Āqib is the one after whom there is no one [i.e., no prophet], and al-Māḥī is the one through whom God will efface infidelity.[1071]

Ibn al-Muthannā—Yazīd b. Hārūn[1072]—Sufyān b. Ḥusayn[1073]—al-Zuhrī—Muḥammad b. Jubayr b. Muṭ'im—his father: The Messenger of God said, "I am Muḥammad, Aḥmad, al-Māḥī, al-'Āqib, and al-Ḥāshir, who will gather mankind at his feet."[1074]

Yazīd [b. Hārūn] states: I asked Sufyān [b. Ḥusayn] what al-'Āqib meant, and he replied [that it meant] the last prophet.

1065. Abū 'Ubaydah b. Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān al-Kūfī. Ibid. XII, 159.

1066. As in Muslim (Ṣaḥīḥ, VII, 90), and Tabrīzī (Mishkāt, III, 132; Mishkat [trans. Robson], II, 1239; transmitted on the authority of Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī). Text, Ibn Isḥāq (Kitāb al-Mubtada', 123) and Ibn Shabbah (Ta'rīkh, II, 632): Wa'l-malḥamah [one who predicts future events that were to happen before the Last Hour]. Another version in Ibn Shabbah reads: Nabī al-raḥmah wa-nabī al-malḥamah.

1067. Sulaymān b. Dāwūd al-Ṭayālisī died ca. 203/818–19. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 182–86.

1068. Ibrāhīm b. Sa'd al-Zuhrī died ca. 183/799. Ibid., I, 121–23.

1069. Ibid., IX, 91–92.

1070. Jubayr b. Mut'im b. 'Adī died ca. 58/677–78. Ibid., II, 63–64.

1071. Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, 132; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1239; transmitted both by Bukhārī and Muslim on the authority of Jubayr b. Muṭ'im. Cf. also Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 392.

1072. Died ca. 206/821–22. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 366–69.

1073. Ibid., IV, 107–9.

1074. Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, II, 631: Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 132; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1239.

The Messenger of God's Characteristics [1789]

Ibn al-Muthannā—Ibn Abī 'Adī—al-Mas'ūdī—'Uthmān b. 'Abdallāh b. Hurmuz[1075]—Nāfi' b. Jubayr[1076]—'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib: The Messenger of God was neither tall nor short. [He had] a large head and beard, the palms of his hands and his feet were calloused, [he had] large joints, his face [had] a reddish tinge, the hair of his breast was long, and when he walked he bent forward as if he were descending a slope. I have never seen anyone like him before or since.[1077]

Ibn al-Muthannā—Abū Aḥmad al-Zubayrī[1078]—Mujamma' b. Yaḥyā[1079]—'Abdallāh b. 'Imrān[1080]—a man of the Anṣār [whom 'Abdallāh b. 'Imrān did not name]: I asked 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib while he was seated in the mosque of al-Kūfah, leaning his back against the wall and carrying his sword, "Describe for me the characteristics of the Messenger of God." He replied, "The Messenger of God was of a white complexion with a reddish tinge, [with] deep-black and large [eyes],[1081] and long eyelashes. The hair of his breast was thin, his cheeks were smooth, and his beard was thick and long as if his neck were a silver pitcher. The hair from the upper part of his chest to his navel ran like a branch cut off from a tree. He did not have any other hair on his chest or in his armpits. The palms of his hands and his feet were calloused. When he walked, [he walked] as though he were descending a slope or as though he were falling from a rock. When he turned around he turned completely;[1082] his turn was neither short nor long, and [he turned] neither like a weak nor like a mean person. The perspiration on his face [looked] as if it were pearls, and the fragrance

1075. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 133.
1076. Nāfi' b. Jubayr b. Muṭ'im b. 'Adī died in 99/717–18. Ibid., X, 404–5.
1077. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 386ff.; Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 135; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1242. See also Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 121; Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 209–10.
1078. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr died in 203/818–19. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 254–55.
1079. Ibid., X, 47–48.
1080. Ibid., V, 343.
1081. Addition from Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 120.
1082. Ibn Sa'd: He was neither short nor long, neither weak nor mean.

of his sweat was better than musk.[1083] I have never seen anyone like him before or since."

[1790] Ibn al-Muqaddamī[1084]—Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad b. Qays, who is called Abū Zukayr,[1085] states: I heard Rabī'ah b. Abī 'Abd al-Raḥmān[1086] recalling from Anas b. Mālik that the Messenger of God was commissioned [by God] when he was at the beginning of his fortieth year. He remained in Mecca ten years and in Medina ten years, and died at the beginning of his sixtieth year, when there were not twenty white hairs in his head and beard. He was neither very tall nor very short; he was neither pure white nor of dark complexion; and his hair was neither curly nor long.[1087]

Ibn al-Muthannā—Yazīd b. Hārūn—al-Jurayrī:[1088] I was with Abū al-Ṭufayl circumambulating the Ka'bah, and he said, "No one who saw the Messenger of God is alive except me." I asked him, "Did you see him?" He replied, "Yes." I asked, "What were his characteristics?" He answered, "He was white, good-looking, and of moderate stature."[1089]

The Seal of Prophethood Which He Had

Ibn al-Muthannā—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Makhlad[1090]—'Azrah b. Thābit[1091]—'Ilbā'[1092]—Abū Zayd:[1093] The Messenger of God said to me, "O Abū Zayd, come close to me and wipe my back," and[1094]

1083. Ibn Sa'd, and Ibn Shabbah (Ta'rīkh, II, 607): The pungent musk (or the musk of the utmost excellence).

1084. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr al-Muqaddamī died in 234/848–49. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 79.

1085. Ibid., XI, 274–75.

1086. Died ca. 136/753–54. Ibid., III, 258–59.

1087. Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 133; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1240; transmitted both by Bukhārī and Muslim on the authority of Anas b. Mālik.

1088. Sa'īd al-Jurayrī. Ibn Ḥajar. Tahdhīb, XI, 366.

1089. Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 134; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1241; transmitted by Muslim. For further details, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 120–31; Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, II, 602–17.

1090. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Makhlad b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk al-Shaybānī died ca. 214/828–30. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 450–53.

1091. Ibid., VII, 192.

1092. 'Ilbā' b. Aḥmar al-Yashkurī al-Baṣrī. Ibid., VII, 273–74.

1093. Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 131): Abū Rimthah. 'Amr b. Akhṭab b. Rifā'ah, Abū Zayd al-Anṣārī, was a companion of the Prophet. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 4.

1094. Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 131): I went close and wiped his back.

he uncovered his back. I touched his back, and then put my finger[1095] on the seal and touched it. ['Ilbā'] states: I said [to Abū Zayd], "What is the seal?" He replied, "[It is] a collection of hair on his shoulders." [1791]

Ibn al-Muthannā—Bishr b. al-Waḍḍāḥ Abū al-Haytham[1096]—Abū 'Aqīl al-Dawraqī[1097]—Abū Naḍrah:[1098] I asked Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī about the seal which the Prophet had, and he said that it was like a protruding lump of flesh.[1099]

His Bravery and Generosity

Ibn al-Muthannā—Ḥammād b. Wāqid[1100]—Thābit[1101]—Anas: God's Messenger was one of the best of men, the most generous of men, and the bravest of men. [One night the people of] Medina were frightened and went in the direction of the sound. Lo and behold, they found the Messenger of God on an unsaddled bare-backed horse belonging to Abū Ṭalḥah! He had a sword with him and had gone there before them and was saying, "O people, don't be afraid, don't be afraid." Then he said, "O Abū Ṭalḥah, we found it [could run like] a great river." Before that the horse was slow-paced, but no horse outstripped it after that.[1102]

Ibn al-Muthannā—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mahdī[1103]—Ḥammād b. Zayd[1104]—Thābit—Anas: The Messenger of God was the bravest most generous of men. [One night when the people of] Medina were frightened and went in the direction of the sound, he freed Abū Ṭalḥah's horse from fright and rode on it bare-backed, with-1095. Ibn Sa'd: My fingers.

---

1096. Died in 221/836. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 462.

1097. Bashīr b. 'Uqbah al-Nājī was called Abū 'Aqīl al-Dawraqī. Ibid., I, 465–66.

1098. Al-Mundhir b. Mālik, Abū Naḍrah al-Baṣrī, died ca. 108/726–27. Ibid., X, 302–3.

1099. For various descriptions of the seal, see Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, I, 148; III, 132–33; Mishkat (trans. Robson), I, 96; II, 1239–40; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 131–33; Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, II, 625.

1100. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 21.

1101. Thābit b. Aslam al-Banānī died ca. 123/740–41. Ibid., II, 2–4.

1102. Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 139–40; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1245–46; transmitted by both Bukhārī and Muslim on the authority of Anas. For a different report, see Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 306.

1103. Died in 198/813–14. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 279–81.

1104. Died in 179/795–96. Ibid., III, 9–11.

out a saddle, with a sword swung on his neck, and said, "We found it [could run like] a great river," or "it is like a great river."

[1792] The Description of His Hair and Whether He Used to Dye It or Not

Ibn al-Muthannā—Mu'ādh b. Mu'ādh[1105]—Ḥarīz b. 'Uthmān[1106]—Abū Mūsā—Mu'ādh: I have never seen a person from the inhabitants of Syria to whom I could give preference over [the Prophet]. We went to 'Abdallāh b. Busr, and I said to him while I was with my companions, "Did you see the Messenger of God? Was he an old man?" He put his hand on the part between his chin and the edge of his lower lip and said, "There was a white hair [among a few hairs] between his lower lip and his chin."

Ibn al-Muthannā—Abū Dāwūd—Zuhayr[1107]—Abū Isḥāq—Abū Juḥayfah:[1108] I saw the Messenger of God's white [tuft of] hair on his lower lip. He was asked, "Like what you have now, O Abū Juḥayfah?" He replied, "I pare and feather arrows."[1109]

Ibn al-Muthannā—Khālid b. al-Ḥārith[1110]—Ḥumayd:[1111] Anas was asked whether the Messenger of God dyed his hair. He replied, "The whiteness of the Messenger of God's hair did not become intense, but Abū Bakr dyed his with henna and katam[1112] and 'Umar dyed his with henna."[1113]

Ibn al-Muthannā—Ibn Abī 'Adī—Ḥumayd: Anas was asked whether the Messenger of God dyed his hair, and he replied, "Grey hair was not seen on him, except for nineteen or twenty 1105. Mu'ādh b. Mu'ādh al-'Anbarī al-Baṣrī died in 196/811–12. Ibid., X, 194–95.

---

1106. Died ca. 163/779–80. Ibid., II, 237–41.

1107. Zuhayr b. Muḥammad al-Tamīmī died in 162/778–79. Ibid., III, 348–50.

1108. Wahb b. 'Abdallāh, called Abū Juḥayfah al-Suwā'ī, died ca. 74/693–94. Ibid., XI, 164.

1109. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 137.

1110. Died in 186/802. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 82–83.

1111. Ḥumayd b. Abī Ḥumayd al-Ṭawīl died ca. 142/759–60. Ibid., III, 38–40.

1112. A herb used for hair dye. Fīrūzābādī, Qāmūs, s.v. k-t-m.

1113. Tabrīzī [Mishkāt, II, 501; Mishkat [trans. Robson], I, 937]: Anas replied: "If I had wanted to count the grey hairs on his head, I could have done so," adding that he did not dye his hair. In another version, Anas added that both Abū Bakr and 'Umar dyed their hair. It is transmitted by both Bukhārī and Muslim. For other reports, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 135–36.

white hairs in the front part of his beard. He was not blemished with grey hair." It was said to Anas, "Is [having grey hair] a blemish?" He replied, "All of you dislike it. Abū Bakr dyed [his white hair] with henna and katam and 'Umar dyed his with henna."

Ibn al-Muthannā—Mu'ādh b. Mu'ādh—Ḥumayd—Anas: The Prophet did not have more than twenty grey hairs.[1114] [1793]

Ibn al-Muthannā—'Abd al-Raḥmān [b. Mahdī]—Ḥammād b. Salamah[1115]—Simāk[1116]—Jābir b. Samurah:[1117] There was no white hair on the Messenger of God's head except for a few hairs in the place where the hair of his head was parted. When he annointed it with oil he covered it.[1118]

Ibn al-Muthannā—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mahdī—Sallām b. Abī Muṭī'—'Uthmān b. 'Abdallāh b. Mawhib:[1119] A wife of the Prophet entered [the house] and brought out to us the Messenger of God's hair dyed with henna and katam.[1120]

Ibn Jābir b. al-Kurdī al-Wāsiṭī—Abū Sufyān—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Ḥumurah[1121]—Ghaylān b. Jāmi'[1122]—Iyād b. Laqīṭ[1123]—Abū Rimthah:[1124] The Messenger of God used to dye [his hair] with henna and katam, and his hair used to reach his shoulders. [Commenting on the reliability of narrators in the above chain, al-Ṭabarī states:] There is doubt with regard to Abū Sufyān.

Ibn al-Muthannā—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mahdī—Ibrāhīm [i.e., Ibn Nāfi'][1125]—Ibn Abī Najīḥ—Mujāhid—Umm Hāni': I saw the Messenger of God and he had four [braided] locks of hair.[1126]

1114. Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, II, 622–23.
1115. Died in 167/783–84. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 11–16.
1116. Simāk b. Ḥarb al-Kūfī died in 123/740–41. Ibid., IV, 232–34.
1117. Died ca. 74/693–94. Ibid., II, 39–40.
1118. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2 136.
1119. Died in 160/776–77. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 132–33.
1120. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 395, on the authority of 'Abdallāh b. Mawhib, states: I entered [the house] of Umm Salamah and she brought out to me the Messenger of God's hair dyed with henna and katam. See also Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 139; Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, II, 618; Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, II, 501; Mishkat [trans. Robson], II, 937; transmitted by Bukhārī on the authority of Ibn Mawhib.
1121. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 443–44.
1122. Died in 132/749–50. Ibid., VIII, 252–53.
1123. Ibid., I, 386–87.
1124. He was a companion of the Prophet. Ibid., XII, 97.
1125. Ibid., I, 174.
1126. For a further description of his hair, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 133–35.

Report about the Beginning of the Messenger of God's Illness in Which He Died, and What He Did Just Prior to It When He was Bewailed [for His Approaching Death]

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: God states: "When comes the help of God, and victory, and you see men entering God's religion in multitudes, then glorify your Lord and seek His forgiveness. Verily He is forgiving."[1127] We have mentioned before what the Messenger [1794] of God's instructions were to his companions during his pilgrimage called "The Farewell Pilgrimage (ḥajjat al-wadā')," "The Pilgrimage of Completion [or Perfection of Religion] (ḥajjat al-tamām)," and "The Pilgrimage for Conveying the Message (ḥajjat al-balāgh)," [1128] its rites and his last Will and Testament to them. This I have cited before in his address which he delivered to them during that pilgrimage. Then the Messenger of God returned from his journey, after he had performed the pilgrimage, to his residence in Medina toward the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah and stayed there during the remainder of that month as well as during Muḥarram and Ṣafar.

1127. Qur'ān, sūrah 110.
1128. See Ṭabarī, above, 1756.

The Events of the Year

II

(March 29, 632–March 17, 633)

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: I have received an account on the authority of Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Ayyāsh b. Abī Rabī'ah:[1129] In the year 11/632, during the month of Muḥarram,[1130] the Messenger of God ordered the people to undertake an expedition to Syria. He put Usāmah, the son of his freed slave Zayd b. al-Ḥārithah, in command over them, ordering him to lead the cavalry into the territory of al-Balqā'[1131] and al-Dārūm[1132] in the land of Palestine. The people got ready and the first emigrants[1133] went forth all together with him. As the people were preparing for the expedition, the Prophet began to suffer from the sickness by which God took him to what honor and compassion He intended 1129. Died in 143/760–61. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 155–56.

1130. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1117; and Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 136, state that the Messenger of God ordered the expedition on the twenty-fifth of Ṣafar.

1131. A name given by the Arab authors either to the whole of the Transjordanian territory or to the middle part of it. Its geographical meaning is restricted to the limestone plateau between the Wādī al-Zarqā' and the Wādī al-Mūjib. EI², s.v. al-Balḳā'.

1132. Name of a coastal plain of Palestine, EI², s.v. al-Dārūm.

1133. The prominent emigrants, such as Abū Bakr, 'Umar, and Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ, were asked by the Prophet to join the expedition. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1118; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 136; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 474.

for him. [It took place] toward the end of Ṣafar or at the beginning of Rabīʿ I.

ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿīd al-Zuhrī[1134]—his uncle Yaʿqūb[1135]—Ibrāhīm[1136]—Sayf b. ʿUmar[1137]—ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd b. Thābit b.
[1795] al-Jidhʿ al-Anṣārī—ʿUbayd b. Ḥunayn,[1138] freedman of the Prophet—Abū Muwayhibah, freedman of the Messenger of God: After performing the Pilgrimage of Completion (ḥajjat al-tamām) the Messenger of God returned to Medina, [which made] travel permissible [for the people]. He ordered them to undertake an expedition, put Usāmah b. Zayd in charge of it, ordering him to go from Ābil al-Zayt,[1139] the land of the Arabs that is near mashārif al-Shām,[1140] to the territory in Jordan (al-Urdunn).[1141] The hypocrites criticized [the leadership of Usāmah], so the Prophet refuted them, [stating] that indeed he was worthy of [the command]. If they criticized [Usāmah's leadership], then indeed they had criticized his father before, although Zayd was qualified to command.[1142] The news that the Prophet was suffering from sickness spread in the land as travel became permissible. Both al-Aswad and Musaylimah seized upon [the opportunity to claim the prophethood for themselves] in the Yemen and al-Yamāmah, respectively, and their news had reached the Prophet. After he had recovered [from his illness], Ṭulayḥah seized upon [the opportunity to claim the prophethood for himself] in the country of Asad. In Muḥarram the Prophet complained of the pain by which God took him.

Ibn Saʿīd [al-Zuhrī]—his uncle Yaʿqūb—Sayf [b. ʿUmar]—Hi-

1134. Died in 260/873–74. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 15–16.

1135. Died in 208/823–24. Ibid., XI, 380–81.

1136. Ibrāhīm b. Saʿd b. Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf al-Zuhrī died ca. 183/799. Ibid., I, 121–23.

1137. He represents the Iraqi historical school and died in 180/796. Duri, Rise, 46–47, 140, 154.

1138. A client of the Banū Zurayq, who died in 105/723–24. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 63–64.

1139. A place name. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 50.

1140. The highlands of Syria. Ibid., V. 131.

1141. See EI[1], s.v. al-Urdunn.

1142. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1118–19, states that some of the Muhājirūn also criticized Usāmah's leadership. When ʿUmar conveyed the criticism to the Prophet, he became very angry, went to the pulpit and addressed the people urging them to dispatch the army of Usāmah. This happened on Saturday, the tenth of Rabīʿ I. Cf. also Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 136; II/2, 40–42; Lings, Muhammad, 339.

shām b. 'Urwah—his father: Toward the end of Muḥarram the Messenger of God complained of the pain by which God took him.

Al-Wāqidī states: The Messenger of God's pain started two days before the end of Ṣafar.[1143]

'Ubaydallāh b. Sa'īd [al-Zuhrī]—his uncle [Ya'qūb]—Sayf b. 'Umar—al-Mustanīr b. Yazīd al-Nakha'ī—'Urwah b. Ghaziyyah al-Dathīnī[1144]—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Fayrūz b. al-Daylamī[1145]—his father:[1146] The first apostasy (riddah)[1147] in Islam took place in the Yemen, while the Messenger of God was alive, at the hands of Dhū al-Khimār 'Abhalah b. Ka'b (that is, al-Aswad) among the commonalty of Madhḥij after the Farewell [Pilgrimage]. Al-Aswad was a soothsayer and a juggler. He used to show them [1796] wondrous things captivating the hearts of those who listened to his speech. The first time he [claimed the prophethood] was [after] his coming out of the Khubbān cave. It was his residence [because] he was born and brought up there. Madhḥij corresponded with him, promising him Najrān. They attacked [Najrān] and expelled 'Amr b. Ḥazm and Khālid b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ [the Prophet's agents], giving al-Aswad the position occupied by the latter two. Qays b. 'Abd Yaghūth attacked Farwah b. Musayk, [the Prophet's agent] over Murād, and expelled him placing al-Aswad in his stead. 'Abhalah [al-Aswad] did not stop at [the subjugation of] Najrān but marched to Ṣan'ā' and occupied it. The news of his rising and occupation of Ṣan'ā' was conveyed to the Prophet. It was the first news about him that the Prophet received from Farwah b. Musayk. Those people of Madhḥij who remained faithful to Islam joined Farwah, and they [gathered] at al-Aḥsiyah. Al-Aswad neither corresponded with Farwah nor sent [any messenger] to him, because there was no one with the latter who would have caused trouble for him. His hold over the Yemen was [thus] complete.

'Ubaydallāh [al-Zuhrī]—his uncle Ya'qūb—Sayf [b. 'Umar]—Ṭalḥah b. al-A'lam—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abbās: The Prophet had or-1143. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1117, states that it was Wednesday, the following day after he had appointed Usāmah in charge of the expedition.

---

1144. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 448.

1145. Ibid., IV, 448.

1146. Ibid., VIII, 305. See Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 282–87, for what follows.

1147. See Ṭabarī, above I, 1737, n. 641.

dered the expedition of Usāmah, but it did not go well because of his illness and because both Musaylimah and al-Aswad had renounced [his authority]. The hypocrites did much [to criticize] Usāmah's leadership. When [the criticism] reached the Prophet, he went out to the people while his head was wrapped around because of the pain, which had increased due to the dream he had seen [while he was] in ʿĀ'ishah's house, saying, "Last night I saw what a sleeping person sees, that in my two upper arms there were two golden armbands. I disliked them so I blew on them, and they flew away [in the air]. I interpreted the armbands to mean these two arch liars,[1148] the possessor of al-Yamāmah and[1149] the possessor of the Yemen. It has reached me that some people speak [ill of] Usāmah's leadership. By my life, if they crit-[1797] icize his leadership, then they have criticized the leadership of his father before. If his father was worthy of command, then he is [equally] worthy of it. Dispatch the expedition of Usāmah![1150] May God curse those who make the tombs of their prophets as places of worship (masājid)!" Usāmah went out [with his army], camped at al-Jurf, and the people began to gather in the army. Ṭulayḥah rose [in rebellion], so the people acted slowly and deliberately. The Messenger of God's [disease] became violent, so the expedition was not accomplished. The people were looking at each other until God took His Prophet's soul.

Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā wrote to me [i.e., al-Ṭabarī] stating that he has received an account on the authority of Shuʿayb b. Ibrāhīm al-Tamīmī—Sayf b. ʿUmar—Saʿīd b. ʿUbayd, Abū Yaʿqūb—Abū Mājid al-Asadī—al-Ḥaḍramī b. ʿĀmir al-Asadī: [When] Abū Mājid asked Ḥaḍramī concerning Ṭulayḥah b. Khuwaylid's affair, the latter replied: [After] we received the news of the Prophet's illness, it reached us that Musaylimah and al-Aswad had gained ascendency over al-Yamāmah and the Yemen, respectively. Soon thereafter, Ṭulayḥah claimed the prophethood while [Usāmah's] army was [still] at Samīrā'. The commonalty [of Asad] followed Ṭulayḥah and his hold became consolidated. He sent his brother's son Ḥibāl to the Prophet, inviting him to make peace with him and informing him about his news. Ḥibāl said that the one who visits Ṭulayḥah is Dhū al-Nūn, and he named [that spirit] an angel.[1151] Then Ḥibāl, [introducing himself], said that he was the son of Khuwaylid. The Prophet replied, "May God kill you and deprive you of the shahādah!"

1148. Ibn Shabbah (Taʾrīkh, II, 573) adds: Musaylimah.

1149. Ibn Shabbah adds: Al-ʿAnsī. For the importance of dreams, see Ṭabarī, above, I, 1673, n. 182.

1150. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 384, 474.

'Ubaydallāh b. Sa'īd [al-Zuhrī]—his uncle Ya'qūb—Sayf [b. 'Umar]—Sa'īd b. 'Ubayd—Ḥurayth b. al-Mu'allā: The first person who wrote to the Prophet about the news of Ṭulayḥah was Sinān [1798] b. Abī Sinān. He was [the Prophet's agent] over the Banū Mālik while Quḍā'ī b. 'Amr was [the Prophet's agent] over the Banū al-Ḥārith.

'Ubaydallāh b. Sa'īd [al-Zuhrī]—his uncle [Ya'qūb]—Sayf [b. 'Umar]—Hishām b. 'Urwah—his father: The Messenger of God waged war against the false prophets by sending messengers. He sent a messenger to some of the descendants of the Persian soldiers in the Yemen (al-abnā') instructing them [to get rid of] al-Aswad by artful contrivance. He [further] instructed them to seek help of some people whom he named from the Banū Tamīm and Qays, sending [word] to the latter to help the former. They did [as instructed]. The means of [escape] for those who apostatized were cut off, and they were attacked [while they were] in a state of waning. Since they were isolated, they were occupied with themselves. Al-Aswad was killed while the Messenger of God was [still] alive, a day or a night before the latter's death. Ṭulayḥah, Musaylimah and the likeness of them were driven away by the messengers.

Despite his illness, the Messenger of God was not distracted from the command of God and the defense of His religion.[1152] He sent Wabar b. Yuḥannas to Fayrūz, Jushaysh al-Daylamī, and Dādhawayhi al-Iṣṭakhrī; Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh to Dhū al-Kalā' [Sumayfi'][1153] and [Ḥawshab][1154] Dhū Ẓulaym; al-Aqra' b. 'Abdal-1151. The pre-Islamic Arabs believed in the demon of poetry, and they thought that a great poet was directly inspired by demons. Similarly, a kāhin (soothsayer) and an 'arrāfah (sorceress) were supposed to have a spirit (shayṭān or tābi'), who visited them. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 162; Ṭabarī, I, 1864 (al-Aswad al-'Ansī was a kāhin with a shayṭān and a tābi'); Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 35, 44, 45; Fahd, Divination, 72–75, 91ff.

1152. See Ḥamīdullāh, Majmū'ah, 284–85.

1153. Addition from Ḥamīdullāh.

1154. Addition from Ḥamīdullāh.

lāh al-Ḥimyarī to Dhū Zūd and Dhū Murrān; Furāt b. Ḥayyān al-ʿIjlī to Thumāmah b. Uthāl;[1155] Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah al-Tamīmī al-ʿAmrī to Qays b. ʿĀṣim and al-Zibriqān b. Badr; Ṣalṣal b. Shurāḥbīl to Sabrah al-ʿAnbarī, Wakīʿ al-Dārimī, ʿAmr b. al-Maḥjūb [1799] al-ʿĀmirī and ʿAmr b. al-Khafājī of the Banū ʿĀmir; Ḍirār b. al-Azwar al-Asadī to ʿAwf al-Zirqānī of the Banū al-Ṣaydāʾ and Sinān al-Asadī al-Ghanmī[1156] and Quḍāʿī al-Daylamī; Nuʿaym b. Masʿūd al-Ashjaʿī to Ibn Dhī al-Liḥyah and Ibn Mushaymaṣah al-Jubayrī.

Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf[1157]—al-Ṣaqʿab b. Zuhayr[1158]—the jurists of al-Ḥijāz: The Messenger of God suffered from the pain caused by the disease which took his life toward the very end of Ṣafar while he was in the house of Zaynab bt. Jaḥsh.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah and ʿAlī b. Mujāhid—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. ʿAlī—ʿUbayd b. Jubayr, a freedman of al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ—Abū Muwayhibah, a freedman of the Messenger of God. The Messenger of God sent for[1159] me in the middle of the night, saying, "O Abū Muwayhibah, I have been ordered to seek forgiveness for the [dead] inhabitants of al-Baqīʿ [cemetery],[1160] so come with me." I went with him, when he stood before them he said, "Peace [1800] be upon you, O people of the graves! Happier are you in your state than the people [here] in their present state![1161] Dissension (fitan)[1162] has come like segments of a pitch dark night one after the other, the last being worse than the first." He then turned to me, saying, "O Abū Muwayhibah, I have been given the keys of the treasuries of this world, long abode in it, then Paradise. I have been given the choice between it and meeting my Lord and Para-

---

1155. See ibid., 56–57.

1156. Ḥamīdullāh: Al-Qanmī.

1157. One of the earliest historians, who died in 157/774. *EI*², s.v. Abū Mikhnaf; Sezgin, GAS, I, 308–9; Duri, Rise, passim.

1158. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 432.

1159. Ibn Shabbah (Taʾrīkh, I, 87): Woke me up.

1160. Ibn Isḥāq, Ibn Shabbah: Of this al-Baqīʿ [cemetery]. See also Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 9–10; Lings, Muhammad, 337–38.

1161. Ibn Shabbah and Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 544) add: [I wish] you knew from what God has saved you!

1162. Generally, it means sedition whereby some good or evil quality is put to the test.

dise, so[1163] I have chosen meeting my Lord and Paradise." I said, "May you be ransomed with my parents! Take the keys of the treasuries of this world and long life in it followed by Paradise." He replied, "No, by God, O Abū Muwayhibah, I have chosen meeting my Lord and Paradise." He prayed for the [dead] inhabitants of al-Baqīʿ [cemetery] and left. Then the illness during which[1164] he died began.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq; and Ibn Ḥumayd—ʿAlī b. Mujāhid—Ibn Isḥāq—Yaʿqūb b. ʿUtbah—Muḥammad b. Muslim b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī—ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah [b. Masʿūd][1165]—ʿĀ'ishah, the Prophet's wife: [When] the Messenger of God returned from al-Baqīʿ [cemetery] he found me suffering from headache and crying, "Alas, O my head!" He said, "Nay, by God, O ʿĀ'ishah, rather alas, O my head!" Then he said, "It would not distress you if you were to die before me so that I would take care of you[r body], wrap you in the shroud, pray over you, and bury you." I replied, "By God, it seems to me that if you were to do that you would return to my house and would make a marriage feast with one of your wives."[1166] The Messenger of God smiled, [then] his pain came to him, all of it, as he was going the round of his wives until he was overwhelmed by it while he was in Maymūnah's house.[1167] He called [1801] his wives, asking their permission to be nursed in my house. They permitted him, so the Messenger of God went out [walking][1168] between two men of his family, al-Faḍl b. al-ʿAbbās, and another man with his feet dragging on the ground, while his head was wrapped around until he entered my house.

ʿUbaydallāh [b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah] states: [When] I narrated

1163. So . . . Paradise: Omitted from Ibn Isḥāq and Ibn Saʿd. It is an example of oneiromancy; cf. Fahd, Divination, 284.

1164. Ibn Isḥāq: Through which God took him began. Ibn Shabbah, Taʾrīkh, I, 87–91, 94–95, adds other reports, stating that that night the Prophet was with ʿĀ'ishah. Andrae, Mohammed, 171.

1165. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq. He died ca. 94/712–13. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 23–24.

1166. As it indicates, ʿĀ'ishah very often assumed a jesting tone. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 10–11; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 541, 544; Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 207–8; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1308; Andrae, Mohammed, 171–72; Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 204; Lings, Muhammad, 338.

1167. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 11, 30.

1168. Addition from Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq.

this story of ʿĀ'ishah to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās, he asked, "Do you know who the [other][1169] man was?" "No," I said. He replied, "[He was] ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, but[1170] ʿĀ'ishah could not bring herself to speak well of him, although she was able to do it."[1171]

Then the Messenger of God's illness intensified, the pain became fierce, so he said, "Pour seven skins of water over me from different wells so that I may go out to the people and instruct them." ʿĀ'ishah states: We made him sit in a tub (mikhḍab) belonging to Ḥafṣah bt. ʿUmar and poured water over him until he began saying, "Enough, enough."[1172]

Ḥumayd b. al-Rabīʿ al-Kharrāz—Maʿn b. ʿĪsā[1173]—al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAbdallāh b. Iyās al-Laythī al-Ashjaʿī—al-Qāsim b. Yazīd[1174]—ʿAbdallāh b. Qusayṭ—his father—ʿAṭā'—Ibn ʿAbbās—his brother al-Faḍl b. ʿAbbās: The Messenger of God sent for me, so I went, found him ill, and his head wrapped around.[1175] He asked me to take his hand and I did so until he [walked and] sat on the pulpit [in the mosque]. Then he asked me to call the people, [I did so] and they gathered round him. He said, "O people, [1802] I praise God, the only God, unto you. Now then: Your rights are dear to me[1176] so whomever I have flogged on his back with a whip, here is my back—let him avenge; and whomever I have reviled, here is my honor—let him retort.[1177] Malice is neither my nature nor characteristic of me.[1178] Indeed, the most loved of you to me is the one who claims his right from me [if he is the aggrieved party],[1179] or that he should absolve me [from it] so that

---

1169. Addition from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Balādhurī.

1170. But . . . it: Omitted from Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq.

1171. ʿĀ'ishah's grudge against ʿAlī stemmed from the incident of the slander against her [Qur'ān 24:10–20], when ʿAlī had advised the Prophet to divorce her. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, III, 313–14; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, II, 430; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 29. For recent works, see Abū al-Naṣr, ʿAlī wa ʿĀ'ishah; al-Afghānī, ʿĀ'ishah wa 'l-siyāsah.

1172. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 29.

1173. Died in 198/813–14. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 252–53.

1174. Ibid., VIII, 341–42.

1175. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 45, for some variations.

1176. I am only a human being: Addition in Ibn Saʿd.

1177. Ibn Saʿd adds: And whose property I might have taken [unknowingly], here is my property: let him take [compensation].

1178. Ibn Saʿd: No person should say that he is afraid of enmity and malice from the Messenger of God, because they are neither my nature nor my property.

1179. Addition from Ibn Saʿd.

I shall meet the Lord while I am content.[1180] I see that this is not enough until I stand before you several times."

Then he got down [from the pulpit], prayed the ẓuhr (midday) prayers, returned and sat on the pulpit repeating what he had said earlier. A man stood up saying, "O Messenger of God, you owe me three dirhams." He said, "O Faḍl, give him [three dirhams]," and I did. Then he sat and said, "O people, he who has a pledge let him return it and not profess the disgrace of this world, because the disgrace of the present world is easier [to bear] than the disgrace of the world to come." A man stood up saying, "O Messenger of God, I owe [you] three dirhams which I took unfaithfully from the cause of God." He asked, "Why did you do it?" "I was in need of it," the man replied. He said, "O Faḍl, take [three dirhams] from him." Then he said, "O people, he who is afraid of himself for something, let him stand up so that I will pray for him." A man stood up saying, "O Messenger of God, I am a liar, a late riser, and [one who acts] impudently." The Messenger of God said, "O God, bless him with truthfulness and faith and remove lethargy from him, if he is determined!" Another man [1803] stood up saying, "By God, O Messenger of God, I am a liar, a hypocrite, and there is no act which I did not commit." 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb stood up and said that the man had disgraced himself. The Prophet said, "O son of al-Khaṭṭāb, the disgrace of this world is easier [to bear] than the disgrace of the world to come. O God, bless that man with truthfulness and faith, and make his affairs good!" 'Umar thereupon asked the Prophet to speak to that man.[1181] The Messenger of God smiled and said, "'Umar is with me and I am with him." Referring to that man,[1182] the Prophet said, "Follow 'Umar after me, wherever he might be:"

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī—Ayyūb b. Bashīr:[1183] The Messenger of God went out while his head was wrapped around and sat in the pulpit. The first thing he said was a prayer for the men of Uḥud, asking God's forgiveness for them and prolonging the prayer. Then he said, "God has given one of his servants the choice between this world and that which is with 1180. Ibn Sa'd: I am exonerated.

1181. Cairo: 'Umar said a word.
1182. Cairo: After me the truth is with 'Umar wherever he might be.
1183. Died ca. 65/684–85. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 396.

Him, and the servant has chosen the latter." Abū Bakr understood and knew that the Prophet meant himself, so he cried, saying, "Nay, we and our children will be your ransom!" The Prophet replied, "Gently, Abū Bakr!" [Then he added],[1184] "Look at these doors that open on to the mosque. Close them except the one which is from Abū Bakr's house,[1185] for I know no one who is a better friend to me with regard to generosity than he."[1186]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh[1187]—some one from the family of Abū Saʿīd b. al-Muʿallā: That day the Messenger of God said in his speech, [1804] "If I were to take a friend from among mankind, I would take Abū Bakr as a friend, but comradeship and brotherhood in the faith [continue] until God unites us in His presence."

Aḥmad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Wahb[1188]—his uncle ʿAbdallāh b. Wahb[1189]—Mālik [b. Anas][1190]—Abū al-Naḍr[1191]—ʿUbayd b. Ḥunayn—Abū Saʿīd al-Khudrī: One day the Messenger of God sat in the pulpit, saying, "God has given a servant the choice between obtaining whatever he desires of the splendor of this world and that which is with God, and he has chosen that which is with God." Abū Bakr wept, saying, "May our fathers and mothers be your ransom, O Messenger of God!" Al-Khudrī states: We were surprised at Abū Bakr, [some] people said, "Look at this old man, [when] the Messenger of God informs [us] about a servant who has been given the choice, he says, 'May our fathers and mothers be your ransom.'"[1192] The Messenger of God was the one who was given the choice and Abū Bakr informed us of it. The Messenger of God said, "The most gracious person to me, with his comradeship and wealth, is Abū Bakr. If I were to take a friend

---

1184. Addition from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 547).

1185. Ibn Hishām [Another tradition states], and Balādhurī: Except Abū Bakr's door. Cf. Lings, Muhammad, 338.

1186. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 25.

1187. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 212–13.

1188. Died in 264/877–78. Ibid., I, 54–56.

1189. Died in 197/812–13. Ibid., VI, 71–74.

1190. A jurist and founder of the Mālikī school of jurisprudence died in 179/795. *EI*², s.v. Mālik b. Anas; Sezgin, GAS, I, 457–64.

1191. He is Sālim b. Umayyah and died in 120/738. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 431–32.

1192. Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 202; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1303; transmitted by both Bukhārī and Muslim.

[with me] I would take Abū Bakr, but Islamic brotherhood [remains]. No aperture in the mosque except that of Abū Bakr will be left [open]."[1193]

Muḥammad b. 'Umar b. al-Ṣabāḥ al-Hamdānī—Yaḥyā b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān—Muslim b. Ja'far al-Bajalī: I heard 'Abd al-Malik b. al-Iṣbahānī from Khallād al-Asadī: 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd states: Our beloved Prophet announced his [approaching] death a month before he died. When the separation drew near, he gathered us in the house of our mother 'Ā'ishah, looked at us intensely while his eyes were shedding tears, and said, "Welcome to you. May God [1805] treat you with compassion, shelter you, protect you, exalt you, benefit you, give you success, assist you, preserve you, and receive you [kindly]! I enjoin you to fear God and entrust you to Him. I appoint Him as successor over you and entrust you to Him. 'Verily I am to you [from Him] a warner and an announcer of good tidings.'[1194] 'Rise not up against God'[1195] in His land and among His creatures, for He has stated to me and to you: 'That is the mansion of the Hereafter, We give it to those who desire neither exaltation in the earth nor corruption. The future belongs to the pious.'[1196] He [also] stated: 'Is there not a place in Hell for the arrogant?' "[1197]

We asked, "When is your appointed time (ajal)?" "The separation [from you] and return to God and the Lote Tree[1198] have drawn closer," he replied. We asked him who would wash him and with what [cloth] he should be wrapped. He replied that he should be washed by his closest relatives and that he should be wrapped in the clothes he was wearing, or in a white Egyptian cloth, or in Yemenī dress (ḥullah Yamāniyyah).[1199] Then, we asked him who would lead the prayer over him. He said, "[Go] slowly. May God forgive you and reward you with goodness on

---

1193. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 24, 25–26.
1194. Qur'ān 11:2.
1195. Ibid., 44:19.
1196. Ibid., 28:83.
1197. Ibid., 39:60.
1198. Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 46) adds: And the Garden of Repose, the Exalted Companion, the brimming cup, the wholesome life.
1199. A wrapper for the whole body, generally consisting of three garments: a shirt, an izār, and a ridā'. The Yemenī garment is said to be the best kind of grave clothing. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ḥ-l-l.

behalf of your prophet!" We wept, as did he, and he said, "After you have washed and wrapped me in the shroud, put me on my bed in this house of mine on the edge of my grave, then go out for a while. The first one to pray over me would be my companion and friend Gabriel (Jibrīl), then Michael (Mīkā'īl), then Isrāfīl. [He will be] followed by the angel of death with a great multitude of angels in their entirety. After that, you are to enter group by group, pray over me, and pronounce your salutations. Do not hurt me by beating yourselves, nor by mournful and vehement cries. Let the male members of my family start praying over me, followed by their women, then you, and convey my salutation to [1806] yourselves. I testify to you that I have conveyed my salutation to those who rendered their oath of allegiance to me for my religion from today until the Day of Judgment." We asked him who would lower him into the grave, he replied, "The members of my family, together with many angels, who will see you but you will not see them."

Aḥmad b. Ḥammād al-Dūlābī[1200]—Sufyān—Sulaymān b. Abī Muslim[1201]—Sa'īd b. Jubayr[1202]—Ibn 'Abbās: Thursday, what a Thursday![1203] He said: The Messenger of God's pain became so severe that he said, "Give me [pen and paper][1204] so that I may write a document for you and you will never go astray after me."[1205] His companions wrangled over it,[1206] and it did not befit them to carry on a dispute before a prophet. Some people said, "What's the matter with him? Is he talking nonsense?[1207] Ask 1200. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 25–26.

1201. Ibid., IV, 218.

1202. Died in 95/713–14. Ibid., IV, 11–14.

1203. Then he wept until his tears wet the pebbles. He was asked, what about Thursday, and he replied: Addition in Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 205–6; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1306; transmitted by both Bukhārī and Muslim. Cf. also Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 562.

1204. Addition from Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 36, who states that this incident happened on Thursday when the Messenger of God's pain became severe. Balādhurī, and Tabrīzī: An inkpot and a shoulder blade.

1205. Ibn Sa'd, and Tabrīzī: After that.

1206. Balādhurī: They said, "Do you see him talking nonsense?" and [started] wrangling among themselves. The Messenger of God became grieved and annoyed and asked them to leave.

1207. The Prophet was not happy with 'Umar because he did not cooperate with him when he asked for pen and paper. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 36–38; Buhl, Leben, 353; Momen, Shi'i Islam, 15–16. The Shī'īs claim that the Prophet wanted to make a written testament favoring 'Alī's succession as head of the nascent Islamic state but that 'Umar foiled his plan. See Mirzā, al-Balāgh, I, 254–86.

him for an explanation." [When] they went back, repeating [those remarks] to him, he replied, "Leave me [alone], the state I am in is better than that for which you are calling me." He charged them with three things: "Expel the polytheists from the Arabian Peninsula; give presents to the delegation[s] as I used to do."[1208] [Sa'īd b. Jubayr states that Ibn 'Abbās] became silent about the third [command] intentionally, or that he said that he had forgotten it.

Abū Kurayb[1209]—Yaḥyā b. Ādam[1210]—Ibn 'Uyaynah[1211]—Sulaymān al-Aḥwal[1212]—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: Thursday! [Al-Ṭabarī states:] Then he narrated a report like that of Aḥmad b. Ḥammād [mentioned above], except that he said, "It did not befit them to dispute with a prophet."

Abū Kurayb and Ṣāliḥ b. Sammāl—Wakī'—Mālik b. Mighwal—Ṭalḥah b. Muṣarrif[1213]—Sa'īd b. Jubayr—Ibn 'Abbās: Thursday, what a Thursday! [Sa'īd b. Jubayr states:] Then I looked at Ibn 'Abbās' tears flowing on his cheeks as if they were a chain [1807] of pearls, [saying:] The Messenger of God said, "Bring me a tablet (lawḥ) and an inkpot (dawāt), or a plank of the shoulder blade (katīf) and an inkpot, so that I can write for you a document, after which you will not go astray." Some [people] said that the Messenger of God was talking deliriously.

Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Wahb—his uncle 'Abdallāh b. Wahb—Yūnus—al-Zuhrī—'Abdallāh b. Ka'b b. Mālik[1214]—Ibn 'Abbās: 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib went out from the Messenger of God during his illness in which he died. The people asked him, "O Abū Ḥasan, how did the Messenger of God wake up?" "By the grace of God he woke up [and he had] recovered [from his illness]," he replied. Al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib held him by his hand and said, "Don't you see[1215] that in three days you will be 'a slave [to be punished with] the club' ('abd al-'aṣā)?[1216] It seems to me that the Messenger of God will die from this sickness of his, 1208. This was the Messenger of God's practice. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I/2, 38ff.

1209. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 212.
1210. Died in 203/818–19. Ibid., XI, 175–76.
1211. Sufyān b. 'Uyaynah died in 198/813–14. Ibid., IV, 117–22.
1212. Ibid., IV, 188.
1213. Died ca. 112/730–31. Ibid., V, 25–26.
1214. Died ca. 98/716–17. Ibid., V, 369.
1215. Ibn Isḥāq: By God, O 'Alī, you will be in . . . .
1216. It is an idiom used contemptuously for a despicable person. Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 19–20.

for I know [how] the faces of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib's sons look at the time of death. So return[1217] to the Messenger of God, and ask him who will get this authority.[1218] If it is to be with us, we shall know that, if it is to be with others, he[1219] will command accordingly and entrust [that person] with us." 'Alī replied, "By God, if we asked the Messenger of God and he denied it to us, the people will never give it to us. By God, I[1220] will never ask the Messenger of God."[1221] Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī—'Abdallāh b. Ka'b b. Mālik[1222]—'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās: That day 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib went out from the Messenger of God. [Al-Ṭabarī states:] Ibn Ḥumayd mentioned a report similar to the above report except that in his account he stated [al-'Abbās' saying]: "I swear by God that I recognized death in the Messenger of God's [1808] face as I used to recognize it in the faces of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib's sons. So let us go to the Messenger of God; if this authority is to be with us, we shall know it, and if it is to be with others, we will ask [the Prophet] so that he will enjoin the people to treat us well." [Ibn Ḥumayd] also added in that account: The Messenger of God died that day when the heat intensified at noon.[1223] Sa'īd b. Yaḥyā al-Umawī[1224]—his father[1225]—'Urwah—'Ā'ishah: The Messenger of God said to us, "Pour seven skins of 1217. So let us go: Ibn Sa'd (Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 38), and Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 565). See also Lings, Muhammad, 341.

---

1218. Ibn Sa'd adds: After him.

1219. Ibn Sa'd: We will speak to him, so that he will entrust [that person] with us.

1220. Ibn Sa'd: We. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 583, states on the authority of Jābir b. 'Abdallāh that 'Abbās wanted to give his oath of allegiance to 'Alī, but the latter seemed to be overconfident that nobody would usurp what he considered to be his right. The commentator of Nahj al-balāghah, II, 51–52, reports that after Abū Bakr was elected in the Saqīfah, attempts were made to bribe 'Abbās so that he would not support 'Alī's claim.

1221. 'Abbās is reported to have warned 'Alī against participating in the Shūrā so that he could maintain his freedom of action, but 'Umar's provisions for the council precluded such a course of action. Here again, 'Abbās reminded 'Alī of what he had told him during the Prophet's illness. See Ṭabarī, I, 2780; Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, III, 925–26.

1222. Died ca. 97/715–16. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 369.

1223. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 38–39, for other reports.

1224. Died ca. 249/863. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 97–98.

1225. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. Abān b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ al-Umawī died in 194/809–10. Ibid., XI, 213–14.

water from seven different wells over me so that I may go out to the people and instruct them."[1226]

Muḥammad—Muḥammad b. Ja'far—'Urwah—'Ā'ishah: We poured seven skins [of water] over him and he found some relief. He went out, prayed with the people, addressed them and sought God's forgiveness for the martyrs of Uḥud. Then he urged them to take care of the Anṣār, saying, "Now then: O community of the Emigrants, you will go on increasing, but the Anṣār will not grow [greater in size] than what they are today. They are my intimates with whom I sought shelter, so honor their nobles and overlook those (of them) who do ill."[1227] He [added], saying, "One of God's servants has been given the choice between this world and that which is with God, and he has chosen the latter." No one except Abū Bakr perceived that the Prophet meant himself, so he cried. The Prophet said to him, "Gently, O Abū Bakr!" [Then addressing the people he said:] "Shut these doors that open on to the mosque except the door of Abū Bakr, for I know no one who is a better friend to me with regard to generosity than he."

'Amr b. 'Alī[1228]—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd al-Qaṭṭān[1229]—Sufyān[1230]—Mūsā b. Abī 'Ā'ishah—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah—'Ā'ishah: We forced the Messenger of God to take medicine during his illness. He said not to force him, but we said that the sick man does not like medicine. After he recovered, he said [addressing us, the women], "Let no one remain in the house until [every one of you] has been forced to take this medicine except al-'Abbās, for he did not agree with you what you did." [1809]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq (in an account we have quoted from him [see Ṭabarī, above, I, 1800]) on the authority of al-Zuhrī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh—'Ā'ishah: Then the Messenger of God came down [from the pulpit], entered his house and the pain came, all of it, until he was exhausted. Some of his wives, Umm Salamah, Maymūnah, and some of the wives of the Muslims, among whom was Asmā' b. 'Umays, gathered round

1226. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 42.

1227. Ibid., 42–44; Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 275–76; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1368–69; transmitted by Bukhārī.

1228. Died in 249/863. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 80–82.

1229. Died in 198/813–14. Ibid., XI, 216–20.

1230. Sufyān b. Sa'īd al-Thawrī died in 161/777–78. Ibid., IV, 111–15.

him, while his uncle al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib was with him. They agreed to force him to take medicine. Al-ʿAbbās said, "Let me force him," and [the Messenger of God] was forced.[1231] After the Messenger of God recovered he asked who had done that with him. They said that it was his uncle al-ʿAbbās. Pointing in the direction of Abyssinia, the Prophet said, "This is a medicine brought by women from that country." When he asked why they had done it, al-ʿAbbās replied, "O Messenger of God, we were afraid that you might have pleurisy (dhāt al-janb)."[1232] He replied, "That is a disease with which God would not afflict me. Let no one remain in the house until he is forced to take this medicine except my uncle." Although Maymūnah had fasted, she was forced to take it because of the Messenger of God's oath as a retribution for what they had done [to him].[1233]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar b. al-Zubayr[1234]—ʿUrwah—ʿĀʾishah: When they said that they were afraid that he might have pleurisy, he said, "It is from [1810] Satan and God would not inflict it on me."

Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣaqʿab b. Zuhayr—the jurists of al-Ḥijāz: When the Messenger of God's illness from which he died grew severe until he became unconscious, all of his family (i.e., his wives, his daughter [Fāṭimah], al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib and ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib) gathered [round him]. Asmāʾ bt. ʿUmays said, "This pain of his is nothing but pleurisy, so force him to take medicine." We did so, and, after he had recovered, he inquired who had done that to him. When they replied that [it was] Asmāʾ bt. ʿUmays who thought that he might have pleurisy, he said, "May God protect me from such an affliction! I am more honorable to Him than [that I should have] such [a disease]."

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Saʿīd b. ʿUbayd al-Sabbāq[1235]—Muḥammad b. Usāmah b. Zayd[1236]—his father Usāmah b. Zayd: When the Messenger of God's illness became 1231. Ibn Isḥāq: And they forced him.

---

1232. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. j-n-b.
1233. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq. Cf. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 31–32; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 545–46; Buhl, Leben, 353.
1234. Died between 110/728–29 and 120/738. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 93.
1235. Ibid., IV, 61.
1236. Ibid., IX, 35.

severe, I and the people came down [from where we were encamped] to Medina and went[1237] to the Messenger of God. As he was tongue-tied, he began to lift his hand toward heaven and put it down upon me, so I understood that he was praying for me.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh—'Ā'ishah: Very often I used to hear the Messenger of God say, "God never takes a prophet's life without giving him the choice."[1238]

Abū Kurayb—Yūnus b. Bukayr[1239]—Yūnus b. 'Amr[1240]—his father [Abū Isḥāq 'Amr al-Sabī'ī]—al-Arqam b. Shuraḥbīl:[1241] I asked Ibn 'Abbās, "Did the Messenger of God make a will?" "No," he replied. I asked, "How was that?" He replied: The Messenger of God asked for 'Alī, but 'Ā'ishah said, "[I wish] you had [1811] asked for Abū Bakr!" Ḥafṣah said, "[I wish] you had asked for 'Umar!" So all of them gathered before the Messenger of God. He asked them to disperse, for he would call them if there should be any need, and they went away. [At another time] the Messenger of God asked whether the time for prayer had drawn close. They said, Yes. When he ordered that Abū Bakr should lead the people in prayer 'Ā'ishah said, "He is a delicate man, so order 'Umar." He did that,[1242] but 'Umar replied, "I will not lead while Abū Bakr is present." So Abū Bakr led [them in prayer]. The Messenger of God got some relief [from the pain], so he went out [to the mosque]. When Abū Bakr heard his movement, he stepped backward, so the Messenger of God pulled at his clothes asking him to stand in his place. He sat down [near Abū Bakr] and recited from where Abū Bakr had left off.

1237. Ibn Isḥāq: And I went. This was on Sunday. For details see Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1119–20; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/1, 137; II/2, 41.

1238. Ibn Isḥāq adds: When the Messenger of God was on the point of death, the last word I heard him saying was, "[Nay], rather the Exalted Companion is from paradise." I said, "Then, by God, he is not choosing us." I knew that he used to tell us, "A prophet does not die until he has been given the choice." For further details, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 27–28.

1239. He is one of the main transmitters of Ibn Isḥāq's Sīrah and died in 199/814–15. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 434–36; Duri, Rise, 33n., 36.

1240. Died ca. 158/774–75. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 433–34.

1241. Ibid., I, 198–99.

1242. Some traditions state that 'Umar led the people in prayer, but when the Messenger of God heard his voice he expressed his disapproval and asked for Abū Bakr. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 21–22; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 554–55.

Ibn Wakī'—his father[1243]—al-A'mash[1244]—Abū Hishām al-Rifā'ī—Abū Mu'āwiyah and Wakī'—al-A'mash; and 'Īsā b. 'Uthmān b. 'Īsā[1245]—al-A'mash—Ibrāhīm—al-Aswad—'Ā'ishah: During the Messenger of God's illness during which he died, a call for prayer was given. He ordered that Abū Bakr should lead the people in prayer. I said, "Abū Bakr is a tender-hearted man. When he will stand in your place, he might not be able to bear [the idea of taking your place]."[1246] He repeated his order nevertheless. When I repeated my objection,[1247] he became angry and said, "You are like Joseph's women companions (ṣawāḥib)." Ibn Wakī' states: "[You are like] Joseph's women companions (ṣawāḥibāt); order Abū Bakr to lead the people in prayer." Then, he came out while he was being supported between two men,[1248] and his feet were dragging on the ground. Abū Bakr stepped backward when the Prophet approached him. The Messenger of God motioned him to [1812] stand in his place, while he sat down and prayed sitting at the side of Abū Bakr. Abū Bakr followed the Prophet in his prayer, and the people followed Abū Bakr in their prayers. [Al-Ṭabarī]: The [exact] words in [the above account] are that of 'Īsā b. 'Uthmān.

Al-Wāqidī: I asked Ibn Abī Sabrah,[1249] "How many times did 1243. Wakī' b. al-Jarrāḥ died ca. 196/811–12. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 123–31.

1244. Ibid., XI, 123.

1245. Died in 251/865. Ibid., VIII, 220.

1246. In another version, 'Ā'ishah said: Abū Bakr is a tender-hearted man who weeps a lot when he recites the Qur'ān, so order 'Umar to lead the people in prayer! Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 18. In a different version reported by Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 554, it was Abū Bakr himself who suggested that let 'Umar lead the prayer. See also Lings, Muhammad, 339.

1247. Another version states: The reason for my objection was that the people might not like a person taking the Prophet's place. I felt that nobody would take his place without being regarded by the people as a portent of evil. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 18, 20.

1248. According to ibid., II/2, 19–20, they were either 'Abbās and 'Alī or al-Faḍl b. 'Abbās and Thawbān. All the reports that Abū Bakr was asked by the Prophet during his last illness to lead the prayer are tendentious and inconsistent. They are used by the Sunnīs to argue the succession in favor of Abū Bakr (see n. 1290 below). For the Shī'ī refutation see al-Qāḍī al-Nu'mān, al-Urjūzah, 73–76, 267–68. Although the phrase "Joseph's women companions" is in the plural, it is meant to be in the singular, that is, for 'Ā'ishah. She is compared to the Egyptian official's wife who tried to seduce Joseph. See Mirzā, al-Balāgh, I, 235–54, where older sources are given.

1249. Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Sabrah: Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 23. He died in 162/778–79. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 27–28.

Abū Bakr lead the prayers?" "Seventeen times," he replied. I asked, "Who informed you?" "Ayyūb b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Ṣaʿṣaʿah,[1250] on the authority of a man among the companions of the Prophet," he replied.

Al-Wāqidī—Ibn Abī Sabrah—ʿAbd al-Majīd b. Suhayl.[1251]—ʿIkrimah: Abū Bakr led the prayers for three days.[1252]

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Ḥakam[1253]—Shuʿayb b. al-Layth[1254]—al-Layth[1255]—Yazīd b. al-Hād[1256]—Mūsā b. Sarjis[1257]—al-Qāsim[1258]—ʿĀ'ishah: Before the Messenger of God died, I saw a bowl of water near him. He used to put his hand in the bowl and then wipe his face with it, saying, "O my Lord, help me [to overcome] the severity of the agony of death (sakrat al-mawt)."

Muḥammad b. Khalaf al-ʿAsqalānī[1259]—Ādam[1260]—al-Layth b. Saʿd—Ibn al-Hād—Mūsā b. Sarjis—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad—ʿĀ'ishah: Before the Messenger of God died I saw . . . [al-Ṭabarī:] and narrated the same [aforecited] report, except that he stated: The agonies of death (sakarāt al-mawt).[1261]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī—Anas b. Mālik: [1813]
On Monday, the day on which the Messenger of God died,[1262] he went out [of his house] to the people [in the mosque] while they were praying the morning prayer. He lifted the curtain, opened the door, came out, and stood at ʿĀ'ishah's door.[1263] The Muslims

---

1250. On the authority of ʿAbbād b. Tamīm: Addition in Ibn Saʿd.

1251. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 380–81: ʿAbd al-Majīd b. Sahl b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf(?)

1252. Ibn Saʿd, Tabaqāt, II/2, 23; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 556.

1253. Died in 268/881–82. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 260–62.

1254. Died in 199/814–15. Ibid., IV, 355.

1255. Layth b. Saʿd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Fahmī died in 175/791–92. Ibid., VIII, 459–65.

1256. Died in 139/756–57. Ibid., XI, 339–40.

1257. Ibid., X, 345.

1258. Al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr died between 101/719–20 and 112/730–31. Ibid., VII, 333–35.

1259. Died in 260/873–74. Ibid., IX, 149.

1260. Ādam b. Abī Iyās died ca. 220/835. Ibid., I, 196.

1261. Sakarāt is a plural of sakrah. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. s-k-r.

1262. Ibn Isḥāq: The day on which God took the Messenger of God.

1263. Ibn Saʿd's report (Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 18, 19) states that the Messenger of God lifted the curtain of his room and stood looking at us. His face [looked] like a leaf of a book (muṣḥaf). He then smiled.

were almost distracted from their prayers with joy when they saw the Messenger of God. He motioned [to them][1264] with his hand[1265] to continue their prayers, and smiled with joy when he saw their appearance in their prayers. I had never seen the Messenger of God in better shape before. Then he returned, and the people departed thinking that the Messenger of God had recovered from his illness. Abū Bakr [also] went back to his family in al-Sunḥ.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Abū Bakr b. ʿAbdallāh[1266] b. Abī Mulaykah: On Monday, the Messenger of God came out to morning prayer with his head wrapped around while Abū Bakr was leading the people in prayer. When the Messenger of God came out, the people were delighted in looking at him. Abū Bakr knew that the people would not [be distracted from prayer] except for the Messenger of God, so he withdrew from his place. The Messenger of God pushed him in the back telling him to lead the prayer. He sat on the right side of Abū Bakr and prayed while seated. After he had completed the prayer, he turned to the people and spoke to them, raising his voice until it could be heard from outside, saying, "O people, the fire has been kindled, and dissension (fitan) has set in like segments of a dark night. By God, you cannot lay anything to my charge. I did not make anything lawful for you except what was made lawful by the Qur'ān. I did not make anything unlawful for you except what was forbidden by the Qur'ān." After he had finished his speech, Abū Bakr said to [1814] him, "O Prophet of God, I see that this morning, with the grace of God and His bounty, [you have recovered] as we desire. Today is the day of Bint Khārijah.[1267] May I go to her?"[1268] Then the Messenger of God went to [his house] and Abū Bakr left for his family in Sunḥ.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yaʿqūb b. ʿUtbah—al-Zuhrī—ʿUrwah—ʿĀ'ishah: That day, after the Messenger of God

---

1264. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.
1265. With his hand: Omitted from Ibn Isḥāq.
1266. ʿUbaydallāh: Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 32.
1267. She was from Balḥārith of al-Khazraj. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 17.
1268. "Yes," [the Messenger of God] replied: Addition in Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq. See also Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 558–59.

had gone to the mosque, he returned[1269] and lay down in my lap. A man from the family of Abū Bakr[1270] came to me, and he had a fresh siwāk in his hand. The Messenger of God looked at it in such a way that I knew [that] he wanted it.[1271] I took it, chewed it until I had softened it and gave it to him. He rubbed his teeth with it more energetically than I had [ever][1272] seen him doing it before. Then he put it down, and I found him getting heavy in my lap. When I looked into his face his eyes were fixed while he was saying, "Nay, the most Exalted Companion is that of paradise." I said, "By Him who sent you with the truth, you were given the choice, and you have chosen," and he died.[1273]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. ʿAbbād b. al-Zubayr[1274]—his father ʿAbbād:[1275] I heard ʿĀ'ishah saying, "The Messenger of God died on my bosom during my turn, and I did not wrong anyone in regard to him.[1276] It was because of my ignorance and youthfulness that the Messenger of God died while he was in my lap. Then I laid his head on a pillow and got up beating my chest and slapping my face along with the women.

An Account of the Day on Which the Messenger of God Died and His Age [1815]

Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī]: There is no disagreement among those knowledgeable about the day on which the Messenger of God died. [They agree that] it was Monday in the month of Rabīʿ I. They disagree, however, as to which Monday [it was that] he died. [An account of what] some of them said [is as follows].

1269. To me: Addition in Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq. And entered my room: Addition in Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 30.

1270. In a different version, Ibn Saʿd, loc. cit., states that he was ʿĀ'ishah's brother ʿAbd al-Raḥmān.

1271. I asked, "O Messenger of God, do you want me to give it to you?" "Yes," he replied: Addition in Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq.

1272. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq. Lings, Muhammad, 341.

1273. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 548.

1274. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 234–35.

1275. ʿAbbād b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr. Ibid., V, 98.

1276. Some traditions state that the Messenger of God died on ʿAlī's bosom. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 30, 49–51.

Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ṣaq'ab b. Zuhayr—the jurists of al-Ḥijāz: The Messenger of God died at noon on Monday, the second of Rabī' I. The oath of allegiance was given to Abū Bakr on Monday, the very day on which the Prophet died.

Al-Wāqidī: [The Messenger of God] died on Monday, the twelfth of Rabī I.[1277] He was buried the following day around midday, after the sun had declined, and this day was Tuesday.[1278]

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī] The Messenger of God died while 'Umar was present and Abū Bakr was in al-Sunḥ.[1279]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī—Sa'īd b. al-Musayyib[1280]—Abū Hurayrah: When the Messenger of God died, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb stood up saying, "Some of the hypocrites allege that the Messenger of God is dead. By God, he is not dead, [1816] but has gone to his Lord as Moses b. 'Imrān went and remained hidden from his people for forty days. Moses returned after it was said that he had died. By God, the Messenger of God will [also] return[1281] and will cut off the hands and feet of those who allege that he is dead."

When the news [of the Prophet's death] reached Abū Bakr, he came and dismounted near the door of the mosque [where] 'Umar was speaking to the people. He paid no attention to anything and went [straight] to the Messenger of God in 'Ā'ishah's house where he was lying in a corner covered by a striped garment of the Yemenī fabric. Abū Bakr went close [to the Prophet], uncovered his face, kissed him, then said, "With my father may you be ransomed, and with my mother! Indeed, you have tasted the death which God had decreed for you. No [other] death will ever overtake you." Then he replaced the cloth on [the Prophet's] face and went out as 'Umar was speaking to the people. He said, "Gently, O 'Umar, [and] be silent!" 'Umar refused [to be silent] and kept on speaking. When Abū Bakr saw that he would not listen, he went forward to the people [speaking]. When they heard his 1277. For different reports, see Ibid., II/2, 57–58; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 568.

1278. Some reports state that he was buried on Wednesday. Cf. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 58; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 568.

1279. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 52–53.

1280. Died ca. 93/711–12. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 84–88.

1281. As Moses returned: Addition in Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq.

words, they came to him and left 'Umar. After praising God and extolling Him, he said, "O people, those who worshipped Muḥammad, [must know that] Muḥammad is dead; those who worshipped God, [must know that] God is alive [and] immortal." He then recited the verse: "Muḥammad is only a messenger; and many a messenger has gone before him. So if he dies or is killed, will you turn back on your heels? He who turns back on his heels will do no harm to God; and God will reward the grateful."[1282] By God, it was as if the people did not know that this verse was revealed to the Messenger of God until Abū Bakr recited it that day. The people took it from him, and it was [constantly] in their mouths. 'Umar said, "By God, as soon as I heard Abū Bakr recite [1817] it, my legs betrayed me so that I fell to the ground, and my legs would not bear me. I knew that the Messenger of God had indeed died."[1283]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr[1284]—Mughīrah[1285]—Abū Ma'shar Ziyād b. Kulayb[1286]—Abū Ayyūb—Ibrāhīm: When the Messenger of God died, Abū Bakr was not present, and he came after three [hours].[1287] No one dared to uncover the Messenger of God's face until his exterior turned ashen. [When] Abū Bakr [came, he] uncovered [the Prophet's] face, kissed [his forehead] between his two eyes, and said, "With my father may you be ransomed, and with my mother! How good you were while alive, and how good you are when you are dead!" Then he went out, praised God and extolled Him, saying, "Whoever worships God, God is alive and immortal; whoever worships Muḥammad, Muḥammad is dead." Then he recited: "Muḥammad is only a messenger; and many a messenger has gone before him. So if he dies or is killed, will you turn back on your heels? He who turns back on his heels will do no harm to God; and God will reward the grateful."[1288] 'Umar was telling [the people that] the Prophet was not dead and he was

---

1282. Qur'ān 3:144.

1283. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 54–55. See also Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 563, 565–66.

1284. Jarīr b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd al-Ḍabbī died in 188/804. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 75–77.

1285. Mughīrah b. Miqsam al-Ḍabbī died ca. 134/751–52. Ibid., X, 269–71.

1286. Died ca. 120/738. Ibid., III, 382.

1287. The specification of number (tamyīz) is missing. It could be three hours, three prayers, or three deputations. See 'Abd al-Maqṣūd, al-Saqīfah, 16.

1288. Qur'ān 3:144.

threatening to kill [those who maintained that the Prophet was dead].

The Anṣār gathered in a roofed building (saqīfah)[1289] of the Banū Sā'idah to render their oath of allegiance to Sa'd b. 'Ubādah. This news reached Abū Bakr, so he came to them with 'Umar and Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ, asking [them] why [they had gathered]. They replied, "Let us have a ruler (amīr) from us and another from you." Abū Bakr said, "The rulers (umarā') will be from us, and the viziers (wuzarā') from you." Abū Bakr then added, "I am pleased [to offer] you one of these two men: 'Umar or Abū 'Ubaydah. Some people came to the Prophet asking him to send a trustworthy man with them. The Messenger of God said that he [1818] would send a truly trustworthy man with them, and he sent Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ. I am pleased [to offer] you Abū 'Ubaydah." 'Umar stood up saying, "Who among you would be agreeable to leave Abū Bakr whom the Prophet gave precedence?"[1290] and he gave him the oath of allegiance. The people followed ['Umar]. The Anṣār said, or some of them said, "We will not give the oath of allegiance [to anyone] except 'Alī."

Ibn Ḥumayd—Jarīr—Mughīrah—Ziyād b. Kulayb: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb came to the house of 'Alī. Ṭalḥah, al-Zubayr, and some of the Muhājirūn were [also] in the house [with 'Alī]. 'Umar cried out, "By God, either you come out to render the oath of allegiance [to 1289. A rectangular building of one storey consisting merely of a number of pillars with a clay roof, but open at all sides. It seems to have been the clan's gathering place. Serjeant, "Translation," 10.

---

Abū Bakr's election took place in this building, hence the event surrounding his election is named "The Saqīfah" after it. Following the Prophet's death, the Anṣār, who had grown resentful of the growing influence of the Quraysh, met there to deliberate on the critical leadership crisis that had arisen. The common view among the early Muslim historians is that the crisis was averted by the resolute action of three prominent Muhājirūn: Abū Bakr, 'Umar, and Abū 'Ubaydah, and that their success was facilitated by the jealousies among the Anṣār. The sources, as pointed out by Lammens, "Triumvirate," also suggest an alliance between those three Muhājirūn. Moreover, all of them, being close advisers to the Prophet, carried considerable influence and prestige in the emerging Islamic polity. For an analysis of the early sources and an intelligent reconstruction of the events, see Jafri, Origins, 27–57. Shoufani, al-Riddah, 48–70, who has reexamined the earlier sources, states that Abū Bakr was elected mainly because he was supported by the newly converted Meccan aristocracy. See also Rodinson, Mahomet, 327–28; Momen, Shi'i Islam, 18–20.

1290. The reference is to Abū Bakr's leading the prayer. See n. 1248 above.

Abū Bakr], or I will set the house on fire." Al-Zubayr came out with his sword drawn. As he stumbled [upon something], the sword fell from his hand, so they jumped over him and seized him.[1291]

Zakariyyā' b. Yaḥyā al-Ḍarīr—Abū 'Awānah[1292]—Dāwūd b. 'Abdallāh al-Awdī[1293]—Ḥumayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥimyarī:[1294] When the Messenger of God died, Abū Bakr was in a detached part of Medina. He came, uncovered [the Prophet's] face, and kissed him, saying, "May my father and mother be your ransom! How good you are both living and dead! [I swear] by the Lord of the Ka'bah that Muḥammad is dead." Then he went to the pulpit and found 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb standing [there], threatening the people and saying, "The Messenger of God is alive and not dead. He will [return], go out after those who spread lies about him, cut off their hands and strike their necks and crucify them." Abū Bakr asked him to be silent, but he refused to listen, so Abū Bakr spoke, saying that God had revealed to His Prophet: "Verily, you will die, and so will they. Then on the Day of Resurrection you will [1819] dispute before your Lord."[1295] [Then] he said: "Muḥammad is only a messenger; and many a messenger has gone before him. So if he dies or is killed, will you turn back on your heels? He who turns back on his heels will do no harm to God; and God will reward the grateful.[1296] He who [formerly] worshiped Muḥammad, [then] the deity whom he worshiped is dead. He who [formerly] worshiped God, Who has no associate, [then] God is alive [and] immortal." Some people from among the companions of Muḥammad, whose 1291. Although the timing of the events is not clear, it seems that 'Alī and his group came to know about the Saqīfah after what had happened there. At this point, his supporters gathered in Fāṭimah's house. Abū Bakr and 'Umar, fully aware of 'Alī's claims and fearing a serious threat from his supporters, summoned him to the mosque to swear the oath of allegiance. 'Alī refused, and so the house was surrounded by an armed band led by Abū Bakr and 'Umar, who threatened to set it on fire if 'Alī and his supporters refused to come out and swear allegiance to Abū Bakr. The scene grew violent and Fāṭimah was furious. For details, see Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 582–86; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 116; (Pseudo-) Ibn Qutaybah, al-Imāmah, I, 19–20; Ṭabarsī, Iḥtijāj, I, 108–9; Nahj al-balāghah, II, 21, 45, 46, 47, 50, 56; Jafri, Origins, 50–51; Momen, Shi'i Islam, 19.

1292. Died ca. 176/792–93. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 116–20.

1293. Ibid., III, 191.

1294. Ibid., III, 46.

1295. Qur'ān 39:31–32.

1296. Ibid., 3:144.

time we had reached, affirmed that they did not know that those two verses were revealed until Abū Bakr recited them that day.

Then, a man suddenly came running and said, "Listen to me, the Anṣār have gathered in a roofed building (ẓullah)[1297] of the Banū Sā'idah to give their oath of allegiance to one of their men. They say: Let us have a ruler from us and let Quraysh have another from them." Abū Bakr and 'Umar rushed away (as though each of them led the other) until they came to them. 'Umar wanted to speak but Abū Bakr stopped him so he said, "I will not disobey the Prophet's successor (khalīfah) twice in a day." Abū Bakr spoke and did not leave out anything that was either revealed about the Anṣār or was said by the Messenger of God with regard to their fine qualities. He said, "You know that the Messenger of God said, 'If the people took one way and the Anṣār another, I would take Anṣār's path.' O Sa'd, you know that the Messenger of God had said, while you were sitting, that Quraysh were the masters of this authority. The righteous follow their kind, and the wicked follow theirs." Sa'd replied, "You have spoken the truth. We are the viziers and you are the rulers."[1298] 'Umar said, "Stretch out your hand, O Abū Bakr, so that I may give you the oath of allegiance." Abū Bakr replied, "Nay, rather you, O 'Umar. You are stronger than I [to bear the responsibility]." 'Umar was indeed the stronger of the two. Each of them wanted the other to stretch his hand so that he could strike the bargain with him.[1299] 'Umar stretched Abū Bakr's hand saying, "My power is for you with your power," and the people gave their oath [1820] of allegiance. They demanded confirmation of the oath, but 'Alī and al-Zubayr stayed away. Al-Zubayr drew his sword (from the scabbard), saying, "I will not put it back until the oath of allegiance is rendered to 'Alī." [When] this news reached Abū Bakr and 'Umar, the latter said, "Hit him with a stone and seize the 1297. Literally, it means a thing which covers or protects one overhead as a building, or a cloud. It is a roofed building, like Saqīfah (see n. 1289 above). Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ẓ-l-l. Cf. Fahd, Divination, 136.

---

1298. Ḥubāb b. al-Mundhir replied [to Abū Bakr's speech], "No. By God, we will never accept that. Let us have a ruler from us and another from you." Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 55.

1299. Ḍaraba 'alā yadihi is an idiom meaning to strike a bargain, or to ratify the sale. When two persons were bargaining, it was a custom for one of them to put his hand upon the other's in ratifying the bargain. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ḍ-r-b.

sword."[1300] It is stated that 'Umar rushed [to the scene], brought them forcibly [while] telling them that they must give their oath of allegiance willingly, or unwillingly. So they rendered their oath of allegiance.

An Account of the Saqīfah[1301]

'Alī b. Muslim[1302]—'Abbād b. 'Abbād[1303]—'Abbād b. Rāshid[1304]—al-Zuhrī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah—Ibn 'Abbās:[1305] I used to teach 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf [how] to read the Qur'ān. 'Umar made the pilgrimage,[1306] and we did so with him. While I was waiting in a station (manzil) in Minā, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf came to me saying, "Today I saw a man[1307] who came to the Commander of the Faithful [i.e., 'Umar] and said, 'I have heard so-and-so[1308] saying: If the Commander of the Faithful is dead I would give my oath of allegiance to so-and-so,'[1309] The Commander of the Faithful said that he would get up among the people that evening and warn them against the group of people who want to usurp their power." I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, the pilgrimage brings together the riffraff and the rabble; they are the ones who will dominate over your assem-

---

1300. Zubayr was in Fāṭimah's house. See n. 1291 above; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 116; Nahj al-balāghah, II, 56–57.

1301. The following account of the Saqīfah, especially the speech of 'Umar, is analyzed and compared with other sources by Jafri, Origins, 29ff. Ṭabarī also gives another account of the Saqīfah on the authority of Abū Mikhnaf, see I, 1837–45.

1302. Died in 253/867. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 382–83.

1303. Ibid., V, 95–96.

1304. Ibid., V, 92–93.

1305. The account of Saqīfah is reported by Ibn Isḥāq, Sīrah, IV, 307–11, on the following chain of authorities: 'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr—al-Zuhrī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh—Ibn 'Abbās.

1306. During the last pilgrimage made by 'Umar: Ibn Isḥāq.

1307. Ibn Isḥāq: I wish you could have seen a man.

1308. According to Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 581, this was Zubayr, and the person whom he wanted to hail as caliph was 'Alī. Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, on the other hand, reports that the person who said it, according to al-Jāḥiẓ, was 'Ammār b. Yāsir or, according to ahl al-ḥadīth, Ṭalḥah; but the person they wanted to hail as caliph was 'Alī. It was thus 'Alī's name that made 'Umar disturbed and caused him to deliver a fiery speech.

1309. Ibn Isḥāq adds: By God, the oath of allegiance given to Abū Bakr was nothing but a faltah [an event that happened without consideration], which was ratified [later]. 'Umar became angry and said. . . .

bly.[1310] I am afraid lest you should say something today which they might neither heed, nor remember, nor put it in its context and spread it everywhere; so wait until you[1311] come to Medina [which is][1312] the place of refuge [dār al-hijrah] and a seat of the sunnah. [There] you can confer privately with the Messenger of God's companions,[1313] both the Emigrants and the Anṣār. You [1821] can say what you will with firmness, they will retain your words and interpret them properly." He replied, "By God, I will do it at the first opportunity which I get in Medina."

After we arrived in Medina,[1314] I journeyed on Friday at midday [to listen to] the report which ʿAbd al-Raḥmān had narrated to me. I found that Saʿīd b. Zayd had already preceded me [to the mosque],[1315] so I sat at his side near the pulpit, my knee to his knee. Immediately after the sun had declined, ʿUmar came. As he was coming I said to Saʿīd, "The Commander of the Faithful will say something today from this pulpit which he has not said[1316] before." Saʿīd became angry, retorting,[1317] "What is he going to say that he has not said before?" When ʿUmar sat in the pulpit, the muezzin[1318] called to prayer. After the muezzin had finished his call to prayer, ʿUmar stood up. He praised God, extolled Him and said, "Now then: I want to say something which has been decreed that I should say.[1319] He who takes heed of it, understands it and will remember it. Let him relate it wherever he goes, [but] he who takes no heed of it, I do not permit him to lie [to someone that I did not say it]. God sent Muḥammad with truth and revealed the Book to him. The verse concerning the stoning [of adulterers] was among [the verses] which were revealed to him.[1320] The Messenger of God stoned [adulterers], and we 1310. Your proximity: Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq.

---

1311. Kos: We.

1312. Addition from Ibn Isḥāq.

1313. Ibn Isḥāq: With the people of knowledge (ahl al-fiqh) and the nobles.

1314. Ibn Isḥāq: We arrived in Medina toward the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah.

1315. Ibn Isḥāq: I found Saʿīd b. Zayd b. ʿAmr b. Nufayl sitting in the corner of the pulpit.

1316. Ibn Isḥāq: Since he succeeded [to the caliphate].

1317. Ibn Isḥāq: Saʿīd was annoyed at me and said, "What may he perhaps say that he has not said before?"

1318. As in Kos. Text: Muezzins. It seems that with the increasing population of Medina, especially since ʿUthmān's caliphate, more than one muezzin were employed. Cf. Ibn Shabbah, Taʾrīkh, III, 958ff.

1319. Ibn Isḥāq adds: I do not know, perhaps my appointed time (ajal) is close.

1320. Ibn Isḥāq adds: We read it; it was taught to us, and we heeded it.

stoned them after him. I am afraid that as time becomes prolonged some people might say that they do not find stoning in God's Book, and [thereby] they might go astray by forsaking an obligatory act (farīḍah) revealed by God.[1321] We used to say:[1322] 'Do not detest your ancestors for it is infidelity to do so.'[1323]

"It has reached me that someone[1324] of you said, 'If the Commander of the Faithful[1325] is dead, I will give the oath of alle-

---

1321. Ibn Isḥāq adds: Stoning in the Book of God is a penalty laid on married men and women who commit adultery, if evidence stands, or confession is made, or [it] results in pregnancy.

The alleged verse about stoning read: "Do not detest your ancestors, for it is infidelity to do so. If an adult man (al-shaykh) or woman (al-shaykhah) commit adultery, stone them without exception as a chastisement from God. God is Mighty and Wise." It is suggested that this verse was a part of the Qur'ān, and that it originally belonged to sūrah 33, but was later abrogated. See Nöldeke, Geschichte, I, 248–52, where older sources are cited. Schacht doubts that the verse is genuine and states that the traditions relating to it and the mention of 'Umar are clearly tendentious. He suggests that stoning was introduced from Jewish law. EI[1], s.v. Zinā'.

Burton (Collection of the Qur'ān, 72–86, 134ff.) contends that the ḥadīth about the stoning penalty for adultery and the stoning verse, classified in the third category of naskh (i.e., naskh al-tilāwah dūna al-ḥukm, the suppression of a Qur'ānic verse without prejudice, however, to the continuing validity of its ruling for legal purposes), were most probably fashioned by the dictates of Islamic legal science, uṣūl al-fiqh. He further contends that the latter has also shaped Islamic accounts of the history of the collection of the Qur'ānic texts, in which the Prophet is said to have been deliberately excluded from the task of collecting revelations because naskh (withdrawal) was a possibility as long as he lived.

In the Qur'ān 24:2, scourging is prescribed as a punishment for adultery. It states: "Flog both the adulterous woman and the adulterous man with a hundred lashes, and do not let any pity for either of them deter you from [complying with] God's law, if you believe in God and the Last Day." Both the flogging and stoning remained as a punishment combined with a year's banishment. In some traditions and the system of law, stoning and flogging are separated as punishment (ḥadd) for adultery in two categories of criminals, whether they are muḥṣan (an adult in possession of his faculties, who is free and has had sexual intercourse in a legal marriage) or not. Generally, the non-muḥṣan is flogged, while the muḥṣan is flogged and then stoned, or stoned.

Wāqidī, Maghāzī, II, 439–40, 712–13; III, 1115, states that the Prophet prohibited a man long absent from his home to come to his family at night. One of his followers disobeyed his command and returned to his family, and discovered a man with his wife. The cases mentioned by Wāqidī do not suggest that the parties involved were stoned. See also Qur'ān 4:15, 25; Ṭabarī, above, I, 1754, n. 772.

1322. Ibn Isḥāq: We used to read in what we read from the Book of God.

1323. Ibn Isḥāq adds: Indeed, the Messenger of God said, "Do not praise me lavishly as Jesus, son of Mary, was praised, and say: The servant of God and His messenger."

1324. Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 581): Al-Zubayr.

1325. Ibn Isḥāq: If 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. Cf. Balādhurī.

[1822] giance to so-and-so.'[1326] Let a man not deceive himself by saying that the oath of allegiance given to Abū Bakr was an event that happened without consideration (faltah).[1327] Admittedly it was so, but God averted its evil. There is none among you like Abū Bakr to whom people would have submitted.[1328] It is our information that when God took His prophet, 'Alī, al-Zubayr, and those who were with them stayed away from us in the house of Fāṭimah;[1329] the Anṣār, all of them, stayed away from us;[1330] and the Muhājirūn gathered round Abū Bakr. I told him that we should go to our brothers the Anṣār, so we rushed off, making for them. Two pious fellows[1331] who had been present at Badr met us,[1332] asking where we were going. When we told them that we were going to our brothers the Anṣār, they asked us to go back[1333] and to decide our affair among ourselves. We replied, 'By God, we will go to them.' We came to them as they had gathered in the hall of the Banū Sā'idah. In their midst was a man enwrapped in a cloak. When I asked who he was and what was his position, they said that he was Sa'd b. 'Ubādah and that he was ill.[1334] Then, a man from them stood up.[1335] After he had praised God he said, 'We are the Helpers[1336] (al-Anṣār) and the squadron of Islam, while you, O men of Quraysh,[1337] are a family of our Prophet[1338]

1326. Balādhurī: We will give the oath of allegiance to 'Alī. Indeed, the oath of allegiance given to Abū Bakr was a faltah. (Faltah means a sudden, unexpected event without deliberation. See Nahj al-balāghah, II, 26; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. f-l-t.)

1327. Ibn Isḥāq adds: But it was ratified.

1328. Ibn Isḥāq adds: An oath of allegiance rendered by an individual to a man without consulting the Muslims has no validity for either of them; both are in danger of being killed [i.e., subject to the death penalty].

1329. See above, n. 1291.

1330. Ibn Isḥāq: The Anṣār opposed us and gathered with their nobles in the Saqīfah of the Banū Sā'idah.

1331. For their names, see Ṭabarī, below, I, 1824.

1332. Ibn Isḥāq adds: Telling us what [their] people had decided.

1333. Ibn Isḥāq: They said that there was no need for them to approach [the Anṣār], and they should decide their affair [among themselves].

1334. For his speech and as to what was transpiring in that gathering, see Ṭabarī, below, I, 1837–39.

1335. Ibn Isḥāq: After we had sat down, their speaker [stood up] pronouncing the shahādah. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 113, he was Thābit b. Qays b. Shammās.

1336. Ibn Isḥāq: The Helpers of God.

1337. Ibn Isḥāq: O Muhājirūn.

1338. Ibn Isḥāq: Family of ours.

who have come to us journeying leisurely in search of herbage and sustenance.' ['Umar] said: When I saw that they wanted to cut us off from our root and wrest authority from us,[1339] I wanted to make a speech which I had composed in my mind.[1340] As I used to treat Abū Bakr with gentle courtesy to some extent, [and considered] him more sober and gentler[1341] than me, I conferred with him about [the speech]. When I wanted to speak he said, 'Gently!' so I did not like to disobey[1342] him. He stood up, praised God, extolled Him and did not leave anything [from his speech], which I myself had composed in my [own] mind if I had spoken, but that he expressed it, or [expressed it] in a better way [than I would have done]. [1823]

"He said: 'Now then: O men of the Anṣār, you deserve all the fine qualities that you have mentioned about yourselves, but the Arabs will not recognize this authority except in this clan of Quraysh, for they represent the best in lineage and standing.[1343] I am pleased [to offer] you one of these two men; render your oath of allegiance to any one of them you like.' [Thus saying,] he took hold of my hand and that of Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ.[1344] By 1339. Ibn Isḥāq adds: After [their speaker] had finished, I wanted to speak.

---

1340. Ibn Isḥāq adds: Which pleased me.

1341. Hisch.: Knowledgeable.

1342. Hisch., Kos, and Ibn Isḥāq: To make him angry.

1343. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 582, cites the speech of Abū Bakr which shows how he argued against the Anṣār. He states: "We are the first people to accept Islam. We are in the center among the Muslims with respect to our position, and we are the noblest with respect to our lineage, and we are the nearest to the Messenger of God in relationship. You are our brethren in Islam and our partners in religion .... The Arabs will not submit themselves except to this clan of Quraysh. .... You had better not compete against your Muhājirūn brethren for what God has decreed for them."

1344. Ibn Isḥāq adds: Who was sitting between us. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 113–14, adds: Both of them declined and said, "By God, we cannot take precedence over you while you are the companion of the Messenger of God and the second of the two [in the cave at the time of the hijrah]." Abū 'Ubaydah put his hand upon Abū Bakr's hand and 'Umar did the same [in ratifying their bargain]. The Meccans who were with them did the same. Then Abū 'Ubaydah cried, "O people of the Anṣār, you were the first to help [the Prophet] so do not be the first to change and convert [back to paganism]." Next, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf stood up and said, "O people of the Anṣār, although you have the merits, you do not have among you [anyone] like Abū Bakr, 'Umar, and 'Alī." [Thereupon] Mundhir b. al-Arqam stood up saying, "We do not deny the merits of those you have mentioned. Indeed, there is among God, I liked everything he said except the last words. I would have preferred myself to be sent forward and my head struck off—if it were not considered a sin—rather than to be appointed a ruler over a people of whom Abū Bakr was one.

"After Abū Bakr had finished his speech, a man from the Anṣār[1345] stood up saying, 'I am their much-rubbed little rubbing post and their little palm tree loaded with fruit.[1346] Let us have a ruler from us and another from you, O men of Quraysh.' ['Umar] said,[1347] "Voices rose and clamorous speech waxed hotter. I feared [total] disagreement so I said to Abū Bakr, 'Stretch out your hand [so that] I may give you the oath of allegiance.' He did so and I gave [him] the oath of allegiance; the Muhājirūn followed and then the Anṣār. [In so doing] we jumped on Sa'd b. 'Ubādah so someone said that we had killed him. I said, '[May] God kill him!'[1348] By God, nothing was mightier than the rendering of the oath of allegiance to Abū Bakr. We feared that if [we] left [without rendering the oath of allegiance], no agreement would be hammered out later. It was either to follow the Anṣār in what we did not like, or else to oppose them, which would have led to disorder (fasād)."

[1824] Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī—'Urwah b. al-Zubayr: One of the two men from the Anṣār whom Abū Bakr and 'Umar met on their way to the Saqīfah was 'Uwaym b. Sā'idah, whilst the other was Ma'n b. 'Adī, a brother of the Banū you a person with whom, if he seeks this authority, none will dispute [i.e., 'Alī]." It seems that at this stage Ḥubāb b. Mundhir al-Anṣārī proposed a compromise solution as stated by 'Umar.

---

1345. He was al-Ḥubāb b. Mundhir. Ṭabarī, I, 1840, 1844; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 581–82, 584; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, al-Istī'āb, I, 316.

1346. It means: I am one of those by means of whose counsel people seek relief, like the mangy camels seek relief from their mange by rubbing themselves against the post. Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, I, 47–48; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. j-dh-l.

1347. Ṭabarī, I, 1841, records 'Umar's reply to Ḥubāb's proposal as follows: How preposterous! Two [swords] cannot be accommodated in one sheath. By God, the Arabs will never accept your rule, since their Prophet is not from you, but they will not reject the rule of one from whom is their Prophet. If anyone refuses our authority, we will [produce] a clear rebuttal and an evident proof. Who would dispute us with regard to Muḥammad's authority and rule except the falsely guided one, or the erring one, or the damned one, when we are his close associates and kinsfolk? Cf. also Nahj al-balāghah, II, 52–53.

1348. What follows is omitted from Ibn Isḥāq.

al-ʿIjlān. As for ʿUwaym b. Sāʿidah, we have heard that when the Messenger of God was asked who were the people about whom God said: "Therein [i.e., in a mosque] are men who love to be purified; and God loves those who purify themselves,"[1349] he replied that the best of them was ʿUwaym b. Sāʿidah. As for Maʿn, it has reached us that when people wept over the Messenger of God's death and said that they wished that they had died before him because they feared that they would be subjected to temptations after him, he said, "By God, I do not wish to die before him, so that I can bear witness to his truth when he is dead, as I did when he was alive." Maʿn was killed in the battle of al-Yamāmah, the battle against Musaylimah, the arch-liar, as a martyr during Abū Bakr's caliphate.

ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿīd al-Zuhrī—his uncle Yaʿqūb b. Ibrāhīm—Sayf b. ʿUmar—al-Walīd b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Ẓaybah al-Bajalī—al-Walīd b. Jumayʿ al-Zuhrī: ʿAmr b. Ḥurayth asked Saʿīd b. Zayd, "Were you present at [the time of] the Messenger of God's death?" "Yes," he replied. ʿAmr asked, "When was the oath of allegiance given to Abū Bakr?" "The [very] day the Messenger of God died," he replied. "People disliked to be left [even] part of the day without being [organized] into a community (jamāʿah)." ʿAmr asked, "Did anyone oppose him?" "No [one] except an apostate (murtadd), or the one who was about to apostatize," he replied. "It was because God rescued them from the Anṣār." ʿAmr asked, 'Did anyone from the Muhājirūn stay away?' "No, they followed [1825] one another to give their oath of allegiance without being summoned," he replied.

ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿīd [al-Zuhrī]—his uncle [Yaʿqūb]—Sayf [b. ʿUmar]—ʿAbd al-ʿAziz b. Siyāh[1350]—Ḥabīb b. Abī Thābit:[1351] ʿAlī was in his house when he was approached and was told that Abū Bakr had sat to receive the oath of allegiance. He went out immediately in the shirt [worn beneath the clothes] he was wearing without the waist-wrapper, or the outer wrapping garment, out of dislike that he might be late. He gave the oath of allegiance,[1352] sat with Abū Bakr, and sent for his clothes. When [the clothes] were brought he put them on and stayed in [Abū Bakr's] assembly.

1349. Qur'ān 9:108.
1350. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 340–41.
1351. Died in 119/737. Ibid., II, 178–80.

Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Ḍirārī—'Abd al-Razzāq b. Hammām[1353]—Ma'mar[1354]—al-Zuhrī—'Urwah—'Ā'ishah: Fāṭimah and al-'Abbās came to Abū Bakr demanding their [share of] inheritance of the Messenger of God. They were demanding the Messenger of God's land in Fadak and his share of Khaybar['s tribute].[1355] Abū Bakr replied, "I have heard the Messenger of God say: 'Our [i.e., the prophets' property] cannot be inherited and whatever we leave behind is alms [i.e., to be given in charity]. The family of Muḥammad will eat from it.'[1356] By God, I will not abandon a course which I saw the Messenger of God practicing, but will continue doing it accordingly." Fāṭimah shunned him and did not speak to him about it until she died. 'Alī buried her at night and did not permit Abū Bakr to attend [her burial].[1357] While Fāṭimah was alive, 'Alī held respect among the people. After she died, their 1352. A close scrutiny of the early sources suggests that 'Alī refused to swear allegiance to Abū Bakr for six months, that is, for as long as Fāṭimah was alive. After her death and with the eruption of rebellion among the Arab tribes, 'Alī might have been compelled to become reconciled with Abū Bakr. Jafri, Origins, 59; Momen, Shi'i Islam, 20.

---

1353. Died in 211/826–27. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 310–15.

1354. Ma'mar b. Rāshid al-Azdī died ca. 152/769. Ibid., X, 243–46.

1355. Fadak was allocated to Muḥammad, because it had been acquired by treaty. The inhabitants, according to the treaty, were to remain there while giving up half their lands and half the produce. Fāṭimah maintained that Fadak, like Muḥammad's fifth share (khums) of the produce from Khaybar, should come to her as her father's heiress. This question of inheritance soon became one of the most debated issues in the conflict between the Shī'īs and the Sunnīs. For its subsequent history, see *EI*², s.v. Fadak. See also Ṭabarī, above, I, 1759, n. 825.

1356. Tabrīzī, Mishkāt, III, 209; Mishkat (trans. Robson), II, 1310; transmitted by both Bukhārī and Muslim. The Shī'īs refute this tradition, saying that it contradicts the Qur'ānic teachings on family inheritance.

It was the first and most important step taken by both Abū Bakr and 'Umar in their attempts to displace the Banū Hāshim, and especially 'Alī, from their prerogatives in the leadership of the Muslim polity. Acceptance of this claim of inheritance based on family ties would have opened the door widely to 'Alī's right to the succession. Moreover, the income from both these sources was considerable, and it would have given some leverage to 'Alī. Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, I, 176–218; Jafri, Origins, 14–16, 63. For Fāṭimah's reply and refutation, see Ṭabarsī, Iḥtijāj, I, 119–49.

1357. Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, I, 196–97; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 29; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 117; Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 250.

attention turned away from him.[1358] Fāṭimah continued to live for six months after the Messenger of God's [death] and then died.

Ma'mar: A man asked al-Zuhrī, "Did 'Alī not give his oath of allegiance for six months?" "No, nor anyone of the Banū Hāshim until 'Alī rendered his," he replied.[1359] When 'Alī saw that the people's attention had turned away from him, he begged for reconciliation with Abū Bakr. He sent to the latter, [asking him] to visit him, and [requesting] that nobody should accompany him. 'Alī disliked that 'Umar should come with Abū Bakr, for he knew 'Umar's rudeness. 'Umar said [to Abū Bakr], "Don't go alone." Abū Bakr replied, "By God, I will go alone. It is not possible that [the Banū Hāshim] might do anything to me," and he went. He entered into 'Alī's presence while the Banū Hāshim had gathered with him. 'Alī stood up, praised God and extolled Him with what is due to Him. Then he said, "It is neither the denial of your good qualities nor the rivalry of good, which God has given you, that prevented us from giving you the oath of allegiance, but the fact that we considered that we have a right in this authority which you have monopolized." 'Alī then mentioned his relationship with the Messenger of God and the rights of the Banū Hāshim. He continued speaking until Abū Bakr wept. After 'Alī stopped, Abū Bakr pronounced the shahādah, praised God, extolled Him with what is due to Him, then said, "By God, the relationship of the Messenger of God is dearer to me [too]. I reach [him] through my relationship [to him]. By God, I did not fall short of doing what was requisite with regard to this property [i.e., the Prophet's inheritance], which became [a dispute] between you and me except for good. I had heard the Messenger of God saying: 'Our [i.e., the prophets' property] cannot be inherited and whatever we leave behind is alms [i.e., to be given in charity]. The family of Muḥammad will eat from it.' God forbid that I should recall a thing which the Messenger of God did without doing it, God willing!" 'Alī said that he would render the oath of allegiance that evening. After Abū Bakr had prayed the noon prayers, he approached the people and excused 'Alī with his apology. 'Alī stood up, lauded the right [1826] 1358. Nahj al-balāghah, II, 22; also reported by Bukhārī and Muslim.

1359. Most of the authorities state that 'Alī did not render his oath of allegiance until after Fāṭimah's death. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 116; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, II, 308; Nahj al-balāghah, II, 22.

of Abū Bakr by mentioning his fine qualities and his precedence and went to him, giving the oath of allegiance. The people came [1827] to ʿAlī saying that he had done the right thing.[1360] ʿĀ'ishah said: The people got close to ʿAlī when he came close to what was right [i.e., in rendering his oath of allegiance to Abū Bakr].

Muḥammad b. ʿUthmān b. Ṣafwān al-Thaqafī[1361]—Abū Qutaybah[1362]—Mālik (that is Ibn Mighwal)—Ibn al-Jarr: Abū Sufyān[1363] said to ʿAlī, "What is the matter, that this authority had been vested in a least-known clan of Quraysh?[1364] By God, if you wish, I will fill [the whole space] with men and horses." ʿAlī replied, "O Abū Sufyān, for a long time you have been at war with Islam and the Muslims, but you have been unable to do any harm. We find Abū Bakr worthy of this authority."[1365]

Muḥammad b. ʿUthmān al-Thaqafī—Umayyah b. Khālid[1366]—Ḥammād b. Salamah[1367]—Thābit:[1368] When Abū Bakr succeeded [the Prophet], Abū Sufyān said, "What has Abū Faṣīl[1369] to do with us? Indeed, the authority belongs to the Banū ʿAbd Manāf."[1370] [When his son Yazīd became the governor], it was said to 1360. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 586. This report is on the authority of ʿĀ'ishah.

---

1361. Died ca. 252/866. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 337–38.

1362. Died ca. 200/815–16. Ibid., IV, 133–34.

1363. Some reports state that, being appointed by the Prophet as his agent over Najrān, he was not present in Medina when the Prophet died. Wāqidī, on the other hand, affirms that he was in Medina. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 529, 589.

1364. Abū Bakr came from the inconspicuous clan of Taym, which was never a major factor in the power struggle among the rival clans of Quraysh. Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 4–8, 16–20.

1365. ʿAlī probably declined Abū Sufyān's offer of support because it would have destroyed the nascent Islamic polity. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 588; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 116; Nahj al-balāghah, II, 44–45; Momen, Shiʿi Islam, 19–20.

1366. Died ca. 200/815–16. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 370–71.

1367. Died in 167/783–84. Ibid., XI, 11–16.

1368. Thābit b. Aslam al-Banānī died ca. 127/744–45. Ibid., II, 2–4.

1369. Literally, it means a young camel when weaned from her mother. Here it implies that the clan to which Abū Bakr belonged was not a distinguished clan of Quraysh.

1370. Quṣayy, the great ancestor of Muḥammad, is regarded as the founder of the city of Mecca as distinct from a mere encampment around the sanctuary of the Kaʿbah. He was the effective ruler of Mecca during his lifetime and also became the master of the Kaʿbah holding all the important offices, such as sidānah (guardianship), rifādah (feeding), and siqāyah (providing water). His descendants ʿAbd al-Dār inherited much of his power, but in the course of time the family was split and challenged by ʿAbd Manāf. It nearly led to fighting, but a compromise was reached whereby ʿAbd al-Dār retained nominal privileges and ʿAbd Manāf was him, "Your son has been entrusted with the authority," and he replied, "He made close his ties of kinship by behaving with kindness."[1371]

Hishām—'Awānah: When people gathered to give their oath of allegiance to Abū Bakr, Abū Sufyān came while at the same time saying, "By God, I see a cloud of smoke ('ajājah),[1372] which nothing but blood will clear. O family of 'Abd Manāf, where is Abū Bakr that he should be the master of your affairs! Where are 'Alī and al-'Abbās, the two weak (mustaḍ'afān)[1373] and lowly ones (adhillān)?" He [then] said [to 'Alī], "O Abū Ḥasan, stretch out your hand so that I may give you the oath of allegiance," but 'Alī declined, so he began to cite appositely the proverbial verses of al-Mutalammis:

No one remains in a state of ignominy that is intended for him, except the two despicable things: a domestic ass and a wooden peg [of a tent].[1374]
The former is turned back to his state of ignominy by a piece of worn-out rope, while the latter's head is broken and no one mourns.

'Alī rebuked him, saying, "By God, you do not intend anything [1828] but [to stir up] dissension (fitnah). For long you have desired evil for Islam. We do not need your advice."

---

given the substance of power. Both the Hāshimites and the Umayyads were branches of 'Abd Manāf. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah I, 130ff.; Guillaume, Life, 52ff.; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 48ff.; Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, I, 103ff.; Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 5, 7, 30; Rodinson, Mahomet, 62–64; Ḥamīdullāh, "al-Īlāf"; Cook, Muhammad, 12–13.

1371. Abū Sufyān is said to have made the same remark when 'Umar appointed Mu'āwiyah as the governor of Syria after the death of Yazīd. Ibn Shabbah, Ta'rīkh, III, 837.

1372. It also means low, ignoble people. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. 'a-j-j.

1373. Both the terms (the weak and lowly) are used here sarcastically. Mustaḍ'af means literally "one who is deemed weak." It occurs in the Qur'ān 4:75, 97–98, 127; 8:26, in the sense of "oppressed." Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 156ff., 197, lists a group of early converts under the title al-Mustaḍ'afūn, that is, those who were clanless and without protection. The term was thus used for poorly defended lower classes. Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 339; Guillaume, Life, 143; Serjeant, "Translation," 11; Rodinson, Mahomet, 128–29; Cook, Muhammad, 51–52.

1374. The proverbs state: "More vile than a wooden peg in a plain," "More vile than the ass," "More vile than a chained donkey." Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, I, 511–12, 516; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. w-t-d, '-y-r.

Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Muḥammad al-Qurashī: When the oath of allegiance was rendered to Abū Bakr, Abū Sufyān said to ʿAlī and al-ʿAbbās, "You are two despicable ones," and began reciting the [following] proverbial verses:

A domestic ass knows the disgrace, but a free man and a well-built camel, soft in the joints, detest it.
No one bears an unjust state that is intended for him, except the two despicable things: a domestic ass and a wooden peg.
The former is turned back to his state of ignominy by a piece of worn-out rope, while the latter's head is broken and no one mourns.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī—Anas b. Mālik: The following day after Abū Bakr was given the oath of allegiance in the Saqīfah, he sat in the pulpit. ʿUmar stood up and spoke before him. After praising God and extolling Him with what is due to Him, he said, "O people, yesterday I said something to you that[1375] was based on my own opinion. I neither found it in God's book[1376] nor was it something by which the Messenger of God had enjoined me;[1377] but I thought[1378] that the Messenger of God would conduct our affairs until he was the last of us [alive]. God has left His book, by which He guided His Messenger, with you. If you hold fast to it God will guide [you] as He guided him. God has vested your affairs in the hands of the best one among you, the companion of the Messenger of God, 'the second of the two when both of them were in the cave,'[1379] so arise and give [him][1380] the oath of allegiance." The people gave 1375. That . . . opinion: Omitted from Ibn Isḥāq. Ibn Saʿd (Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 56): That was not [correct] as I said.

1376. Ibn Saʿd: The Book revealed by God.

1377. C: Us.

1378. Ibn Saʿd: But I had hoped that the Messenger of God would live [as] he had said, and that he would be the last of us [alive]. God chose for His messenger that which was with Him rather than that which was with you. Hold fast to this book, by which God guided your messenger, and you will be guided as the Messenger of God was guided.

1379. Qurʾān 9:40.

1380. Addition from Hisch.

Abū Bakr their oath of allegiance in public after the one rendered in the Saqīfah. [1829]

Then Abū Bakr spoke. After praising God and extolling Him with what is due to Him, he said, "Now then: O people, I have been put in charge of you although I am not the best of you. Help me if I do well; rectify me if I do wrong. Truthfulness is loyalty and falsehood is disloyalty. The weak among you shall be strong in my eyes until I ensure his right, God willing; and the strong among you shall be weak in my eyes until I wrest the right from him, God willing. No one from you should refrain from fighting in the cause of God, because if it is forsaken by a people, God will smite them with disgrace.[1381] Foul things never become widespread in a people but God brings calamity upon them. Obey me as long as I obey God and His Messenger; if I disobey them, you are not bound to obey me. Perform your prayers. May God have mercy on you!"

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ḥusayn b. 'Abdallāh[1382]—'Ikrimah—Ibn 'Abdallāh: I was walking with 'Umar during his caliphate while he set about some business of his. He had a whip in his hand, and we were alone. As he was talking to himself he swished the outer side of his leg with his whip. Turning to me he said, "Do you know, O Ibn 'Abbās, what prompted me to speak[1383] as I did when the Messenger of God died?" "No, I do not know, O Commander of the Faithful," I replied. "You know it better." He said, "By God, nothing prompted[1384] me [to utter those words] but that I used to read the following verse: 'We have set you up as a moderate nation so that you may act as witness for mankind, as the Messenger is a witness for you.'[1385] By God, I thought that the Messenger of God would remain among his people until he could witness for them to their last deeds. That was what prompted me to say what I said."[1386] [1830]

1381. Hisch., C, and Ibn Isḥāq: If a people refrain from fighting in the cause of God, God will smite them with disgrace. See also Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 590–91.

1382. Ḥusayn b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās died ca. 140/757–58. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 341–42.

1383. As in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 568). Text: Speak this.

1384. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: What prompted me was that.

1385. Qur'ān 2:143.

1386. During one of the conversations between 'Umar and Ibn 'Abbās, the former said, "What prevented 'Alī from coming out with us?" Ibn 'Abbās replied, "I

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]: After the oath of allegiance was rendered to Abū Bakr, people came to prepare the Messenger of God's burial. Some [of the authorities] state that the burial took place on Tuesday, that is, the following day of the Messenger of God's death, while the others state that he was buried three days after his death. The report of some of those authorities has already preceded.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr, Kathīr b. 'Abdallāh,[1387] and others who relate from 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās: 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, al-Faḍl b. al-'Abbās, Qutham b. al-'Abbās, Usāmah b. Zayd, and Shuqrān, freedman of the Messenger of God, were the ones who took charge of the washing of the Prophet. Aws b. Khawlī, one[1388] of the Banū 'Awf b. al-Khazraj, said to 'Alī, "I adjure you by God, O 'Alī, [where is] our share in regard to the Messenger of God?" Aws was one [of the companions of the Messenger of God][1389] who had participated in Badr. 'Alī allowed him to enter, so he came in[1390] and was present at the Messenger of God's washing. 'Alī made the Prophet's body to rest upon his breast and 'Abbās, al-Faḍl, and Qutham turned him over along with 'Alī. Usāmah and Shuqrān were the ones who poured water [over him],[1391] while 'Alī washed him, having rested him against [1831] his breast. The shirt was still on the Prophet's body; 'Alī rubbed him from the outside without touching the Messenger of God's do not know." 'Umar said, "O son of 'Abbās, your father is an uncle of the Messenger of God and you are [the Prophet's] cousin, so what prevented the Quraysh [from supporting] you?" Ibn 'Abbās answered, "I do not know." Then 'Umar said, "But, I know, they dislike your authority." Ibn 'Abbās replied, "[But] why? We are [always] good to them." 'Umar added, "O God, pardon me! They did not like having both the prophethood and the caliphate combined in your family, which would have made you proud and arrogant." This conversation not only reveals 'Umar's attitude toward 'Alī but also clearly indicates that he was aware of the importance of the idea of inherited sanctity. On another occasion, the same subject is discussed between the two, but the second dialogue is more intense and lively. When Ibn 'Abbās answers back, 'Umar loses his temper. See Ṭabarī, I, 2769–71.

---

1387. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 421–23.

1388. C: Brother.

1389. Addition from Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq.

1390. And sat down: Addition in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Balādhurī (Ansāb, I, 569).

1391. Addition from Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq.

[body directly] with his hands while he was saying, "With my father may you be ransomed, and with my mother! How excellent you are in life and in death!"[1392] The Messenger of God's body did not look like what an ordinary corpse would look like.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Yaḥyā b. ʿAbbād—his father ʿAbbād [b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr]—ʿĀ'ishah: When they wanted to wash the Prophet, they disagreed about it, saying that they did not know whether they should remove his clothes as they do with their dead, or wash him with his clothes on. When they disagreed, slumber overtook them[1393] so that everyone's chin was sunk on his chest. Then a speaker—it is not known[1394] who he was—spoke from a corner of the house: "Wash the Prophet with his clothes on." They got up and washed the Messenger of God with his shirt on, pouring water on the shirt, and rubbing him with the shirt. ʿĀ'ishah used to say, "Had I known regarding my duty at the beginning what I knew at the end, none but his wives would have washed him."[1395]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn—his father [Muḥammad al-Bāqir]—his [father] ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn. Ibn Isḥāq states that he has [also] received this account on the authority of al-Zuhrī—ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn: After the Messenger of God was washed, he was shrouded in three garments: two of Ṣuḥār[1396] make and [the other] a striped cloak (burd[in] ḥibarat[un]),[1397] one wrapped over the other.[1398]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ḥusayn b. ʿAbdallāh—ʿIkrimah, freedman of Ibn ʿAbbās—ʿAbdallāh b. [1832]
ʿAbbās: Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ and Abū Ṭalḥah Zayd b. Sahl

---

1392. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 60–63; Lings, Muhammad, 344.

1393. Ibn Isḥāq: God cast a [deep] sleep upon them.

1394. Ibn Isḥāq: None knowing.

1395. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 59–60; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 569–70. This sentence is omitted from Ibn Isḥāq.

1396. A seaport on the coast of ʿUmān known for its textile industry. EI[1], s.v. Ṣuḥār. Lane (Lexicon, s.v. ṣ-ḥ-r), states that it is a kind of garment made in Ṣuḥār, a town in Yemen. Wāqidī, Maghāzī, III, 1090, states that on the Farewell Pilgrimage the Prophet made his iḥrām in two Ṣuḥārī garments. Other texts, such as Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 571, state that he was dressed in three Saḥūlī garments instead of Ṣuḥārī ones. Saḥūl is a town in Yemen, still known for its clothes. See Bakrī, Muʿjam, III, 727; Serjeant, "Translation," 10.

1397. A kind of garment made in Yemen. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ḥ-b-r.

1398. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 63–67; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 572.

were the two men [in Medina][1399] [who used to dig graves]. The former used to dig [graves] as the Meccans dig them, while the latter, who used to dig for the Medinans, used to make a niche in them. When they decided to dig [a grave] for the Messenger of God, al-ʿAbbās called two men, told one of them to go to Abū ʿUbaydah and the other to go to Abū Ṭalḥah, [saying], "O God, choose for your[1400] messenger." The one who had been sent for Abū Ṭalḥah found him and brought him, so he dug the grave with the niche for the Messenger of God.

After the preparations for the Messenger of God's burial had been completed on Tuesday, he was laid upon his bed in his house. The Muslims had disagreed about the place of his burial. Some said that they should bury him in his mosque while the others said that [they should bury him][1401] with his companions.[1402] Abū Bakr said, "I have heard the Messenger of God saying that no prophet died but he was buried where he died," so the bed on which he died was removed, and a grave was dug beneath it.[1403] [Then] the people passed by the Messenger of God praying over him in groups, first the men, then the women, then the children, and[1404] [finally] the slaves. No one led the people in prayers over him. The Messenger of God was buried in the middle of the night of Wednesday.[1405]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Fāṭimah bt. Muḥammad b. ʿUmārah, wife of ʿAbdallāh (that is, the son of Abū Bakr)—ʿAmrah bt. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saʿd b. Zurārah—ʿĀ'ishah, [1833] Mother of the Faithful: We did not know of the Messenger of God's burial until we heard the sound of the pickaxes (or mattocks) in the middle of the night of Wednesday.[1406]

1399. Addition from Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 74.

1400. Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq: The Messenger of God.

1401. As in Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq and Ibn Saʿd (Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 71). Text: He should be buried.

1402. Ibn Saʿd adds: In al-Baqīʿ [cemetery]. For further details, see idem, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 70–72.

1403. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 573.

1404. It is omitted from Hisch., Ibn Isḥāq, and Ibn Saʿd (Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 68–70).

1405. Some traditions state that he was buried on Tuesday. Ibid., 78–79.

1406. Probably because of this report, Rodinson, Mahomet, 328–29, thinks that the Prophet was buried by his family the same night in the house of ʿĀ'ishah. The reason for their hurried action was to avoid any ceremony in which Abū Bakr, leading the funeral rites, might appear as the Messenger of God's appointed successor.

Ibn Isḥāq states: Those who descended into the Messenger of God's grave were ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, al-Faḍl b. al-ʿAbbās, Qutham b. al-ʿAbbās, and Shuqrān, freedman of the Messenger of God. Aws b. Khawlī implored ʿAlī in the name of God, asking for his share regarding the Messenger of God. ʿAlī permitted him to descend [into the grave] with the others.[1407] After the Messenger of God was laid in his grave and the earth was laid over him, Shuqrān, the Messenger of God's freedman, took a garment which the Messenger of God used to wear and spread out [for sitting], and tossed it[1408] in the grave saying, "By God, no one shall ever wear it after you," so it was buried with the Messenger of God.

Ibn Isḥāq states: Al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah used to claim that he was the last man to be with the Messenger of God. He used to say, "I took my ring, threw it in the grave and said, my ring has fallen. I threw it intentionally so that I might touch the Messenger of God and be the last person to be with him."[1409]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—his father Isḥāq b. Yasār—Miqsam, Abū al-Qāsim, freedman of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Nawfal—his master ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith:[1410] I made a lesser pilgrimage with ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib during the [caliphate] of ʿUmar or ʿUthmān. ʿAlī stayed with his sister Umm Hānīʾ bt. Abī Ṭālib. After he had finished his lesser pilgrimage, ʿAlī returned and I poured [water][1411] for him [to perform] the major ritual purification, which he did. After he had finished the purification, some Iraqis came to him and said, "O Abū al-Ḥasan, [1834] we have come to ask you about a matter on which we would like you to give us information." He said, "I suppose that al-Mughīrah tells you that he was the last person to be with the Messenger of God." They said that, indeed, that was the reason they had come to ask him. ʿAlī said that al-Mughīrah lied. The last man to be with the Messenger of God was Qutham b. al-ʿAbbās.[1412]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān[1413]—al-

1407. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 577. Some traditions add the names of Usāmah b. Zayd and Ṣāliḥ, the Messenger of God's freedman, to the list of those who descended into the grave. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 76–77.

1408. Hisch., Kos, and Ibn Isḥāq: And buried it.

1409. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 77–78; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 578.

1410. Died between 79/698–99 and 84/703. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 180–81.

1411. Hisch. and Ibn Isḥāq: [Water] was poured for him.

1412. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 78.

1413. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 399–401.

Zuhrī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh—'Ā'ishah: The Messenger of God was wearing a black cloak (khamīṣah)[1414] when his pain became severe. Sometimes he would put it over his face, at times he would put it off, saying, "May God fight the people who took the graves of their prophets as places of worship (masājid)!", warning his community against such a practice.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān—al-Zuhrī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah—'Ā'ishah: The last injunction enjoined by the Messenger of God was that no two religions be left in the Arabian Peninsula. The Messenger of God died on the twelfth of Rabī' I/June 7, 632, the very day on which he came to Medina as an emigrant,[1415] so he completed a full ten years of his migration.

The Disagreements about His Age When He Died

Some [authorities] state that he was sixty-three years old. Those who state that [are as follows].

Ibn al-Muthannā—Ḥajjāj b. al-Minhāl[1416]—Ḥammād (that is, Ibn Salamah)—Abū Jamrah[1417]—Ibn 'Abbās: The Messenger of God stayed in Mecca for thirteen years while the revelation came [1835] to him and ten years in Medina. He died while he was sixty-three years old.

Ibn al-Muthannā—Ḥajjāj b. al-Minhāl—Ḥammād—Abū Jamrah—his father:[1418] The Messenger of God lived for sixty-three years.

Ibn al-Muthannā—'Abd al-Wahhāb[1419]—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd:[1420] I heard Sa'īd b. al-Musayyib say, "The revelation came to the Messenger of God while he was forty-three years old. He stayed ten 1414. A garment made of cloth woven from wool and silk with two ornamental or colored borders, or a black cloak; worn by older people. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. kh-m-ṣ.

---

1415. His arrival in Medina was on Monday, the twelfth of Rabī' I. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 263.

1416. Died ca. 217/832. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 206–7.

1417. Died ca. 128/745–46. Ibid., X, 431–32.

1418. 'Imrān b. 'Isām died ca. 83/702. Ibid., VIII, 134–35.

1419. 'Abd al-Wahhāb b. 'Abd al-Ḥakam died ca. 250/864. Ibid., VI, 447.

1420. Ibid., XI, 215–16. For a similar report see Ibn Isḥāq, Kitāb al-Mubtada', 114.

years in Mecca, ten years in Medina, and died while he was sixty-three."

Muḥammad b. Khalaf al-ʿAsqalānī[1421]—Ādam[1422]—Ḥammād b. Salamah—Abū Jamrah al-Ḍubaghī—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Messenger of God was called to his mission when he was forty. He stayed in Mecca for thirteen years while he was receiving revelation and [stayed] in Medina for ten years. He died when he was sixty-three years old.

Aḥmad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Wahb[1423]—his uncle ʿAbdallāh[1424]—Yūnus[1425]—al-Zuhrī—ʿUrwah—ʿĀ'ishah: The Messenger of God died while he was sixty-three.[1426]

The others state that he was sixty-five. Those who state that [are as follows].

Ziyād b. Ayyūb[1427]—Hushaym[1428]—ʿAlī b. Zayd[1429]—Yūsuf b. Mihrān[1430]—Ibn ʿAbbās: The Prophet died while he was sixty-five.[1431]

Ibn al-Muthannā—Muʿādh b. Hishām[1432]—his father[1433]—Qatādah[1434]—al-Ḥasan [al-Baṣrī]—Daghfal (that is, Ibn Ḥanẓalah):[1435] The Prophet died while he was sixty-five.

Yet others state that he was sixty years old. Those who state [1836] that [are as follows].

Ibn al-Muthannā — Ḥajjāj[1436] — Ḥammād[1437] — ʿAmr b. Dī-

1421. Died in 260/873–74. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 149.

1422. Ādam b. Abī Iyās died ca. 220/835. Ibid., I, 196. For a similar report see Ibn Isḥāq, Kitāb al-Mubtada', 114.

1423. Died in 264/877–78. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 54–56.

1424. ʿAbdallāh b. Wahb b. Muslim died in 197/812–13. Ibid., VI, 71–74.

1425. Yūnus b. Yazīd died in 159/775–76. Ibid., XI, 450–52.

1426. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 82; he considers this report to be the most authentic; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 579.

1427. Died in 252/866. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 355; his death date given in the text as A.H. 152 seems to be incorrect because he was born in A.H. 166.

1428. Died in 183/799. Ibid., XI, 59–64.

1429. Died ca. 129/746–47. Ibid., VIII, 322–24.

1430. Ibid., XI, 424–25.

1431. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 82.

1432. Died in 200/815–16. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 196–97.

1433. Hishām b. Abī ʿAbdallāh died ca. 152/769. Ibid., XI, 43–45.

1434. Qatādah b. Diʿāmah died ca. 117/735. Ibid., VIII, 351–56.

1435. Ibid., III, 210–11.

1436. Ḥajjāj b. Ibrāhīm died after 213/828. Ibid., II, 195–96.

1437. Ḥammād b. Zayd died in 179/795–96. Ibid., III, 9–11.

nār[1438]— 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr: The Messenger of God was called to his mission while he was forty and died while he was sixty.[1439]

Al-Ḥusayn b. Naṣr—'Ubaydallāh—Shaybān—Yaḥyā b. Abī Kathīr[1440]—Abū Salamah:[1441] I have received an account on the authority of [both] 'Ā'ishah and Ibn 'Abbās that the Messenger of God remained in Mecca for ten years while the Qur'ān was revealed to him and [remained] in Medina for ten years.

The Day and the Month in Which the Messenger of God Died

Abū Ja'far [al-Ṭabarī]—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Walīd al-Jurjānī—Aḥmad b. Abī Ṭaybah—'Ubaydallāh—Nāfi'—Ibn 'Umar: The Prophet put Abū Bakr in command of the pilgrimage in the year 9/631 and explained to him its rites. The following year, that is the year 10/632, the Messenger of God made the Farewell Pilgrimage, returned to Medina and died in Rabī' I.

Ibrāhīm b. Sa'īd al-Jawharī[1442]—Mūsā b. Dāwūd[1443]—Ibn Lahī'ah[1444]—Khālid b. Abī 'Imrān[1445] Ḥanash al-Ṣan'ānī[1446]—Ibn 'Abbās: The Prophet was born on Monday and he received the revelation on Monday. The boycott by Quraysh [of the Banū Hāshim] was lifted on Monday and [the Messenger of God] left Mecca, emigrating to Medina, on Monday. He arrived there on Monday and died on Monday.

[1837] Aḥmad b. 'Uthmān b. Ḥakīm[1447]—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sharīk[1448]—his father[1449]—Ibn Isḥāq—'Abdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm[1450]—his father:[1451] The Messenger

1438. Died ca. 125/742–43. Ibid., VIII, 28–30.
1439. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/2, 81.
1440. Died ca. 129/746–47. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 268.
1441. Died ca. 94/712–13. Ibid., XII, 115–18.
1442. Died ca. 249/863. Ibid., I, 123–25.
1443. Died ca. 216/831. Ibid., X, 342–43.
1444. Died ca. 174/790–91. Ibid., V, 373–79.
1445. Died ca. 129/746–47. Ibid., III, 110–11.
1446. Died in 100/718–19. Ibid., III, 57–58.
1447. Died in 261/874–75. Ibid., I, 61.
1448. Died in 227/841–42. Ibid., VI, 194.
1449. Sharīk b. 'Abdallāh died ca. 177/793–94. Ibid., IV, 333–37.
1450. Died ca. 135/752–53. Ibid., V, 164–85.
1451. Died ca. 110/728–29. Ibid., XII, 38–40.

of God died on the twelfth of Rabīʿ I/June 7, 632,[1452] on Monday, and was buried on the night of Wednesday.

Aḥmad b. ʿUthmān [b. Ḥakīm]—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān [b. Sharīk]—his father—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr: Muḥammad b. Isḥāq went to ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr, who asked his wife Fāṭimah to narrate to him what she had heard from ʿAmrah bt. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. She said, "I heard ʿAmrah saying that she had heard ʿĀ'ishah saying that the Prophet of God was buried on the night of Wednesday, and that they did not know about it until they heard the sound of the pickaxes."[1453] 1452. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 568. Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Mahomet, 205, on the other hand, states that it must be Monday, the twenty-third of Rabīʿ I, which corresponds to June 8, 632. According to Haig's Comparative tables, the corresponding date given above in the text is correct.

1453. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 568.

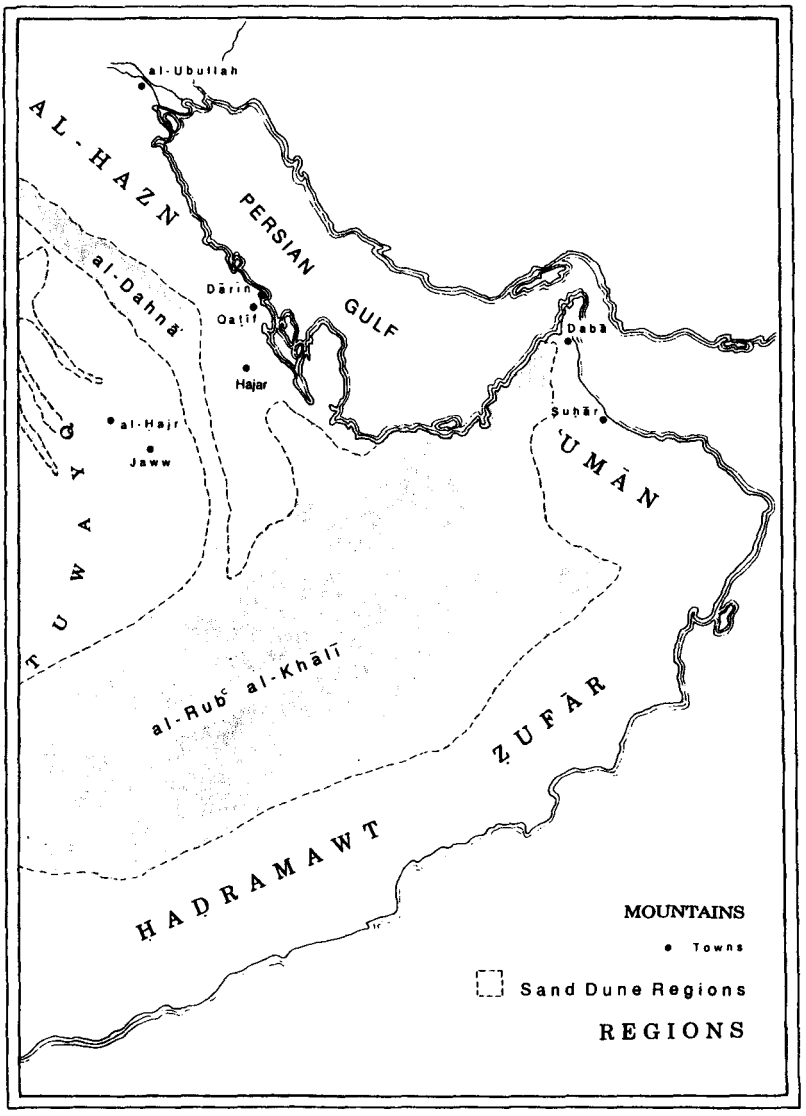
The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME X



The Conquest of Arabia

TRANSLATED BY FRED M. DONNER

Map 1. Western Arabia at the Time of the Riddah

Map 2. Eastern Arabia at the Time of the Riddah

The Events of the Year

II (cont'd) [1837]

(MARCH 29, 632–MARCH 17, 633)

What Took Place between the Muhājirūn and the Anṣār over the Matter of Leadership at the Portico of the Banū Sā'idah[1]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī 'Amrah al-Anṣārī:[2] When the Prophet passed away, the Anṣār gathered on the portico of the Banū Sā'idah said, "Let us appoint Sa'd b. 'Ubādah[3] to be in charge of

---

1. The Muhājirūn (often translated as "Emigrants," but see note 81, below, on hijrah) were mainly those people of the Meccan tribe of Quraysh—the Prophet's tribe—who emigrated to Medina to join the Prophet's community there, but they included some people of other groups who embraced Islam and settled in Medina; the Anṣār ("Helpers") were the Medinan converts to Islam, comprising mainly the rival Medinan tribes of Aws and Khazraj; the Banū Sā'idah b. Ka'b were a clan of he Khazraj. For an analysis of the traditions on Abū Bakr's election, see Caetani, 521–33.

2. Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, Sharh nahj al-balāghah, I, 302–3, summarizes pp. 1–10; cf. Nuwayrī, 29–31 (as far as p. 15). Cf. Caetani, 514–15.

3. A chief of the Khazraj tribe of Medina and one of the twelve naqībs, or guarantors, of the Medinan Anṣār chosen by the Prophet during the meeting at al-'Aqabah, before the hijrah; cf. Ibn Sa'd, III/2, 134–35, 142–45.

our affairs after Muḥammad." They made Sa'd come out to them; but he was sick, and after they had gathered he said to his son or to one of his cousins, "Because of my illness I cannot make my words heard by all the people. Take my speech from me and make them hear it." So he spoke, and the man memorized what he said and said [it] in a loud voice so that his [1838] companions would hear it. After praising and extolling God, he said:

> Company of the Anṣār! You have precedence in religion and merit in Islam that no [other] tribe of the Arabs can claim. Muḥammad remained ten-odd years in his tribe, calling them to worship the Merciful and to cast off idols and graven images, but only a few men of his tribe believed in Him, and they were able neither to protect the Apostle of God, nor to render His religion strong, nor to divert from themselves the oppression that befell them all; until, when He intended excellence for you, He sent nobility to you and distinguished you with grace. Thus God bestowed upon you faith in Him and in His Apostle, and protection for him and his companions, and strength for him and his faith, and battle (jihād) for his enemies. You were the most severe people against his enemies who were among you, and the most troublesome to his enemies who were not from among you, so that the Arabs became upright in God's cause, willingly or unwillingly, and the distant one submitted in abject humiliation, until through you God made great slaughter in the earth[4] for His Apostle, and by your swords the Arabs were abased for him.[5] When God took (the Prophet) to Himself,[6] he was pleased with you and consoled by you. [So] keep [control of] this matter to yourselves, to the exclusion of others, for it is yours and yours alone.

4. Reading 'athkhana ... fī al-ardi, instead of the text's and Nuwayrī's (p. 30) athkhana ... al-arda. Cf. Qur'ān 8:67.

5. Translating the verb dānat as transitive, rather than intransitive.

6. I.e., at the time of the Prophet's death.

They answered him all together, "Your opinion is right, and you have spoken correctly. We will not diverge from your opinion, and we shall put you in charge of this business. For indeed, you are sufficient for us and satisfactory to whoever is righteous among the believers." But then they began to debate among themselves, and [some] said, "What if the Muhājirūn of Quraysh refuse, saying, 'We are the Muhājirūn and the first companions of the Apostle of God; we are his kinsmen and his friends.[7] So why do you dispute this matter with us after him?'" [Another] group of [the Anṣār] said, "Then we should say, 'let us have a leader from among ourselves, and you a leader from among yourselves,' for we should never be satisfied with less than this leadership." When Sa'd b. 'Ubādah heard this, he said, "This is the beginning of weakness." [1839]

'Umar learned of this and went to the Prophet's house and sent to Abū Bakr, who was in the building.[8] Now 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib[9] was working busily preparing the Apostle [for burial], so ['Umar] sent a message to Abū Bakr to come out to him. Abū Bakr sent back that he was occupied, but ['Umar] sent him another message, saying, "Something has happened that you must attend to in person." So he came out to him, and ['Umar] said to him, "Didn't you know that the Anṣār have gathered at the portico of the Banū Sā'idah intending to put Sa'd b. 'Ubādah in charge of this affair? [Even] the best of them is saying, 'A leader for us and a leader for Quraysh.'" So the two of them hurried toward them; they met Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ,[10] and the three of them marched toward them. [On

---

7. 'Ashīratuhu wa awliyatuhu. Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 302, has awliyā'uhu wa 'itratuhu; Nuwayrī, 30, has 'ashīratuhu wa awliyā'uhu.

8. Cf. Ibn Hishām, 1013 (from Ibn Isḥāq), 1015–16; Diyārbakrī, II, 168 (from Ibn Isḥāq); and Ṣan'ānī, V, 442 (al-Zuhrī—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Utbah—Ibn 'Abbās). Ibn Hishām, 1015–16, seems to be a condensed version of pp. 3–8.

9. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was the Prophet's cousin and the husband of the Prophet's daughter Fāṭima; he would later be the fourth caliph or successor to the Prophet as head of the Muslim community. 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb and Abū Bakr, in the preceding sentence, were early converts and close associates of the Prophet and would later serve as the second and first successors of the Prophet, respectively.

10. An early convert to Islam from Quraysh, who played a major role in the Islamic conquest of Syria after the Prophet's death; cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "Abū 'Ubayda b. al-Djarrāḥ" (H. A. R. Gibb). Diyarbakrī, II, 167–68 (from Ibn Isḥāq) makes no their way] they were met by ʿĀṣim b. ʿAdī and ʿUwaym b. Sāʿidah,[11] who said, "Go back, for it will not be as you wish." But they refused [to turn back] and arrived while [the Anṣār] were gathered.

According to ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb: We came to them, and I had pieced together[12] a speech that I wanted to deliver to them; but, when I had pushed in among them and was about to begin my address, Abū Bakr said to me, "Easy does it, ʿUmar, until I have spoken; then afterward say whatever you wish." So he spoke [first], and there was nothing that I had wanted to say that he did not come to, or amplify it.

According to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān:[13] Abū Bakr began by praising and extolling God. Then he said, "Verily God sent Muḥammad as an Apostle to His creatures and as a witness to his community, that they should worship God and affirm His [1840] oneness. For they had worshiped various deities other than Him, alleging that [those deities] were intercessors before Him on their behalf and were beneficial for them. [Those gods] were of carved stone and hewn wood." Then he recited, "And they serve beside God that which can neither harm nor help them, saying: 'These are our intercessors before God.'"[14] And they said, "We worship them only that they may make us nearer to God."[15] [Abū Bakr continued,] "Now the Arabs found it most distressing that they should leave the religion of their forefathers; so from among his tribe God singled out the first Muhājirūn, by having mention of him and has only Abū Bakr and ʿUmar proceeding to the Anṣār, but later in the account he mentions the raising of the hands of ʿUmar and Abū ʿUbaydah to swear allegiance to Abū Bakr.

---

11. The names vary in different accounts. Ibn Hishām, 1016 [Ibn Isḥāq—al-Zuhrī—ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr]; Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 293; Ṣanʿānī, V, 445 [al-Zuhrī—ʿUrwah]; and Diyārbakrī, II, 167, give the first name as Maʿn b. ʿAdī; the last gives the second name as ʿUwaymir b. Sāʿidah. Ṣanʿānī, V, 442, gives simply "two righteous men of the Anṣār" and has them saying "Go and settle your affairs among yourselves."

12. Reading zawwartu [instead of zawwaytu ["I cast off?"] or rawītu ["I related"] of the manuscripts], as suggested by De Goeje in Emendanda, Ibn al-Athīr Kāmil, II, 327; Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 293; Ibn Hishām, 1015–16; and Nuwayrī, 32. Ṣanʿānī, V, 443, has rawwaytu "I asked [s.o.] to recite"[?].

13. Cf. Nuwayrī, 33–36, as far as p. 8.

14. Qurʾān 10:18.

15. Qurʾān 39:3.

them affirm that he spoke the truth and by their belief in him, and consoling him and enduring patiently with him the harsh insults their tribe [directed] against them and [their tribe], calling them liars. All the people were opposed to [the Muhājirūn] and rebuked them; but they were not distressed by their small numbers or by the hatred of the people for them or by [the people's] single-minded opposition to them, for they were the first who worshiped God on the earth and who believed in God and the Apostle. They are his friends and kinsmen[16] and the most deserving people in this matter after him; only a wrongdoer would dispute that. Oh company of the Anṣār, your superiority in religion and great precedence in Islām are undeniable. May God be satisfied with you as helpers (anṣār) for His religion and His Apostle. He made his hijrah to you, and the majority of his wives and his companions are among you; so—after the first Muhājirūn—there is no one among us who is in your station. We are the leaders, and you the helpers;[17] matters shall not be settled without consultation, nor shall we decide on them without you."[18]

Then al-Ḥubāb b. al-Mundhir b. al-Jamūḥ[19] stood up and said, "Oh company of the Anṣār, take command of yourselves, for you overshadow [other] people.[20] No one will dare oppose you [1841] [if you do], nor will the people[21] proceed, except in accordance with your opinion. You are the people of power and wealth, numerous and strong in resistance and experienced, having boldness and courage. The people look only to what you do; so do not differ among yourselves, lest your judgment (ra'y) be spoiled and your cause (amr) collapse.[22] This one [i.e., Abū Bakr]

16. 'Ashīratuhu. Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 302: 'itratuhu "his family."

17. Wuzarā', here using wazīr in the Qur'ānic sense of "helper, assistant"; cf. Qur'ān 20:29, 25:35.

18. A loose parallel in Ibn Sa'd, III/1, 129, ll. 4ff., makes clear the idea of shared power.

19. A leader of Khazraj, prominent at Badr and other battles of the Prophet. Cf. Ibn Sa'd, III/2, 109–10.

20. Lit., "the people are in your shade and shadow."

21. Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 302: "anyone."

22. Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 302, has "lest you spoil your affairs (umūr) for yourselves."

insisted on what you have heard.[23] So [let us have] a leader from among us, and [they] a leader from among them." At this 'Umar said, "Absolutely not; two cannot come to agreement in a joining.[24] By God, the Arabs will not be content to give you the leadership when their Prophet was not one of you; but they would not prevent their affairs from being led by one of those among whom prophethood [had appeared] and from whom the guardian of their affairs [was chosen]. In that [fact] is manifest argument and clear proof[25] for us against those Arabs who deny [it]. Who would attempt to wrest from us the sovereignty (sulṭān) of Muḥammad and his authority (imārah), seeing that we are his friends and his kinsmen, except someone advancing falsehood, inclining to sin, or hurtling into destruction?" [But] al-Ḥubāb b. al-Mundhir stood up [again] and said, "Oh company of the Anṣār, take charge of your own affairs[26] and do not listen to what this one and his companions say, for they would do away with your share in this matter. If they refuse to give you what you ask for, then drive them out of this country, and seize control of these matters despite them. For you are more deserving of this authority[27] than they are, as it was by your swords that those who were not yet converted came to obey this religion.[28] I am their much-rubbed little rubbing post, and their propped little palm tree loaded with fruit.[29] By God, if you wish to return it as a stump [then do so!]" 'Umar said, "Then may God kill you!" and [al-Ḥubāb] replied, "Rather may He kill 23. Lit., "denied everything except what you heard." Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 302, has "If this one has insisted . . . , then let us have. . . ." Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 169 top.

24. This phrase is, at best, laconic. Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 302, has "two swords cannot be joined in one scabbard"; Al-Ṣan'ānī, V, 444, has "two swords are not suitable in one scabbard." The idea, in any case, is that one community cannot be led by two people.

25. Al-sulṭān al-mubīn.

26. Lit., "grasp upon your hands."

27. Imārah; but cf. Nuwayrī, 35 top: amr "affair."

28. Dāna li-hādhā al-dīn man dāna mimman lam yakun yadīnu, lit., "those who came to obey of those who had not [yet] obeyed came to obey this religion."

29. I.e., "I am sought out by those needing advice as camels with mange seek the scratching post, and I have a numerous family to defend me" [Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon, s.v. "jidhl"]. Cf. Ibn Hishām, 1016; Diyārbakrī, II, 168, 169; Nuwayrī, 32 bottom, 35 top.

you!" At this Abū ʿUbaydah said, "Oh company of the Anṣār, you were the first who helped and strengthened, so do not be the first to substitute and change for the worse."[30] [1842]

Then Bashīr b. Saʿd,[31] father of al-Nuʿmān b. Bashīr, stood up and said, "Oh company of the Anṣār, if indeed by God we were the first in merit in battling the polytheists and in precedence in this religion, we would want by (these deeds) only [to gain] our Lord's pleasure, and obedience to our Prophet, and sustenance for ourselves; it is not appropriate for us to exalt ourselves over [other] people. Let us not seek by it some transitory thing of the world, for indeed God is the One Who provides (such things) for us out of His grace.[32] In truth Muḥammad was from Quraysh, and his people are more entitled to [hold] (authority) and more suitable. I swear by God that He shall never see me contesting this matter (amr) with them. So fear God and do not oppose them or dispute with them."

At this Abū Bakr said,[33] "This is ʿUmar, and this is Abū ʿUbaydah; render the oath of allegiance to whichever of them you wish." But they both said, "No, by God, we shall not undertake [to hold] this authority over you, for you are the best of the Muhājirūn, the "second of two when they were in the cave,"[34] and the Apostle of God's deputy (khalīfah) over the prayer; and prayer is the most meritorious obedience (dīn) of the Muslims. So who should precede you or undertake this authority over you? Extend your hand so we may render the oath of allegiance to you!"

When[35] the two of them went forth to render the oath of allegiance to him, Bashīr b. Saʿd went to him ahead of them and swore allegiance to him [first]. At this al-Ḥubāb b. al-Mundhir shouted to him, "Oh Bashīr b. Saʿd, you are in op-

30. I.e., as the Muslim community was united and strong before, a change to disunity will be a setback.

31. An early follower of Muḥammad from Medina. Cf. Ibn Saʿd, III/2, 83–84.

32. Lit., "God is the benefactor of grace upon us by that."

33. Cf. Al-Dıyārbakrī, II, 168, 169.

34. A quotation from Qur'ān 9:40, considered by Muslim exegetes to refer to an episode when Abū Bakr made the hijrah with the Prophet.

35. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 169.

position [to your kinsmen];[36] what drove you to [do] what you have done?[37] Did you envy your cousin[38] the sovereignty?" He replied, "By God, no! But I abhorred contending with a group for a right that God had given them." Now when the Aws saw what Bashīr b. Sa'd had done and what Quraysh had called for and what the Khazraj were demanding by way of giving sovereignty [1843] to Sa'd b. 'Ubādah, they said to one another [and among them was Usayd b. Ḥuḍayr, one of the naqībs]:[39] "By God, if once you appoint the Khazraj over you, they will always have the advantage over you on that account, and will never give you any share in it with them. So stand up and render the oath of allegiance to Abū Bakr." So they came forth to him and rendered the oath of allegiance to him. Thus that which Sa'd b. 'Ubādah and the Khazraj had agreed to do was defeated.

Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad al-Khuzā'ī:[40] Aslam[41] approached en masse until the streets were packed with them, and they rendered the oath of allegiance to Abū Bakr. 'Umar used to say, "It was not until I saw Aslam that I was certain we had won the day."[42]

Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān.[43] People approached from all sides swearing allegiance to Abū Bakr, and they almost stepped on Sa'd b. 'Ubādah. Some of Sa'd's associates said, "Be careful not to step on Sa'd!" At this 'Umar said, "Kill him; may God slay him!" Then he stepped on his head, saying, "I intend to tread upon you until your arm is 36. Reading, with Cairo, 'aqqatka 'aqāqī, for 'aqaqta 'aqāqī in the text. Cf. Ibn Manẓūr, X, 257, for the idiom.

37. Reading mā akhrajaka for mā aḥwajaka, as suggested by P. De Jong in notes to text. However, Nuwayrī, 36, has the same reading as the text.

38. I.e., his fellow tribesman of Khazraj, Sa'd b. 'Ubādah.

39. On the naqībs see note 2, above. On Usayd, a chief of the Aws tribe who had led them in battle against the Khazraj at the battle of Bu'āth before Islam, see Ibn Sa'd, III/2, 135–37.

40. Cf. Nuwayrī, 36–38, as far as p. 10.

41. A tribe associated with Khuzā'ah, living west and southwest of Medina and among Muḥammad's earliest backers after his arrival in Medina. Cf. Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 82ff.

42. Lit., "that I was certain of victory."

43. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 169; Nuwayrī, 36–37.

dislocated."[44] At this Sa'd took hold of 'Umar's beard and said, "By God, if you remove a single hair from it you'll return with no front teeth in your mouth." Then Abū Bakr said, "Take it easy, 'Umar; compassion[45] would be more effective at this point." So 'Umar turned away from him. Sa'd said, "By God, if I had the strength to get up, you would have heard from me in the regions and streets [of Medina], roaring in a way that would make you and your companions take cover; by God, I shall join to you a group among whom you[46] would be a follower, not a leader. [Now] carry me from this place." So they carried him and took him into his house. He was left for several days; then[47] [1844] he was sent to [and told] that he should come to render the oath of allegiance, for the people [generally] had done so and his tribe as well. But he said, "By God, I shall not do it, before I have shot at you with whatever arrows are in my quiver, and have reddened the head of my spear, and struck you with my sword, as long as my hand controls it. I will fight you with my family and those who obey me of my tribe. I swear by God, [even] if the jinn gathered to you with the people,[48] I would not render the oath of allegiance to you, until I am brought forth[49] before my God and know what my reckoning is."

When Abū Bakr was informed of this, 'Umar said to him, "Pester him until he renders the oath of allegiance." But Bashīr b. Sa'd said, "He has refused; he has made up his mind, and wouldn't render the oath of allegiance to you even if he were

---

44. Reading 'aḍudaka with Cairo edition and Emendanda, instead of the text's 'iḍwaka "your limb." The emendation does not solve all the problems in the text, however, as the context immediately before and after the word refers to Sa'd's head (e.g., "if you remove a single hair from it"), not his arms. In view of this, one might expect here that 'Umar may have threatened to break Sa'd's neck (i.e., dislocate his head?).

45. Or, perhaps, "gentleness" or "tact": rifq.

46. Reading with Emendanda, instead of "among whom I was a follower" in the text.

47. Ibn Sa'd, III/2, 144, ll. 24ff., provides a close parallel to the remainder of this paragraph and the following one.

48. An echo of the Qur'ānic "men and jinn," meaning all creatures (e.g., Qur'ān 17:88); a loose English rendering might be something like "even if man and beast joined in supporting you."

49. Reading u'raḍu with Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 303; Nuwayrī, 37; and Cairo ed.

killed; and he would not be killed without his children and family and a party of his kinsmen being killed with him. So leave him alone; leaving him won't harm you, he is only one man,"[50] So they left him alone. They came to accept the advice of Bashīr b. Sa'd, consulting him whenever it seemed right to them to do so.

Sa'd[51] [b. 'Ubādah] used not to pray in their [daily] prayer or congregate with them [for Friday prayer]; he performed the pilgrimage [to Mecca] but did not press on with them in the multitudes.[52] He continued thus until Abū Bakr died.

According to 'Ubaydallāh b. Sa'd[53]—his uncle—Sayf b. 'Umar —Sahl and Abū 'Uthmān—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Khalīfah: When al-Ḥubāb b. al-Mundhir stood up, he drew his sword and said, "I am their much-rubbed little rubbing post and their propped little palm tree loaded with fruit.[54] I am [like] the father of a cub in the lion's den, related to the lion [as son to father]." Then 'Umar attacked him, striking his hand so that the sword dropped out, [1845] and picked it up. Then he pounced upon Sa'd [b. 'Ubādah]; and they all fell upon him. The people rendered the oath of allegiance successively [to Abū Bakr]; and Sa'd rendered the oath of allegiance. It was an action taken without consideration, like those of the jāhiliyyah.[55] Abū Bakr stood up before them. Someone said, when Sa'd was being trampled, "You have killed Sa'd," to which 'Umar replied, "God killed him, for he is a hypocrite"; and 'Umar struck the sword on a stone, breaking it.[56]

---

50. Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 292, has a similar phrase, but applied to 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib as the one holding out against Abū Bakr.

51. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 169.

52. Referring to the multitudes surging to and from 'Arafah during the culmination of the pilgrimage rituals on the eighth-tenth days of the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah.

53. Text has Sa'īd; cf. Emendanda, Cairo edition, manuscript C of Leiden edition.

54. Cf. p. 6, above.

55. The pejorative term for the pre-Islamic age in Islamic historiography; roughly "age of barbarism," i.e., before the enlightenment of Islam had arrived.

56. The text is difficult, but similar passages help clarify the meaning. In Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 315, 'Umar seizes the sword of al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām as he is about to recognize 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and breaks it on a stone; in Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 291, and Nuwayrī, 39, al-Zubayr's sword is taken away and broken on a rock at

According to ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿd[57]—his uncle Yaʿqūb—Sayf—Mubashshir—Jābir:[58] Saʿd b. ʿUbādah said to Abū Bakr on that day, "Oh company of Muhājirūn, you begrudge me sovereignty (al-imārah), and you and my tribe have compelled me to render the oath of allegiance." At this they replied, "If we had compelled you to division and then you had come to unity (jamāʿah) [of your own accord] you would be in a comfortable position; but we forced [you] to unity, so there is no going back on it.[59] If you withdraw a hand from obedience, or divide the union, we will strike off your head."[60]

According to ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿd[61]—his uncle—Sayf; and according to al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb b. Ibrāhīm—Sayf b. ʿUmar—Ibn Ḍamrah—his father—ʿĀṣim b. ʿAdī: Two days after the Apostle of God's death, Abū Bakr's public crier called out so that the mission (baʿth) of Usāmah[62] could be completed: "Up now! No one from Usāmah's army should remain in Medina, but should go out to his camp at al-Jurf."[63] And [Abū Bakr] stood up among the people, praised and extolled God, and said,[64] "Oh people, I am like you. I do not know, perhaps you will impose on me that which the Apostle of God was able to do. God chose Muḥammad above [all] the worlds and protected him from evils; but I am only a follower, not an innovator (mubtadiʿ). If I am upright, then follow me; but, if I deviate, straighten me out.[65] The Apostle of God died with no one of this community having [1846]

ʿUmar's request when al-Zubayr wants to recognize ʿAlī; in Diyārbakrī, II, 169 (from Mūsā b. ʿUqbah), ʿUmar breaks al-Zubayr's sword when he refuses to recognize Abū Bakr. Cf. Caetani, 515–16.

57. See note 53, above.

58. Cf. Nuwayrī, 38.

59. Lit., "there is no cancellation in it." The concept of jamāʿah, or political unity of the Muslim community, was from the start an important one in Islamic political discourse.

60. Lit., "we will strike off that in which are your eyes"; cf. Lane, V, 2215.

61. See note 53, above.

62. Usāmah b. Zayd, the Prophet's freedman, was sent by him to raid the Balqāʾ region of southern Syria just before the Prophet's final illness overtook him; cf. Ibn Hishām, 970, 999; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 1117ff.

63. A place three miles from Medina in the direction of Syria (Yāqūt, s.v.).

64. For widely divergent "accession speeches" of Abū Bakr, see Ibn Hishām, 1017; Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 314; Ibn Saʿd, III/ 1, 129.

65. Cf. Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, I, 314.

a claim against him concerning anything wrongfully taken [for which the punishment would be] one lash of the whip or [even] less. I have a Satan who takes possession of me; so when he comes to me, avoid me so that I may have no [evil] effect [even] on your hair and your skins.[66] You come and go [in this life] at an appointed time, knowledge of which is hidden from you; so if you are able [to ensure] that this appointed time elapses only while you are engaged in good works, do so. But you will only be able to do that through God; so compete in putting off your appointed times, before your appointed times surrender you to the interruption of [your] works. Verily, a tribe that forgets their appointed times, and lets others do the [good] deeds—beware being like them. Haste! Hurry! Salvation! For behind you is one who searches swiftly, an appointed time whose passage is rapid. Beware of death; be forewarned by [your deceased] fathers and sons and brothers, and do not envy the living except on account of that for which you envy the dead."

He also stood up and said, after praising and extolling God: "God only accepts those works through which His countenance was desired; so strive for God in your works. Know that whatever you sincerely direct to God is among your [good] works: obedience you have rendered, or a sin you have overcome, or taxes you have paid,[67] or a good work you have sent forward from ephemeral days to others that endure, to the time of your poverty and need.[68] Servants of God, be forewarned by whoever [1847] among you has died, and think on those who were before you. Where were they yesterday, and where are they today?[69] Where are the tyrants, and where are those who were renowned for fighting and victory on the fields of war? Time has abased them, and they have become decayed bones upon whom have been perpetuated gossip—"loathsome women for the loathsome men, and loathsome men for the loathsome women."[70] Where are the kings who tilled the earth and cultivated it? They have perished, and mention of them is forgotten, and they have become as

66. I.e., so that I may not harm you in any way.
67. Ḍarā'ib ataytamūhā.
68. I.e., to the Day of Judgment.
69. On this theme see C. H. Becker, "Ubi sunt, qui ante nos in mundo fuere."
70. Qur'ān 24:26.

nothing; but God has preserved the consequences [of their evil deeds] against them and cut them off from the desires [of this world], and they have passed away. The deeds [they did] are [still reckoned] their works, but the world is the world of others. We remained after them; and, if we take warning from them, we will be saved, but, if we are deceived by them, we will be like them. Where are the pure ones with beautiful faces, captivating in their youthfulness? They have become dust, and what they neglected to do before has become a source of grief for them. Where are those who built cities and fortified them with walls and made in them wondrous things? They have left them to those who follow after them; those are their residences, empty,[71] while they [themselves] are in the darkness of the grave. "Do you perceive any one of them, or hear a sound from them?"[72] Where are those sons and brethren of yours whom you know, whose appointed times have elapsed? They have arrived according to what they had sent forward, alighting upon it and abiding for misery or happiness after death. Between God, Who has no associate, and between [any] one of His creatures there is no means of access by which He may grant him grace or divert evil from him—unless it be through obedience to Him and following His command. Know that you are requited servants[73] and that what is with Him is only attained through obedience to Him. What seems good is not good if its consequence is [hell]fire, and what seems evil is not evil if its consequence is paradise."[74]

[1848] ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿd[75]—his uncle—Sayf; al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Hishām b. ʿUrwah—his father:[76] After the oath of allegiance had been rendered to Abū Bakr and the Anṣār had come together on the matter over which they had differed, he said that Usāma's mission should be completed. Now the Arabs[77] had

71. A paraphrase of Qur'ān 27:52.
72. Qur'ān 19:98.
73. Cf. Qur'ān 37:53.
74. Lit., "There is no good in a good thing that is followed by [hell]fire," etc.
75. See note 53, above.
76. Cf. Caetani, 588–89. Close parallels to the following section [through p. 17] are found in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 334–36; and Nuwayrī, 46–47.
77. Here and a few lines farther on, the word al-ʿarab seems to have the sense of "nomads, bedouins"; see comments on this word in the Foreword.

apostasized, either generally or as particular individuals in every tribe. Hypocrisy appeared, and the Jews and Christians began to exalt themselves, and the Muslims were like sheep on a cold and rainy night because of the loss of their Prophet and because of their fewness and the multitude of their enemy.[78] So the people said to [Abū Bakr], "These[79] are the majority of the Muslims. The Arabs, as you see, have mutinied against you, so you should not separate the troop of Muslims from yourself." At this Abū Bakr replied, "By Him in Whose hands is Abū Bakr's soul, even if I thought that beasts of prey would snatch me away, I would carry out the sending of Usāma just as the Apostle of God ordered. Even if there remained in the villages no one but myself, I would carry it out."

ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf; and al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAṭiyyah—Abū Ayyūb—ʿAlī; and al-Ḍaḥḥāk—Ibn ʿAbbās: Then some of the tribes who had been absent in the year of [the truce of] al-Ḥudaybiyah gathered about Medina and rose in rebellion. The people of Medina had gone out in the army of Usāma; so Abū Bakr detained[80] whoever remained of those tribes that had made hijrah within their territories,[81] so that they became armed outposts (masāliḥ) around their tribes, but they were few.

[1849] ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf; and al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū Ḍamrah, Abū ʿAmr, and others—al-Ḥasan b. Abū al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī:[82] Before his death, the Apostle of God had imposed a campaign on the people of Medina and those in their vicinity, among them ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. He had put Usāmah b. Zayd in charge of them, but the last of them had not yet crossed the 78. Cf. Balansī, 1, where this phrase is related on the authority of Ibn Isḥāq—ʿĀ'ishah; cf. also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 334; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 95; Diyārbakrī, II, 201.

79. I.e., those assigned to the army of Usāmah b. Zayd.

80. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 334, following Mss. C and B of Ṭabarī, has "formed [them] into an army."

81. The text refers to the act of joining the Muslim community, which in the early days was done by emigrating to and settling in Medina. This procedure was called hijrah. At some point, the Prophet seems to have allowed certain tribes to become recognized members of the community without making hijrah in Medina. On hijrah as emigration to a place or to a powerful group in order to secure its protection, see Robert Bertram Serjeant and Ronald Lewcock, Sanʿā', ch. 5. "Ṣanʿā' the 'Protected,' Hijrah," pp. 39–43.

82. Cf. Nuwayrī, 47–48; Caetani, 589–91.

ditch[83] when the Apostle of God passed away. So Usāmah stopped with the army[84] and said to 'Umar, "Return to the caliph of the Apostle of God and ask his permission for me to return with the army; for the chiefs of the army are with me along with their forces,[85] and I am uneasy lest the polytheists snatch away the caliph and the Apostle of God's household and the households of the Muslims." The Anṣār added, "And if he insists that we proceed, convey to him our request that he appoint in command of us a man older than Usāmah." So 'Umar went out on Usāmah's order and came to Abū Bakr and informed him of what Usāmah had said. Abū Bakr replied, "Even if the dogs and wolves were to snatch me off, I would not reverse a decision the Apostle of God had made." Then 'Umar said, "The Anṣār ordered me to inform you that they would like to request that you put in charge of them a man older than Usāmah." At this Abū Bakr sprang up—he had been seated—and seized 'Umar's beard, saying, "May your mother be bereft of you and destitute of you, Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb! The Apostle of God appointed him, and you order me to dismiss him?" So 'Umar returned to the army. They said to him, "What did you do?" And he replied, "Proceed, may your mothers be bereft of you! I didn't receive [anything] for your cause from the caliph."

Then[86] Abū Bakr went out until he reached them; he made [1850] them go forth, and he followed after them on foot while Usāmah was riding and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf[87] led Abū Bakr's mount. Usāmah said to him, "By God, oh caliph of the Apostle of God, either you ride or I shall dismount." But Abū Bakr said, "By God, don't dismount; nor, by God, will I ride. It will not hurt me to get my two feet dusty for an hour in God's way; but, for each

83. The ditch on the edge of Medina, dug during the siege by Quraysh in A.H 7. Cf. Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 35ff.

84. Or perhaps "the people" (al-nās), here and later in the paragraph. Diyārbakrī, II, 114, states that all the notables (wujūh) of the Muhājirūn and Anṣār went on the raid.

85. The editor of text suggests aw julluhum "or most of them" for wa ḥadduhum; Nuwayrī has waḥdahum "by themselves."

86. Cf. Ṣan'ānī, V, 199–200 (no. 9375).

87. An early convert from Banū Zuhra of Quraysh. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf" (M. Th. Houtsma—W. M. Watt).

step the warrior takes, seven hundred beauties are destined for him, and seven hundred steps[88] are made visible to him, and seven hundred sins are lifted from him." Until, when he was done, (Abū Bakr) said to (Usāmah): "If you think you might help me out [by lending me the services of] 'Umar, then do so." So Usāmah gave him permission to do that.[89] Then (Abū Bakr) said, "Oh army, stop and I will order you [to do] ten [things]; learn them from me by heart. You shall not engage in treachery; you shall not act unfaithfully; you shall not engage in deception; you shall not indulge in mutilation; you shall kill neither a young child nor an old man nor a woman; you shall not fell palm trees or burn them; you shall not cut down [any] fruit-bearing tree; you shall not slaughter a sheep or a cow or a camel except for food. You will pass people who occupy themselves in monks' cells;[90] leave them alone, and leave alone what they busy themselves with. You will come to a people who will bring you vessels in which are varieties of food; if you eat anything[91] from [those dishes], mention the name of God over them. You will meet a people who have shaven the middle of their head and have left around it [a ring of hair] like turbans;[92] tap them lightly with the sword. Go ahead, in God's name; may God make you perish through wounds and plague!"[93]

---

88. Reference to the steps or stages to, and the beautiful companions in, paradise.

89. That is, Usāmah allowed 'Umar to remain behind with Abū Bakr in Medina, rather than marching on the campaign.

90. Al-Ṣan'ānī, V, 199–200 (no. 9375), has "people who allege that they imprison themselves" (i.e., as monks, for God).

91. The text reads shay'an ba'da shay'in "something after something," but this may be a conflation of two separate variant readings: shay'an "a thing" and ba'ḍa shay'in "some thing."

92. Reference to a monk's tonsure.

93. The text is difficult; Ibn al-Athīr's version, Kāmil, II, 336, is identical, and both are closely paralleled by Ṣan'ānī, V, 199–200 (no. 9375). Although these passages are in substantial agreement that Muslims should smite shaven-headed monks with the sword, they do not fit the larger context of the accounts in which they occur, in which Abū Bakr warns the Muslim warriors not to abuse certain categories of people, including monks in their cells, thus directly contradicting the passage in question. Ṣan'ānī, V, 200 (no. 9377:—Ma'mar—al-Zuhrī), may preserve a more accurate version: "You will find people who have shaved their heads with the sword, and those who lock themselves up in cells: leave them alone in their sins." The sentence about wounds and plague, missing

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf; and according to ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf—Hishām b. ʿUrwah—his father:[94] Abū Bakr went out to al-Jurf and followed Usāmah and sent him off. He asked Usāmah for ʿUmar [b. al-Khaṭṭāb], which he agreed to. He told Usāmah, "Do what the Prophet of God ordered you to do: Begin with the Quḍāʿah[95] country, then go to Ābil.[96] Do not fall short in anything that the Apostle of God commanded, but do not hurry because of what you have not [yet] attained of his injunction." So Usāmah advanced quickly to Dhū al-Marwah[97] and the valley[98] and ended up doing what the Prophet had ordered him to do by way of dispersing horsemen among the Quḍāʿah tribes and raiding Ābil. He took captives and booty, and his completion [of the mission] was within forty days, excepting [the time of] his encampment and his return.[99] [1851]

According to al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb—Sayf; and according to ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf—Mūsā b. ʿUqbah—al-Mughīin Nuwayrī's account, is Abū Bakr's backhanded way of wishing that all the warriors might attain paradise, as according to Islamic law those who die fighting the infidel and those who die from plague are deemed martyrs whose place in paradise is assured. E. Landau-Tasseron observes that this "blessing" is a reference to the prophetic ḥadīth, "My community will vanish through wounds and plague" (personal communication). Caetani, 590–91, observes that variants of this speech appear in topos-like fashion in several other contexts and ascribed to different speakers.

---

94. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 154–55; Nuwayrī, 49; Caetani, 591.

95. A group of tribes living north of Medina as far as Syria, including Juhayna, ʿUdhrah, Balī, Bahrāʾ, Kalb, al-Qayn (Bal-Qayn), Tanūkh, Salīḥ, and Saʿd Hudhaym, as well as Nahd and Jarm in South Arabia and ʿUmān. See *EI*², s.v. "Ḳudāʿa" (M. J. Kister); Caskel, II, 470.

96. Diyārbakrī, II, 154; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 1117ff.; and Yāqūt, s.v. "Ubnā" call this place Ubnā. De Goeje argued that the name Ubnā was a corruption of Ābil, referring to the ancient town of Abila in Gaulanitis: Ibn Rusṭah (BGA, VII), 329 note c. Robert Schick, The Fate of the Christians of Palestine, s.v. "Ābil," cites Ṭabarī, I, 2081, which places Ābil in association with Zīzāʾ and Qasṭal during the conquest of the Balqāʾ region of Syria; on this basis he argues that Ābil in these accounts of the conquest is not Abila at all but a corruption of Arabic Ubnā, which he therefore localizes near the other two places, just south of modern ʿAmmān. Yāqūt places Ubnā in the Balqāʾ, near Muʾtah.

97. A village in Wādī al-Qurā "the valley of villages," north of Medina (Yāqūt, s.v. "al-Marwah").

98. Presumably Wādī al-Qurā.

99. Diyārbakrī, II, 155: Usāmah raids Quḍāʿah as far as Muʾtah, then raids people of Ubnā; takes booty and captives; kills the killer of his father, Zayd; and returns within forty days.

rah b. al-Akhnas; and according to the two of them—Sayf—ʿAmr b. Qays—ʿAṭāʾ al-Khurasānī: a similar account.

Remainder of the Account Regarding al-ʿAnsī the Liar[100]

According to what we have learned, when Bādhām[101] and the Yemen embraced Islam, the Apostle of God placed in Bādhām's hands the governorship of all the Yemen, putting him in charge of all its districts; and he continued to be the Apostle's governor all the days of his life. The Apostle did not dismiss him from it or from any part of it, nor did he place in it any associate with him, until Bādhām died. After he died, the Apostle divided governorship of the Yemen among a group of his companions.

According to ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿīd[102] al-Zuhrī—his uncle—[1852] Sayf; and according to al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb b. Ibrāhīm—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—his father—ʿUbayd b. Ṣakhr b. Lawdhān al-Anṣārī al-Salmī (who was one of those whom the Prophet sent with the governors of Yemen):[103] in the year 10, after he had performed the "completion pilgrimage"[104] [and after] Bādhām had died, the Prophet accordingly divided up his governorship among the following: Shahr b. Bādhām, ʿĀmir b. Shahr al-Ham-

---

100. For the beginning of this account, see Ṭabarī, I, 1795ff.; tr. I. K. Poonawala, The History of al-Ṭabarī, IX, 164ff. A parallel version of this segment as far as p. 34, is found in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 336–41; another as far as p. 20, is in Nuwayrī, 50–51. Ṭabarī returns to the riddah in Yemen, p. 158, below. The rebel's cognomen was "al-Aswad" ("the black one"); his tribe, ʿAns b. Mālik, was a settled tribe of Madhḥij living mainly in the northern highlands of Yemen and in part near Najrān; cf. Caskel, II, 190. On his proper name, see note 172, below.

101. One of the Abnāʾ ("sons"), descendants of Persians sent to Yemen around A.D 570 by the Sasanian king Khusraw Anūshirwān. Balansī, infra; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil; and Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 163, give his name as Bādhān; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 105ff., has Bādhām. On the name (properly Bādhān) see Justi, 56.

102. See note 53, above.

103. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 153.

104. Ḥijjat al-tamām, presumably another term for the Prophet's last pilgrimage of the year A.H 10, more usually called the "farewell pilgrimage" (ḥijjat al-wadāʿ), during which he is reported to have said, "Today I have completed for you your faith." It is apparently also called "pilgrimage of Islam" (ḥijjat al-islām). I thank E. Landau-Tasseron for clarifying the relationship of these terms (personal communication).

dānī,[105] ʿAbdallāh b. Qays Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī,[106] Khālid b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ,[107] al-Ṭāhir b. Abī Hālah,[108] Yaʿlā b. Umayyah,[109] and ʿAmr b. Ḥazm;[110] and over the Ḥaḍramawt country Ziyād b. Labīd al-Bayāḍī;[111] and ʿUkkāshah b. Thawr b. Aṣghar al-Ghawthī[112] over the Sakāsik, Sakūn, and Muʿāwiyah b. Kindah.[113] And he sent Muʿādh b. Jabal[114] as teacher to the people of the countries of Yemen and Ḥaḍramawt.

According to ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf b. ʿUmar—Abū ʿAmr, mawlā of Ibrāhīm b. Ṭalḥah—ʿUbādah b. Qurṣ b. ʿUbādah b.[115] Qurṣ al-Laythī: The Prophet returned to Medina after completing the pilgrimage of Islam,[116] having arranged the government of the Yemen. He divided it among [a number of] men, making each man unchallenged in his territory. He arranged [also] the command of Ḥaḍramawt, dividing it among

---

105. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 83, says merely that he was a Yemeni tribesman, one of the Prophet's governors of Yemen, who later settled in al-Kūfah.

106. Yemeni tribesman who came to the Prophet in 7/628; he later had an important military and political career. See *EI*², s.v. "Al-Ashʿarī, Abū Mūsā" (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

107. An Umayyad of Quraysh, one of the earliest Muslims; the Prophet sent him to Yemen as a collector of taxes with the Yemeni convert Farwah b. Musayk. He later had a controversial military and political career. See *EI*², s.v. "Khālid b. Saʿīd" (H. Loucel).

108. Son of the Prophet's first wife, Khadījah, considered a member of the tribe of Tamīm, which was allied with the ʿAbd al-Dār clan of Quraysh; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 50. Diyārbakrī, II, 153, omits his name from the list.

109. A Tamīmī, ally of the Banū Nawfal of Quraysh, who embraced Islam at the conquest of Mecca. This passage and another from Sayf (p. 158, below) suggest that he was sent to Yemen by the Prophet, but Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 128–29; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, s.v.; and even another account by Sayf (Ṭabarī, I, 2162) suggest that he may not have gone to Yemen until the time of Abū Bakr or ʿUmar.

110. He seems to have been a Khazrajī of Banū al-Najjār from Medina; cf. Caskel, I, Table 186, II, 176. However, Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 98–99, provides several alternative genealogies for him.

111. A Khazrajī from Medina, he emigrated to Mecca and embraced Islam before the Prophet's hijrah to Medina; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 217; Ibn Saʿd, III/2, 131.

112. Other sources add nothing to what is given here by Sayf.

113. Three tribes of Ḥaḍramawt, genealogically subdivisions of Kindah but at this time politically independent; cf. Caskel, I, Table 233, II, 413, 503.

114. An early Medinan convert to Islam renowned for his religious knowledge; Ibn Saʿd, III/2, 120–26.

115. Reading ibn for ʿan, following Emendanda.

116. Hijjat al-islām; cf. note 104, above.

three [persons], each one of whom he made unchallenged in his territory. Over Najrān[117] he appointed ʿAmr b. Ḥazm; Khālid b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ he appointed over what was between Najrān and Rimaʿ and Zabīd;[118] ʿĀmir b. Shahr he appointed over Hamdān;[119] over Ṣanʿā', [he placed] Ibn Bādhām; over 'Akk and the Ashʿarīs,[120] [he placed] al-Ṭāhir b. Abī Hālah; over Maʾrib,[121] [he placed] Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī; and over al-Janad,[122] [he placed] Yaʿlā b. Umayyah. Muʿādh [b. Jabal] was the teacher, [1853] who used to make the rounds in the district of each governor of the Yemen and Ḥaḍramawt.[123] And [the Prophet] appointed to the governorships of Ḥaḍramawt: ʿUkkāshah b. Thawr over the Sakāsik and Sakūn; over Muʿāwiyah b. Kindah, ʿAbdallāh[124] or al-Muhājir,[125] who then fell ill and did not go until Abū Bakr sent him;[126] and over Ḥaḍramawt[127] [he appointed] Ziyād b.

---

117. An important town on the northern edge of the Yemen, renowned for its Christian population on the eve of Islam; cf. Yāqūt, s.v.

118. Zabīd was the main town of the Yemeni Tihāmah or coastal plain, situated about 100 km north of the Bāb al-Mandab. According to Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 105, Khālid (or al-Muhājir b. Abī Umayyah?) governed Ṣanʿā'. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 336, does not mention Rimaʿ, a valley leading down to the Red Sea coast about 20 km north of the city of Zabīd and its valley (cf. Yāqūt, s.v. "Zabīd"; Hamdānī, 71; TAVO B VII 1; Wilson, 31).

119. Large tribe and territory north of Ṣanʿā': *EI*², s.v. "Hamdān" (J. Schleifer—W. M. Watt); TAVO B VII 1.

120. Ashʿar was a tribe of the Tihāmah coastal plain located between Mukhah (Mocha) and Zabīd; 'Akk lived in the Tihāmah north of Ashʿar. Cf. Caskel, II, 150, 200; *EI*², s.v. "'Akk" (W. Caskel).

121. Important town on the eastern desert edge of the Yemeni highlands, ca. 140 km due east of Ṣanʿā' (TAVO B VII 1); in antiquity the capital of the kingdom of Saba' (Sheba).

122. Large town in Yemen about 200 km due south of Ṣanʿā' and, with Ṣanʿā' and Ḥaḍramawt, normally one of the three administrative seats of southwestern Arabia (Yāqūt, s.v.).

123. I.e., to teach Qur'ān and prayer?

124. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 146, proposed that this was Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī; note, however, that Abū Mūsā figures as governor of Maʾrib in the immediately preceding list.

125. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 105, identifies this as al-Muhājir b. Abī Umayyah; he was of the Makhzūm clan of Quraysh and full brother of the Prophet's wife Umm Salamah (Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 322–23).

126. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 336–37, suggests that this refers to the Prophet's illness, having delayed the dispatch of the governor.

127. I.e., over the valley of Ḥaḍramawt proper, as opposed to the whole province of the same name?

Labīd al-Bayāḍī, who assumed [also] the governorate of al-Muhājir. So, when the Apostle of God died, these were his governors over the Yemen and Ḥaḍramawt, excepting those who had been killed in fighting al-Aswad or had [otherwise] died—those being Bādhām, who died and because of [whose death] the Prophet divided up his governorate, and his son Shahr b. Bādhām, against whom al-Aswad marched to fight him, killing him. This account was [also] related to me according to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb b. Ibrāhīm—Sayf—Abū ʿAmr, mawlā of Ibrāhīm b. Ṭalḥah; then the rest of the account was according to his isnād like the account of Ibn Saʿd[128] al-Zuhrī.

According to al-Sarı—Shuʿayb b. Ibrāhīm—Sayf—Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam—ʿIkrimah—Ibn ʿAbbās: The first ones who resisted al-ʿAnsī and tried to match his numbers[129] were ʿĀmir b. Shahr al-Hamdānī,[130] in his district, and Fayrūz and Dādhawayh[131] in their districts. Then there followed those who had been assigned commands.

According to ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿd[132]—his uncle—Sayf; and according to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—his father —ʿUbayd b. Ṣakhr:[133] While we were in al-Janad,[134] having [1854] laid out for them what [conditions] were necessary and having drawn up agreements between us, a letter arrived from al-Aswad. [It said:] "Oh you who are marching against us: Grasp firmly against us that which you have taken of our land, and hold back that which you have gathered, for we are more entitled to it, as long as you are [in the situation] you are." So we asked the messenger from where he had come. He replied:

128. Reading with Cairo edition and Emendanda; text has Saʿīd.

129. Text: kātharahu; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 83, has kābarahu "strove to overcome him," which makes more sense. Cf. Caetani, 678.

130. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 337, says it was Shahr, not ʿĀmir b. Shahr.

131. Both were of the Abnāʾ and embraced Islam under the Prophet; cf. Ibn Saʿd, V, 389–90. The names are of Middle Persian origin, cf. F. Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 100, 247 (s.v. Pērōz) and 75–76 (s.v. Dādhōē).

132. See note 53, above.

133. Cf. Nuwayrī, 51–53 (to p. 25); al-Masʿūdī, 276–77; Caetani, 678–80.

134. Reading with Cairo ed. and Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 146, for "with the army" given in the text.

"From the cave of Khubbān."[135] Then he directed himself toward Najrān until he took it ten [days] after coming out [in rebellion], and the bulk of Madhḥij submitted to him.[136] So, while we were taking care of our business and gathering our force, someone came to us and said, "This al-Aswad is in Shaʿūb."[137] Shahr b. Bādhām had gone out against him twenty days after the beginning [of his revolt], and while we were awaiting the news of who would be defeated, we learned that [al-Aswad] had killed Shahr and routed the Abnā'[138] and taken possession of Ṣanʿā', twenty-five days from his uprising. Muʿādh [b. Jabal] fled until he passed by Abū Mūsā while he was in Maʾrib, and the two then rushed to Ḥaḍramawt.[139] Muʿādh settled among the Sakūn, and Abū Mūsā among the Sakāsik that are adjacent to al-Mufawwur,[140] with the desert between them and Maʾrib. The other commanders withdrew to al-Ṭāhir [b. Abī Hālah], except for ʿAmr and Khālid,[141] who returned to Medina. Al-Ṭāhir at that time was in the midst of the ʿAkk country, facing Ṣanʿā'.[142] Al-Aswad subdued [the territory] between Ṣayhad—the desert of Ḥaḍramawt[143]—to

135. Yāqūt, s.v. "Khubbān," evidently on the basis of this report or one like it, describes it as a village in a valley of the same name near Najrān. Cf. Al-Hamdānī, 101, on wādī Khubbān.

136. Or "aided him": ṭābaqahu; but the verb often has a sexual connotation; cf. Ibn Manẓūr, X, 211. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 337, has "followed him." Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 155, bottom; Balansī, 151ff. Madhḥij was a large tribe or tribal confederation of the Yemen, which later played an important role in the Islamic conquests in Egypt and Syria. Cf. EI[2], s.v. "Madhḥidj" (C. E. Bosworth—G. R. Smith).

137. Yāqūt, s.v.: a high fortress near Ṣanʿā'.

138. Cf. note 101, above; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 105.

139. Diyārbakri, II, 156, ll. 9–10.

140. The editor notes that the reading is uncertain. Kosegarten offered "Aẓfūr." Neither al-Mufawwar nor Aẓfūr was known to Hamdānī or Yāqūt. Nuwayrī omitted the phrase.

141. I.e., ʿAmr b. Ḥazm and Khālid b. Saʿīd. Diyārbakrī, II, 156 l. 10, has "ʿAmr b. Khālid."

142. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 337, has "in the mountains of Ṣanʿā'." Neither reading is entirely satisfactory from the point of view of content, as the ʿAkk lived not near Ṣanʿā' but in the Tihāmah coastal region; cf. two sentences farther on in text and note 120, above.

143. Text, Nuwayrī, 52, and all manuscripts read ṣ.h.y.d, and Cairo ed. has Ṣahīd, but this must refer to the well-known desert district. Cf. p. 182, below, the province of al-Ṭāʾif [to the north], to al-Baḥrayn in the direction of Aden.[144] The Yemen submitted to him, while the [1855] ʿAkk in the Tihāmah were resisting him, and [his movement] began to advance like wildfire. The day he met Shahr [in battle] he had with him seven hundred horsemen, in addition to the camel riders; his commanders were Qays b. ʿAbd Yaghūth al-Murādī,[145] Muʿāwiyah b. Qays al-Janbī,[146] Yazīd b. M.h.r.m., Yazīd b. Ḥuṣayn al-Ḥārithī, and Yazīd b. al-Afkal al-Azdī.[147] His rule became stable; his order was considered harsh. Some of the coastal districts submitted to him—Jāzān [and] ʿAthr and al-Sharjah and al-Ḥirdah and Ghalāfiqah and Aden;[148] and al-Janad where Sayf describes "ṣ.h.y.d" as "the desert between Ma'rib and Ḥaḍramawt"—i.e., Ṣayhad. Cf. Hamdānī, index; and Ibn Manẓūr, III, 260.

---

144. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 146, notes that no place named al-Baḥrayn is known in the region of Aden. There seems to be some problem with the text here. Perhaps it read "to al-Baḥrayn and in the direction of Aden," so that al-Baḥrayn could be taken to refer to the well-known district of that name in eastern Arabia, for the sentence seems at this point to be enumerating regions beyond the Yemen highlands that were following al-Aswad. Cf. Nuwayrī, 50, who states that al-Aswad overcame the area from Ṣanʿā' to ʿUmān to al-Ṭāʾif—i.e., the whole southern half of the Arabian peninsula. Cf. also note 148, below. Although in Islamic times the term "al-Baḥrayn" came to be used for the whole east Arabian littoral from the head of the Persian Gulf to ʿUmān, in earlier usage it referred to the largest oasis cluster of northeastern Arabia, ca. 60 km inland from the coast near the modern country called al-Baḥrayn. Its main center was the oasis of Hajar. Cf. Thilo, s.v. "Baḥrayn"; Wüstenfeld, "Bahrein und Jemâma," 175–76.

145. Originally of the tribe of Bajīlah, but an ally of the Murād clan of Madhḥij, for whom he became an important warrior. There is confusion about his name, which sometimes appears as Qays b. Hubayra "al-Makshūḥ," Qays b. ʿAbd Yaghūth b. Makshūḥ, or more commonly, simply Qays b. al-Makshūḥ: cf. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 105–6; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 337; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 222, 227–28; p. 165, below; and Emendanda, where Qays b. Makshūḥ b. ʿAbd Yaghūth is proposed.

146. Caskel, II, 257, lists Janb as a group of Madhḥij living near modern Khamīs Mushayṭ.

147. I have found no other references to any of these three Yazīds.

148. Text has "Ḥāz ʿAthr." These places were along the Red Sea coast north of Aden, as mentioned in Hamdānī, 52, ll. 9–15, which even offers them in the same sequence (in reverse) and clarifies that "Ḥāz" and ʿAthr (also ʿAththar; cf. Hamdānī, 54 l. 11 and index) are two places. There were several places named Ḥāz, Ḥāzzah, etc., in Yemen; they seem to have been situated in the mountains, not along the coast, but their names may have caused a copyist to corrupt the name Jāzān to "Ḥāz." Cf. Hamdānī, index, s.v. "Ḥāz" (there misprinted as "Jāz"!); Wilson, 125–26. On Jāzān (modern Jīzān or Jayzān, in southern Saudi Arabia) see EI^{2}, s.v. "Djayzān" (G. Rentz).

and then Ṣanʿā' to the province of al-Ṭā'if [and] to al-Aḥsiyah[149] and ʿUlayb.[150] The Muslims dealt with him out of fear;[151] the apostates dealt with him out of disbelief and turning back from Islam. His lieutenant among Madhḥij was ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib.[152] He based his command on a group of warriors; as for the command of his army, it was in the hands of Qays b. ʿAbd Yaghūth, and he put command of the Abnā' in charge of Fayrūz and Dādhawayh. Then, after he had made much slaughter in the land, he made light of Qays and Fayrūz and Dādhawayh and married the wife of Shahr,[153] who was Fayrūz's niece. [In Ḥaḍramawt][154] we were on the verge of Muʿādh's marriage into the Banū Bakr, a clan of Sakūn, to a woman named Ramlah, whose maternal uncles were the Banū Zankīl,[155] so [1856] that they had become fond of us because of his kinship [with them]. Muʿādh admired her greatly; indeed he used to say when he prayed to God, "Oh God, raise me up on Judgment Day with the Sakūn," and sometimes, "Oh God, be forgiving to

149. This toponym was unknown to Hamdānī; Yāqūt knew of it directly from accounts of the riddah and related that, when al-Aswad expelled the Prophet's governors in Yemen, Farwah b. Musayk, who had been the Prophet's governor over the Murād clan, set up camp in al-Aḥsiyah. This part of the text, however, is suspiciously similar to a passage several lines earlier that also begins with the phrase "to the province of al-Ṭā'if" (cf. note 144, above); one wonders whether the otherwise unknown "al-Aḥsiyah" is not actually a copyist's error for al-Aḥsā', the oasis district in the region of al-Baḥrayn, and whether ʿUlayb—the localization of which was evidently a problem for the geographers (see note 150, below)—is not an erroneous reading of ʿAdan/Aden. Or should we, following the principle of lectio difficilior, propose that the errors proceeded the other way around, so that al-Aḥsiyah and ʿUlayb came to be misread as al-Aḥsā' (then revised to al-Baḥrayn) and Aden? In any case, the possibility that one of these phrases represents a dittography should be noted.

150. Apparently a place in the Tihāmah (Yāqūt, s.v.) or in the Sarāt mountains north of Yemen (Hamdānī, 181 ll. 12ff.), perhaps as far north as Mecca or Medina. Nuwayrī, 52, has "and elsewhere" (wa-ghayrihā).

151. Reading taqiyya, with Emendanda, for baqiyya in the text and Nuwayrī.

152. Leading chief, warrior, and poet of the Zubayd clan of Madhḥij, said to have embraced Islam in Medina shortly before the Prophet's death; cf. EI[2] s.v. "ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib" (C. Pellat); Caskel, II, 178.

153. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 156 ll. 11–12; Balansi, 151: al-Aswad marries the wife of Shahr's father, Bādhān.

154. At this point an enormous sentence has been broken into several parts in the translation and the clauses rearranged.

155. Thus the text, but probably Zankabīl; cf. Caskel, II, 605.

Sakūn." While we were in this state in Ḥaḍramawt and not free from fear that al-Aswad might march against us or send an army against us, or that some rebel might arise in Ḥaḍramawt demanding what al-Aswad demanded, lo and behold, letters reached us from the Prophet. In them he commanded us to send men to seek out (al-Aswad) by deceit, or to assault him [openly], and to tell about that, on the Prophet's behalf, everyone who desired anything from him. Muʿādh accordingly undertook what he was ordered to do, so that we grew powerful and became confident of victory.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf; and according to ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf—al-Mustanīr b. Yazīd—ʿUrwah b. Ghaziyyah al-Dathīnī—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Fayrūz; and according to al-Sarī—Jushaysh[156] b. al-Daylamī; and according to ʿUbaydallāh b. Jushaysh b. al-Daylamī:[157] Wabr b. Yuḥannis[158] came to us with the Prophet's letter, in which he ordered us to stand firm in our religion[159] and to rise up in war and to take action against al-Aswad either by stealth or by brute force.[160] [And he ordered] that we inform on his behalf anyone whom we thought to be of help and obedient; so we did accordingly, and we saw that the matter was difficult. And we saw that (al-Aswad) was resentful toward Qays b. ʿAbd Yaghūth, who was in command of his army. So we said [to ourselves] that (Qays) would be in fear for his life, so he would be ready to be invited[161] [to join our cause], so we invited him, telling him of the matter and informing him on the Prophet's behalf. It was as if we had descended upon him from heaven while he was in perplexity and sadness over his situation, so he responded [affirmatively] to what we wished in [1857]

156. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 338, and Kosegarten have "Jishnas"; but cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 283, s.v. "Jushaysh al-Daylamī." Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 146, proposed Jushnas (< Middle Persian "Gushnasp"). Cf. Dhahabī, Mushtabih, 186.

157. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 156–57, and Nuwayrī, 53–58, for loose paraphrases of this account as far as p. 33, below. Cf. also Caetani, 680–85.

158. One of the Abnāʾ who embraced Islam; cf. Ibn Saʿd, V, 388–89, Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 83; Balansī, 152; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, s.v. His name (Wabr or Wabar or Wabrah?) and exact identity are somewhat confused.

159. Or, possibly, "in our obedience": dīn.

160. Lit., "by clashing."

161. Fa-huwa la-awwalu daʿwatan.

that. Wabr b. Yuḥannis came to us, and we wrote to the people calling them [to Islam].

Satan told [al-Aswad] something [about this], so he sent to Qays and said, "Oh Qays, [do you know] what this one [i.e., Satan] is saying?" [Qays] said, "[No,] what is he saying?" [Al-Aswad] replied, "He is saying [to me], 'You relied on Qays and honored him, to the point that he had your complete trust[162] and had become like you in power. Then he inclined toward your enemy and schemed after your kingship and because of treachery determined that he would say, "Oh Aswad, oh Aswad, shame, shame!"[163] Pluck the top of him and take from Qays his highest part; if not he will dispossess you or pluck the top of you.'"[164] At this Qays, swearing a [false] oath, said—"Oh Dhū al-Khimār,[165] you are too important to me and too illustrious that I should be envious of you." Whereupon [al-Aswad] said, "How crude of you! Do you [dare] call the angel[166] a liar? The angel spoke the truth; now I know that you have repented because of what [Satan] made known about you."

Then [Qays] went out and, coming to us, said, "Oh Jushaysh and Fayrūz and Dādhawayh, there were words between us; what is [your] opinion?" So we said, "We should be wary." We were in that [state] when [al-Aswad] sent to us, saying, "Did I not honor you above [others in] your tribes? Did [Satan] not keep me informed about you?" To this we said, "Forgive us this time." Whereupon he replied, "Don't let me hear [anything] about you or I shall kill you."[167] So we got away, barely, while he was 162. Lit., "entered every entering from you." This whole passage, with its quotation within a quotation, is awkward to render.

---

163. Or perhaps "you prick, you prick"; yā saw'ah yā saw'ah.

164. I.e., Satan tells al-Aswad to behead Qays before Qays beheads him. Cf. note 174, below.

165. The text has "By Dhū al-Khimār," but Dhū al-Khimār, "the one with the veil," was the nickname of al-Aswad himself [see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 105], and it seems unlikely that Qays would have sworn an oath on his name. However, making this emendation removes from the sentence the formal oath, which the context requires. Perhaps the original was "By God, Oh Dhū al-Khimār."

166. Al-Aswad here refers to Satan as his "angel." One wonders if the text might originally have had malik, "king", instead of mal'ak or malak ("angel").

167. Reading with Cairo ed., following Kosegarten, for "dismiss you" [uqīlaka] in the Leiden text. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 338, avoided the difficulties in doubt over our situation and that of Qays, and we were in doubt and great danger. Then [news] reached us of the opposition against him on the part of 'Āmir b. Shahr and Dhū Zūd and Dhū Murrān and Dhū al-Kalā' and Dhū Ẓulaym;[168] they wrote to us and offered us help, and we wrote back to them and instructed them not to put anything in motion until we should [1858] arrange the matter thoroughly. They only became agitated over that when the letter of the Prophet arrived. The Prophet wrote to the people of Najrān, to their Arabs and to the non-Arab inhabitants of the country, so they stood firm and regrouped[169] and gathered in a single place. Learning of that, (al-Aswad) sensed disaster. We hatched a plan, and accordingly I went to visit Āzād, (al-Aswad's) wife,[170] saying to her, "Oh my cousin, you know the misfortune this man represents for your people; he has killed your husband, made excessive slaughter among your people, humiliated those who remained of them, and disgraced the women. So might you have some conspiracy against him?" At this she replied, "To what end?" I said, "To expel him." She added, "Or to kill him?" I replied, "Or to kill him." She said, "Yes, by God. God has created no one more hateful to me than he is. He does not attend to what is right [even] for the sake of God, nor does he refrain from what is forbidden[171] for His sake. So when you have resolved [what to do], let me know so that I may inform you of how this may be

---

(as usual) and gave the following gist of this passage: "He sent to us, threatening us, so we made excuses to him and barely saved ourselves from him, he being in doubt about us and we being wary of him."

168. Cf. p. 165, below. These are all epithets used as names, evidently referring to South Arabian chiefs. 'Umayr "Dhū Murrān" was a chief of Hamdān who had had written contact with the Prophet (Hamdānī, 99 ll. 4–5; cf. Harding, 542, on the name DMRN in Minaean inscriptions); Dhū al-Kalā' was the most powerful tribe of South Arabia on the eve of Islam, probably represented here by its chief, Samayfa' b. Nākūr "Dhū al-Kalā' al-Aṣghar" (Caskel, II, 236, 510); Dhū Ẓulaym was a clan of the Alḥān b. Mālik tribe that lived southwest of Ṣan'ā', probably represented here by its chief Ḥawshab b. Yazīd (Caskel, II, 152, 322). I could find nothing on Dhū Zūd besides the reference on p. 165, below.

169. Lit., "turned aside."

170. Azād or Azādh had been the wife of Shahr b. Bādhām and was the cousin of Fayrūz; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 6, s.v. "Shahr b. Bādhām." Her name is Iranian (< Azāta "free, noble"); cf. Justi, 54.

171. Or, perhaps, "from womenfolk." Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 338.

accomplished." And so I was going out, [when] all of a sudden there were Fayrūz and Dādhawayh waiting for me. Qays came, and we wanted to rise against (al-Aswad), but then a man [arrived and] said to (Qays), before he could sit with us, "The king summons you." Accordingly (Qays) entered with ten [men] of Madhḥij and Hamdān, so that (al-Aswad) was unable to kill him.

According to al-Sarī in his account: Then ʿAyhalah b. Kaʿb b. Ghawth[172] said, (or, according to ʿUbaydallāh in his account, "ʿAbhalah b. Kaʿb b. Ghawth said")[173] "Do you fortify yourself against me with men? [i.e., "How dare you fortify yourself against me with men?] Did I not tell you the truth, whereas you lie to me? (Satan) says, 'Shame! shame! If you do not cut the hand from Qays he will cut the heights from your head.'"[174] [He [1859] went on like this], until (Qays) thought that (al-Aswad) would kill him. Whereupon (Qays) said, "Indeed, it was not right for me to kill you, as you are an apostle of God, so do with me what you will. As for fear and terror, I am in both of them [anyway], in dread [that you will kill me].[175] Kill me, for one death is easier for me than deaths I die every day (or, according to al-Zuhrī: and as for your killing me, one death is easier)." At this, (al-Aswad) took pity on (Qays) and sent him out. So (Qays) came out to us and told us [what had happened] and stayed with us and said, "Do your deed."

(Al-Aswad)[176] came out against us with a group, so we stood at attention for him. [Now] at the gate were one hundred cows and camels, so he stood up and drew a line so that they were

172. I.e., al-Aswad. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 336; and Al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 105, state that his proper name was ʿAyhalah, but he was called by his nickname "al-Aswad," "the black," because of his color. Diyārbakrī, II, 155; and Nuwayrī, 49, 55 (as well as Tabarī, I, 1795) also have the form ʿAbhalah.

173. Text has "Oh ʿAyhalah," so that the subject of "he said" must be someone other than al-Aswad. I have followed the suggestion of Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 147, who proposed that the vocative particle "oh" should be dropped, as the context makes it clear that the words spoken immediately after must have been uttered by al-Aswad, not to him.

174. Text has yaqṭaʿu qunnataka al-ʿulyā "he will cut off your highest part," i.e., "your head;" Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 339, suggests raqabataka "your neck." Cf. note 164, above.

175. This emendation is introduced in the Cairo ed. from Nuwayrī.

176. This seems to be the beginning of another version of the narrative, not very neatly integrated into the story told so far.

situated behind it and he stood before it. Then he cut their throats, [they being] neither corralled nor bound, [but] none of them plunged across the line. Then he let them go, so that they roamed around until they passed away. I have never seen a more repulsive scene than that or a more brutal day. Then he said, "Is what I have learned about you true, Fayrūz?" and he pointed the lance at him. "I had intended to cut your throat, making you follow this beast." At this (Fayrūz) said, "You chose us to be your in-laws and gave us precedence over the [rest of the] Abnā'. [Even] if you had not been a prophet we would not have sold our share with you for anything; so how [could we reject you], after the promise[177] of [both] an afterlife and a present life[178] has been gathered to us by you? You should not believe what you have heard about us, for indeed we are where you wish."[179] At this (al-Aswad) said, "Divide this, as you are most knowledgeable of whoever is hereabouts." Then the people of Ṣan'ā' began to gather to me, so I began to order that the slaughtered camels be given to the clan, the cows to the family, [1860] and the equipment to the needy,[180] until the people of each district[181] had taken their share. Then, before he reached his house—while he was watching me[182]—a man overtook him who denounced Fayrūz to him. (Al-Aswad) was listening closely to him, and Fayruz overheard him while he was saying, "I will kill him tomorrow with his companions, so come to me early in the morning." Then (al-Aswad) turned and, lo and behold, there was (Fayrūz). So he said [to the man], "Shhh!"[183] Then [Fayrūz] informed him of what he had done [by way of distributing the meat], at which (al-Aswad) said, "Excellent work." Then (al-Aswad) struck his riding animal and went in. (Fayrūz) returned 177. Lit., "matter" (amr).

178. Nuwayrī, 55, has "a faith" (dīnan).
179. I.e., our loyalties are with you.
180. The three terms are raht (clan), ahl al-bayt (family), and ahl al-khallah (needy), respectively. Nuwayrī, 56, and Cairo edition, following Kosegarten, read "people of the settlements" (ahl al-ḥillah).
181. Nāhiyah.
182. Or "standing over me" (wa-huwa wāqifun 'alayya).
183. Or "hold it!" (mah!). Alternatively, we might construe this as "So he said [to Fayrūz], "Yes?" as seems to be suggested by Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 147.

to us and told us the news. At this we sent to Qays, [telling him] that he should come to us. Together they agreed[184] that I should return to the woman to inform her of our decision, so she might tell us what she would order [us to do]. So I went to the woman and said, "What do you think?" She replied, "He is cautious and [closely] guarded. Every part of the palace is surrounded by the guard, except this room; the rear of it is at such-and-such a place on the street, so, when evening has come, break into it; you will then be inside the guard, and nothing will stand in the way of killing him." Then she said, "In [the room] you will find a lamp and weapons." Then I went out; but, when al-Aswad met me coming out of one of his residences, he said to me, "What are you doing here?"[185] and slapped my head so [hard] that I fell down, for he was powerfully built. The woman screamed so that he was startled away from me; but for that he would have killed me. She said, "My cousin came to visit me, but you have treated me meanly!" At this he said, "Shut up, you nobody![186] I hereby give him to you." So she spared me.[187] So I came to my companions, saying, "Help! Get away!" and I told them the news. We were in this state, confused, when all of a sudden [the woman's] messenger came to me, [saying], "Don't give up what [1861] you were going to do when I left you, for I will continue to be with him until he goes to sleep." So[188] we said to Fayrūz, "Go to her and make sure of her. As for me, there is no way for me to enter after being thrown out [by al-Aswad]."[189] He did so; he was more clever than I. So after she had informed him [of the

184. Lit., "their council agreed."

185. Lit., "What brought you to visit me?"

186. Or, "You bastard!" lit., "May you have no father!"

187. Fa-tazāyalat ʿannī. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 147, proposed that the text should read fa-tazāyala, with al-Aswad as the subject; De Goeje, Glossary, wished to leave the text unchanged and proposed that it meant "she hid herself from me." The act of handing a captive over to a petitioner who had requested him was a common gesture of magnanimity among chiefs of pre-Islamic and early Islamic Arabia. The idea was that the petitioner could decide the captive's fate—either to free him, as in this instance, or to inflict a more hideous punishment on him than the king might have, in the case of a captive who was a personal enemy of the petitioner.

188. The following eight sentences are omitted from Nuwayrī, 56.

189. Lit., "there is no way for me to enter after the prohibition [al-nahy]."

plan], he said,[190] "And how may we break into lined rooms?"[191] [She replied,[192]] "We must remove the lining of the room." So the two of them entered and removed the lining, whereupon they locked it and he sat with her as if he were a visitor. Then [al-Aswad] came to visit her and became consumed with jealousy, but she explained to him [Fayrūz's] kinship and foster-relationship with her [and that] he was within the forbidden degrees of consanguinity.[193] At this, [al-Aswad] screamed at him and threw him out, and he brought us the news. When it was evening we put our plan into effect, our partisans having agreed with us [beforehand]. We went ahead before making contact with the Hamdānīs and Ḥimyarīs[194] and broke into the room from the outside. Then we entered and in it was a lamp under a large bowl. We protected ourselves [by letting] Fayrūz, who was the bravest and strongest of us, [go first][195] and said: "Look [and see] what you can see." So he went out, while we were between [al-Aswad] and the guards that were with him in the compound. When [Fayrūz] got near the door of the room, he heard a loud snoring, and, lo, there was the woman, sitting up. Then, when [Fayrūz] stood by the door, Satan made [al-Aswad] sit up and address him with his tongue. He was snoring as he sat and also saying, "I have nothing to do with you, oh Fayrūz!" At this [Fayrūz] feared that if he went back he and the woman would be

190. Cairo ed. has "she said"; this change would eliminate the need for the emendation introduced later in the sentence [see Note 192, below].

191. Buyūt mubaṭṭanah, i.e., rooms having a biṭānah, or "lining"; cf. next two sentences. The meaning is obscure. E. Landau-Tasseron suggests that this reference may be to a tent, in which case biṭānah means an inner divider or wall hanging, but the general sense of the paragraph is that the house was one with solid walls. Perhaps it is simply a way of saying the "inner sanctum" or personal chambers of the ruler in a palace complex; cf. The Assyrian Dictionary, II, s.v. "bītānu." The root b–ṭ–n does not seem to be attested in the Sabaic or Sabaean dialect of Old South Arabic.

192. This addition was suggested by Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 147. Cf. note 190, above.

193. I.e., closely enough related to her so that they could not marry, meaning that he was formally a part of her family and could visit her without arousing suspicion or causing disgrace.

194. Ḥimyar b. ʿĀmir was a large South Arabian nation or tribe that had provided the last Yemeni dynasty of rulers. Cf. Caskel, II, 324.

195. Ittaqaynā bi-Fayrūz; translation following Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 147.

killed. So he acted first and came on him [from behind as if to mount him] like a camel.[196] He took his head and killed him by breaking his neck and placing his knee on his back and breaking it. Then he got up to go out. At this the woman, thinking that he had not killed him, took hold of his robe saying, "Why[197] are you leaving me?" [Fayrūz] replied, "To inform my companions of his death." Then [Fayrūz] came to us, and we went off with [1862] him wishing to cut off [al-Aswad's] head; but Satan made him move, tossing about so that [Fayrūz] could not restrain him. Whereupon I said, "[All of you] sit on his chest." So two [of us] sat on his chest, and the woman took hold of his hair. We heard a muttering noise, so I bridled him[198] with a rag, and [Fayrūz] passed the knife over his gullet. At this he bellowed, like the loudest bellowing of a bull that I have ever heard, so that the guards hurried to the door—they were around the compound—and said, "What's this? What's this?" Whereupon the woman replied, "It is [only] the prophet, receiving revelations." Then he passed away.[199]

We stayed up all night discussing among ourselves how to notify our supporters, there being none other [present] than the three of us—Fayrūz, Dādhawayh, and Qays.[200] Consequently we agreed to give our war cry that we had with our supporters, and then to make the call to prayer. When the dawn appeared, therefore, Dādhawayh called out the war cry, terrifying [both] the Muslims and the unbelievers. The guards [of al-Aswad] gathered, surrounding us; then I gave the call to prayer. Their horsemen gathered to the guards, so I called out, "I bear witness that Muhammad is the Apostle of God and that ʿAbhalah[201] is a

196. The verb khālaṭa here means "to approach from the rear," as animals do when copulating. The text reads, literally, "he approached him, while he was like the camel."

197. Lit., "where."

198. I.e., held him by his head.

199. Or perhaps "Then he calmed down," i.e., ceased bellowing, but the context makes it clear that he died at this time. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 340, has "they [i.e., the guards] settled down."

200. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 147, remarked that this passage makes clear that the original version of the story was not narrated by Jushaysh (cf. p. 25, above).

201. I.e., al-Aswad. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 340; Kosegarten; and Manuscript C: ʿAyhalah.

liar," and we threw his head to them. Then Wabr performed the ritual prayer. The men [of al-Aswad] launched an attack, so we called out, "Oh people of Ṣanʿā', whoever has [one of al-Aswad's men] as a visitor, take hold of him, and whoever [of you] has one of them with him, take hold of him." And I called out to whoever was in the street, "Seize whomever you can." [But] then [al-Aswad's men also] snatched up many boys and seized [things]. Then they departed, going out [of the city]; but, when they emerged, seventy of their horsemen and [camel] riders were missing, and lo! the townspeople[202] had brought them to us. [For our part,] we were missing seven hundred household members. Then we wrote to each other, [agreeing] that they should leave for us what they held and that we should leave for them what we held. So they did this, leaving [Ṣanʿā'] without winning anything from us. Then they returned to [the [1863] region] between Ṣanʿā' and Najrān. Ṣanʿā' and al-Janad became clear [of them], and God made Islam and its people strong.

We contended among ourselves over [who should] command. The companions of the Prophet returned one by one to their governorates, whereupon we agreed that Muʿādh b. Jabal [should hold authority];[203] he had used to lead us in prayer. We wrote to the Apostle of God with the news—that was during the lifetime of the Prophet. The news reached him the same day;[204] [subsequently] our messengers arrived, but the Prophet had died the morning of that day, so Abū Bakr replied to us.

According to ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf; and according to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū al-Qāsim al-Shanawī—al-ʿAlā' b. Ziyād—Ibn ʿUmar:[205] The news reached the Prophet from heaven on the night in which [al-Aswad] al-ʿAnsī was killed, that he might bring us the good tidings, so he said, "Al-ʿAnsī was killed

202. Lit., "people of the houses and streets."

203. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 340–41; Kosegarten; and Manuscript C add "bi-al-khabar" or "bi-khabarihi," suggesting that the agreement was to let Muʿādh carry the news of the death of al-Aswad to the Prophet. However, two accounts later Muʿādh is clearly still in Ṣanʿā', not a messenger.

204. I.e., the news reached the Prophet miraculously on the same day as al-Aswad's death; see next account. In this passage laylah "night" has been translated as "day" because the traditional unit of a day in Arabia began with sundown and was called "a night."

205. Cf. Nuwayrī, 59.

last night; a blessed man of a blessed family killed him." He was asked, "And who [is this]?" He replied, "Fayrūz gained the victory, Fayrūz."

According to ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf; and according to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Mustanīr — ʿUrwah — al-Ḍaḥḥāk —Fayrūz:[206] We killed al-Aswad, and our affairs returned to what they had been, except that we sent to Muʿādh [b. Jabal], coming to mutual agreement upon him [as commander]. So he used to lead us in prayer in Ṣanʿā'. We had [high] hopes and expectations, as there remained nothing that displeased us except the matter of those horsemen who were going back and forth between us and Najrān; but by God (Muʿādh) only led us in prayer three times, when the news reached us of the Apostle of God's death; whereupon matters became unsettled and we came to disavow many things we used to acknowledge, and the land became disturbed.

[1864] According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū al-Qāsim and Abū Muḥammad—Abū Zurʿah Yaḥyā b. Abī ʿAmr al-Shaybānī from the province [jund] of Palestine—ʿAbdallāh b. Fayrūz al-Daylamī —his father: The Prophet sent them an envoy named Wabr b. Yuḥannis al-Azdī, who resided with Dādhawayh al-Fārisī. Now al-Aswad was a soothsayer who had Satan with him and followed him; so he rebelled and fell upon the king of Yemen, killing its king and marrying his wife. He ruled the Yemen. Bādhām had died before that, leaving his son in charge of his affairs; so (al-Aswad) killed him and married [his wife].[207] At this, Dādhawayh and Qays b. Makshūḥ al-Murādī and I met with Wabr b. Yuḥannis, the envoy of the Prophet of God, plotting to kill al-Aswad. Subsequently al-Aswad ordered the people to gather in an open area of Ṣanʿā'; then he came out so that he stood in their midst, [carrying] with him the javelin of the king. Then he called for the king's horse; and he speared it in the mouth with the javelin and then let it go, so that [the horse] began to run loose in the city as it bled, until it died. [Then] he stood up in the midst of the open area and called for sacrificial camels from behind the line;[208] whereupon he made them stand with their necks and heads behind the line but not crossing it. Then he met them with his javelin, slitting their throats so that they scattered from him until he was done with them.[209] Then he seized his javelin in his hand, then fell upon the earth in a fit and, raising his head, said that he (that is, his Satan, who was with him) [had told him], "Ibn Makshūḥ is one of the oppressors, oh Aswad; cut off his head."[210] Then he cast his head [down] again to contemplate [and] then raised his head and said that [his Satan] had said, "Ibn al-Daylamī is one of the oppressors, oh Aswad; cut off his right hand and his right leg." Now, when I heard him say that, I said [to myself], "By God, I have no surety but that he might call for me so he could slaughter me with his javelin just as he slaughtered these sacrificial camels." So I [1865] began to hide myself among the people lest he see me, until I went out not knowing in my alarm how I should set out. Then, when I approached my house, one of his people met me and struck me on the neck, saying. "The king summons you, and you sneak off! Go back!" and made me return. When I saw that, I was afraid that he would kill me.

206. Cf. Nuwayrī, 59.

207. The confused syntax and evident repetitions suggest that two or more separate accounts have been combined here. Cf. Caetani, 680–85.

Now hardly ever was any man of us without his dagger, so I slipped my hand in my boot to take hold of my dagger. Then I approached (al-Aswad), wishing to attack him by stabbing him with it until I killed him, and then to kill those with him. But when I drew near him, he saw evil in my face and said, "Stay where you are!" so I stopped. Then he said, "You are the most important of those in this place and the most knowledgeable about the notables of its people, so divide these sacrificial camels among them." [Then] he mounted and left, so I commenced dividing the meat among the people of Ṣan'ā'. Whereupon the one who had struck me on the neck came and said, "Give me some of it." But I said, "No, by God, not one bit. Aren't you the one who struck me on the neck?" At this he 208. Cf. the account on p. 29, above.

209. I.e., presumably those whose throats had been slit ran away from him one by one. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 147 proposed "They fell away on both sides of the line until he was done with them."

210. Lit., "cut the top of his head."

went away angry, so that he came to al-Aswad and informed him of [the treatment] he endured from me and what I had said to him. So, when I had finished, I came to al-Aswad; walking toward him, I overheard the man complaining to him about me, whereupon al-Aswad said to him, "Verily by God I shall slaughter him." Then I said to him, "I have finished what you ordered me to do and have distributed [the meat] among the people." He said, "You have done well" and withdrew; so I left. Then we sent to the king's wife, [saying], "We wish to kill al-Aswad; how [would it be possible] for us [to do so]?" So she sent to me, [saying], "Come on." So I went to her, and she put the servant girl at the door to let us know if (al-Aswad) was coming; and the two of us entered the other house and then dug until we had penetrated [the wall]. Then we came out into the house, letting the curtain drop down; so I said, "Indeed, we shall kill him this very night." Then (the servant girl) said, "Come on!" Then, before I realized it, there was al-Aswad; he had entered [1866] the house, and there he was with us; whereupon violent jealousy took hold of him, so that he began to strike my neck. I kept him away from me and went out to bring my companions [news] of what I had done. I was sure that our scheme against him was undone; [but] then the messenger of the woman came to us [with her message]: "(Al-Aswad) has not disrupted your plot at all, as long as you are [still] considering [it]. For, after you went out, I said to him, 'Don't you people allege that you are generous and possessors of noble deeds?' He said, 'Of course.' So I said, 'My brother came to greet me and to honor me, and then you fell upon him, striking his neck until you expelled him. So that was your generosity toward him?' And I kept heaping blame on him until he came to blame himself and said, 'He is your brother?' So I told him, 'Yes.' At this he said, 'I didn't realize [that].' So come tonight when you wish."

According to al-Daylamī: So we were reassured. We agreed to come by night, Dādhawayh and Qays and I, in order to enter the farthest house by the breach that we had made. Whereupon I said, "Oh Qays, you are the hero (fāris) of the Arabs; enter and kill the man." [But] he replied, "Indeed, powerful trembling overcomes me in the face of harm, so that I fear that I might strike him a blow that would avail nothing. But [rather] you enter, oh Fayrūz, for you are the youngest and strongest of us." So I laid down my sword with the group and entered to see where the man's head was. There was the lamp shining, and there he was asleep on some bedspreads. He was hidden in them, and I didn't know his head from his feet. [But] there was the woman seated with him; she had been feeding him pomegranate until he fell asleep. So I beckoned to her [to tell me] where his head was, whereupon she pointed to it. Then I began to walk until I stood by his head to see. I don't know whether I had [yet] looked at his face or not when all of a sudden he had opened his eyes and looked at me. At this I said [to myself], "If I go back [1867] [to get] my sword, I fear that he will escape me and get a weapon to ward me off of him." And lo, his Satan had warned him of my being there and had awakened him, and then when he was slow [to wake up] (his Satan) spoke to me through (al-Aswad's) tongue; [for] indeed he was looking [at me] and snoring [at the same time]. So I put my two hands forth toward his head, seizing his head with one hand and his beard with the other and then wrenching his neck so that I broke it. Then I went toward my companions, whereupon the woman took hold of my robe, saying, "Your sister! Your advice!" I said, "By God, I have killed him and have given you rest from him."[211] Then I went to my two companions and told them. They said, "Go back and cut off his head and bring it to us." So I entered [again], whereupon he uttered a groan; so I bridled him[212] to cut off his head and took it to the two of them. Then we all went out until we reached our homes. Wabr b. Yuḥannis al-Azdī was with us. He remained with us until we ascended one of the elevated fortresses, whereupon Wabr b. Yuḥannis uttered the call to prayer. Then we said, "Verily God has killed al-Aswad the liar." At this the people gathered to us, so we threw his head. When the people who had been with him saw [this], they saddled up their horses. Then each one of them began to take with him one of our boys, from among the families with whom they were staying; I saw them in the dawn making the boys ride behind them. So I called to my brother, who was below me with the people, "Hold fast to whomever you can of them; don't you see what they are doing with the children?" So they took hold of them, so that we detained seventy of their men. They took thirty boys from us; then, when they came into open country, lo and behold, they were missing seventy men. When they [realized that] they were missing their companions, they came to us saying, "Send our companions to us." So we said to them, "Send our sons to us!" So they sent our sons to us, and we sent their companions to them.

211. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 340; Balansī, 153.
212. I.e., held his head: aljamtuhu.

[1868] The Apostle of God said to his companions, "God has killed al-Aswad al-ʿAnsī the liar; he killed him through the hand of a man who is one of your brethren and of a tribe that embraced Islam and believed [it] to be true." So we were in the same situation we had been in before al-Aswad reached us. The commanders[213] came to feel secure, and gradually returned; and the people made excuses for themselves, as only recently they had been in the jāhiliyyah.[214]

According to ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf; and according to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—his father—ʿUbayd b. Ṣakhr: From first to last, [al-Aswad's] rule was three months.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf, and according to ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf—Jābir b. Yazīd—ʿUrwah b. Ghaziyyah—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Fayrūz:[215] Between his emergence at the cave of Khubbān and his murder there were about four months; he had been concealing his affair before that, until it came out openly afterward.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Abū Maʿshar, Yazīd b. ʿIyāḍ b. Juʿdubah, Ghassān b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd, and Juwayriyyah b. Asmāʾ—their teachers:[216] Abū Bakr sent out the army of Usāmah b. Zayd at the end of Rabīʿ I, and [the news of] the murder of al-ʿAnsī came at the end of Rabīʿ I, after the departure of Usāmah. That was the first conquest, [news of] which came to Abū Bakr while he was in Medina.

---

213. Umarāʾ; i.e., the Prophet's governors.
214. I.e., the age of pre-Islamic heathenism.
215. Cf. Nuwayrī, 59; Caetani, 685.
216. Cf. Nuwayrī, 59; Caetani, 685.

According to al-Wāqidī: In this year, that is, year 11, in the [first] half of Muḥarram, the deputation of al-Nakhaʿ[217] came to the Apostle of God; their leader was Zurārah b. ʿAmr. They were the last of the delegations to reach [the Prophet]. [1869]

In this year the Prophet's daughter Fāṭimah died, on Tuesday, the 3rd of Ramaḍān. At that time she was twenty-nine years old or thereabouts. It is said that this was related on the authority of Abū Bakr b. ʿAbdallāh—Isḥāq b. ʿAbdallāh—Ābān b. Ṣāliḥ. It is alleged that this was related on the authority of Ibn Jurayj—ʿAmr b. Dīnār—Abū Jaʿfar, who said: Fāṭimah died three months after the Prophet.

According to Ibn Jurayj—al-Zuhrī—ʿUrwah: Fāṭimah died six months after the Prophet. [According to al-Wāqidī, this is the more correct [version].] ʿAlī and Asmāʾ bt. ʿUmays[218] washed her [corpse].

According to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm—ʿAmrah bt. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān: Al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib[219] prayed [the funeral prayer] for her.

According to Abū Zayd—ʿAlī—Abū Maʿshar: Al-ʿAbbās and ʿAlī and al-Faḍl b. al-ʿAbbās[220] entered her grave.

In this year ʿAbdallāh b. Abū Bakr b. Abū Quḥāfah died. An arrow had hit him [when he was] at al-Ṭāʾif with the Prophet; it had been shot by Abū Miḥjan.[221] The wound healed up until Shawwāl, when it became bad again; subsequently he died.

According to Abū Zayd—ʿAlī—Abū Maʿshar, Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, and Juwayriyyah b. Asmāʾ, in the chain of informants

---

217. Al-Nakhaʿ b. ʿAmr, a clan of the tribe of Madhḥij in southern Yemen. [Caskel, II, 444].

218. An early convert to Islam of the Khathʿam tribe, married successively to the Prophet's uncle Ḥamzah, to his cousin Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib, to Abū Bakr, and to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib; sister of the Prophet's wife Maymūnah bt. al-Ḥārith. [Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 395].

219. One of the Prophet's uncles, eponym of the Abbasid dynasty.

220. Oldest son of al-ʿAbbās and hence a cousin of the Prophet; his mother was a sister of the Prophet's wife Maymūnah bt. al-Ḥārith. [Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 183].

221. A renowned poet of the Thaqīf tribe of al-Ṭāʾif, who embraced Islam only when his town submitted. [Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 290].

that I mentioned above:[222] In the year in which the oath of allegiance was sworn to Abū Bakr, the people of Fārs made Yazdagard[223] king over them.

[1870] Abū Jaʿfar said: In this year occurred the battle between Abū Bakr and Khārijah b. Ḥiṣn al-Fazārī.[224]

According to Abū Zayd—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad in their chain of authorities, which I mentioned above:[225] Abū Bakr remained in Medina after the death of the Apostle of God and after he sent Usāmah at the head of his army to where his father, Zayd b. Ḥārithah,[226] had been killed in Syria. As it was the place to which the Apostle of God had ordered him to march, (Abū Bakr) made no innovation [in doing this]. There had come to him delegations of apostate Arabs, who confirmed [the observance of] prayer but held back [payment of] the alms tax (zakāt). But Abū Bakr did not accept this from them and sent them back. He remained [in Medina] until Usāmah b. Zayd b. Ḥārithah arrived forty days after his marching off (some say after seventy days). Then, when Usāmah b. Zayd had come, he left him in charge of Medina and marched out (some say that he left Sinān al-Ḍamrī[227] in charge of Medina). So he marched and encamped at Dhū al-Qaṣṣah[228] in Jumādah I (some say Jumādah II). Now the Apostle of God had sent Nawfal b. Muʿāwiyah al-Dīlī;[229] then 222. Cf. p. 38, above; Caetani, 715.

---

223. The last king of the Sasanian dynasty.

224. Leader of the delegation from the Fazārah tribe of the Najd that came to the Prophet shortly after his campaign to Tabūk. Cf. Ibn Saʿd, I/1, 42; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 71–72; and Nuwayrī, 61ff. ("Khārijah b. Ḥuṣayn"). On Fazārah, a tribe of the Ghaṭafān group, see *EI*², s.v. "Fazāra" (W. M. Watt); cf. note 233, below.

225. Cf. Nuwayrī, 61, and p. 38, above; Caetani, 592.

226. The Prophet's freedman and an early convert; originally of the Kalb tribe of Syria, he was sent as leader of a raid on southern Syria toward the end of the Prophet's life. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 224–27.

227. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 359, adds nothing to what we learn here. Ḍamrah b. Bakr was a tribe of Kinānah; cf. Caskel, II, 241.

228. It lies about twenty miles east of Medina on the way to al-Rabadhah, according to al-Masʿūdī, Tanbīh (BGA VIII), 252. (Al-Rabadhah is 175 km east of Medina; see note 271 below.) Yāqūt gives conflicting accounts of Dhū al-Qaṣṣah's location. Cf. Hamdani, 143 l. 21, who lists a "Dhū al-Qiḍḍah" in the vicinity of al-Sharabbah and Zarūd on the road to Iraq.

229. Chieftain of the clan al-Dīl of Kinānah, who, after long resisting the Prophet, joined him late: Caskel, II, 447, and Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 47. On the Khārijah b. Ḥiṣn had lit upon him at al-Sharabbah,[230] taking what he had,[231] and subsequently returned it to the Banū Fazārah. So Nawfal returned to Abū Bakr in Medina, in advance of Usāmah's arrival before Abū Bakr.

The first war in the riddah after the death of the Prophet was the war of al-ʿAnsī. The war of al-ʿAnsī was in the Yemen. [Next] was the war of Khārijah b. Ḥiṣn, and [that of] Manẓūr b. Zabbān b. Sayyār[232] at the head of Ghaṭafān[233] while the Muslims were unaware. So Abū Bakr repaired to a forest and hid himself in it; then God routed the unbelievers.

According to ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf; and according to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Mujālid b. Saʿīd: After Usāmah [1871] had gone away, the land sank into disbelief, and from every tribe either a small group or the whole showed disobedience[234] and apostatized, except for Quraysh and Thaqīf.[235]

According to ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf; and according to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Hishām b. ʿUrwah—his father:[236] After the Apostle of God had died and Usāmah had departed, the Arabs apostatized, in large or small groups;[237] and Musaylimah and Ṭulayḥah[238] feigned [divine] inspiration, so that the situation form of the clan name (al-Dīl, later al-Du'il), see Caskel, II, 234, s.v. "al-Du'il b. Bakr."

---

230. A place between al-Rabadhah and al-Salīlah in the Ghaṭafān country (Yāqūt, s.v.).

231. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 147, observes that this means the tribute in livestock that Nawfal had gathered.

232. Another chief of Fazārah; he embraced Islam and had marriage ties to close associates of the Prophet before his rebellion. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 420; Caskel, II, 398.

233. Ghaṭafan was a group of tribes east of Medina, including ʿAbdallāh b. Ghaṭafān, ʿAbs, Ashjaʿ, and Dhubyān; Dhubyān included the tribes of Fazārah, Murrah, and Thaʿlabah. Cf. Caskel, II, 274; *EI*², s.v. "Ghaṭafān" (J. W. Fück).

234. Taṣammarat, lit., "became avaricious, refused what is demanded." Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 342, has taḍarramat al-arḍ nāran, "the land burned fiercely with fire."

235. The main tribe of al-Ṭā'if. Cf. Caetani, 583.

236. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 342–43; cf. Caetani, 583.

237. ʿAwāmma aw khawāṣṣa. Similarly, in other passages on p. 42 ʿāmma and khāṣṣa are rendered as "the bulk of" and "a few of," or "large and small groups of." Caetani, 583, understands ʿawāmma as "all of [Ṭayyiʾ and Asad]."

238. According to Muslim tradition, the "false prophets" in al-Yamāmah and the Najd respectively.

regarding the two of them became serious. The common people of Ṭayyi' and Asad[239] gathered to Ṭulayḥa, and Ghaṭafān apostatized (except for those from Ashja' and the leaders of groups of mixed origins), and they rendered the oath of allegiance to him. Hawāzin[240] remained ambivalent;[241] they withheld [payment of] the ṣadaqah tax,[242] except for those from Thaqīf and its party.[243] The bulk of Jadīlah[244] and the weak groups were guided by them. A few of of Banū Sulaym[245] apostatized, and likewise the rest of the people in every place.

The envoys[246] of the Prophet arrived [in Medina] from Yemen and Yamāmah and the territory of Banū Asad, [along with] delegations of those with whom the Prophet had corresponded. His business regarding al-Aswad and Musaylimah and Ṭulayḥah had been carried out by means of reports and letters; so they presented their letters to Abū Bakr, and informed him of the news. At this Abū Bakr said to them, "You will not leave before messengers come from your commanders and from others, with [news of] more cunning and more bitter [things?] than that which you have described, and [reports of] the unraveling of affairs." It was not long before there came to them from every place the letters of the Prophet's commanders, with [news of] the rebellion[247] of some [group], large or small, and of their

239. Ṭayyi' and Asad were neighboring, largely nomadic tribes whose territory was near the "mountains of Ṭayyi'" ('Ajā' and Salmā) in the Najd. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "Asad, Banū" (H. Kindermann); Caskel, II, 194, 555; Landau-Tasseron, "Asad from Jāhiliyya to Islām"; idem, "The Participation of Ṭayyī in the Ridda."

240. A large confederation of tribes in northern and west-central Arabia that included 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah and Thaqīf, although the latter, who were townsmen, often went their own way, as here. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "Hawāzin" (W. M. Watt).

241. Lit., "put one foot forward and held one foot back."

242. Although in later jurisprudence ṣadaqah tax came to mean voluntary alms, and thus was little different from zakāt, at the time of the riddah it meant tribute paid by nomads to the Islamic state. See Simonson, 32–33; Donner, Conquests, 251–52, 265, and index.

243. Liffi-hā. cf. Ibn Manẓūr, IX, 318.

244. Jadīlah and al-Ghawth were the two main divisions of Ṭayyi', Cf. Caskel, II, 252.

245. A tribe living northeast of Mecca. Cf. Watt, Medina, 95–97; Michael Lecker, The Banū Sulaym (Jerusalem: The Hebrew University, 1989), infra.

246. Cf. Nuwayrī, 62.

247. Lit., "unraveling, coming undone of what had been done," i.e., renunciation of their agreements.

boldly committing aggression against the Muslims. So Abū Bakr combated them with that which the Apostle of God had combated them—with envoys; hence he sent their messengers back with his orders, and sent [further] envoys after the [original] messengers. And he awaited the arrival of Usāmah [before] [1872] clashing with them.[248] The first who clashed were ʿAbs and Dhubyān;[249] they hastened to [clash with] him, so that he fought them before the return of Usāmah.[250]

According to ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf; and according to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū ʿAmr—Zayd b. Aslam:[251] The Apostle of God died while his tax collectors were among the Quḍāʿah. Over the Kalb was Imruʾ al-Qays b. al-Aṣbagh al-Kalbī of the Banū ʿAbdallāh; and over al-Qayn was ʿAmr b. al-Ḥakam; and over the Saʿd Ḥudhaym was Muʿāwiyah b. Fulān al-Wāʾilī[252]

According to al-Sarī al-Wālibī:[253] Wadīʿah al-Kalbī apostatized with those of Kalb who helped him, whereas Imruʾ al-Qays remained obedient,[254] and Zumayl b. Quṭbah al-Qaynī rebelled with those of Banū al-Qayn who helped him, whereas ʿAmr remained [obedient]; and Muʿāwiyah apostatized with those of Saʿd Hudhaym who helped him. So Abū Bakr wrote to Imruʾ al-Qays b. Fulān[255]—he was the grandfather of Sukaynah, daughter of Ḥusayn[256]—to march to[257] Wadīʿah, 248. Lit., "He awaited in their clashing the arrival of Usāmah."

249. Tribes of Ghaṭafān; cf. note 233, above.

250. The reading of manuscript C is in some ways more coherent: "They made haste in order to fight him before the arrival of Usāmah," i.e., they wished to move quickly so as to attack Abū Bakr before he could consolidate his position.

251. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 343; Caetani, 583.

252. Kos has "al-Wābilī"; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 343, "al-Wālibī." Both are incorrect; cf. Caskel, II, 585, under "Wāʾil b. Saʿd Hudhaym."

253. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 343; Caetani, 583–84, 591, a continuation of the preceding account.

254. ʿAlā dīnihi.

255. There is some confusion regarding the name. Manuscript C has Imruʾal-Qays b. Bilād; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, s.v., has Imruʾal-Qays b. ʿAdī b. Aws.... Perhaps "b. Fulān" is a dittography from the name of Muʿāwiyah b. Fulān in the preceding line (cf. preceding account).

256. Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, the Prophet's grandson.

257. I.e., against, reading li- with the Cairo edition, rather than bi- in the text. The sentence is obscure.

and [he wrote to] ʿAmr to take a stand against Zumayl and against Muʿāwiyah al-ʿUdhrī. So when Usāmah found himself in the midst of the Quḍāʿah country, he deployed the cavalry among them and ordered them to make those who had stood firmly by Islam rise up against those who had turned back from it, so that they fled until they took refuge in Dūmah[258] and gathered round Wadīʿah. Usāmah's cavalry returned to him, whereupon he decamped with them until he raided al-Ḥamqatayn,[259] striking among the Banū al-Ḍubayb of Judhām[260] [1873] and among the Banū Khaylīl of Lakhm[261] and their party[262] of the two factions.[263] He drove them out of Ābil[264] and returned unharmed and bearing spoil.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad:[265] The Apostle of God died, and Asad and Ghaṭafān and Ṭayyiʾ gathered around Ṭulayḥah, except for the principal leaders of some groups in the three tribes. Asad gathered at Samīrāʾ,[266] and Fazārah and those who follow them[267] of Ghaṭafān to the south of Ṭībah,[268] and Ṭayyiʾ[269] on 258. Dūmat al-Jandal, an important oasis in northern Arabia, modern al-Jawf. Cf. *EI*², s.v. "Dūmat al-Djandal" (L. Veccia Vaglieri).

---

259. A place on the fringes of the Syrian steppe (Yāqūt, s.v.).

260. The tribe of Judhām lived in the northern Hijāz and Transjordan; al-Ḍubayb b. Qurṭ was one of their main clans. Cf. *EI*², s.v. "Djudhām" (C. E. Bosworth); Caskel, II, 243, 263.

261. Text has "Khalīl." Lakhm was a tribe of southern Iraq and southern Syria, absorbed in Syria by Judhām; Khaylīl was a branch of Ghassān associated with the tribe of Lakhm. Cf. Caskel, II, 339; Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 147; Emendanda; *EI*², s.v. "Lakhm" (H. Lammens–Irfan Shahid).

262. Cf. note 243, above.

263. Al-qabīlayn.

264. Manuscript C has '.y.l; Kos has Ubnā. See note 96, above.

265. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 344–45 (extending as far as p. 52, below); Caetani, 596–99.

266. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 344, has "Sumayrā'," probably owing to confusion with Sumayrah, another place near Mecca; cf. Yāqūt, s.v.v. Samīrāʾ was in the Asad country on the pilgrimage road to Iraq northeast of Mecca.

267. Kos has "those who come to them."

268. Yāqūt identifies this as a village near Zarūd, which was on the Kūfah-Mecca pilgrimage road in the Shaqīq sands. Perhaps it is identical with Ṭābah, a village on the southeast flank of Mt. Salmā in the Asad/Ṭayyiʾ country; cf. the shift of ā to ī in other names, such as Jāzān/Jīzān. On Ṭābah, see Thilo, s.v. and map B.

269. Kos has Ẓaby.

the borders of their territory. Thaʿlabah b. Saʿd and those who followed them of Murrah and ʿAbs[270] gathered at al-Abraq of al-Rabadhah,[271] and people from the Banū Kinānah[272] crowded around them[273] to the point that the country could not sustain them; so they divided into two groups, one group remaining in al-Abraq while the other went to Dhū al-Qaṣṣah. Ṭulayḥah reinforced them with [his brother] Ḥibāl.[274] Ḥibāl was in charge of the people of Dhū al-Qaṣṣah from Banū Asad and those of Layth and al-Dīl and Mudlij[275] who crowded around; and over Murrah in al-Abraq was ʿAwf b. Fulān b. Sinān; and over Thaʿlabah and ʿAbs was al-Ḥārith b. Fulān, one of the Banū Subayʿ. They[276] had sent delegations that came to Medina and stayed with the chiefs of the people; so [the Medinan chiefs], except for ʿAbbās,[277] put them up and interceded for them before Abū Bakr, on condition that [the petitioning tribes] should perform prayer but not pay the alms tax. But God strengthened Abū Bakr's resolution in the truth, and he said: "If they refuse me [even] a hobble, I shall fight them for it."[278] Now, the hobbles of the ṣadaqah camels were required with the [camels paid as] ṣadaqah from the people who paid ṣadaqah; so he refused [their request], whereupon the delegation of those apostates who were near Medina returned to their tribes, [1874] telling them how few the people of Medina were and making them covetous of it. After Abū Bakr had expelled the delegation,

---

270. All three tribes were part of Ghaṭafān; cf. note 233, above.

271. Al-Rabadhah was 175 km east of Medina. The epithet "al-Abraq," meaning rough terrain with rock, sand, and clay, is common in composite toponyms; presumably here it refers to a specific spot near al-Rabadhah. Cf. al-Rāshid, Al-Rabadhah.

272. Kinānah was a tribe related to Asad, living from near Mecca northeastward to Asad territory. Cf. EI[2], s.v. "Kināna" (W. M. Watt).

273. Manuscript C has "lived" (?) (nashaʾat).

274. Manuscript C has amara-hum . . . bi-khibālin.

275. Layth b. Bakr, al-Dīl b. Bakr, and Mudlij b. Murrah were branches of Kinānah; cf. Caskel, II, 376, 416, and note 229, above.

276. Cf. p. 69, below; Diyārbakrī, II, 202 top; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 9, 12 middle.

277. One of the Prophet's uncles and eponymous ancestor of the Abbasid dynasty of caliphs.

278. The rope hobble (ʿiqāl) worn by the camels given in payment of the ṣadaqa tax. The word also came to mean, by extension, a year's ṣadaqa tax itself; cf. Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon, part 5, p. 2115, s.v. ʿiqāl.

he placed some people on the mountain passes[279] of Medina—ʿAlī al-Zubayr,[280] Ṭalḥah,[281] and ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd[282]—and enjoined[283] the people of Medina to go to the mosque. And he said to them: "The land has sunk into disbelief, and their delegation has seen that you are few and that you would be unaware whether you were approached by day or by night. The nearest of them is [only] a stage[284] from you. The people were hoping that we would accept them and be reconciled with them, but we refused them[285] and dissolved their treaty. So get ready." Consequently they made preparations, and it wasn't three [days] before they came raiding Medina by night, leaving some[286] of their [number] behind in Dhū Ḥusā[287] to serve as reserves for them. The mounted raiders[288] reached the mountain passes by night, while the fighting men were in them; there were people on foot in front of them, so they alerted them and sent news to Abū Bakr. Abū Bakr sent back to them that they should hold their positions; so they did so, while [Abū Bakr] came out to them leading the people of the mosque [mounted] on their water-hauling camels. At this the enemy lost their will;[289] so the Muslims pursued them on their camels until they reached Dhū Ḥusā,[290] whereupon the reserves came out against them

279. Anqāb. Kos: anṣāb, "boundary markers" (?); Ibn al-Athīr, anṣār, "helpers." Cf. Glossary.

280. Al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām, early convert from Asad clan of Quraysh, maternal cousin of the Prophet. Cf. Ibn Saʿd, III/1, 70ff.

281. Talḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh, early convert from the Taym clan of Quraysh. Cf. Ibn Saʿd, III/1, 152ff.

282. Early convert and close associate of the Prophet from the Hudhayl tribe. Cf. Ibn Saʿd, III/1, 106ff.

283. IK and Ibn al-Athir, Kāmil: "required."

284. Barīd, the distance between courier stops, six to twelve miles; cf. Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon, s.v.

285. Kos and Manuscript C: "We came to them."

286. IK: "half."

287. A valley near al-Sharabbah in the territory of ʿAbs and the rest of Ghaṭafān; cf. Yāqūt, s.v.; Thilo, s.v. and map C, places it circa 160 km east of Medina, just west of al-Rabadhah. Nuwayrī, 63, has "Ḥusā."

288. Reading al-ghārah, "horsemen making a raid," for the text's ghiwār, "raiding" (rare), as proposed by Glossary.

289. IK: "turned back."

290. Manuscript C: Dhū Khushub.

with churning skins that they had inflated and on which they had placed ropes. Then they rolled them with their feet in the faces of the camels, so that each skin rolled in its tether. At this the Muslims' camels took fright while they were [mounted] on them—they do not shy at anything the way they did from those skins—and steered (the Muslims) out of their control until they brought them into Medina; but no Muslim was thrown or wounded, so al-Khuṭayl b. Aws, brother of al-Ḥuṭay'ah b. Aws,[291] [1875] said about that:[292]

My saddle and she-camel are a ransom for Banū Dhubyān, on the evening when Abū Bakr is stabbed[293] with lances.
But [something] was rolled by the feet so that they feared it, to a certain degree, no more and no less.[294] [Even] God has troops who are given a taste of it;[295] verily they are reckoned in that which is counted among the wonders of the age.

(Al-Zuhrī recited [the end of the last line] as: "among the memorable deeds of the age." According to ʿAbdallāh al-Laythī: Banū ʿAbd Manāt were among the apostates—they and[296] Banū Dhubyān were involved in that affair at Dhū al-Qaṣṣah and Dhū Ḥusā.)[297]

We obeyed the Apostle of God as long as he was[298] among us,[299]
So, oh worshipers of God, what [is so great about] Abū Bakr?

---

291. A famous poet who claimed to be from the ʿAbs tribe; cf. *EI*², s.v. "al-Ḥuṭay'ah" (I. Goldziher–C. Pellat); Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 30.

292. Poem text has numerous variant readings not noted here.

293. Reading yuḥdhā with the Cairo edition, against yuḥdā and other variants in the text.

294. Reading in yazīdu wa lā yaḥrī with the Cairo edition, against in tuqīmu wa lā tasrī in the text.

295. Literally, "who are made to taste His tasting," perhaps an allusion to Qur'ān 3:185; "every soul tastes death."

296. Reading hum wa as proposed by Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 147, and Emendanda, rather than wa hum, "and they were," as found in text, for ʿAbd Manāt was part of Kinānah, not of Dhubyān.

297. The verses following this parenthetical aside are a continuation of those before it, sharing the same meter (ṭawīl) and rhyme letter (r).

298. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 8: "lived."

299. IK: "in our midst."

[1876] Will he bequeath [leadership of] us to a young camel (bakr)[300] after him, if he should die?
That would be, in God's name,[301] a disaster.[302]
Why won't you return our delegation in time?
Have you no fear of the blast of braying young camels?[303]
Indeed, the thing they requested of you, and that you denied, is like dates, or sweeter to me than dates.[304]

So the enemy (qawm) thought (the Muslims) weak and sent news to the people of Dhū al-Qaṣṣah, whereupon they advanced against them, relying on those who had brought them the news, they being [still] unaware of God's work, which He wished and desired to be communicated among them. At this Abū Bakr passed the night getting ready by putting the army[305] in order; then he went out in battle order in the last part of that night, marching with al-Nuʿmān b. Muqarrin[306] on his right flank, and ʿAbdallāh b. Muqarrin on his left flank, and Suwayd b. Muqarrin with the riders at the rear. No sooner had the dawn broken than they found themselves and the enemy on the same plain. They heard neither a footfall nor a voice from the Muslims until (the Muslims) fell on them with the sword, slaying [them] at the end of that night so that, before the upper limb of the sun arose, they had turned their backs to (the Muslims). (The Muslims) plundered them of all their riding camels,[307] and Ḥibāl[308] was killed. Abū Bakr[309] pursued them until he camped

300. Cairo ed: "Will he bequeath it...?" The verse is clearly a satiric comment on Abū Bakr's name, which means "father of the young camel."

301. Ibn Ḥubaysh: "by God's house."

302. Lit., "the one who breaks the back," qāsimatu al-ẓahri.

303. Reading rāghiyat al-bakri with Cairo, against rāʿiyat al-bakri, "herders of young camels," in the text.

304. I.e., it would have been better had you complied with the delegation's requests.

305. Al-nās, lit., "the people." For a very different account of this episode, see Diyārbakrī, II, 204.

306. He and his brothers ʿAbdallāh and Suwayd were warriors of the tribe of Muzaynah who had led large groups of their tribe to the Prophet. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 30–31.

307. Ghalabū-hum ʿalā ʿāmmati ẓahri-him....

308. Kos and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 345, have "men." Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, II, 347; and pp. 62–63, below. Diyārbakrī, II, 206 bottom, says that he was captured and asked to be executed.

309. Cf. Nuwayrī, 62.

at Dhū al-Qaṣṣah; it was the first conquest. He put in (Dhū al-Qaṣṣah) al-Nuʿmān b. Muqarrin at the head of a number [of troops] and returned to Medina. The polytheists were humiliated [1877] by (this victory), so the Banū Dhubyān and ʿAbs fell upon those Muslims who were among them and slaughtered them; and those who backed them did as they did. Meanwhile, the [other] Muslims grew stronger through Abū Bakr's battle. Abū Bakr swore that he would certainly make slaughter among the polytheists [in vengeance for] every killing [of a Muslim], and would kill in every tribe [someone] for each of the Muslims whom they had killed, and more. Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah al-Tamīmī[310] said about that:

By early morn Abū Bakr hastened to them just as most of them[311] strove toward their death.
He rejoiced supremely at their braying while Ḥibāl[312] drooled out his life to them.

He also said:

We set up for them on the left side; then they gathered together in a jumble,[313] like the troop of warriors who make their camels kneel on well-watered pastures.
They had no endurance for war, when it arose on the morning when Abū Bakr rose up with [his] men.
We approached the Banū ʿAbs by night, at their nearer Nibāj,[314] and Dhubyān we scared away with back-breaking losses.

Then they continued that [policy][315] until the Muslims in every tribe were more firm in their religion for it, and [until] the

310. According to Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 213, he had been sent by the Prophet to help the Tamīmī chieftain Qays b. ʿĀṣim resist the "false prophet" Musaylimah.

311. Reading, with Cairo, julāl, rather than ḥalāl as in the text.

312. IK has "mountains."

313. Fa-kubkibū; cf. kabkaba, "troop," in the next line, presumably an allusion to Qur ʾān 26:94.

314. The nearer of the "two Nibajes" (al-Nibājān) was near Mt. Salmā, about 400 km northeast of Medina; cf. Ibn Manẓūr, II, 372; Yāqūt, s.v. "Nibājān"; Thilo, 76 and Map B.

315. I.e., of severe retaliations; lit., "they did nothing but that."

[1878] fortunes (amr) of the polytheists were reversed in every tribe. The ṣadaqah tax[316] of [various] people came to Medina by night, [brought by] Ṣafwān and then al-Zibriqān and then ʿAdī[317]—Ṣafwān [arriving] at the beginning of the night, and the second [installment] in the middle of it, and the third at the end of it. The one who announced the good news of [the arrival of] Ṣafwān was Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ,[318] and the one who announced al-Zibriqān was ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf,[319] and the one who announced ʿAdī was ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd—or, according to other [traditionists], Abū Qatādah.[320] As each one of them appeared, the people said, "[He is] bringing a warning [about the enemy]!"[321] But Abū Bakr said, "This is a bearer of good tidings, this is a protector, not [someone] worn out [from urgency]." Then, after he had divulged the good news, they said, "Long live[322] the good news you announce!"

That was sixty days after Usāmah's departure; a few days after that, Usāmah[323] came [back to Medina], two months and some days [after his departure]. Thereupon Abū Bakr left him in charge of Medina, saying to him and his army, "Rest, and rest your riding camels." Then he went out, leading those who had gone out to Dhū al-Qaṣṣah and those who had been in the passes

316. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 203–4.

317. Cf. Balansī, 12, 17–18, Nuwayrī, 62–63. Ṣafwān is probably Ṣafwān b. Ṣafwān, the Prophet's tax agent over the ʿAmr clan of Tamīm; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 23, and p. 85, below. Al-Zibriqān b. Badr, chief of Saʿd-Tamīm, had come to the Prophet with his tribe's delegation and was appointed collector of ṣadaqah tax upon his clan of Banū ʿAwf; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 194. ʿAdī b. Ḥātim, a chief of Tayyiʾ, had been appointed by the Prophet as tax collector over parts of the tribes of Asad and Tayyiʾ; cf. EI[2], s.v. "ʿAdī b. Ḥātim" (A. Schaade); Landau-Tasseron, "Asad from Jāhiliyya to Islam," 19–20; Landau-Tasseron, "The Participation of Tayyiʾ" in the Ridda, infra.

318. Important early convert from the Zuhrah clan of Quraysh, sometimes said to have been the third male to embrace Islam. Cf. Ibn Saʿd, III/1, 97–105; Watt, Mecca, 89–90.

319. Another early convert from Banū Zuhrah of Quraysh. Cf. EI[2], s.v. "ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf" (M. Th. Houtsma–W. M. Watt); Watt, Mecca, 89–90.

320. Abū Qatādah al-Ḥārith b. Ribʿī al-Salmī al-Anṣārī, of the Khazraj tribe, an early Medinan follower of the Prophet; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 273–75.

321. Text simply has nadhīr, "a warner," but the term is used in the military context in the sense of one bringing news of the enemy.

322. Lit., "may it be long."

323. Cf. Nuwayrī, 63.

on that side [of the city]. But the Muslims said to him, "Oh Caliph of the Apostle of God, we beg you by God not to expose yourself [to battle], for if you were to be struck down there would be no order among the people. It would be harder on the enemy if you were to remain [here]. So send a man [in your place]; then if he is struck down you can put another in command." But [Abū Bakr] said, "No, by God, I won't do it; indeed, I will set an example for you myself." Then he marched out in battle order to Dhū Ḥusā and Dhū al-Qaṣṣah, with ʿAbdallāh and Suwayd in their accustomed positions,[324] until they descended upon the people of al-Rabadhah at al-Abraq. They fought, God destroying al-Ḥārith and ʿAwf;[325] al-Ḥuṭayʾah[326] was taken prisoner, and ʿAbs and Banū Bakr[327] fled. Abū Bakr remained a few days at al-Abraq. Banū Dhubyān had dominated the country, but he said, "It is [henceforth] forbidden for Banū Dhubyān to control this country, since God has given it to us as spoil," and removed it [from their control].[328] Now, when the apostates had been overcome, and entered [once again] the gate [by] which they had [formerly] gone out, and [Abū Bakr] had treated the people leniently,[329] the Banū Thaʿlabah came to encamp in [this country]—it had been their camping grounds—but were kept from it; so they came to Medina, saying, "Why have we been kept from camping in our country?" Whereupon [Abū Bakr] said, "You lie; it is no land of yours, but a gift restored to me [after having been stolen]," and granted them no favor. He reserved al-Abraq for the horses of the Muslims and made the rest of the country of al-Rabadhah a pasture for the people, the Banū Thaʿlabah notwithstanding. Then he reserved all of it for the [camels paid as] ṣadaqah tax [to] the Muslims, [1879]

---

324. Lit., "over what they had been over"; ʿAbdallāh and Suwayd b. Muqarrin, described on p. 48, above, as commanding the left flank and rear, respectively. The third brother, al-Nuʿmān, had been left at Dhū al-Qaṣṣah.

325. On al-Ḥārith and ʿAwf, see p. 45, above.

326. Kos and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 345: al-Khaṭbah.

327. Probably Bakr b. ʿAbdmanāt b. Kināmah, a main segment of this tribe that included many important clans. Cf. Caskel, I, Tables 36ff. and II, 222.

328. Ajlā-hā; i.e., Abū Bakr deported the Banū Dhubyān from this territory.

329. The text of this phrase is at best elliptical, perhaps corrupt. Kos has "and damage had become widespread." Here and several lines below "the people" [al-nās] refers to the former rebels.

because of a fight that occurred between the people and the collectors of the ṣadaqah taxes.[330] So he barred on that account one from the other. After ʿAbs and Dhubyān were broken up, they took refuge with Ṭulayḥah. Ṭulayḥah had encamped at Buzākhah,[331] having traveled to it from Samīrāʾ, and stayed there.

About the battle of al-Abraq, Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah said:

How many a battle have we witnessed at al-Abraq [victorious] against Dhubyān ablaze in fury?
We brought them an onerous disaster with the Veracious One[332] when he stopped remonstrating.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd b. Thābit b. al-Jidhʿ and Ḥarām b. ʿUthmān—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Kaʿb b. Mālik: When Usāmah b. Zayd arrived, Abū Bakr went out, leaving him in charge of Medina. He proceeded until he came to al-Rabadhah, [and] met Banū ʿAbs and Dhubyān [1880] and a group of Banū ʿAbd Manāt b. Kinānah. Then he met them at al-Abraq, whereupon he fought them so that God put them to flight and routed them. Then he returned to Medina. Now, when the army of Usāmah collected and those around Medina returned to obedience,[333] (Abū Bakr) went out to Dhū al-Qaṣṣah and encamped with them, one stage from Medina in the direction of Najd. Then he divided the army there and tied the banners;[334] he tied eleven banners over eleven armies and ordered the commander of each army to convoke those armed Muslims who had passed by him, leaving some of the armed men to defend their country.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad:[335] When Usāmah and his army had

330. Or perhaps "recipients of the ṣadaqāh taxes": aṣḥāb al-ṣadaqāt.

331. A well in the Najd, in Asad or Tayyiʾ country. Cf. EI[2], s.v. "Buzākha" (C. E. Bosworth).

332. Al-Ṣiddīq, the epithet of Abū Bakr.

333. Or "collected, gathered in numbers," thāba.

334. The phrase "to tie a banner [for someone]," used here and in the following sentences, is an idiom also meaning "to appoint [someone] the commander of an army."

335. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 345–46; Nuwayrī, 64–65; Caetani, 601–3.

rested their riding camels and had assembled, and more ṣadaqah taxes than they needed had come in, Abū Bakr deployed the expeditionary forces and tied the banners,[336] eleven banners [in all]. He tied a banner for Khālid b. al-Walīd,[337] ordering him [to fight] Tulayḥah b. Khuwaylid, and then when he finished to march against Mālik b. Nuwayrah[338] at al-Buṭāḥ,[339] if he resisted him. [He also tied a banner] for ʿIkrimah b. Abī Jahl,[340] ordering him [to fight] Musaylimah; and for al-Muhājir b. Abī Umayyah, ordering him [to fight] the armies of [al-Aswad] al-ʿAnsī and to help the Abnāʾ against Qays b. Makshūḥ and those people of Yemen who supported him against them. Then [al-Muhājir] was supposed to pass on to Kindah in Ḥaḍramawt. [He tied a banner] for Khālid b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿAṣ, who had come at that time from the Yemen and left his governorship, and sent him to al-Ḥamqatayn in the Syrian heights; and for ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ[341] [to go] to the combined [tribes of] Quḍāʿah and [to] Wadīʿah [al-Kalbī][342] and al-Ḥārith [al-Subayʿī].[343] And [he tied a banner also] for Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan al-Ghalfānī[344] and [1881]

336. I.e., appointed the commanders of various forces.

337. Prominent military commander of the Makhzūm clan of Quraysh and a relatively late convert. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "Khālid b. al-Walīd" (P. Crone).

338. Chief of the Yarbūʿ branch of Tamīm, appointed by the Prophet as tax collector over part of Tamīm but said in some (but not all) accounts to have withheld tax after the Prophet's death. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 295–96; Shoufani 82–83; EI^{2}, s.v. "Mālik b. Nuwayra" (E. Landau-Tasseron).

339. A well in the Najd, in Asad country ca. 400 km east-northeast of Medina. Cf. Yāqūt, s.v.; Thilo, s.v. and map C; TAVO B, VII, 1.

340. Fierce opponent of the Prophet from Makhzūm of Quraysh; he fled after conquest of Mecca by the Prophet to avoid execution; later he was pardoned by the Prophet and given important posts. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 4–7.

341. Late convert from the Sahm clan of Quraysh, sent by the Prophet to be tax agent in ʿUmān. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ" (A. J. Wensinck); Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 115–18.

342. Cf. p. 43, above. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 346 omits this name.

343. Cf. p. 45, above. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 346 omits this name.

344. According to Ṭabarī, he was of Ḥimyar; he later served as ʿUmar's governor of ʿUmān and al-Yamāma and participated in the conquest of Iraq (p. 152, below; Ṭabarī I, 2207, 2212). However, Ibn al-Kalbī considers him the same as ʿUyaynah b. Ḥiṣn al-Fazārī (see note 403, below); cf. Caskel, II, 328 ("Ḥudhayfah b. Ḥiṣn") and 580 ("ʿUyayna b. Ḥiṣn"). Tabarī considers them two separate individuals, but the possibility of some confusion should be noted. Ḥudhayfah's nisbah "al-Ghalfānī" is otherwise unknown, and is sometimes given in another form (e.g., "al-Qalʿānī"; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 390); moreover, the ordered him to Dabā;[345] and for ʿArfajah b. Harthamah[346] and ordered him to Mahrah,[347] and commanded the two of them to join, each one of them having in his own province priority over his companion. He sent Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah[348] on the heels of ʿIkrimah b. Abī Jahl, saying that when he was finished with al-Yamāmah[349] he should betake himself to Quḍāʿah and fight the apostates with his cavalry. And [he tied a banner] for Ṭurayfah b. Ḥājiz[350] and commanded him to [attack] Banū Sulaym and those who backed them of Hawāzin; and [he tied a banner] for Suwayd b. Muqarrin and ordered him to the coastal district of Yemen, and for al-ʿAlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī[351] and ordered him to Baḥrayn. So the commanders set out from Dhū al-Qaṣṣah and encamped on their course [of march], whereupon each commander's army overtook him, he having charged them with his instructions.[352] (Abū Bakr) [also] wrote to all the apostates to whom [a force] had been sent.

---

word al-Ghalfānī/al-Qalʿānī could have resulted from misreading the word al-Ghaṭafānī—an appropriate nisbah for someone (like ʿUyaynah) from Fazārah, as Fazārah was a section of Ghaṭafān.

345. Market town and former capital of ʿUmān. Cf. Yāqūt, s.v.; Muqaddasī (BGA 3), 53.

346. A chief of the Bāriq clan of Khuzāʿah. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 401; Caskel, II, 192.

347. A tribe of southern Arabia between Ḥaḍramawt and ʿUmān. Cf. Yāqūt, s.v.; Caskel, II, 382.

348. An ally of the Zuhrah or Jumaḥ clan of Quraysh, of uncertain tribal origin; he was an early convert to Islam. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 391.

349. An oasis district in central eastern Arabia, about 750 km east of Medina, just west of the Dahnāʾ sands; its main oases were Ḥajr (not to be confused with Hajar) and Jaww. Cf. TAVO B, VII, 1, and Thilo, s.v., and Map D, warning against misunderstandings in Yāqūt and other medieval geographers.

350. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 346, has "Maʿn b. Ḥājiz." Ṭurayfah is said to have been a companion of the Prophet by Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 51–52 ("Ṭurayfah b. Ḥajir"), but little information on him survives. Nuwayrī, 65, has "Maʿn b. Ḥājiz—but some say Ṭurayfah b. Ḥājiz. . . ."

351. Al-ʿAlāʾ, of the South Arabian tribe of al-Ṣadif, had been the Prophet's governor over Baḥrayn; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 7–8.

352. The text leaves ambiguous whether this phrase refers to the commanders instructing the troops or to Abū Bakr's instructing the commanders.

[Abū Bakr's Letter to the Apostates][353]

According to al-Sarī—Sayf—ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Kaʿb b. Mālik: Qaḥdham[354] participated with him in commissioning [the armies] and in writing [the letter to the apostates], so that the letters to the apostate tribes of the Arabs were identical:

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. From Abū Bakr, caliph of the Apostle of God, to whomever this letter of mine may reach among the commoners and notables who has stood fast in his Islām or who has turned back from it: Peace upon those who follow the [true] guidance and who have not turned back to error and blindness after [having received] the [true] guidance. Verily I praise to you God, other than Whom there is no god. I bear witness that there is no god but God alone, Who has no associate, and that Muḥammad is His Servant and His Apostle; we affirm that which he brought, and that which he denied we declare to be unbelief and strive against it. Now then: Verily God, may He be exalted, sent Muḥammad with His truth to His creation [1882] > as a bearer of good tidings and as a warner[355] and as one calling [others] to God, with His permission, and as a light-bringing lamp,[356] so that he might warn [all] who live, and so that the saying against the unbelievers might be fulfilled.[357] So God guided with the truth[358] whoever responded to Him, and the Apostle of God, with His permission, struck whoever turned his back to Him until he came to Islām, willingly or grudgingly. Then God took His Apostle to Him, he having carried out God's com-

353. This material is omitted by Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil; cf. Balansī, 27–29; Nuwayrī, 65–69.

354. He is identified in the index to the Cairo edition as the scribe of Yūsuf b. ʿUmar, but, as the latter was a governor of the late Umayyad period, he cannot be meant here; cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2388, and II, 1739.

355. Cf. Qurʾān 2:119.

356. Qurʾān 33:46.

357. Qurʾān 36:70.

358. Nuwayrī, 66: "to the truth."

mand, and counseled His community, and carried out [the duty] that was upon him; for God had made that clear to him and to the people of Islam in the book that was sent down. Thus He said,[359] "You are dead, and they are dead"; and he said,[360] "We have not made any man before you immortal; so, if you die, should they then be immortal?" And to the believers He said,[361] "Muḥammad is only an apostle. The apostles before him have passed away; so, if he dies or is killed, will you turn on your heels? For he who may turn on his heels will not harm God one whit, but God will reward the grateful." So whoever worshiped Muḥammad, indeed Muḥammad has died; but whoever worshiped God alone, Who has no associate, indeed God is always with you,[362] Living, Eternal. He does not die,[363] nor do slumber or sleep take Him; He guards His cause, takes vengeance on His enemy, and punishes him.

I recommend to you the fear of God and your right share and portion of God[364] and of that which your Prophet brought you; and that you let yourselves be guided by His guidance, and cleave to the religion[365] of God. For indeed, whomever God has not guided is astray,[366] and whomever He has not made safe is afflicted, and whomever God has not helped is forsaken. Whomever God guides is on the right way, and whom-[1883] ever He allows to go astray is lost. God said,[367] "Whomever God guides is on the right way, but whomever He lets get lost, you will find no friend to guide him";

359. Qur'ān 39:30.
360. Qur'ān 21:34.
361. Qur'ān 3:144.
362. Lit., "God lies in wait for you," meaning that He is everywhere and cannot be evaded—a reference to Qur'ān 89:14.
363. Cf. Qur'ān 2:255.
364. Balansī, 28: "... and I urge you to your right share...."
365. Or, possibly, "obedience": dīn.
366. Balansī, 28: "lost," with greater divergence through the remainder of the paragraph.
367. Qur'ān 18:17.

nor will any work of his in the world be accepted until he acknowledges Him; and neither repentance nor ransom[368] will be accepted from him in the afterlife.

I have learned that some of you have turned back from your religion after you had acknowledged Islam and labored in it, out of negligence of God and ignorance of His command, and in compliance with the devil. God said,[369] "When We said to the angels, 'Bow down before Adam,' they bowed down except for Iblīs. He was one of the jinn; so he strayed from the command of his Lord. Do you then wish to take him and his offspring as friends to the exclusion of Me, even though they are your enemy? How bad an exchange [that is] for the transgressors!" And He said,[370] "The devil is an enemy to you, so take him for an enemy. He only calls his party that they may be among the people of the flame." I have sent to you someone[371] at the head of an army of the Muhājirūn and the Anṣār and those who follow [them] in good works. I ordered him not to fight anyone or to kill anyone until he has called him to the cause of God; so that[372] those who respond to him and acknowledge [Him] and renounce [unbelief] and do good works, [my envoy] shall accept him and help him to [do right], but I have ordered him to fight those who deny [Him] for that reason. So he will not spare any one of them he can gain mastery over, [but may] burn them with fire, slaughter them by any means, and take women and children captive; nor shall he accept from anyone anything except Islam. So whoever follows him, it is better for him; but whoever leaves him, will not weaken God.[373] I have 368. Ṣarf wa'adl. For different possible meanings of this phrase, see Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon, 1682, col. 1 top.

369. Qur'ān 18:50.

370. Qur'ān 35:6.

371. Balansī, 28: "Khālid b. al-Walīd."

372. The text in Balansī, 28–29, differs considerably for the remainder of this sentence, although the general import is the same.

373. Or perhaps "God will not be incapable [of dealing with him]."

[1884] ordered my messenger to read my letter to you in all gathering places.[374] The invitation [to God's cause] shall be the call to prayer. If, when the Muslims make the call to prayer, they do likewise [in response], leave them alone; but, if they do not make the call to prayer [with the Muslims], then grant them no respite. And, if they do make the call to prayer [with the Muslims], ask them what has come over them; then, if they deny [God], grant them no respite, but, if they acknowledge [God], He will accept them and bring them to what they should do.

So the messengers put the letters through before the armies, and the commanders went out, taking with them the treaties:[375]

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. This is a treaty from Abū Bakr, caliph of the Apostle of God, to so-and-so, sent [by Abū Bakr] when he dispatched [people] to fight whoever had repudiated Islam. He requires him to fear God to the utmost of his ability in all his affairs, whether they be secret or public; and he orders him to take God's command seriously, and to strive against those who turn away from Him and turn back from Islām to the desires of the devil,[376] [only] after he has explained to them [why they are to be attacked][377] and called them to the cause of Islam. Then, if they respond, he should restrain himself from them; but if they do not respond, he should launch his attack against them until they acknowledge Him. Then he

374. Or perhaps "... to read my letter in all gathering places of yours." Here it is not clear whether the text refers to the gathering places of the tribes being contacted or to those of the messengers; in the latter instance the party addressed would have shifted from the tribes to the messengers. This shift has already been completed in the next sentence. The parallel version in Balansī, 29, ends with this sentence.

375. Cf. Nuwayrī, 68–69; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 16 l. 18ff., a loose parallel written from Abū Bakr to Khālid b. al-Walīd.

376. Ibn Ḥubaysh: "to error and jāhiliyya and the desires (amānī) of the devil...." The editor of Nuwayrī suggests "his refuge" or "place of refuge." The rest of the sentence is missing in Ibn Ḥubaysh and in Nuwayrī.

377. Ba'da an yughdira ilayhim, lit., "after he has apologized to them."

should inform them of [the duties] that are incumbent upon them and [the advantages] that accrue to them, and should take what is [imposed] on them and give them what they are due. He should not give [those that do not respond] a respite; nor should the Muslims turn back from fighting their enemy. Whoever does respond to God's command and acknowledges Him, he will accept that from him and help him [to accomplish] it in kindness. He should only fight whoever denies God [so as to make him] acknowledge that which has come from [1885] God. So if [someone] has responded to the call, [the Muslim] has no cause to get at him; God shall be his reckoner thereafter in whatever he seeks to conceal.[378] Whoever does not respond to the cause of God shall be killed and fought wherever he may be and wherever he may have come to, as an enemy.[379] [God] shall not accept from [such a] one anything that he may give, except Islam; but whoever responds to Him and acknowledges [Him], He shall accept [it] from him and instruct him. [The Muslim] should fight whoever denies [God]; so, if God lets him prevail over [the unbeliever], he should make slaughter among them by any means, with weapons and fire; then he should divide that which God bestowed as spoil upon him, except for the fifth part, which he should convey to us. And [he should take care] to prevent his companions from rash acts[380] and evil [deeds], and not to introduce into them auxiliary troops[381] until he can get to know them and learn what[382] they are, [making sure that] they should not be

378. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 16: "in his actions."

379. Nuwayrī and Cairo read ḥaythu balagha murāghima-hu for the text's ḥaythu balagha murāghamatan. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 16, last line: "wherever he learned of their call [to Islam]," ḥaythu balagha bi-du'ā'i-him.

380. Lit., "haste," "precipitancy" (al-'ajalah).

381. Text has ḥashw; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 17, has "a kind of people" (jins min al-nās). But cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 43, 4 lines from end, where in another context he speaks of ḥashw kathīr min al-'arab, "many Arab (i.e., nomad?) auxiliaries."

382. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 17: "who."

spies,[383] and that the Muslims may not be undermined because of them. And [he should] treat the Muslims justly and deal gently with them in marching and encamping, and should seek them out. And none of (the Muslims) should try to outdo another [in reaching a place]. [The commander] should follow [my] counsel regarding good companionship and gentle speech, as far as the Muslims are concerned.

The Remainder of the Account about Ghaṭafān at the Time of Their Joining with Ṭulayḥah and Other Things Relating to the Affair of Ṭulayḥah

According to ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿd—his uncle—Sayf; and according [1886] to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad and Badr b. al-Khalīl and Hishām b. ʿUrwah:[384] After ʿAbs and Dhubyān and those attached to them took refuge at al-Buzākhah, Tulayḥah sent to Jadīlah and al-Ghawth [proposing that they] unite with him; so people from the two clans hurried to him, having ordered their tribe to join them, and came before Ṭulayḥah. Meanwhile Abū Bakr sent ʿAdī [b. Ḥātim of Ṭayyiʾ] to his tribe, before sending Khālid out from Dhū al-Qaṣṣah, saying, "Overtake them [so that] they will not be destroyed." So he went out to them and cajoled them.[385] Khālid went out on (ʿAdī's) heels, and Abū Bakr ordered him to begin with Ṭayyiʾ on the flanks [of the mountains],[386] then to head for al-Buzākhah, and then in third place for al-Buṭāḥ, and not to leave [a place] when he finished with a group until he had spoken to (Abū Bakr) and he had ordered him to do so. Abū Bakr let it be known[387]

---

383. ʿUyūn. Manuscript C has "aid" [ʿawn]; Kos has "a wealthy person" [ghanī].

384. Balansī, 31; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 346–47; Nuwayrī, 70; Diyārbakrī, II, 205–6 (to p. 62, below); Caetani, 608.

385. Lit., "he twirled [the hair] of the upper parts of the camel's back" (fatala-hum fī al-dhirwah wa al-ghārib); on the idiom, see Ibn Manẓūr, XIV, 284, left col., s.v. al-dhirwah.

386. ʿAlā al-ʾaknāf, that is, on the sides of the "mountains of Ṭayyiʾ" (see note 388, below). Al-Aknāf may be a place name, but more probably it was simply a descriptive term; cf. Yāqūt, s.v.

387. I.e., as a ruse. Cf. p. 63, below.

that he was going out to Khaybar and from it would be going down to gather with him so that he would meet him on the flanks of Salmā.[388] So[389] Khālid went out, skirting al-Buzākhah, and inclined toward Aja', letting it be known that he would be going out to Khaybar[390] and then gathering with them. That made the Ṭayyi' hold back and be slow [in joining] Ṭulayḥah; meanwhile, 'Adī reached them and invited them [to Islam]. At this they said, "We will never render the oath of allegiance to Abū al-Faṣīl." So he said: "There has come to you a group who would violate your womenfolk. Indeed, you will [have to] nickname him 'the Greatest Stud.'[391] So it is your business." At this they said to him, "Then meet the army [of Khālid] and protect us from it so that we can extricate those of us who went to al-Buzākhah [to join Ṭulayḥah]; for, if we break with Ṭulayḥah while they are in his hands, he will kill them or take them hostage."

So[392] 'Adī met Khālid while he was in al-Sunḥ,[393] saying "Oh [1887]
Khālid, hold back from me[394] for three days; there should gather to you five hundred warriors with whom you may strike your enemy. That is better than that you should hasten them to the Fire and be distracted by them." So [Khālid] did that, whereupon 'Adī returned to [the tribe of Ṭayyi']. They had sent their tribes-

388. Bi-al-'aknāf, 'aknāf Salmā. Salmā and Aja' [next line] were the "two mountains of Ṭayyi'" [modern Jabal Shammar] in the Najd, about 400 km northeast of Medina. Cf. EI^{2}, s.vv. "Adja' and Salmā" [W. Caskel]; Thilo, s.v.v. and maps A and B. Cf. Balansī, 21.

389. Cf. Nuwayrī, 71 [—Ibn al-Kalbī].

390. An important oasis town in the northern Ḥijāz. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "Khaybar" [L. Veccia Vaglieri].

391. The account turns around a play on words. Abū Bakr literally means "father of the lively young he-camel"; a bakr is young and strong, perhaps several years old, and the word is commonly used as a name. The Ṭayyi' refer to him pejoratively as "Abū al-Faṣīl"; Faṣīl, never used as a name, means "newly weaned camel," presumably implying inexperience, weakness, and helplessness. The faḥl or stallion [here translated "stud"] is a byword for strength and vigor; hence the use of the word to designate the most highly esteemed poets as "fuḥūl al-shu'arā'," etc. Cf. p. 53.

392. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 18, citing Wāqidī, has an interesting variant version of this section. Cf. Nuwayrī, 71.

393. Yāqūt knows this as a place in the Najd, but his localization is clearly derived from this account. Cf. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 148; Emendanda.

394. I.e., from his tribe, Ṭayyi'. Kos has "from us."

men[395] to [those of them who had joined Ṭulayḥah], so that they reached them as reinforcements from Buzākhah. But for that, they would not have been left alone.[396] Then ʿAdī returned to Khālid with [news of] their Islām,[397] and Khālid set out toward al-Ansur,[398] intending [to confront] Jadīlah. At this ʿAdī said to him, "Ṭayyi' is like a bird, and Jadīlah is one of the wings of Ṭayyi'. So give me a few days' time; perhaps God will recover Jadīlah just as he recovered al-Ghawth." So [Khālid] did so. ʿAdī went to them and kept after them until they rendered the oath of allegiance to him, whereupon he brought [Khālid] [news of] their Islam. A thousand of their mounted warriors joined the Muslims. So [ʿAdī] was the best person born in the country of Ṭayyi' and the greatest of [the tribe], with regard to the blessing he brought upon them.

As for Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī,[399] he alleged that, when Usāmah and those of the army who had been with him returned, Abū Bakr became earnest about fighting the apostates and went out with the men. He [remained] with them until he encamped at Dhū al-Qaṣṣah, one stage from Medina toward the Najd. There he put his armies in battle order, and then sent Khālid b. al-Walīd [to be] over the men. He put Thābit b. Qays[400] over the Anṣār, ordered him to [join] Khālid,[401] and ordered [Khālid] to head for Ṭalḥah[402] and ʿUyaynah b. Ḥiṣn[403] while the two of them were at Buzākhah, one of the wells of Banū 395. Lit., "their brothers" [ikhwāna-hum].

396. I.e., Ṭulayḥah would not have let them go.

397. Perhaps here and several lines farther on we should translate "their submission."

398. According to Yāqūt, a well of Ṭayyi', this side of the sands [i.e., west of the sands of Nafūd and Shaqīq].

399. Cf. Baladhurī, Futūḥ, 95–96; Nuwayrī, 71–72; Caetani, 608–9.

400. Thābit b. Qays b. Shammās, orator of the Anṣār and of the Prophet; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 229–30.

401. I.e., to join Khālid's army as a subordinate commander.

402. I.e., Ṭulayḥah, here given in its regular form, rather than in the usual pejorative diminutive.

403. A chief of Fazārah; he opposed the Prophet at the Battle of the Ditch [Khandaq], later embraced Islam, then joined Ṭulayḥa in apostasy. According to Ibn al-Kalbī, 'Uyaynah was a by-name of Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan al-Ghalfānī [see note 344, above]; Caskel, II, 580. Ṭabarī and Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 390, IV, 166–67, clearly consider them different people.

Asad. (Abū Bakr)[404] let it be known that he would go with those who were with him to meet (Khālid), [coming] from the direction of Khaybar; that was a ruse, as he had sent all the army with Khālid, but he wished to let the enemy know that in order to frighten them; then he returned to Medina. Khālid[405] b. al- [1888]
Walīd marched until, when he came near the enemy, he sent out as scouts ʿUkkāshah b. Miḥṣan[406] and Thābit b. Aqram, one of the Banū al-ʿAjlān and an ally of the Anṣār.[407] When the two of them got near the enemy, Ṭulayḥah and his brother Salamah came out to take a look.[408] As for Salamah, it was not long before he killed Thābit. Ṭulayḥah called to his brother when he saw that he had finished off his opponent, [saying], "Help me with [my] man, for he is getting the better [of me].[409] So they teamed up against (ʿUkkāshah) until they killed him; then they went back. Khālid advanced with the men until they passed the slain Thābit b. Aqram, unaware of him until the riding camels stepped on him with their feet. That distressed the Muslims greatly; then they looked, and lo, there prostrate before them was ʿUkkāshah b. Miḥṣan. So the Muslims were overcome with grief at that, and said, "Two of the leaders of the Muslims and two of their horsemen have been killed." So Khālid turned toward Ṭayyiʾ.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Saʿd b. Mujāhid—al-

---

404. The narrative shifts to direct speech (of Abū Bakr) for the first part of this sentence, but it has been converted to indirect speech in the translation to make it fit more smoothly with the rest of the account.

405. Here begins a parallel with Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 347; cf. Baladhurī, Futūḥ, 96; Diyarbakrī, II, 207 (< Ibn Isḥāq); Balansī, 38–39; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 21 bottom (< Ibn Isḥāq); Ibn Ḥubaysh, 21–22 (Wāqidī).

406. An Asadite, ally of ʿAbd Shams (Umayyah clan of Quraysh) before Islam, an early settler in Medina, and one of the most prominent early companions of the Prophet, who promised him entry into paradise. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 1–2.

407. Banū ʿAjlān was a branch of the Ḥijāz section of the Balī tribe. Thābit was an early convert in Medina; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 220; Caskel, II, 546.

408. Lit. "to see and to ask." At this point Nuwayrī, 72, inserts the following passage: "The two of them [Khālid and Salamah] met them both [ʿUkkāshah and Thābit], whereupon Salamah challenged Thābit to single combat, and ʿUkkāshah challenged Ṭulayḥah."

409. ʾĀkil, "devouring." See Glossary, s.v. Balansī, 39; Diyārbakrī, II, 207; and Ibn Ḥubaysh, 21–22 have "for he is killing me."

Muḥill b. Khalīfah—'Adī b. Ḥātim: I sent to Khālid b. al-Walīd, [saying]: "March to me and remain with me a few days, so that I might send to the tribes of Ṭayyi' and gather for you from them more [men] than you have with you. Then I will accompany you to your enemy." So he marched to me.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Salām b. Suwayd—one of the Anṣār: When Khālid saw how grief-stricken his companions were over the killing of Thābit and 'Ukkāshah, he said to them, "Would you like me to repair with you to one of the tribes of the Arabs, whose numbers are great, whose [1889] might[410] is strong, and among whom no one has apostatized from Islam?" To which the men replied, "And what tribe do you mean, what an excellent tribe it is, by God?" He said, "Ṭayyi'." At this they said, "May God give you success, what a good idea you have had!" So he went with them and stayed with the army among Ṭayyi'.

According to Hishām—Judayl b. Khabbāb[411] al-Nabhānī of Banū 'Amr b. Ubayy: Khālid advanced until he encamped at Uruk,[412] the city of Salmā.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Isḥāq: He encamped at Aja', whereupon he put [the army] in order for war; then he marched until the two [forces] met at Buzākhah, while Banū 'Āmir,[413] under their chiefs and leaders, were nearby listening and waiting expectantly [to see] who would be defeated.[414]

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Sa'd b. Mujāhid—elders of his tribe:[415] We asked Khālid that we [be allowed to] protect 410. Or perhaps "weapons" or "valor": shawkah.

---

411. Kos has Judayl b. Jāb (?). Nabhān was a branch of the Ghawth clan of Ṭayyi', but no lineage of 'Amr b. Ubayy is listed in it; cf. Caskel, I, table 257, II, 439.

412. Yāqūt, s.v. "Uruk," confirms that Uruk is the city of Salmā (perhaps deriving his information from this account) and claims that it was in Ghaṭafān country.

413. Banū 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah, a large tribal group of central Arabia that included such tribes as Kilāb, Ka'b, 'Āmir b. Rabī'ah, Hilāl, and Numayr, among others. Cf. *EI*², s.v. "'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'a" (W. Caskel).

414. Cf. Balansī, 6.

415. His tribe was Ṭayyi'. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 347; Caetani, 609.

him against Qays,[416] for Banū Asad were our allies, so he said, "By God, Qays is not the weaker of the two powers; direct yourself at whichever of the two tribes you wish." Then ʿAdī said: "If [even] the closest of my family and the closest of my tribe left this religion,[417] I would fight them because of it; so should I abstain from fighting Banū Asad because of their [former] alliance [with my tribe]? No, by the Eternal God, I will not!" At this, Khālid said to him: "Fighting against either of the two parties is [still] holy war (jihād). Do not oppose the [1890] opinion of your companions; [rather], proceed to one of the two parties and conduct (your companions) to the enemy they are most enthusiastic to fight."

Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—ʿAbd al-Salām b. Suwayd: The horsemen of Ṭayyiʾ used to meet the horsemen of Banū Asad and Fazārah before the arrival of Khālid among them, and they would exchange words without fighting. Asad and Fazārah would say, "No, by God, we will never render the oath of allegiance to Abū al-Faṣīl," whereupon the horsemen of Ṭayyiʾ would say to them, "I bear witness that [Abū Bakr] will fight you until you [will be willing to] call him "father of the greatest stud."[418]

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah b. Yazīd b. Rukānah—ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah:[419] When the men fought, ʿUyaynah fought energetically on the side of Ṭulayḥah at the head of seven hundred of Banū Fazārah. Ṭulayḥah was wrapped up in a cloak of his in the courtyard of one of his hair tents, pretending to prophesy for 416. Qays ʿAylān (or Qays b. ʿAylān) was a broad genealogical grouping that included the tribes of Ghaṭafān, Sulaym, Hawāzin, ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah, and others. Cf. Caskel, II, 462, s.v. "Qays b. al-Nās"; *EI*², s.v. "Ḳays ʿAylān" (W. M. Watt). Presumably in the present context it is meant as a reference to Fazārah, as suggested by Landau-Tasseron, "The Participation of Ṭayyiʾ in the Ridda," 63. In this account the Ṭayyiʾ ask Khālid not to line them up against Asad, their former allies, when the battle is closed, but rather against Fazārah (E. Landau-Tasseron, personal communication).

417. Kos and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 347, have "If this came down on those who are the closest of my family . . . ."

418. Cf. p. 61 and note 391, above, for an explanation of the plays on words.

419. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 347–48; Baladhuri, Futūh, 96; Balansī, 35–36; Diyārbakrī, II, 207 top; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 20 middle; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 21; Nuwayrī, 72–73; Caetani, 614–15.

them while the men were fighting. After the warfare had shaken ʿUyaynah and the fighting had become severe, he returned to Ṭulayḥah and said to him, "Has Gabriel come to you yet?" He replied that he had not, so ʿUyaynah returned to fight until, when the fighting became severe and the warfare shook him [again], he returned to him and said: "You bastard![420] Has Gabriel come to you yet?" Ṭulayḥah replied, "No, by God." ʿUyaynah was uttering an oath:[421] "How long will it be, by God? It has worn us out!"[422] Then he returned to fight, until, when [the revelation] came, he returned to him and said, "Has Gabriel come to you yet?" Ṭulayḥah said that he had, so he asked, "So what did he say to you?" He replied, "He told me that I have a millstone[423] like his millstone, and a story[424] [1891] that you shall not forget." ʿUyaynah said, "I think God knew that there would be a story you would not forget, Oh Banū Fazārah, in this way; so turn away, for by God this one is a liar."[425] So they turned away, and the men were routed. Whereupon they came to Ṭulayḥah, saying, "What do you order us [to do]?" Now he had made his horse ready near him, and prepared a camel for his wife al-Nawār, so when they came to him and asked him what he ordered them to do, he stood up, jumped on his horse, and carried his wife to save her. [Then] he said, "Whoever of you can do as I have done and save his family, let him do so." Then he traveled by al-Jūshiyyah[426] until he

420. Lit., "May you have no father!"

421. Yaqūlu... ḥilfan. E. Landau-Tasseron suggests that the text should perhaps be emended to yaqūlu... ʿalafan, "he said rudely." (personal communication).

422. Qad balagha minnā.

423. Raḥā. The word has many significations—mill, molar tooth, high rugged ground, breast, tribe, chief, or any of several other meanings; see Ibn Manẓūr, XIV, 314.

424. Baladhuri, Futūh, 96: "a day"; Balansi, 36: "an effect"; Diyarbakri, II, 207 and Ibn Ḥubaysh, 21: "a matter."

425. Diyarbakri, II, 297, and Ibn Ḥubaysh, 21, have: "'... a matter you will not forget, Oh Fazārah, in this way'—and he pointed to them [standing] under the sun. 'This one, by God, is a liar...'." Ibn Ḥubaysh, 20, has "By God, I think we will have a story we won't forget."

426. Reading with Nuwayrī, 73; text has "al-Ḥawshiyyah." Al-Jūshiyyah was, according to Yāqūt (s.v. "Jūsiyyah," second half of article), a town between Najd and Syria.

reached Syria. His gathering scattered, and God killed some of them. Banū ʿĀmir had been near them with their leaders and chiefs, and those tribes of Sulaym and Hawāzin were [also] in that state, but when God inflicted upon Ṭulayḥah and Fazārah that which befell them, those [tribes] came, saying, "We enter into that which we had left, and we believe in God and His Apostle, and we accept His sovereignty over our property and ourselves."

Abū Jaʿfar said, the reason for the apostasy of ʿUyaynah and Ghaṭafān and those who apostatized of Ṭayyiʾ was [as follows]:

According to ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿd—his uncle—Sayf, and according to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam—Ḥabīb b. Rabīʿah al-Asadī—ʿUmārah b. Fulān al-Asadī:[427] Ṭulayḥah [1892] had apostatized in the lifetime of the Apostle of God, and had asserted a claim to prophecy, so the Prophet sent Ḍirār b. al-Azwar[428] to his tax agents[429] over the Banū Asad [to find out] about that, and ordered them to stand firm in that [matter] against all who apostatized. So they perturbed Ṭulayḥah and made him afraid. The Muslims encamped at Wāridāt,[430] while the unbelievers encamped at Samīrāʾ, and the Muslims continued growing [in numbers] and the unbelievers decreasing until al-Ḍirār determined to march on Ṭulayḥah, so that he took everyone[431] who remained peaceably, except for a blow that he struck [at Ṭulayḥah] with the cutting sword. But [the sword] shrank from him,[432] at which [news of this] spread among the army. Then, while they were in that state, the Muslims received the news of the death of their Prophet. People in the army said 427. Diyarbakri, II, 260; Nuwayrī, 69–70; Caetani, 606–607.

428. A warrior and poet of Asad; the Prophet appointed him tax agent over the Banū al-Ṣaydāʾ of Asad and Banū al-Dīl. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 39–40.

429. ʿUmmāl; sometimes the word seems to mean "governor" in a more general sense.

430. A place northeast of Samīrāʾ; cf. Yāqūt, s.v. and Thilo, s.v.

431. Reading with Kos and Cairo edition. The sentences that follow are confused; Nuwayrī, 70, evidently in an attempt to smooth them out, has the following: "... so that he took everyone by surrender. Then he agreed to deliver a blow with a sword, so he shrank from him. [News of] that blow spread among the army, but they said, 'The weapons will not affect Ṭulayḥah.' So while the army was in that state, the news of the Prophet's death reached them...."

432. I.e., the sword miraculously did not harm Ṭulayḥah.

about that blow, "Weapons will not affect Ṭulayḥah." So from that day forth the Muslims knew decreasing [of numbers], and people scattered to Ṭulayḥah and his situation was in the ascendant.[433] Dhū al-Khimārayn ʿAwf al-Jadhamī[434] approached so that he encamped opposite us. Thumāmah b. Aws b. Lām al-Ṭāʾī[435] sent to him, "With me are 500 of Jadīlah, so, if something should happen to you unexpectedly, we are at al-Qurdūdah[436] and al-Ansur just this side of the sands. And Muhalhil b. Zayd sent to him, "With me are the army (ḥadd) of al-Ghawth, so if [1893] something should happen to you unexpectedly, we are on the flanks [of the mountains] facing Fayd.[437] Ṭayyiʾ showed nothing but benevolence toward Dhū al-Khimārayn ʿAwf because there had been an alliance in the jāhiliyyah among Asad and Ghaṭafān and Ṭayyiʾ; then, some time before the sending of the Prophet, Ghaṭafān and Asad gathered against Ṭayyiʾ and forced them to leave the territory they had had in the jāhiliyyah, [both] Jadīlah and Ghawth. ʿAwf disliked that, so he broke with Ghaṭafān. The two tribes followed one another in emigration. ʿAwf sent to these two tribes of Ṭayyiʾ, renewing their alliance, and undertook to help them, so that they [were able to] return to their territories. That distressed Ghaṭafān; but, when the Apostle of God died, ʿUyaynah b. Ḥiṣn stood up among Ghaṭafān saying, "I no longer recognize the boundaries of Ghaṭafān since the termination of what was between us and Banū Asad, so I will renew the alliance that was between us of old and follow Ṭulayḥah. By God,[438] it is preferable for us to follow a prophet from our two allies than to follow a prophet from Quraysh. [In any

433. Diyarbakri, II, 160, and Nuwayrī, 70, gloss this passage, but the idea there also is clearly that the death of the Prophet strengthened Ṭulayḥah and weakened the Muslims.

434. Jadhīmah was a clan of Asad. Little information is available on Dhū al-Khimārayn, "the one with two veils"; cf. Wellhausen, Skizzen VI, 148; Landau-Tasseron, "The Participation of Ṭayyiʾ," 58–59; Landau-Tasseron, "Asad," 21.

435. Lām b. ʿAmr was a branch of the Jadīlah clan of Ṭayyiʾ; cf. Caskel, II, 376.

436. Yāqūt, s.v. "al-Qurdūdah" offers a variation of this sentence but provides no further information on its location.

437. Or "at Al-Aknāf facing Fayd." Fayd is a well-known oasis on the Mecca-Kūfa road, just east of Mt. Salmā. Cf. Yāqūt, s.v.; Thilo, s.v. and Map B.

438. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 342.

case] Muḥammad has died, whereas Ṭulayḥah remains." Then they agreed with his opinion, so he did [as he had proposed], and so did they. So when Ghaṭafān gathered to assist Ṭulayḥah, Ḍirār and Quḍāʿī and Sinān[439] and whoever [else] had undertaken some of the Prophet's work among Banū Asad fled to Abū Bakr. Those who had been with them were scattered, so they gave Abū Bakr the news and told him to exercise caution.[440] Then Ḍirār b. al-Azwar said, "I have seen no one, other than the Apostle of God,[441] who is more likely[442] to carry out widespread war than Abū Bakr; for [when] we began to tell him [of it], it was as if we had informed him of something to his advantage, [1894] not [something] detrimental to him."

The delegations of Banū Asad and Ghaṭafān and Hawāzin and Ṭayyiʾ[443] came to him, and the delegations of Quḍāʿah encountered Usāmah b. Zayd, whereupon he led them to Abū Bakr; so they gathered in Medina, staying with the chiefs of the Muslims on the tenth [day] after the death of the Apostle of God. Then they proposed to do the ritual prayer, provided that they be exempted from the zakāt. A council of those who were lodging them agreed to accept that, so that they might attain what they desired. Every one of the chiefs of the Muslims lodged someone of them, except al-ʿAbbās. Then they came to Abū Bakr to inform him of their tidings and of what their council had agreed on. But Abū Bakr did not [agree],[444] for he refused [to accept] anything except what the Apostle of God had accepted. They refused [these terms], so he sent them back, giving them respite of a day and a night [to leave], whereupon they dispersed to their tribes.

---

439. Quḍāʿī b. ʿAmr was the Prophet's tax agent over the Banū al-Ḥārith of Asad, cf. Ṭabarī I, 1798; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 305. Sinān b. Abī Sinān b. Miḥsan al-Asadī was an ally of ʿAbd Shams (Umayyah—Quraysh) and an early convert to Islam; he was the Prophet's tax agent over the Banū Mālik of Asad; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 358. On Quḍāʿī and Sinān, cf. Landau-Tasseron, "Asad," 19.

440. Or "vigilant." Kos and Manuscript B omit the phrase.

441. Kos omits this phrase.

442. Amlaʾa "fuller," hence "more suitable, more capable, more inclined to," as suggested by Glossary.

443. Cf. pp. 44–45, and notes.

444. Illā mā kāna min Abī Bakr.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ḥajjāj—ʿAmr b. Shuʿayb:[445] The Apostle of God had sent ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ to Jayfar[446] upon his return from the farewell pilgrimage.[447] Then the Apostle of God died, while ʿAmr was in ʿUmān; so he came until, when he reached al-Baḥrayn, he found al-Mundhir b. Sāwī[448] on the point of death. Whereupon al-Mundhir said to him, "Advise me with regard to my wealth in a matter that will be to my benefit and not to my detriment." He replied, "Give your real property as an almsgiving (ṣadaqah)[449] that will continue after you." So he did that. Then (ʿAmr) left him and marched among the Banū Tamīm;[450] then he went from them to the territory of Banū ʿĀmir and stayed with Qurrah b. Hubayrah,[451] while Qurrah [1895] was playing for time,[452] and all the Banū ʿĀmir likewise, except for a few.[453] Then (ʿAmr) marched until he came to Medina; at this Quraysh gathered about him and asked him [for information]. So he informed them that armies were gathered together from Dabā to where he had reached them. At this they dispersed and formed circles.[454] ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb came to greet ʿAmr, and passed by a circle while they were [talking] about what they

445. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 352–53; Balansi, 43; Diyarbakri, II, 208; Caetani, 584.

446. Jayfar b. al-Julandā of the Azd tribe and his brother ʿAbd were corulers in ʿUmān who embraced Islam upon receiving a letter from the Prophet; cf. Caskel, II, 104, 256 (s.v. "ʿAbd b. al-Julandā"); Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 313, Shoufani, 36–37. Their father, al-Julandā b. al-Mustakir, had founded the dynasty at Ṣuhār; cf. Caskel, II, 264; J. C. Wilkinson, "The Julandā."

447. The Prophet's final pilgrimage to Mecca, AH 10. Cf. note 104, above.

448. A chief of the Dārim clan of Tamīm, he was the Prophet's tax agent over al-Baḥrayn; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 417; Caskel, II, 430.

449. Reading the verb as taṣaddaq instead of the text's ṣaddiq. The term ṣadaqah is here used in the later sense as alms, rather than as a tax imposed on nomads; cf. note 242, above.

450. Tamīm b. Murr was a powerful tribe of central and northeastern Arabia; they had close ties to Mecca on the eve of Islam. Cf. Watt, Medina, 137–40; Caskel, II, 544; M. J. Kister, "Mecca and Tamīm," JESHO 8 (1965), 113–63.

451. Chieftain of Banū Qushayr, a part of ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah; he embraced Islam late in the Prophet's life, and was sent by him as tax agent over his tribe. Cf. Caskel, II, 473; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, s.v.

452. Lit., "putting a foot forward and holding a foot back."

453. Al-khawāṣṣ. Kos, manuscript C, and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, omit the clause of exception.

454. I.e., circles formed to discuss the news.

had heard from ʿAmr. In that circle were ʿUthmān [b. ʿAffān], ʿAlī [b. Abī Ṭālib], Ṭalḥah [b. ʿUbaydallāh], al-Zubayr [b. al-ʿAwwām], ʿAbd al-Raḥmān [b. ʿAwf], and Saʿd [b. Abī Waqqāṣ].[455] When ʿUmar drew near them, they fell silent; so he said, "What are you [talking] about?" But they did not answer him, so he said, "How well I know what you are meeting secretly about!" At this Ṭalḥah grew angry and said, "By God, oh Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, then tell us about the unseen!" He replied, "No one knows the unseen except God; but I think you were saying how much you fear for Quraysh because of the Arabs, and how likely [the Arabs] are not to affirm this cause." [When] they said that he was right, he continued, "Do not fear this situation. By God, I am more afraid of what you might do to the Arabs than I am of what the Arabs might do to you! If you were to go into a hole in the ground, oh company of Quraysh, the Arabs would enter it after you. So be God-fearing in regard to them." He passed on to ʿAmr and greeted him, and then returned to Abū Bakr.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Hishām b. ʿUrwah—his father:[456] Upon his return from ʿUmān after the death of the Apostle of God, ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ stayed with Qurrah b. Hubayrah b. Salamah b. Qushayr. Around him was an army of obscure groups (afnāʾ) of Banū ʿĀmir. [Qurrah] slaughtered for him[457] and honored his dwelling, and then, when [ʿAmr] wished [to resume] traveling, Qurrah met with him privately and said to him, "Hey you, the Arabs will not be pleased with you by the [demand for] tribute (al-itāwah). If you spare them the taking of their wealth, [1896] they will listen to you and obey, but if you deny [that] I do not think they would gather to you." At this ʿAmr replied, "Have you become an unbeliever, Oh Qurrah?" Now around [Qurrah] were the Banū ʿĀmir, and [Qurrah] hated to make the fact that they were following [him] known, lest they should deny following him, with the result that he would end up in a

455. All leading early converts to Islam, and later the six members of the council that selected ʿUthmān to be the third caliph.

456. Cf. Balansī, 44–45; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 352–53.

457. I.e., slaughtered animals for a feast.

disastrous [situation]. So he said, "We shall send you back to your old ways (he had been a Muslim). Let's set a date between us and you [to do battle]." Whereupon ʿAmr said, "Do you threaten us[458] with the Arabs and [try to] frighten us with them? Your alliance is [no better than] your mother's knick-knacks![459] By God, I shall make the cavalry trample you!"[460] And he came to Abū Bakr and the Muslims and gave them the news.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: When Khālid was done with the matter of Banū ʿĀmir and their taking the oath of allegiance accepting [the conditions] that he imposed on them,[461] he bound ʿUyaynah b. Ḥiṣn and Qurrah b. Hubayrah to send them to Abū Bakr. When they came before him,[462] Qurrah said to him, "Oh Caliph of the Apostle of God, I had been a Muslim, and I have a witness to that—to my Islam—in ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ, [for] he passed by me, whereupon I honored him and showed favor to him and protected him." So Abū Bakr summoned ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ, saying, "What do you know about the affairs of this [man]?" Thereupon [ʿAmr] told him the story until he got to what (Qurrah) had said to him regarding the ṣadaqah tax,[463] [at which] Qurrah said to him, "Let that be enough for you, may God have mercy on you!" [But] [ʿAmr] said, "By God, not until I have informed him of everything that you said." So he related [it] to him, but Abū Bakr pardoned (Qurrah) and spared his life.

[1897] According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah b. Yazīd b. Rukānah—ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah:[464] Those who saw ʿUyaynah b. Ḥiṣn with 458. Reading a-tūʿidunā with Cairo ed. and manuscript B for a-tuwāʿidunā in the text.

459. Text: ḥifsh; Cairo: ḥafsh, meaning "your mother's lowly hut," or "incense box" or "box for spindles," etc., in any case, intended as a denigration of Qurrah's promise.

460. Reading with the Cairo edition.

461. Cf. pp. 66–67, above, on ʿĀmir's oath of allegiance; Caetani, 621–22.

462. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 353; Baladhuri, Futūḥ, 97; Balansı, 47–48; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 26–27.

463. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil: zakāt.

464. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 348; Balansı, 47; Diyarbakrı, II, 208; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 25; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 167; Nuwayrī, 74; Caetani, 622.

his hands bound to his neck with a rope informed me that the boys of Medina used to prick him with palm branches, saying, "Oh enemy of God, have you become an unbeliever after [acknowledging] your faith?" Whereupon he would say, "By God, I never believed in God." But Abū Bakr pardoned him and spared his life.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf:[465] The Muslims took a man of Banū Asad, so he was brought to Khālid at al-Ghamr.[466] He was knowledgeable about the affairs of Ṭulayḥah, so Khālid said to him, "Tell us about him and about what he says to you." Whereupon he alleged that among the things he brought [as revelation] was: "By the doves and the wild pigeons, by the famished sparrow hawk, they fasted[467] before you by years, may our kingship reach Iraq and Syria."[468]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū Yaʿqūb Saʿīd b. ʿUbaydah:[469] When the people of al-Ghamr took refuge at al-Buzākhah, Ṭulayḥah stood up among them. Then he said, "I order you to make a millstone with handles,[470] with which God can grind up[471] those whom He will, and upon which He may throw down those whom He will." Then he put his armies in battle order. After that he said,[472] "Send two horsemen on two dark horses of Banū Naṣr b. Quʿayn,[473] bringing you a spy." So they sent out two horsemen of Banū Quʿayn, whereupon he and [his brother] Salamah went out as two lookouts.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd b. Thābit b. al-Jidhʿ—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Kaʿb[474]—those of the [1898]

---

465. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 348–49; Nuwayrī, 70; Caetani, 605.

466. A well of Asad, evidently just south of Mt. Aja'; cf. Yāqūt, s.v.; Thilo, s.v. and Map B.

467. Text and Nuwayrī, 70: "stood surety" [?]; we read with Cairo edition.

468. This passage, like the one at the end of the next paragraph, is couched in rhymed prose reminiscent of the Qur'ān; unlike the Qur'ān, however, the doggerel attributed to Ṭulayḥah has a ludicrous or comic effect.

469. Cf. Balansi, 33, from third sentence onwards; Caetani, 605–6.

470. Raḥan dhātu ʿuran.

471. Lit., "strike, smite": aṣāba.

472. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 19, l. 16f.

473. A clan of Asad, closely related to Ṭulayḥah's clan. Cf. Caskel, II, 446 and Table 50; Landau-Tasseron, "Asad," 2.

474. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 349 top; Caetani, 617–18.

Anṣār who witnessed Buzākhah: At Buzākhah Khālid did not capture a single family; the families of Banū Asad were guarded. (According to Abū Yaʿqūb: [the families of Asad were] between Mithqab and Falj,[475] and the families of Qays were between Falj and Wāsiṭ.[476]) So no sooner were they defeated than they all recognized Islām out of fear for [their] off-spring, and protected themselves from Khālid by honoring his demands,[477] and claimed [assurances of] safety. Ṭulayḥah[478] went on until he descended among Kalb at al-Naqʿ;[479] then he embraced Islām and remained staying among Kalb until Abū Bakr died. He embraced Islām there when he had learned that Asad and Ghaṭafān and ʿĀmir had embraced Islām. Then he went out toward Mecca to make the ʿumrah[480] during the reign of Abū Bakr, and passed by Medina. At this Abū Bakr was told that this was Ṭulayḥah; but he said, "What should I do to him? Leave him alone; for God has guided him to Islam." Ṭulayḥah continued toward Mecca and performed his ʿumrah. Then he came to ʿUmar to render the oath of allegiance when he assumed the caliphate. So ʿUmar said to him, "You are the murderer of ʿUkkāshah and Thābit; by God, I do not like you at all." To which he replied, "Oh Commander of the Faithful, why are you troubled by two men whom God ennobled by my hand,[481] when He did not disgrace me through their hands?" So ʿUmar accepted the oath of allegiance from him; then he said to him, "You imposter, what is left of your soothsaying?" He replied, "A puff or two in the bellows." Then he returned to the territory of his tribe and remained in it until he left for Iraq.

---

475. Yāqūt is vague on Mithqab, there being several places with the name. Falj (or Baṭn Falj) is a wide valley in northeast Arabia, stretching toward Baṣrah in Iraq; cf. Yāqūt, s.v., Thilo, s.v. and Map B.

476. Wāsiṭ is, again, difficult to localize, since many places bore this name.

477. Ittaqaw Khālidan bi-ṭalabatihi. Cf. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 148.

478. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 348; Baladhuri, Futūh, 96; Nuwayrī, 74–75.

479. Kalb b. Wabarah was a strong tribe of the Quḍāʿah confederation in northern Arabia and the Syrian steppe. Cf. Caskel, II, 368; EI^{2}, s.v. "Kalb b. Wabara" (J. W. Fück). No information on the location of al-Naqʿ is listed in the standard geographical sources.

480. The "lesser pilgrimage" to Mecca.

481. I.e., by making them martyrs.

The Apostasy of Hawāzin, Sulaym, and ʿĀmir [1899]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl and ʿAbdallāh:[482] As for Banū ʿĀmir, they played for time while they looked to see what Asad and Ghaṭafān would do. So when they were surrounded while Banū ʿĀmir was under their leaders and chiefs, Qurrah b. Hubayrah was among Kaʿb[483] and their allies, and ʿAlqamah b. ʿUlāthah among Kilāb[484] and their allies. Now ʿAlqamah had embraced Islam and then apostatized in the time of the Prophet; then he went out after the [Prophet's] conquest of al-Ṭāʾif until he reached Syria. So when the Prophet died, [ʿAlqamah] came back hurriedly so that he encamped among the Banū Kaʿb, playing for time. Abū Bakr learned of that, so he sent a raiding party to him, putting al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr[485] in command of it. He said, "Oh Qaʿqāʿ, march until you raid ʿAlqamah b. ʿUlāthah. Perhaps you will take him [captive] for me or kill him; [but] know that the [only] remedy for a tear is to stitch it up, so do what you must." So he went out at the head of this raiding party until he raided the spring where ʿAlqamah was. [ʿAlqamah] was still holding back, so he made an effort to outdistance them on his horse and escaped them.[486] His family[487] and his children embraced Islām, so [al-Qaʿqāʿ] carried off his wife and his daughters and his [other] womenfolk and those men who stood fast, who protected themselves from him through submission (islām). Then he brought them before Abū Bakr, whereupon ʿAlqamah's children and his wife denied that they had assisted him while they were staying in [his] household. That was all [Abū Bakr] learned;[488] and 482. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 349; Caetani, 603–4, 619–20.

---

483. Kaʿb b. Rabīʿah was the subsection of ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah to which Qurrah's tribe, Qushayr, belonged.

484. Kilāb b. Rabīʿah was a tribe of the ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah group residing in west central Arabia, east of Medina. ʿUlāthah was a chief of Kilāb, whom the Prophet made a special effort to win over following the conquest of Mecca in AH 8.

485. A poet and warrior of the ʿAmr clan of Tamīm, he later occupies a prominent role in Sayf's accounts of the Islamic conquests. Cf. Ella Landau-Tasseron, "Sayf Ibn ʿUmar in Medieval and Modern Scholarship," 16.

486. Cf. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 148.

487. Cf. Balansi, 48; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 27 top.

488. I.e., he learned no incriminating information about them.

[1900] they said, "What is our fault in what ʿAlqamah did in this [situation]?" So [Abū Bakr] set them free. Afterward [ʿAlqamah] submitted,[489] so [Abū Bakr] accepted that from him.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū ʿAmr and Abū Ḍamrah—Ibn Sīrīn: A similar account.[490] After the defeat of the people of Buzākhah, Banū ʿĀmir came, saying, "Let us enter that which we had left," so he[491] made an agreement with them on [the same terms] that the people of Buzākhah from Asad and Ghaṭafān and Ṭayyiʾ had agreed to before them. They gave him their hands[492] to Islam. The only thing he would accept from anyone of Asad or Ghaṭafān or Hawāzin[493] or Sulaym or Ṭayyiʾ was that they bring him those who during their apostasy had burned the people of Islām and mutilated them[494] and waged aggression against them; so they brought them to him, whereupon he accepted that from them [as atonement] except for Qurrah b. Hubayrah[495] and some people with him whom he fettered. He mutilated those who had waged aggression against Islām by burning them with fire, smashing them with rocks, throwing them down from mountains, casting them headlong into wells, and piercing them with arrows; and he sent Qurrah and the [other] prisoners[496] and wrote to Abū Bakr, "Banū ʿĀmir has come forward after being reluctant, and entered Islām after awaiting [the outcome of things]. I have accepted nothing from anyone, whether he fought me or made peace with me, until he brought me whoever waged aggression against the Muslims; those I have killed by every means of slaughter. And I have sent you Qurrah and his companions."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū ʿAmr—Nāfiʿ: Abū Bakr wrote to Khālid, "May that which God has granted you by way of blessings increase for you! Fear God in your affairs, for 489. Or: embraced Islām.

---

490. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 350; Caetani, 620–21.
491. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, says "Khālid."
492. This refers to the traditional hand clasp symbolizing the bayʿah, or oath of allegiance.
493. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, has ʿĀmir.
494. Here and below, maththala, "to mutilate" or "to punish severely."
495. Cf. Wathīma, 7/46.
496. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, adds: "and Zuhayr."

verily God is with those who are pious and who do good works. [1901]
Take seriously the command of God and be not remiss; for you shall not be victorious over anyone who fought the Muslims unless you fight him and, by punishing him as an example, warn another. So kill whomever you like of those who showed enmity to God or who opposed Him, [if] you think there will be some benefit in doing so." Hence (Khālid) remained in al-Buzākhah for a month, going 'round about it[497] and returning to it in pursuit of those [evildoers]; so that some of them were burned and some cut to pieces and some smashed with rocks and some thrown from mountaintops. He brought Qurrah and his companions, but they did not encamp, nor was there said to them what had been said to ʿUyaynah and his companions,[498] because they were not in the same situation and had not done the things [the companions] had done.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl and Abū Yaʿqūb:[499] The shattered remnants of Ghaṭafān[500] gathered at Ẓafar.[501] With them was Umm Ziml Salmā, daughter of Mālik b. Ḥudhayfah b. Badr; she resembled her mother Umm Qirfah, daughter of Rabīʿah b. Fulān b. Badr.[502] Now Umm Qirfah had been [married] to Mālik b. Ḥudhayfah and bore him Qirfah, Ḥakamah, Jurāshah,[503] Ziml, Ḥuṣayn, Sharīk, ʿAbd, Zufar, Muʿāwiyah, Ḥamalah, Qays, and Laʾy. As for Ḥakamah, the Apostle of God killed him on the day ʿUyaynah b. Ḥiṣn raided the livestock of Medina; Abū Qatādah [actually] killed him. So those shattered remnants rallied around Salmā; she was as renowned as her mother [had been], and she had Umm Qirfah's [1902] camel, so (Ghaṭafān) encamped with her. Then she stirred them

497. Lit., "ascending and descending from it."
498. Cf. p. 73, above.
499. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 350; Caetani, 623–24.
500. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, has "Ghaṭafān and Ṭayyiʾ and Sulaym and Hawāzin and others." Cf. list on p. 78, below.
501. Yāqūt, s.v., places this near Ḥawʾab on the Baṣrah-Mecca road, but the localization is probably derived from this account; cf. p. 78 and note 505, below.
502. Her name was Fāṭimah bt. Rabīʿah b. Badr; a paternal cousin of Mālik b. Ḥudhayfah. Cf. Caskel, I, Table 130; II, 246 and 477; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil.
503. Caskel, I, Table 130, has "Khurāshah."

up and commanded them to make war, and marched about at the head of them summoning them to make war on Khālid, until they [all] gathered about her. They became encouraged on that account, and solitary remnants congregated to them from every side. ([Back] in the days of Umm Qirfah, [Salmā] had been taken captive and had fallen to ʿĀ'ishah, who then set her free, so that [Salmā] used to be with her. Subsequently [Salmā] returned to her own tribe. Now one day[504] the Prophet called on them and said, "Verily, one of you [women] will make the dogs of Ḥaw'ab[505] bark." Salmā caused that to happen when she apostatized and demanded that vengeance.) Then she marched about between Ẓafar and al-Ḥaw'ab to gather [followers] to herself, whereupon every company of vanquished warriors and every oppressed person from those clans of Ghaṭafān and Hawāzin and Sulaym and Asad and Ṭayyi' rallied to her. So when Khālid learned of that, while he was engaged in exacting vengeance and taking ṣadaqah tax and calling people [to Islām] and calming them down, he marched to the woman. Her situation had grown grave and her case was serious, so he fell upon her and her followers; then they fought intensely while she was standing on her mother's camel with the same bravery as [her mother]. People began to say, "Whoever goads her camel shall have one hundred camels because of her fame." [Many] noble families of Khāsi'[506] and Hāribah[507] and Ghanm[508] perished on that day, (Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī] said: Khāsi' is a clan of Ghanm.) and 504. That is, one day when she was still in ʿĀ'ishah's household.

505. Ḥaw'ab was a well on the Baṣrah road in the territory of Banū Abū Bakr b. Kilāb, south of Ḥimā Ḍariyyah, 325 km east of Medina. Cf. Yāqūt, s.v. and Thilo, s.v.

506. Cairo has Jās; Emendanda proposes Jalas; Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 148 suggests Jāsī, a branch of Dhubyān, and says that Ṭabarī's note equating them with Ghanm is not right. Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, relates "al-Jāsī" to a branch of Fazārah—Lawdhān, but no one else knows of it. Perhaps we should read Jassās [b. ʿAmr], the name of a family of Fazārah; cf. Caskel, II, 260 and Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharat ansāb al-ʿArab (Cairo 1971), 256.

507. Hāribah b. Dhubyān was a declining branch of Dhubyān (Caskel, II, 279).

508. Possibly Ghanm b. ʿAbdallāh of Ghaṭafān. The Cairo edition (index) identifies it as Ghanm of Banū Ḥadas, but according to Ibn al-Kalbī, Ḥadas was a clan of Lakhm from Transjordan, and seems to have included no subclan named Ghanm. (Caskel, II, 290).

among the people [many] were struck down of Kāhil.[509] Their fighting was intense until some horsemen gathered around [Salmā's] camel, wounding it and killing her. Around her camel were slain a hundred men. [Khālid] sent [news of] the victory, so that it arrived about twenty days after [the arrival of] Qurrah. [1903]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl and Abū Yaʿqūb:[510] The story of al-Jiwāʾ and Nāʿir[511] was that al-Fujāʾah Iyās b. ʿAbd Yālīl[512] came to Abū Bakr saying, "Assist me with weapons and order me [to fight] whomever you wish of the apostates." So [Abū Bakr] gave him weapons and gave him his command. But he disobeyed his command with regard to the Muslims, going out until he camped at al-Jiwāʾ, and he sent Najabah[513] b. Abū al-Maythāʾ from the Banū al-Sharīd[514] and ordered him against the Muslims. So he launched them in a raid against every Muslim amongst Sulaym, ʿĀmir and Hawāzin. Abū Bakr learned of that, so he sent to Ṭurayfah b. Ḥājiz[515] ordering him to gather [men] to himself and to march against [al-Fujāʾah]; and he sent ʿAbdallāh b. Qays al-Jāsī[516] to him by way of reinforcement, so he [went]. Then the two of them rose up against [al-Fujāʾah] and pursued him, so he began to seek shelter from the two of them until they caught up with him at al-Jiwāʾ, whereupon they fought. Najabah was killed and Fujāʾah fled, so Ṭurayfah followed him and took him captive, sending him to Abū Bakr. [When] he was brought to Abū Bakr he

509. Presumably Kāhil b. Asad; cf. Caskel, II, 368. However, kāhil may have a more general sense, meaning "those upon whom [people] relied."

510. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 350–51; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 98; Caetani, 624–25; Balansi, 130ff. Balansī links al-Jiwāʾ to the story of Abū Shajarah; see pp. 81ff., below.

511. According to Yāqūt, al-Jiwāʾ was a well in the Ḥimā Ḍariyyah, ca. 325 km east of Medina. Yāqūt's localization of Nāʿir is derived from this account.

512. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 98: "al-Fujāʾah, who was Bujayr b. Iyās b. ʿAbdallāh al-Sulamī." Caskel, II, 228–29 and 247: Bujayrah b. Iyās of Banū ʿĀmirah of Sulaym, noting that the manuscript of Ibn al-Kalbī has "Baḥīrah."

513. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 350: Nukhbah.

514. Sharīd b. Riyāḥ was a branch of Sulaym (Caskel, II, 527).

515. Of Sulaym; cf. Shoufani, 138. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 51 ("Ṭurayfah b. Ḥājir") adds nothing to Ṭabarī's account.

516. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 351: al-Jāshī. Manuscript B: no points. Manuscript C: Jāsī of Qays. Cf. note 506, above.

ordered a fire to be kindled with much firewood in the prayer yard (muṣallā) of Medina and threw him, with arms and legs bound, into it.

According to Abū Jaʿfar—Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr, regarding the affair of al-Fujāʾah:[517] A man of Banū Sulaym came to Abū Bakr. He was Iyās b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd Yālīl b. ʿUmayrah b. Khufāf, called al-
[1904] Fujāʾah. He said to Abū Bakr, "I am a Muslim, and I want to fight[518] those unbelievers who have apostatized; so give me a mount and help me." So Abū Bakr mounted him upon camels and gave him weapons, whereupon he went forth indiscriminately against the people, Muslim and apostate [alike], taking their property and striking whoever of them tried to resist. With him was a man of Banū al-Sharīd named Najabah b. Abī al-Maythāʾ. So when Abū Bakr received news of him, he wrote to Ṭurayfah b. Ḥājiz: "The enemy of God al-Fujāʾah came to me, alleging that he was a Muslin, and asked me to empower him over those who apostatized from Islām, so I mounted him and armed him. Then absolutely certain information reached me that the enemy of God has gone forth indiscriminately against the people, the Muslim and the apostate [alike], taking their property and killing whoever of them opposes him. So march against him with whatever Muslims are with you until you kill him or take him [captive] to bring to me." Ṭurayfah b. Ḥājiz duly marched against (al-Fujāʾah). Then when the people met they shot arrows back and forth, whereupon Najabah b. Abī al-Maythāʾ was killed by an arrow shot at him. So when al-Fujāʾah saw the earnestness of the Muslims, he said to Ṭurayfah, "By God, you are no more entitled to command than I am; you are a commander of Abū Bakr, and I [likewise] am his commander." At this Ṭurayfah said to him, "If you are telling the truth, then lay down your weapons and depart with me to Abū Bakr." So he went out with him. Then when the two of them approached Abū Bakr, he ordered Ṭurayfah b. Ḥājiz to take him out to this clearing[519] and burn him in it with fire. So Ṭurayfah took him

517. Balansī, 126–28; Caetani, 625.
518. Jihād, lit. "to strive against."
519. Al-baqīʿ; perhaps a reference to Baqīʿ al-Gharqad, the famous Muslim cemetery in Medina.

out to the prayer yard and kindled a fire for him and threw him into it.

Khufāf b. Nudbah [Khufāf b. ʿUmayr][520] said, in reference to al-Fujāʾah and what he did:

Why did they take his weapons to fight him [1905]
even though those are sins in the eyes of God?
Their religion [dīn] is not my religion,[521] but I am not one causing error,[522] until Shamām[523] marches to al-Ṭarāt.[524]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr:[525] Some of Sulaym b. Manṣūr had rebelled and returned [to being] unbelievers, while others had stood fast in Islām with a commander of Abū Bakr's over them named Maʿn b. Ḥājiz, one of the Banū Ḥāritha.[526] So when Khālid b. al-Walīd marched against Ṭulayḥah and his companions, he wrote to Maʿn b. Ḥājiz to march with those of Banū Sulaym who had stood fast with him in Islām, [so that they might join] with Khālid. So (Maʿn) marched, leaving in charge of his duties[527] his brother Ṭurayfah b. Ḥājiz. Abū Shajarah b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā[528] had joined the apostates at the head of those of Sulaym who did so. He was the son of al-Khansāʾ,[529] and said:[530]

---

520. A black poet and warrior of Banū Sharīd; he fought on the Prophet's side at Ḥunayn and did not defect from Islam. Nudbah was his mother's name, ʿUmayr his father's. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 118–19; Caskel, II, 348.

521. An allusion to Qurʾān 109:6.

522. Cairo: "I am not [one] of them." Cairo notes that the Aṣmaʿiyyat has "I am not an unbeliever."

523. A mountain of Bāhilah, ca. 200 km west of al-Yamāmah. Cf. Yāqūt, s.v.; Ibn Manẓūr, XII, 327; Thilo, s.v. and Map D.

524. A well-known mountain in Najd, according to Yāqūt, s.v. The sense of the verse is that the speaker would never cause error, not until one mountain moved to another.

525. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 351; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 97–98; Balansī, 126; Caetani, 579.

526. A brother of Ṭurayfah b. Ḥajīz of Sulaym, and one of the Prophet's tax agents over part of his tribe. Cf. Shoufani, 138–39.

527. ʿAmal, i.e., collection of tax.

528. Cf. Wathīmah, 10/49–50; Caskel, II, 168, s.v. "ʿAmr b. ʿAbdalʿuzzā" poet of Sulaym.

529. A famous poetess of Sulaym and early convert to Islam, proper name Tumāḍir bt. ʿAmr; cf. Caskel, II, 546.

530. Cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 101 (no. 609), s.v. "Abū Shajarah al-Sulamī."

So if she asked about us on the morning of Murāmir[531]
As I would have asked about her if I had been distant from her,
The encounter of Banū Fihr[532]—their encounter[533] on the morning of al-Jiwā' was a necessity, so I fulfilled it.
I restrained for them my soul, and steered my filly into the melée until the dark bay in her reddened.
When she shied away from some courageous armed man I wanted,
I turned her chest toward him and guided her on.

When he apostatized from Islām, Abū Shajarah said:[534]

[1906] The heart has given up youthful folly and amorousness by ridding itself of its love for Mayyah and has held back, and agreed with those who found fault with her; then it [was able] to see [the truth].
The yearning to be close [to her] of [that] boyish foolishness has become, like her love of us, estranged.
And the yearning for joining with them,
just like her ties with us, has been severed.
Oh, you who brag about the numerousness of his tribe,
[what good is that] when it is your fate [as part?] of them to be humiliated and conquered?
Ask the people about us on every day of calamity whenever we met [in battle], clad in mail or unprotected.
Did we not give the disobedient horse his bit, and make stabs in the battle when death has spread [its] desolation?

---

531. Cf. Emendanda and Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 148. Balādhurī, Futūh, 97 has Khālid meeting Sulaym at "Jaww Qurāqir" or al-Nuqrah, but De Goeje notes that the text should probably read "Jaww Murāmir." On this basis Wellhausen suggested that Murāmir/Jaww Murāmir should probably be identified with al-Jiwā' (see following lines). For this line, Ibn Ḥajar has "If Salmā asked on the morning about a man."

532. Banū Fihr b. Mālik, that is, Quraysh. Cf. Caskel, II, 246.

533. Ibn Ḥajar has "The melée (ṭi'ān) among the Lu'ayy b. Ghālib." Lu'ayy is another way of referring to most of Quraysh, specifically the "Quraysh al-Biṭāḥ" or "inner Quraysh" of the city of Mecca; cf. Caskel, II, 246, and Watt, Mecca, 5ff.

534. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 351.

When opposing him [was] a great and well-armed troop that shakes its lance, you see the black mixed with white, and the coats of mail, [glinting] in their ranks.
So I quenched the thirst of my lance from Khālid's squadron, and I hope after it that I may live long.

Then Abū Shajarah embraced Islam, and entered into that which the people had entered. He came to Medina in the time of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Anas al-Sulamī—men of his tribe, and according to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl and Abū Yaʿqūb and Muḥammad b. Marzūq, and according to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Qays al-Sulamī:[535] [Abū Shajarah] made his camel kneel in the high ground of the Banū Qurayẓah. Then he came to ʿUmar while he was giving the destitute some ṣadaqah tax and dividing it among the poor of the Arabs, so he said, "Oh commander of the believers, give [some to] me, for I [1907] am needy." [ʿUmar] said, "And who are you?" [When] he said that he was Abū Shajarah b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā al-Sulamī, [ʿUmar] replied, "Abū Shajarah! Oh enemy of God, are you not the one who said: 'So I quenched the thirst of my lance from Khālid's squadron, and I hope after it that I may live long'?" Then he began to strike [Abū Shajarah] on the head with the whip, until he outran him, returned to his she-camel, and rode off on her. Then he made her go at an easy pace[536] in the Ḥarrat Shawrān[537] on his way back to the territory of Banū Sulaym, and said:

Abū Ḥafṣ[538] was stingy to us with his favor, though everyone who shakes a tree some day gets leaves.[539]

---

535. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 351–52; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 98; Balansī, 131–32; Caetani, 579–80.

536. Asnada-hā, cf. Ibn Manẓūr, III, 221, left col.

537. According to Yāqūt, s.v. "Shawrān," a valley in Sulaym country 3 miles from Medina; also a mountain on the left when leaving Medina for Mecca. Cf. Lecker, Banū Sulaym, 5f.

538. I.e., ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.

539. Waraq, "leaves," also means "silver" or "silver coins."

He continued to oppress me until I abased myself to him and fear kept [me] from some covetousness.[540]
When I dreaded[541] Abū Ḥafṣ and his police[542]— for an old man sometimes is consumed with fear[543] and loses his judgment—
Then I turned to her while she was charging ahead,[544]
[running] like the flushed-out prey for which no leaf [of cover] grows.[545] [1908] I steered her forward to the path of Shawrān; indeed, I scolded her [to go faster] as she went.
Flint of the mountains of Abānī[546] flies from her soles,[547] as silver is selected out[548] by the money changer.
When confronted by an open desert, she contends with it rashly; if you ask her to be quick, her soles[549] hardly touch the ground.
Her hindquarters are impatient with her forequarters [when running];
she is fleet of foot, thrusting her neck [forward].

Banū Tamīm and the Affair of Sajāḥ bt. al-Ḥārith b. Suwayd

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ṣaʿb b. ʿAṭiyyah b. Bilāl—his father and Sahm b. Minjāb:[550] The situation among Banū

---

540. Balansī, 132, has "and wearisome distance kept [me] from some goal" (wa ḥāla min dūna baʿḍ al-bughyati al-shuqaqu).

541. Balansī, 133, has "met."

542. Shurṭah.

543. Balansī, 133, has "sometimes strikes."

544. Jāniḥah; i.e., he turned to his she-camel to escape. Cf. Ibn Manẓūr, II, 429.

545. Numerous divergent readings of this half-line exist, none of which is entirely satisfactory, as noted by the editor.

546. Two mountains in Fazārah country northeast of Medina. Cf. Yāqūt, s.v. "Abān" and "Abānān."

547. Balansī, 133: "She flies, vehemently driving (? mardā) her paces from her soles."

548. Balansī, 133: "scrutinized." Balansī ends with this verse.

549. Cf. Ibn Manẓūr, X, 75, s.v. "khuruq."

550. Cf. Nuwayrī, 75–77 (as far as p. 90, below); Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, III, 353–55, who adds Sahm b. Minjāb to the list of tax collectors (as far as p. 94, Tamīm was that the Apostle of God died, having sent among them his tax collectors (ʿummāl), such that al-Zibriqān b. Badr was [placed] over al-Ribāb[551] and ʿAwf and the Abnāʾ,[552] and Qays b. ʿĀṣim[553] was over Muqāʿis[554] and the Buṭūn clans, and [1909] Ṣafwān b. Ṣafwān and Sabrah b. ʿAmr[555] were over Banū ʿAmr, the former over Bahdā and the latter over Khaḍḍam,[556] two tribes of Banū Tamīm; and Wakīʿ b. Mālik[557] and Mālik b. Nuwayrah over Banū Ḥanẓalah,[558] the former over Banū Mālik and the latter over Banū Yarbūʿ. When the news of the death of the Prophet came to Ṣafwān, he struck out for Abū Bakr with the ṣadaqah taxes of Banū ʿAmr, of which he was in charge, and with that of which Sabrah had charge. Sabrah remained among his tribe in case some misfortune should overcome the tribe.[559] Qays had remained silent [waiting] to see what al-Zibriqān might do, while al-Zibriqān was reproving him; and scarcely did with much poetry and most difficult spots omitted); Caetani, 628–35, 646–47; cf. also pp. 139–40, below.

---

551. A group of tribes, most of them closely allied to Tamīm, including Banū Ḍabbah b. ʾUdd and ʿAdī, Taym, ʿUkl, and Thawr b. ʿAbd Manāt b. ʾUdd; cf. Caskel, II, 8 and 486.

552. ʿAwf b. Kaʿb was the section of Saʿd b. Zaydmanāt b. Tamīm to which Zibriqān belonged. The Abnāʾ ("sons") was the collective term for eight other lineages of Saʿd b. Zaydmanāt b. Tamīm, not including Kaʿb and ʿAmr, who together were known as "al-Buṭūn" (Caskel, I, Tables 75 and 77, and II, 230).

553. Renowned as a man of tact and good judgment; of Muqāʿis/Tamīm, he came in the Tamīm delegation to the Prophet, who praised him as "lord of the nomads" (Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 219).

554. Muqāʿis was probably a lineage of Saʿd/Tamīm, although Sayf presents it as an alliance of Tamīm clans; cf. Caskel, II, 431.

555. He had been in the Tamīm delegation to the Prophet, according to Ibn Isḥāq (Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 259–60).

556. ʿAmr b. Tamīm was one of the main nomadic sections of the tribe; Cf. Caskel, II, 8 and 184–85. Ibn al-Kalbī knows neither Bahdā nor Khaḍḍam; the former may be Bahdalah b. ʿAwf, a lineage of the Saʿd/Tamīm (Caskel, II, 220). ʿUmar Riḍā Kaḥḥālah, Muʿjam qabāʾil al-ʿarab (Beirut, 1968) I, 247, identifies a Khaḍḍam b. al-ʿAfīr b. Tamīm.

557. Ibn Ḥajar, Isābah, s.v., citing Sayf b. ʿUmar and Ṭabarī, says he was of the Dārim clan of Tamīm.

558. Ḥanẓalah b. Mālik was a group of Tamīm clans including Mālik and Yarbūʿ (Caskel, II, 298).

559. Reading li-ḥadathin ʾin nāba al-qawma, along with Cairo, instead of Leiden's li-ḥadathi arbābin, which generated problematic "solutions" from both Wellhausen (Skizzen, VI, 148) and De Goeje (Emendanda). Cairo's reading seems to derive from Nuwayrī, 75 bottom.

(Qays) flatter him before al-Zibriqān impugned him for his good fortune and high standing.[560] Qays said while he was waiting to see what he would do to oppose him when he was stalling on him, "Woe to us from the son of the "Uklī woman![561] By God, he has slandered me so that I do not know what to do. If I had followed Abū Bakr and brought the ṣadaqah tax to him, (al-Zibriqān) would have slaughtered (the camels)[562] [I had collected as tax] among the Banū Sa'd and blackened my name[563] among them; [on the other hand,] if I had slaughtered them among the Banū Sa'd, (al-Zibriqān) would have come to Abū Bakr and blackened my name with him." So Qays determined to divide it among the Muqā'is and the Buṭūn, and did so; while al-Zibriqān determined on full payment, so he followed Ṣafwān with the [1910] ṣadaqah taxes of al-Ribāb and 'Awf and al-Abnā' until he brought them to Medina, saying in reference to Qays:

I paid in full the several camels[564] [due to] the Apostle, when the collectors [of ṣadaqah tax] had refused, and not a camel had been paid [to him] by its trustee.[565]

The clans dispersed, and evil flared up [among them] and they kept each other busy, one occupying another; then Qays repented after that, so when al-'Alā' b. al-Ḥaḍramī drew near him he sent out its ṣadaqah tax[566] and received (al-'Alā') with it. Then (Qays) went out with him, and said about that:

Indeed! Send Quraysh news of me by letter, since evidence of the deposits [of tax] has come to them.

---

560. Reading ḥaẓwah, "high standing," along with Cairo, instead of khaṭwah in the text.

561. Presumably al-Zibriqān's mother was of the tribe of 'Ukl, a part of the confederation of al-Ribāb. The antecedents of the many pronouns in this sentence are uncertain; presumably Qays was waiting to see what al-Zibriqān would do.

562. The ṣadaqah tax or tribute was paid in camels or other livestock.

563. Reading yusawwidu-nī, with text and Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 148, rather than Emendanda's yasūdu-nī, "conquered/overcame me."

564. Adhwād. The singular (dhawd) is defined variously as a number of camels between two and nine, or between three and thirty, etc.

565. Cf. p. 140, below for a more complete version of this poem.

566. I.e., presumably the ṣadaqah camels Qays had once collected among the Muqā'is and Buṭūn clans of Tamīm, but had redivided among them.

In this circumstance ʿAwf and the Abnāʾ were kept busy by the Buṭūn, and al-Ribāb by Muqāʿis; and Khaḍḍam were occupied by Mālik, and Bahdā by Yarbūʿ. Sabrah b. ʿAmr was in charge of Khaḍḍam; that was what he had been appointed over as successor for Ṣafwān.[567] Al-Ḥuṣayn b. Niyār[568] was in charge of Bahdā and al-Ribāb.[569] ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣafwān[570] was in charge of Ḍabbah, and ʿIṣmah b. Ubayr[571] was in charge of ʿAbd Manāt. In charge of ʿAwf and the Abnāʾ was ʿAwf b. al-Bilād b. Khālid of Banū Ghanm al-Jushamī,[572] and over the Buṭūn was Siʿr b. Khufāf. Reinforcements from Banū Tamīm used to come to Thumāmah b. Uthāl,[573] but when this situation arose among them, they returned to their tribes; but that put Thumāmah b. Uthāl at a disadvantage until ʿIkrimah [b. Abī Jahl] came to him and stirred him up, so he did not do anything [before ʿIkrimah arrived].[574] Then while people in the country of Banū Tamīm were in that [state], some of them having busied themselves with others so that [each] Muslim [among] them was face to face with those who played for time and waited [to see what would happen] and face to face with those who doubted, Sajāḥ bt. al-Ḥārith came upon them by suprise, having arrived from the [1911]

567. I.e., when Ṣafwān left to see Abū Bakr (cf. p. 85, above).

568. Traceable only in Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, s.v., which adds no new information.

569. Wellhausen (Skizzen, VI, 148) noted that al-Ribāb should probably be struck from the text here, as al-Ribāb consisted of Ḍabbah and ʿAbd Manāt, mentioned in the following sentence (see Emendanda); but all manuscripts seem to have the word. Perhaps we should assume that the original intent was "bi-l-Ribāb" and that the waw was missing before the name of ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣafwān, as it actually is in the Cairo edition; this would yield the translation, "Among al-Ribāb, ʿAbdallāh . . . was in charge of Ḍabbah . . . ," etc. For Bahdā, read, probably, Bahdalah; cf. note 556 above.

570. A Tamīmī who came to the Prophet with his father, probably Ṣafwān b. Ṣafwān; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 186 and note 317, above.

571. A delegate to the Prophet from his tribe, Banū Taym b. ʿAbd Manāt of al-Ribāb; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 408–9.

572. Jusham b. Awf was a clan of Saʿd/Tamim; cf. Caskel, I, Table 77 and II, 268.

573. Of the Ḥanīfah tribe of eastern Arabia, he was captured by the Muslims; later he embraced Islam and was pardoned. He then seems to have been involved in cutting off Mecca's supply of grain from eastern Arabia on behalf of the Prophet. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 246–48; F. M. Donner, "Mecca's Food Supplies and Muḥammad's Boycott," 262.

574. Cf. p. 53, above on ʿIkrimah being sent against Musaylimah.

Jazīrah. She and her clan had been among Banū Taghlib.[575] She was leading splinter groups of Rabī'ah, among them al-Hudhayl b. 'Imrān[576] at the head of Banū Taghlib and 'Aqqah b. Hilāl at the head of al-Namir[577] and Wattād b. Fulān[578] at the head of Iyād[579] and al-Salīl b. Qays at the head of Banū Shaybān.[580] So a grave matter faced them, more serious than what the people were [already] involved in, because of Sajāḥ's attack upon them and because of their disagreements and squabbles over what divided them. About this 'Afīf b. al-Mundhir[581] said:

Did he not come to you by night with the news of that which the chiefs of Banū Tamīm encountered?
From their chiefs men called on each other,
and they were among the noblest and best.
They forced them out, after they had had [their own] territory, into empty quarters and retreat.[582]

Sajāḥ bt. al-Ḥarith b. Suwayd b. 'Uqfān and the offspring of her father 'Uqfān were among the Banū Taghlib. Then, after the death of the Apostle of God she pretended to be a prophetess in the Jazīrah among the Banū Taghlib, whereupon al-Hudhayl complied with her and left Christianity, and [also complied]

575. A major tribe of the Rabī'ah group, living between eastern Arabia northward into southern Iraq and the Euphrates fringes. Cf. Caskel, II, 27–28 and 541–42.

576. I have not been able to trace further any of these three leaders of Rabī'ah—al-Hudhayl, 'Aqqah, and Wattād.

577. Al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ was a minor tribe of Rabī'ah, closely affiliated with Taghlib. Cf. Caskel, II, 444.

578. Nuwayrī, 76: Ziyād b. Fulān.

579. A Christian tribe of eastern Arabia, southern and central Iraq. Cf. Caskel, II, 359–60; *EI*², s.v. "Iyād" (J. W. Fück).

580. Bishr "al-Salīl" b. Qays was brother of the more famous Bisṭām, chief of the Hammām b. Murrah clan of Shaybān. Shaybān was the most powerful tribe of the Bakr b. Wā'il confederation (part of Rabī'ah), occupying the lower Euphrates steppe region. Cf. Caskel, II, 507 and 524; F. M. Donner, "The Bakr b. Wā'il Tribes . . . ," 22ff. Cf. pp. 90–91, below, where 'Aqqah is called maternal uncle of Bishr.

581. A poet of 'Amr b. Tamīm; cf. Balansī, 141, 143, and 146. I am grateful to Dr. Landau-Tasseron for these references. Cf. Landau-Tasseron, "Sayf ibn 'Umar," 20.

582. Because of the requirements of rhyme, the poem has khīm for khaym, "retreat, withdrawal."

with those chiefs who advanced with her to raid Abū Bakr. When she got as far as al-Ḥazn,[583] she sent letters to Mālik [1912]
b. Nuwayrah and called him to an alliance; whereupon he answered her, turned her back from her raiding, and incited her against clans of Banū Tamīm. She said, "Yes, so pursue your business with whomever you think [right]; for I am only a woman from Banū Yarbūʿ, so if there is to be [any] sovereignty, it shall be yours."[584] Then she sent to Banū Mālik b. Ḥanẓalah inviting them to an alliance; whereupon ʿUṭārid b. Ḥājib[585] and the chiefs of Banū Mālik went out as fugitives until they came as guests among the Banū al-ʿAnbar,[586] [staying] with Sabrah b. ʿAmr. They had disliked what Wakīʿ [b. Mālik] had done, and those like them of Banū Yarbūʿ, having disliked what Mālik [b. Nuwayrah] had done, went out until they came as guests to al-Ḥuṣayn b. Niyār among the Banū Māzin.[587] Then when her messengers came to the Banū Mālik demanding alliance, Wakīʿ agreed to that; so Wakīʿ and Mālik and Sajāḥ joined, having made an alliance one with another, and agreed to fight the people. They said, "With whom should we begin? With Khaḍḍam or Bahdā[588] or with ʿAwf and the Abnāʾ or with al-Ribāb?" They held back from Qays [b. ʿAṣim] because of what they saw of his indecision, hoping earnestly for him.[589] Then she said, "Prepare your mounts, and get ready for booty, then raid al-Ribāb, for there is no veil before them."[590] Sajāḥ headed for the wells[591] until she encamped there and said to them, "The Dahnāʾ[592] is the barrier of Banū Tamīm, and when [1913]

583. A high plateau in northeastern Arabia, near the fringes of Iraq. Cf. Yāqūt, s.v. and Thilo, s.v.

584. Both Mālik and Sajāḥ were originally from Yarbūʿ.

585. Of the Dārim clan of Tamīm, led a delegation or Dārim to the Prophet (Caskel, II, 580).

586. ʿAnbar b. Yarbūʿ was Sajāḥ's clan of Tamīm (Caskel, II, 189).

587. Probably Māzin b. Mālik, a clan of Banū ʿAmr b. Tamīm. Cf. Caskel, I, Table 82, and II, 406.

588. Probably Bahdalah; cf. note 556, above.

589. I.e., hoping that he would join their cause.

590. Sajāḥ's statement is couched in rhymed prose.

591. Or "for al-Aḥfār"; Yāqūt mentions a place with this name, but gives no precise location.

592. An extensive tract of waterless sand desert in the Najd; at the time of the casualties press them, al-Ribāb will not delay in taking refuge in al-Dajānī[593] and sand deserts (al-dahānī); so let some of you encamp there."[594] At this, "al-Jafūl," that is, Mālik b. Nuwayrah,[595] headed for al-Dajānī and encamped in it. Al-Ribāb heard of this, so they gathered to it, [both] their Ḍabbah and ʿAbd Manāt [clans]. Now Wakīʿ and Bishr[596] were responsible for [battling] Banū Bakr of Banū Ḍabbah, and ʿAqqah was responsible for [fighting] the Thaʿlabah b. Saʿd b. Ḍabbah, and al-Hudhayl [b. ʿImrān] was responsible [for fighting] the ʿAbd Manāt; so Wakīʿ and Bishr met Banū Bakr of Banū Ḍabbah [in battle], whereupon the two were routed, and Samāʿa[597] and Wakīʿ and Qaʿqāʿ[598] were taken prisoner, and many were killed. So Qays b. ʿĀṣim said regarding that [event]—that being the first that there appeared in him any remorse:[599]

It is as if you never witnessed Samāʿa when he raided and Qaʿqāʿ did not rejoice, while Wakīʿ was thwarted.
I saw that you had accompanied Ḍabbah unwillingly,
[as though] having a painful scab on both sides,
The releaser of prisoners whose march was foolish.
All of their business is on the rocks.

Then Sajāḥ and al-Hudhayl and ʿAqqah let Banū Bakr go because of the alliance between her and Wakīʿ; ʿAqqah [more-riddah wars, territory of the Tamīm. Cf. Thilo, s.v.; *EI*², s.v. "Dahnāʾ" (C. D. Mathews).

---

593. A place in eastern Arabia; cf. Hamdānī, 168, l. 19.

594. Again, (loosely) rhymed prose.

595. According to Diyarbakri, II, 209 and Balansī, 51, he earned his nickname (meaning "the refunder") because he sent the camels collected as ṣadaqah tax back to the tribes after the Prophet's death.

596. Presumably Bishr "al-Salīl" b. Qays; cf. note 580, above.

597. Caskel, II, 510, thinks this may be Samāʿah b. ʿAmr of Dārim/Tamīm.

598. Cairo ed. (index) indentifies him as al-Qaʿqāʿ b. Maʿbad, chief of the Dārim clan of Tamīm; he was in the Dārim delegation to the Prophet, and famed for his generosity. Cf. Caskel, II, 465; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, s.v. It is not clear, however, whether al-Qaʿqāʿ b. Maʿbad played any role in the riddah. Landau-Tasseron believes that there were two men of Tamīm named al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr, one a kinsman of Sajāḥ's who backed the riddah, the other of the ʿAmr-Tamīm who remained loyal to Medina. The latter would be the person mentioned here: cf. Landau-Tasseron, "Sayf ibn ʿUmar," 16.

599. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 355 clarifies: "remorse over having held back the ṣadaqah tax from Abū Bakr."

over] was the maternal uncle of Bishr. [Sajāḥ] said, "Kill al-Ribāb and they will make a treaty with you and release your [1914] prisoners. You should carry to them their blood prices, and the others will praise the consequence of their decision." So Ḍabbah released the prisoners to them and paid the blood price for the slain, and they went out from them. Then Qays recited [verses] about that, reproaching them for the truce of Ḍabbah, and supporting Ḍabbah and reproving[600] them. No one of ʿAmr or Saʿd or al-Ribāb had joined the affair of Sajāḥ; from all of these [clans], they yearned only [to be aligned with] Qays, until he showed support for Ḍabbah and began to show regret. No one from Ḥanẓalah aided them except Wakīʿ and Mālik, and their assistance was an alliance on [condition] that they help one another and gather together to one another. About this Aṣamm al-Taymī[601] said:

A sister of Taghlib came to us and then considered weak[602] the armies[603] from among the nobles of our ancestor's tribe.
And she planted a call [to join her] firmly among us, out of stupidity, although she was one from the great foreign tribes.[604]
We did not accept from them even what an ant could carry in its mouth,[605] nor would she embrace [Islam] if she came to us.
May your sound judgment be folly and error
the evening you gathered troops together for her!

Then Sajāḥ went out heading the armies of the Jazīrah until she reached al-Nibāj, whereupon Aws b. Khuzaymah al-Hujaymī[606] [1915]

600. Reading taʾnīban with the Cairo edition and (possibly) the Berlin manuscript, instead of the text's taʾbīnan and other manuscript variants. "Supporting" here is isʿād, lit., "rendering happy." The verses are omitted from the text.

601. The poet Aṣamm b. Wallād b. Khuzaymah, of Taym al-Ribāb; cf. Caskel, II, 201.

602. Istahadda; possibly "threatened," as proposed by Glossary.

603. Possibly "flocks." Arabic jalāʾib.

604. ʿAmāʾir ʾākhirīnā, lit., "great tribes of [people] other than us."

605. I.e., we accepted nothing from them.

606. I have not been able to trace him further. Hujaym was a clan of the B. ʿAmr/Tamīm; cf. Caskel, I, Table 84 and II, 286.

launched a raid against them leading those who crowded to him from Banū ʿAmr, so that al-Hudhayl was taken captive by a nomad of Banū Māzin[607] named Nāshirah. ʿAqqah was taken prisoner by ʿUbdah al-Hujaymī. They stopped fighting on condition that they return the prisoners to one another and that they turn back from them and not pass against the[ir will],[608] so they did that. So they repulsed her and bound her and the two of them to an agreement that they withdraw from them and that they would not cross the[ir territory] except with their permission.[609] Then they fulfilled [their promises] to them, but it continued [to burn] in the soul of al-Hudhayl against the Māzinī until, when ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān was killed, he gathered a troop and launched a raid against Safār[610] while Banū Māzin was there; so Banū Māzin killed him and shot him at Safār.[611]

When[612] al-Hudhayl and ʿAqqah returned to (Sajāḥ) and the chiefs of the people of the Jazīrah had gathered, they said to her, "What do you order us [to do] now that Mālik and Wakīʿ have bound their two tribes to treaties so that they will not help us and will let us do no more than cross their territory, and [now that] we have made a treaty with this[613] tribe?" So she replied, "Al-Yamāmah." At this they said, "The might of the people of al-Yamāmah is great, and the situation of Musaylimah has become rough." But she said, "Betake yourselves to al-Yamāmah, fly in with the flapping of the dove, for it is a gallant raid, no blame shall attach to you after it."[614]

[1916] Then she rushed upon Banū Ḥanīfah. Musaylimah learned

---

607. Rajulun mın Banī Māzin thumma mın banī wabar. Although this construction is a common way of expressing a man's clan and subclan, I find no "Banū Wabar" among Māzın or anywhere else.

608. [An] lā yaṭtāzū ʿalayhim, i.e., that they not pass through the territories of Aws against their will; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, II, 335: wa lā yaṭi'u arḍa Awsin, "and not come to the land of Aws."

609. Lā yattakhidhū-hum ṭarīqan illā min warā'ihim.

610. A watering place of Banū Māzin in the desert southeast of al-Baṣrah (Yāqūt, s.v.).

611. We should perhaps read qātalathu for qatalathu: "Banū Māzın fought him...."

612. Cf. Nuwayrī, 77–78 (to p. 93); Caetani, 646–47.

613. Presumably meaning Banū Māzin.

614. Rhymed prose.

of that and was afraid of her; he feared that, if he busied himself with her, Thumāmah would get the better of him in Ḥajr, or Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah or the tribes that were around them. So he sent gifts to her, and then wrote to her requesting her pledge of security for his life so that he could come to her. At this she made the armies encamp at the wells, granting him permission and offering him security, so he came to her as a delegation at the head of forty people of Banū Ḥanīfah. Now she was knowledgeable about Christianity, having learned from the knowledge of the Christians of Taghlib, so Musaylimah said, "Half of the earth is to us, and half would be to Quraysh if they had acted rightly; but God has returned to you the half which Quraysh rejected, and has given it to you, even though it would have been to [Quraysh] had she accepted." [Sajāḥ] said, "The half is not returned except by those who incline,[615] so carry the half to the cavalry you see as if they were dying of thirst."[616] So Musaylimah said,[617] "God listened to whomever He listened to, and made him yearn for good when he yearned, and His cause is still arranged in everything that delights him. Your Lord saw you and gave you life and preserved you from loneliness, and saved you and gave you life on the day of His religion; for us some prayers of the company of the pious, neither miserable nor licentious, staying up at night and fasting by day; indeed your Lord is great, the Lord of the clouds and the rain."[618] And he said also, "When I saw their faces they were comely, and their complexions were clear, and their hands were soft; I said to them, 'You shall not come to women, nor drink wine, but [1917] you are the company of the pious fasting by day and costing a day.' So praise be to God! Verily life came to where you live; ascend to the King of heaven. [Even] if it[619] were only a mustard seed, a witness would take care of it who would know what is [hidden] in the breasts; but most people in it [will meet]

615. Man ḥanaf; a pun on the name of Banū Ḥanīfah.
616. Reading, with Nuwayrī, 78 and Cairo, ka al-sahafi. Rhymed prose.
617. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 35, ll. 7ff.
618. Rhymed prose.
619. I.e., one's good [or bad?] deeds.

perdition."[620] Among the laws that Musaylimah prescribed for them was that whoever produced a single son as progeny should not come to a woman unless[621] that son should die; then he should [again] seek [to procreate] children until he produced [another] son, and then forbear [again]. So he had forbidden women to anyone who had a male child.

According to Abū Ja'far—authorities other than Sayf:[622] When Sajāḥ descended upon Musaylimah he locked the fortress in front of her, so Sajāḥ asked him to come down. He replied, "Then put your companions away from you"; so she did that. Then Musaylimah said, "Erect a domed tent (qubbah) for her and perfume it, perhaps it will make her think of sex."[623] So they did so; then when she entered the tent, Musaylimah came down and said, "May ten [men] stop here and ten stop there." Then he studied with her,[624] saying, "What has been revealed to you?" But she replied, "Do women usually begin? Rather, you: what has been revealed to you?" He replied, "Do you not see how your Lord has done with the pregnant woman,[625] He has brought forth from her a soul that strives, from between the [1918] belly skin and the waist." She said, "What else?" He said, "It was revealed to me, 'Verily God created women as vulvas, and made men for them as husbands, so we insert into them fat cocks,[626] then we withdraw them when we wish, so they may

620. Reading, with Mss. B and C and Cairo, wa-li-'akthar al-nāsi fīhā al-thubūr, as do Emendanda.

621. Lit., "until."

622. Nuwayrī, 78–80, as far as p. 95, below; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 355–57, close parallel until p. 97, with gaps; Caetani, 647–48.

623. Or, possibly, "perhaps she will mention marriage (al-bāh)." Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 355: "he perfumed it so that the sweet scent would make her think of intercourse."

624. Diyārbakrī, II, 159, in a loose paraphrase has tadārasā al-nubuwwah, "the two of them studied prophecy together." Balansī, 62 and Ibn Ḥubaysh, 34, top, have Musaylimah say, ta'ālī natadārasu al-nubuwwah ayyunā ahaqqu, "come, let us study which of us is more entitled to [claim] prophethood."

625. Diyarbakri, II, 158: "Verily, God has bestowed grace on the pregnant woman."

626. Text has fu's, not found in Ibn Manẓūr. We follow Nuwayrī and Cairo, which read qu's, (pl. of aq'as); Cairo, citing Aghānī, glosses this as gharāmīl, "coarse penises." Cf. Ibn Manẓūr, VI, 177 (s.v. aq'as), "with chests protruding and backs in."

produce for us a kid."[627] She said, "I bear witness that you are a prophet." He said, "Do you want me to marry you, so that I may devour[628] the Arabs with my tribe and your tribe?" She replied that she did. [So] he said,

Why don't you go to fuck,
as the bed has been prepared for you?
If you wish, in the house, or, if you wish, in the closet.
If you wish we shall take you thrown on your back, or, if you wish, on [all] fours.
If you wish, with two-thirds of it, or, if you wish, with all of it.

She said, "No, rather with all of it." He said, "Revelations came to me about that." So she remained with him three days, and then returned to her tribe, whereupon they said, "What do you think?" She replied, "He was in the right, so I followed him and married him." They said, "And did he give you anything as a dowry?" She said that he had not, so they said, "Go back to him, for it is disgraceful for one like you to return without a dowry." So she returned to him, whereupon when Musaylimah saw her he locked the fortress and said, "What do you want?" She said, "Give me something as dowry." He replied, "Who is your [1919] muezzin?" She told him it was Shabath b. Rib'ī al-Riyāḥī,[629] so he said, "Bring him to me." So [Shabath] came, whereupon [Musaylimah] said, "Call out among your companions that Musaylimah b. Ḥabīb, the Apostle of God, has unburdened you of two of the prayers that Muḥammad imposed upon you—the last evening prayer and the dawn prayer." Among her companions were al-Zibriqān b. Badr and 'Uṭārid b. Ḥājib and the likes of them.

According to al-Kalbī—informants of Banū Tamīm:[630] Most of Banū Tamīm in the sands did not pray the two [prayers]. Then she went back, and with her were her companions, among them

627. As always with Musaylimah's alleged revelations, rhymed prose.
628. Nuwayrī, 79: "conquer" or "humble" the Arabs.
629. Riyāḥ was another clan of Yarbū', Sajāḥ's subtribe of Tamīm.
630. Cf. Nuwayrī, 80.

al-Zibriqān b. Badr, ʿUṭārid b. Ḥājib, ʿAmr b. al-Ahtam,[631] Ghaylān b. Kharashah,[632] and Shabath b. Ribʿī. So ʿUṭārid b. Ḥājib said,[633]

Our prophetess entered the evening[634] a female whom we visited,[635] while the prophets of the people entered the morning as males.

And Ḥukaym b. ʿAyyāsh "al-Aʿwar" al-Kalbī[636] said, rebuking Muḍar on account of Sajāḥ and mentioning Rabīʿah:[637]

They brought you a steadfast religion, and you brought verses copied in a knowing book.

Continuation of the Account of Sayf[638]

(Musaylimah) made a treaty with (Sajāḥ) on condition that he deliver to her half of the revenues of al-Yamāmah; she refused
[1920] (to accept) unless he delivered the (installment of the) first year in advance, so he conceded that to her. He said, "Leave behind someone who can collect the advance payment for you, and go back yourself with half of (this) year('s share)." Then he returned and carried to her the half, so she carried it off and returned to the Jazīrah, leaving al-Hudhayl and ʿAqqah and Wattād[639] so that the remaining half might be paid. Then they were taken

631. ʿAmr b. Sinān "al-Ahtam" ("the toothless") was a poet and member of the Tamīm delegation to the Prophet. He became a follower of Sajāḥ, but later embraced Islam. On him see *EI*², s.v. "ʿAmr b. al-Ahtam" (A. J. Wensinck-Ch. Pellat); Caskel, II, 184.

632. Of Banū Ḍabbah. Cf. Caskel, II, 270.

633. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 34.

634. Balansi, 62: the morning. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 34: the forenoon.

635. Nuṭifu bi-hā; sometimes with prurient intent.

636. Poet of Kinānah b. Awf branch of Kalb; probably lived in the second half of the first century A.H. Cf. Caskel, II, 331.

637. Muḍar and Rabīʿah were the two main genealogical divisions of the "North Arabs," portrayed as two sons of Nizār. The Kalbite (South Arab or Qaḥṭānī) poet reproaches the North Arabs, who included Sajāḥ's tribe of Tamīm and her allies of Ribāb and Ḍabbah.

638. Cf. Nuwayrī, 80; Caetani, 648.

639. Text, Cairo, Nuwayrī, and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, have Ziyād; see Emendanda and p. 88, note 578, above.

by surprise by Khālid b. al-Walīd's approach to them, so they dispersed.

Sajāḥ remained among Banū Taghlib until Muʿāwiya transferred them in his day, in the "year of union."[640] When the people of Iraq agreed [to recognize] Muʿāwiyah [as caliph] after ʿAlī, Muʿāwiyah took to expelling from al-Kūfah those who had been most vehement in the cause of ʿAlī, and to settle in their homes those people of Syria and al-Baṣrah and the Jazīrah who were most vehement in his own cause; it is they who were called the "transfers"[641] in the garrison towns. So he expelled Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr b. Mālik[642] from al-Kūfah to Īliyāʾ[643] in Palestine, and petitioned him to settle in the residences of his paternal relatives, Banū ʿUqfān,[644] and to transfer them[645] to [the properties of] Banū Tamīm. So he transferred them from the Jazīrah to al-Kūfah and settled them in the residences of al-Qaʿqāʿ and his relatives. [Sajāḥ] came with them and became a good Muslim.

Al-Zibriqān and al-Aqraʿ[646] went out to Abū Bakr and said, "Make over to us the kharāj.[647] of al-Baḥrayn and we will guarantee for you that no one from our tribe will repudiate [Islām]." So [Abū Bakr] did that and wrote the document. The one who acted as middleman for them was Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh. They called upon witnesses, among them ʿUmar; but when the document was brought to ʿUmar, he looked at it [1921]

640. ʿĀm al-jamāʿah: the year 40 AH/AD 660–661, so called because the Muslim community came together in recognizing Muʿāwiyah, ending the political division of the first civil war. Pace Caetani, 648; see Abū Zurʿah al-Dimashqī, Taʾrīkh, 188 (no. 101) and 190 (no. 105).

641. Al-nawāqil.

642. Cf. notes 485 and 598, above.

643. I.e., Aelia Capitolina (Jerusalem).

644. ʿUqfān b. Suwayd was a clan of Yarbūʿ residing in al-Kūfah; cf. Caskel, II, 574; Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, II, 350.

645. Presumably Banū Taghlib.

646. Cf. Nuwayrī, 80–81. Al-Aqraʿ b. Ḥābis, chief of Dārim clan of Tamīm, was the first Tamīmī to go to the Prophet, during the conquest of Mecca; he was put in charge of the ṣadaqah of Banū Hanẓalah. Cf. *EI*², s.v. "Al-Aḳraʿ b. Ḥābis" (M. J. Kister).

647. In classical juristic usage, kharāj is a kind of land tax, but such clear-cut systematization of terminology was not yet in force during the riddah wars; perhaps "tribute" is a better rendering. For a recent discussion of the development of tax terminology, see Simonsen, Studies.

without witnessing it. Then he said, "No, by God, absolutely not!" and tore up the document and erased it. Ṭalḥah became angry at this, so he went to Abū Bakr saying, "Are you the commander or is ʿUmar?" Whereupon (Abū Bakr) replied, "ʿUmar is, except that obedience is owed to me." So he calmed down. The two of them witnessed with Khālid all the battles up to al-Yamāmah;[648] then al-Aqraʿ went to Dūmah with Shuraḥbīl.

Al-Buṭāḥ and Its Story

According to al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ṣaʿb b. ʿAṭiyyah b. Bilāl:[649] When Sajāḥ returned to the Jazīrah, Mālik b. Nuwayrah held back and repented and became perplexed over his situation. Wakīʿ and Samāʿah[650] knew the shamefulness of what they had done, so they returned to the fold and behaved humbly.[651] The two of them extracted the ṣadaqah taxes and came out with it to meet Khālid; so Khālid said, "What caused you to make an alliance with these people?" Whereupon they replied, "Some blood vengeance we were in the course of pursuing among the Banū Ḍabbah; they were days of preoccupation and opportunities." About that Wakīʿ said:

Do not reckon me a renegade, for indeed I was constrained when the fingers were being bent for me.[652] [1922] But I guarded the bulk of Mālik and watched until my eyes gave out on me.[653]
So when Khālid came to us with his battle standard the payments reached him first[654] at Buṭāḥ.

---

648. Or, perhaps, "even al-Yamāmah."
649. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 357; Nuwayrī, 82; Caetani, 652–53.
650. Cf. p. 90, above.
651. Lit., "returned a good returning and were not haughty," reading wa-lam yataʿabbarā with text. Emendanda proposes lam yataḥayyarā, "they were not perplexed."
652. I.e., even as I was being counted among the renegades (by the bending of fingers as a way of counting), I was being held back by others from declaring my allegiance to Islam.
653. Lit., "until the ocular veins grew dark on me."
654. I.e., payment of ṣadaqah reached Khālid at Buṭāḥ before the people who paid it themselves arrived? (takhaṭṭat ʿalayhi).

In the country of Banū Ḥanẓalah the only hateful [situation] that remained was that of Mālik b. Nuwayrah and those who surrounded him at al-Buṭāḥ. He was perplexed and worried.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl—al-Qāsim and ʿAmr b. Shuʿayb:[655] When Khālid wanted to march, he left Ẓafar mopping up[656] Asad, Ghaṭafān, Ṭayyiʾ, and Hawāzin; so he marched heading for al-Buṭāḥ this side of al-Ḥazn, while Mālik b. Nuwayrah was there. His situation became doubtful to him, and the Anṣār hesitated [to join] Khālid and held back from him saying, "These were not the caliph's orders to us; the caliph charged us to stand fast until he wrote to us after we had finished with al-Buzākhah and mopped up [opposition in] the people's territory." Whereupon Khālid said, "He did not charge you with this; rather, he charged me to proceed, and I am the commander and the one to whom communications come. Even if there reached me no letter nor any command of his, I would [1923] seize any opportunity that I perceived before informing him of it, if I thought that by informing him the opportunity would slip away from me.[657] Likewise, if we were tempted by some situation about which we had no instructions from him, we would not fail to consider what was the most desirable option before us and then to act on it. Now this Mālik b. Nuwayrah is right opposite us and I am heading for him with those who are with me of the Muhājirūn and those who follow in good works; I shall not force you." Khālid proceeded and the Anṣār repented and urged one another on, saying, "If the group achieves good [results], it is a good you will be excluded from; and if some misfortune befalls them, the people will shun you for it." So they agreed to join with Khālid, and dispatched messengers to 655. Cf. partial parallel in Diyarbakri, II, 209 top; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 357–58; Balansī, 50–51; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 28 (from Wāqidī); Ibn Ḥubaysh, 28 (from Ibn Isḥāq); Nuwayrī, 82–83; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 66–67; Caetani, 650.

656. Here and below, istabraʾa + direct object. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 58 (<Ibn Isḥāq).

657. I.e., by causing delay while waiting for the caliph's reply. The syntax is problematic; see the discussion of the sentence in J. Bellamy, "Arabic Verses from the First/Second Century: The Inscription of ʿEn ʿAvdat," Journal of Semitic Studies 35 (1990), 76, note 6, with other references and translations.

him, whereupon he waited for them until they joined him. Then he marched until he reached al-Buṭāḥ, but found no one there.

According to Abū Jaʿfar—al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb. b. Ibrāhīm—Sayf b. ʿUmar—Khuzaymah b. Shajarah al-ʿUqfānī—ʿUthmān b. Suwayd—Suwayd b. al-Mathʿabah al-Riyāḥī:[658] Khālid b. al-Walīd arrived in al-Buṭāḥ, whereupon he found no one there;
[1924] he found that Mālik had dispersed them among their flocks[659] and forbidden them to gather when he became perplexed over his situation. [In doing so] he said, "Oh Banū Yarbūʿ, we have disobeyed our commanders, inasmuch as they called us to this religion, whereas the people held us back from it, so that we have neither prospered nor succeeded. I have reconsidered this situation and found it feasible for them without any managing (siyāsah). For lo, the situation is one that the people do not manage. Beware of acting in a hostile manner against a group having a mandate [from God to exercise authority];[660] so disperse to your territories and enter into this cause." So they dispersed accordingly to their flocks,[661] and Mālik went out until he returned to his residence. When Khālid reached al-Buṭāḥ, he scattered portions of the army and ordered them to summon [the people] to Islām, and to bring to it whoever had not [yet] responded; and if he resisted, to kill him. [This] was part of that with which Abū Bakr had charged him:[662] "When you encamp someplace, make the call to prayer and the iqāmah.[663] Then, if the people make the call to prayer and the iqāmah, leave them alone; but if they do not do so, there is no [course] but to raid them. [In that case] kill them by every means, by fire or whatever else. And if they respond to you in the call to Islām, then question them [further]; if they affirm [payment of] the alms tax, 658. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 358, intermittent parallel; Balādhurī, Futūh, 98–99; Nuwayrī, 83; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 67; Caetani, 653–55.

659. Here and below, amwāl, lit., "properties." It can refer to flocks or to real property.

660. Qawmun ṣuniʿa lahum.

661. Or, perhaps, "properties, lands" (amwāl).

662. Cf. Balansi, 53; Wathīmah, 15/56.

663. The iqāmah is the second call to prayer, not broadcast publicly to notify people at large, but made to the faithful gathered in the mosque to indicate that prayer is about to begin.

then accept that from them; but if they deny it, then there is no [course] but to raid them without any word [of warning]."

Then[664] the cavalry brought Mālik b. Nuwayrah to [Khālid], along with some people of Banū Tha'labah b. Yarbū', of 'Āṣim [1925] and 'Ubayd and 'Arīn and Ja'far.[665] The raiding party disagreed about them; among them was Abū Qatādah, who was one of those who testified that they had made the call to prayer and the iqāmah and had performed the prayer. So when they disagreed about them, [Khālid] ordered that they be locked up, on a cold night against which nothing was sufficient [for warmth]. [The night] began to get colder, so Khālid ordered a crier to call out, "Keep your captives warm." Now in the Kinānah dialect, when one says, "adfi'ū al-rajul," it means "keep him warm" or "wrap him up," but in the dialects of others it means 'kill him."[666] So the people thought, since [the word] meant 'kill" in their dialect, that he wanted them killed, so they did so; Ḍirār b. al-Azwar killed Mālik. Khālid heard the outcry, so he went out after they had finished with them; whereupon he said, "If God desires something, He effects it."

The people disagreed about them.[667] Abū Qatādah said [to Khālid], "This is your doing." At this Khālid countered him with rough speech,[668] whereupon [Abū Qatādah] became angry and proceeded to Abū Bakr. At this Abū Bakr became angry at [Abū Qatādah] until 'Umar spoke to him on his behalf, but [Abū Bakr] would only be content if [Abū Qatādah] returned to [Khālid]; so [Abū Qatādah] returned to [Khālid], so that he came to Medina with him.

Khālid married Umm Tamīm bt. al-Minhāl,[669] and abstained [1926]

---

664. Cf. Balansi, 54–55; Nuwayrī, 83–84; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 67.

665. Subclans of Tha'labah b. Yarbū' of Tamīm; cf. Caskel, I, Table 69. Banū 'Ubayd genealogically included 'Āṣim; perhaps 'Ubayd here is used to refer to all clans other than 'Āṣim.

666. Evidently the crier was a Kinānī. The text is confused here, although the meaning is clear. See Glossary; Emendanda; Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon, s.v. dafa'a; Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 149; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 358.

667. I.e., about whether their deaths were reprehensible.

668. Or, perhaps, "pelted him with stones" [zabara-hu].

669. The slain Mālik b. Nuwayrah's wife: cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, s.v. "Mālik b. Nuwayrah"; Diyarbakri, II, 209, calling her "Umm Mutammim."

from her so that the period between her menstruations should elapse.[670] Now the Arabs used to find [the taking of] women abhorrent in war, and condemn it. ʿUmar said to Abū Bakr, "In the sword of Khālid there really is forbidden behavior; and even if this [story about Mālik's execution] were not true, it is necessary for you to take retaliation on him." He pestered him about that, but Abū Bakr did not take retaliation on [any of] his tax agents or commanders.[671] Then he said, "Tell me, ʿUmar, (Khālid) sought to clear something up but [in the process] made a mistake;[672] so stop berating him. (Abū Bakr) paid the blood price for Mālik and wrote to Khālid to come before him; so he did that to explain his story, whereupon (Abū Bakr) pardoned him and accepted [his explanation]. But (Abū Bakr) did censure him over [his] marriage to[673] one whom the Arabs considered it disgraceful [to marry] in that way.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Hishām b. ʿUrwah—his father:[674] A group from the raiding party testified that they [themselves] had made the call to prayer and done the iqāmah and prayed, whereupon [the people being raided] had done likewise; whereas others testified that nothing like that had occurred, so that [those raided] were killed. [Mālik's] brother,[675] Mutammim b. Nuwayrah, came begging Abū Bakr for [permission to seek vengeance for] his blood and requesting him to make [the guilty parties] captive; but he wrote to him rejecting [their] capture. ʿUmar pressed him to dismiss Khālid, saying, "In his sword there really is forbidden behavior," whereupon he replied, "Oh ʿUmar, I will not sheathe a sword that God has drawn against the unbelievers."

---

670. The idea being to wait until after she had menstruated before consummating the new marriage, thus removing any doubt about the paternity of eventual children; an allusion to the ʿiddah or "waiting period" enjoined by Islamic law. Cf. EI[2], s.v. "ʿIdda" (Y. Linant de Bellefonds).

671. kāna . . . ʾlā yuqīdu min ʿummāli-hi wa-lā wazaʿati-hi.

672. taʿawwala fa-ʾakhṭaʾa. Cf. Balansi, 54, Ibn Ḥubaysh, 29: in kāna Khālidun taʾawwala amran fa-ʾakhṭaʾa-hu. Hoenerbach translates "er hat eine Erklärung gesucht und sich dabei geirrt." (Wathīmah, 12/53).

673. Cf. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 149; Emendanda.

674. Cf. Diyarbakrī, II, 209; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 67–68; Caetani, 655.

675. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, II, 359, different story.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Khuzaymah—ʿUthmān—Suwayd:[676] Mālik b. Nuwayrah was one of the hairiest of people. Now the men of the army used the heads [of the slain captives] to hold up their cooking-pots, and there was no head among them whose skin the fire did not reach except Mālik's; the pot became well-cooked but his head did not cook because of the amount of hair on it, the hair preventing [the fire's] heat from reaching the skin. Mutammim described him in verse, mentioning his slenderness.[677] ʿUmar had seen him when he came to the Prophet, so he said, "Was he really like that, Oh Mutammim?" He replied, "As for what I said, yes."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Ṭalḥah b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq:[678] Among Abū Bakr's instructions to his armies was [this]: "When you come upon one of the peoples' abodes, and then hear the call to prayer in it, desist from its people until you have asked them for what reason they were hostile. But if you do not hear the call to prayer, then launch a raid such that you kill and burn."[679] Among those who testified that Mālik [b. Nuwayrah][had embraced] Islām was Abū Qatādah al-Ḥārith b. Ribʿī, a brother of Banū Salimah. He made a vow to God that he would never witness a war with Khālid b. al-Walīd after [1928] that. He used to relate that when they came upon a group they would watch them under cover of night so that the group took up arms. "Then[680] we would say, 'We are Muslims,' 'whereupon they would say, 'We too are Muslims.' [So] we would say, 'Then what is the meaning of your weapons?' They would say, 'And what is the meaning of your weapons?' whereupon we would say, 'If you are as you say, then put your weapons down.' So they would put them down; then we would pray and they would pray."

---

676. Cf. Diyarbakrı, II, 209; Balansı, 54; Wathīmah, 12/52; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 29; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 68, which ıncludes a couplet by Mutammim omıtted in Ṭabarī.

677. Dr. Landau-Tasseron informs me that in jāhilī poetry slenderness is considered a praiseworthy characterıstic, since it reveals that the person feeds his neighbor while remaining hungry himself.

678. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 29 top (Ibn Isḥāq); Isfahānī, XIV, 68; Caetani, 655–56.

679. Cf. pp. 57, 59, above.

680. Cf Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 359; Balansi, 51 (both fragmentary).

Khālid used to excuse himself for killing [Mālik] [on the grounds] that [Mālik] had said, when he was interrogating him, "I think your companion[681] was only saying such and such." [Khālid] said, "And why didn't you reckon him a companion of yours?" Then he made him come forward and struck off his head and those of his companions. Then, when ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb learned of their murder, he spoke of it with Abū Bakr repeatedly, saying, "The enemy of God transgressed against a Muslim man, killing him and then leaping upon his wife." Khālid b. al-Walīd[682] approached [Medina] on his return until he entered the mosque, wearing a robe of his on which was iron rust, and with his head wrapped in a turban of his in which arrows had become planted. So when he entered the mosque, ʿUmar went to him and pulled the arrows from his head and smashed them. Then he said, "What hypocrisy, to kill a Muslim man and then leap upon his wife! By God, I would pelt you with stones."[683] Khālid b. al-Walīd did not speak to him, and thought that Abū Bakr would only have the same opinion about him as ʿUmar, until he entered upon Abū Bakr. When he entered upon him, he told [1929] him the story and Abū Bakr pardoned him and forgave him without punishment for whatever had happened in his recent campaign. So Khālid went out when Abū Bakr favored him. ʿUmar was seated in the mosque, so he said, "Come to me, you son of the world!"[684] From this, ʿUmar knew that Abū Bakr had favored him, so he did not speak to him and went into his house.

The one who killed Mālik b. Nuwayrah was ʿAbd b. al-Azwar al-Asadī.[685]

According to Ibn al-Kalbī, the one who killed Mālik b. Nuwayrah was Ḍirār b. al-Azwar.[686]

---

681. I.e., the Prophet, as a gloss in Isfahānī, XIV, 68 makes clear.

682. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, II, 359, fragment; Nuwayrī, 84–85.

683. The punishment for adultery in classical Islamic law. See Joseph Schacht, Introduction to Islamic Law, 15–16.

684. Or: "one with the cloak": b. umm Shamlah. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 359 has "b. Umm Salamah."

685. According to Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 334, same as Ḍirār b. al-Azwar; according to Ibn Ḥajar, Isābah, s.v., Ḍirār's brother.

686. Cf. Wathīmah, 12/52.

Remainder of the Story of Musaylimah the Liar and His Tribe of the People of al-Yamāmah

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad:[687] When Abū Bakr sent 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl against Musaylimah and sent Shuraḥbīl after him, 'Ikrimah made haste and strove to precede Shuraḥbīl so that he might secure [for himself] the fame [of having made war.][688] He attacked [Musaylimah's followers], whereupon they defeated him. Shuraḥbīl remained on the road where[689] the news reached him. 'Ikrimah wrote to Abū Bakr about his situation, so Abū Bakr wrote to him, "Oh Ibn Umm 'Ikrimah, let me not see you, nor should you see me in this situation; nor should you turn back, thereby weakening the army. Forge ahead so that you assist Ḥudhayfah and 'Arfajah, fighting along with them the people of 'Umān and Mahrah. And if the two of them are occupied, proceed yourself; then march with your army mopping up those whom you pass until you meet al-Muhājir b. Abī Umayyah in [1930] the Yemen and Ḥaḍramawt." And [Abū Bakr] wrote to Shuraḥbīl ordering him to stay put until his [further] order should reach him. Then he wrote to him several days before directing Khālid to al-Yamāmah: "When Khālid reaches you, then you will be unoccupied if God wills, so betake yourself to Quḍā'ah so that you and 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ may be against those of them who have denied and resisted [Islām]." So when Khālid arrived before Abū Bakr from al-Buṭāḥ, Abū Bakr was pleased with Khālid, listened to his excuse, and accepted [it] from him, and believed him and was pleased with him and directed him against Musaylimah. The army went campaigning with him; Thābit b. Qays[690] and al-Barā' b. Fulān[691] led the Anṣār, Abū Ḥudhayfah[692] and Zayd[693]

687. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 360–61; Nuwayrī, 89–90.
688. Lit., "that he might take away its reputation."
689. Ibn al-Athīr: "When." Kos, Manuscript B, Nuwayrī: "until."
690. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 39 top, p. 116, below, for different arrangement.
691. Perhaps al-Barā' b. Mālik; cf. p. 118, below.
692. Abū Ḥudhayfah b. 'Utbah was an early convert to Islam from the Umayyah clan of Quraysh and an emigrant to Abyssinia; later killed at al-Yamāmah. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 170.
693. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil identifies him as Zayd b. al-Khattāb, who was the older half-brother of the future caliph 'Umar b. al-Khattāb and one of the first Muhājirūn. Cf. Ibn al-Athır, Usd, II, 228–29.

led the Muhājirūn, and leading the tribes was a man over each tribe. Khālid hurried to reach the men of the army at al-Buṭāḥ, and awaited the levy that was being raised in Medina; then, when it reached him, he went forth until he came to al-Yamāmah. Banū Ḥanīfah were at that time numerous.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū ʿAmr b. al-ʿAlāʾ—a man:[694] The number of Banū Ḥanīfah in those days were 40,000 fighting men in their villages and adjacent tracts. So Khālid marched until, when he drew near them, he made some cavalry bear down on ʿAqqah and al-Hudhayl and Wattād,[695] who had stayed [behind to take care of] the tribute that Musaylimah had given out to them so that they might take it to Sajāḥ. He [also] wrote to the tribes of Tamīm about (ʿAqqa, al-Hudhayl and Wattād), so that (the Tamīmīs) drove them away [1931] and expelled them from the Arabian peninsula. Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah hurried and did what ʿIkrimah had done; he tried to precede Khālid by fighting Musaylimah before Khālid could reach him; but he was struck by disaster, so he refrained from fighting. So when Khālid reached him he reproached him. Khālid only relied on those cavalry out of fear that (the enemy) would come upon him from behind while they were on the outskirts of al-Yamāmah.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd b. Thābit—someone who informed him—Jābir b. Fulān:[696] Abū Bakr reinforced Khālid with Salīṭ,[697] so that he would support him against anyone who might come upon him from behind. So (Salīṭ) went out; then, when he drew near Khālid, he found those cavalry who had gone repeatedly to[698] that country had scattered and fled. So he stayed close to them, as reinforcement. Abū Bakr used to say, "I do not appoint[699] the people of Badr;[700] [rather] I

694. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 361; Nuwayrī, 90.

695. Reading thus instead of Ziyād in the text, as Emendanda: cf. p. 88.

696. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 361; Nuwayrī, 90.

697. Nuwayrī, 90 identifies him as Salīt b. ʿAmr b. ʿAbd Shams al-ʿĀmirī al-Qurashī. According to Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 344, Salīt b. ʿAmr, brother of Suhayl b. ʿAmr, was one of the first Muhājirūn, and the Prophet had sent him in AH 6 or 7 to Hawdhah b. ʿAlī and Thumāmah b. Uthāl al-Ḥanafī.

698. Intābat. Cf. Ibn Manẓūr, I, 775.

699. Lā astaʿmilu.

700. One wonders if the text here originally read "nomads" (ahl al-wabar); cf. Donner, Early Islamic Conquests, 264 and note 44.

leave them to meet God with the best of their works. For truly God delivers more and better [things] through them and through the upright among the nations (umam) than He achieves victory through them." [But in his caliphate] ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb used to say, "By God, I make them [truly] partners; and may I be imitated [in doing this]."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam—ʿUbayd b. ʿUmayr—Uthāl al-Ḥanafī, who was with Thumāmah b. Uthāl: Musaylimah used to treat everyone gently and be amicable with him, and it did not occur to the people to know evil from him. With him was Nahār "al-Rajjāl" b. ʿUnfuwah;[701] [1932] he had emigrated to the Prophet, recited the Qurʾān, and become knowledgeable in religion; so (the Prophet) had sent him as a teacher to the people of al-Yamāmah, and to stir up discord against Musaylimah and strengthen the situation of the Muslims. He was more [a cause of] sedition[702] among the Banū Ḥanīfah than was Musaylimah; he swore to (Musaylimah) that he had heard Muḥammad say that he was made a partner with him. Consequently (people) believed (Musaylimah) and responded to [his call]. They ordered him to write to the Prophet, and promised him that they would support him against (the Prophet) if (the latter) did not accept. Now, Nahār al-Rajjāl b. ʿUnfuwah would not say anything, but only followed him in it, and ending up [doing what he suggested]. [Among Muslims] the call to prayer used to be made [in the name of] the Prophet, and it was declared in the call to prayer that Muḥammad was the Apostle of God. The one who used to make the call to prayer for (Musaylimah) was ʿAbdallāh b. al-Nawwāḥah, and the one who used to make the iqāmah for him was Ḥujayr b. ʿUmayr,[703] who [also] made the declaration [of prophethood] to him. [But] when Ḥujayr was about to make the declaration, Musaylimah would 701. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 361; Nuwayrī, 85–86; Caetani, 639. The name is uncertain; cf. p. 117, below, "al-Rahhāl." Diyārbakrī, II, 189 and 211 has "al-Dajjāl." Balansi, 58–59 and Ibn Ḥubaysh, 30 bottom have "al-Rajjāl"; but Ibn Ḥubaysh, 63 bottom, suggests that there were two brothers, named al-Rajjāl and al-Rahhāl or al-Dajjāl, both killed at al-Yamāmah.

702. Fitnah.

703. Possibly Ḥujayr b. ʿUmayr, poet of the Usayyid clan of Tamīm: cf. Caskel, II, 329.

say, "Speak clearly, Ḥujayr!" So he would raise his voice and exert himself in declaring himself and Nahār veracious, and in imputing error to those who had embraced Islām.[704] His dignity made a great impression upon them.

(Musaylimah)[705] erected a sacred enclave in al-Yamāmah, restricting it and imposing it upon the people so that it was respected. Now there were situated within that sacred enclave the villages of the Aḥālīf[706]—sections of Banū Usayyid[707] whose abode was in al-Yamāmah; so the place of their abode came to be in the sacred area. (The Aḥālīf are Sayḥān, Numārah, Nimr, and al-Ḥārith, sons of Jurwah).[708] So if (the Yamāmans) had abundant fruits, (Banū Usayyid) raided the orchards[709] of the [1933] people of al-Yamāmah and defiled the sacred enclave. If (the Yamāmans) got wind that they had entered (the sacred enclave), they withdrew from (Usayyid) in fear; but if they were not aware of them, that was what (Usayyid) wanted.[710] That happened (to the Yamāmans) frequently, until they asked (Musaylimah) for help against them. At this (Musaylimah) said, "I am expecting something to come to me from heaven about you and them." Then he said, "By the darkest night, by the blackest wolf, by the mountain goat, Usayyid has not defiled a sacred thing."[711] So they replied, "Is it not forbidden to desecrate the holy enclave

704. The text about the calls to prayer is difficult; either we must assume several unmarked changes of subject, or assume that the sentence relates to Nahār's and Ḥujayr's change of sides. The former assumption has been adopted here. Cf. the version of the story in Ibn Ḥubaysh, 34 bottom and 35 middle: Ḥujayr would say the call to prayer in Muḥammad's name, and then say "Musaylimah is..." and stop. So one of Musaylimah's followers would say, "Speak clearly, Ḥujayr!" Whereupon he would say, "Musaylimah is the Apostle of God." Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, condenses Ṭabarī's version, but also attempts to show Ḥujayr vacillating in his call to prayer.

705. Cf. Nuwayrī, 86–88 (as far as p. 111, below); Caetani, 639–41.

706. Or "confederates."

707. A section of Banū 'Amr b. Tamīm.

708. Of these only al-Ḥārith b. Jurwah conforms to the information in Caskel I, Table 83, where the other sons of Jurwah are Juwayy, Sahm, and Shurayf. Ibn Ḥazm, 20, has Jurdah b. Usayyid, and the sons are different again. Ibn Durayd, 130, has a Banū al-Ḥārith b. Juhwah. Kos has S.yjān. On Jurwah b. Usayyid, cf. Kister, "Mecca and Tamīm," 146.

709. Thimār, lit., "the fruits."

710. I.e., they could raid the oasis undisturbed.

711. Rhymed prose.

and to ruin property?" Then (Usayyid) went back to raiding and (the Yamāmans) went back to complaining, so he said, "I am expecting something [more] to come to me." Then he said, "By the obscure night, by the restless wolf, Usayyid never cut anything, neither succulent nor dry."[712] At this they replied, "Aren't date palms succulent? Yet they cut them off; aren't garden walls dry? Yet they tore them down." So he said (to the Yamāmans), "Go! Return, for you have no claim." Among the things that he recited to them about (Usayyid) was: "Banū Tamīm is a tribe of purity, an independent tribe with nothing reprehensible about them and [who pay] no tribute [to anyone]; let us be allies of protection with them in goodness as long as we live, let us protect them from every person, then when we die their fate will be to the Merciful One (al-Raḥmān)." And he [also] used to say, "By the goats, by their kinds, by the most remarkable of them—the black ones and their milk, by the black goat, by the white milk, indeed it is the wonder of pure milk, adulterating milk has been forbidden, so what you have, do not mix milk with dates." And he used to say,[713] "Oh frog, [1934] daughter of a frog, croak what you croak, your upper part is in the water and your lower part in the mud, do not bar any person drinking, nor make the water turbid." And he used to say, "By the women who scatter seed at planting, by the women reaping at harvest, by the women who winnow wheat, by the women who grind flour, by the women who break bread, by the women who break bread into crumbs, by the women who gobble mouthfuls of grease and fat, you[714] have been favored over the people of the hair [tents],[715] nor shall the settled people[716] take pre-

712. Rhymed prose. Nuwayrī, 87 offers "powerful wolf" as a gloss.

713. Authors wishing to ridicule Musaylimah are fond of quoting this passage from his alleged revelations; cf. p. 133, below; Diyārbakrī, II, 158, 210 bottom; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 32, 34, 61; Ibn at-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 361–62; Balansī, 117–18; Nuwayrī, 87.

714. Here and subsequently the verbs and pronouns are masculine plural; i.e., the passage is addressed to Musaylimah's followers in general, not to women in particular.

715. I.e., over the nomads; ahl al-wabar.

716. Ahl al-madar.

cedence over you, defend your cultivated land,[717] shelter the one seeking favor, and oppose the oppressor."[718]

There[719] came to (Musaylimah) a woman of Banū Ḥanīfah called Umm al-Haytham, saying, "Our date palms are tall[720] and our wells are dried up; so pray to God for our water and our palms as Muḥammad prayed for the people of Hazmān." Whereupon (Musaylimah) said, "Oh Nahār, what is she talking about?" So (Nahār) explained, "The people of Hazmān came to Muḥammad complaining of how far away their water was; and their wells were dried up and their palms very tall. So he prayed for them, so that their wells overflowed and every date palm that was expired leaned over so that its branches, that is its top, [1935] touched the ground so that it struck roots; then it was cut from below, so that it once again had blooming palm shoots growing upward."[721] (Musaylimah) said, "And what did he do with the wells?" (Nahār) replied, "He called for a bucket full of water and then prayed for them into it. Then he rinsed with a mouthful of it and spat it into it, whereupon they took it away to empty it into those wells; then they watered their palms with it, doing with the aged [palm] what I described to you,[722] whereas the other [palms] remained [as they were] until they aged."[723] So Musaylimah called for a bucket of water and prayed for them into it. Then he rinsed with some of it and spat [it] into it, so they took it and poured it into their wells, whereupon the waters of those wells sank into the ground and their palms became barren;[724] but that only became evident after his defeat.

Nahār said to (Musaylimah), "Ask[725] blessings upon the newborns of Banū Ḥanīfah," at which he said to him, "What is

---

717. Rīf; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, has rīq, "saliva"; Abbott, citing al-Kīlānī, al-Duʿāt, 56, suggests rafīq, "companion."

718. Perhaps "the adulterer": al-bāghī.

719. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 362; Caetani, 639.

720. I.e., and therefore hard to harvest.

721. The sentence is awkward; cf. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 149.

722. Aged palm = al-muntahā; i.e., it was bent over to the ground so that the top struck roots, etc.

723. Illā intihāʾi-hi.

724. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 158.

725. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 33, l. 13ff; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 362; Nuwayrī, 88.

this 'asking for blessings'?" [Nahār] replied, "Whenever a newborn was born among the people of the Ḥijāz, they used to bring him to Muḥammad, whereupon he would rub his palate with a date pit[726] and anoint his head." No child was brought to Musaylimah for such treatment, however, but that he would gnash the teeth and speak defectively; but that [only] became apparent after his defeat.

They said, "Search out their walled gardens, as Muḥammad used to do, to pray in them." So he entered one of the gardens of al-Yamāmah and washed in it; whereupon Nahār said to the owner of the garden, "Why don't you water your garden with the wash water of al-Raḥmān until it was irrigated and drenched, [1936] just as Banū al-Mahriyyah, a family of Banū Ḥanīfah, did?" (Now a man of al-Mahrīyyah had come to the Prophet, and taken his wash water and carried it with him to al-Yamāmah and poured it into his well. Then he drew it out and used it for irrigation. His land [formerly] used to be parched, but [thereafter] it was quenched and satisfied, so that you would find only tall greenery.) So [the owner] did so, whereupon [his land] became once again wasteland, [and] its pasture would not grow.[727]

A man came to (Musaylimah) saying, "Pray to God for my land, for it is saline, just as Muhammad prayed for a man of Sulaym on behalf of his land." At this (Musaylimah) asked, "What is he talking about, oh Nahār?" So (Nahār) said,[728] "A man of Sulaym whose land exuded salty water came to (Muḥammad), so he prayed for him and gave him a bucket of water and spat into it for him; whereupon he poured it out into his well. Then he drew some, and it had become sweet and good." So (Musaylimah) did the same, whereupon the man left and did with the bucket just as the man of Sulaym had done; but his land drowned, its moisture did not dry up, and its fruit did not ripen.[729]

A woman fetched him to come to some date palms of hers, to

726. A ritual used to invoke blessings on newborns; cf. Avner Gil'adi, "Some Notes on Tahnīk in Medieval Islam."

727. Cf. Dīyārbakrī, II, 158.

728. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 33, ll. 22ff.

729. Cf. Balansi, 63.

pray for them on her behalf; then she cut off all their date clusters on the day of 'Aqrabā'.[730] They had learned [that Musaylimah was a fraud], and it had become clear to them, but the wretch overcame them.

[1937] According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Khulayd b. Zufar al-Namarī—'Umayr b. Ṭalhah al-Namarī:[731] His father came to al-Yamāmah and said, "Where is Musaylimah?" At this people said, "Careful! [Call him] the Apostle of God!" So he replied, "No, [not] until I have seen him." So when he came to him he said, "You are Musaylimah?" He replied, "Yes." He said, "Who comes to you?" [Musaylimah] replied, "Rahmān." He asked, "Does [he come] in light or in darkness?" He replied, "In darkness." Whereupon he said, "I bear witness that you are a liar and that Muḥammad tells the truth; but a liar of Rabī'ah is dearer to us than a veracious person of Muḍar." So he was killed with [Musaylimah] at the battle of 'Aqrabā'.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Kalbī: the same [account], except that he said, "A liar of Rabī'ah is dearer to me than a veracious person of Muḍar."

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ṭalhah b. al-A'lam—'Ubayd b. 'Umayr—a man of them:[732] When Musaylimah learned of Khālid's approach, he established his army at 'Aqrabā'. He called the people together to fight and people began to go out against him. Mujjā'ah b. Murārah[733] went out at the head of a raiding party, seeking blood revenge he had among Banū 'Āmir and Banū Tamīm.[734] He feared that he might die, and hastened 730. The decisive battle between the Muslims and the followers of Musaylimah; cf. below, pp. 118ff.

731. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 362; Caetani, 641–42.

732. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 362; Diyārbakrī, II, 211; Balansī, 71–72; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 36 middle.

733. Caskel, II, 419 and Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 300–301 have him linked to different clans of the tribe of Ḥanīfah. He is said to have come to the Prophet, who gave him tracts of land (aqta'a-hu) in al-Yamāmah—perhaps actually only confirming his previous ownership; cf. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 93. Since Khawlah bt. Ja'far (see text, below, and note 736) was of al-Dūl, it seems likely that Mujjā'ah was of this clan also. Nuwayrī, 90: Mujjā'ah b. Murārah b. Salmā.

734. Balansī, 71 and 117, and Ibn Ḥubaysh, 36 say Banū Numayr—possibly Numayr b. Usayyid, a clan of 'Amr b. Tamīm. Cf. Caskel, II, 450.

to the task. As for their[735] blood revenge among Banū ʿĀmir, Khawlah bt. Jaʿfar[736] was among them, so they kept him from her; but he abducted her [anyway]. As for his blood revenge among Banū Tamīm, [it was about] camels they took from him. Khālid received Shurahbīl b. Ḥasanah and then sent him ahead, and ordered Khālid b. Ḥulān al-Makhzūmī[737] over the vanguard; and he put over the two wings Zayd[738] and Abū Ḥudhayfah. Musaylimah put over his two wings al-Muḥakkam[739] and al-Rajjāl; then Khālid marched, along with Shurahbīl, until, when [1938] he was a day's march[740] from the army of Musaylimah, he attacked Jubaylah Hujūʿ[741] with forty [men]—according to those who diminish [the numbers]—or sixty [men]—according to those who augment [them]. Lo and behold, there was Mujjāʿah and his companions; sleep had overcome them while they were returning from the Banū ʿĀmir country, having passed by them and extricated Khawlah bt. Jaʿfar, who was with them. They stopped for a brief rest this side of the lowest part of the pass[742]—the pass of al-Yamāmah; whereupon they found them asleep, with the leads of their horses in their hands under their cheeks, unaware that the army was near them. So they woke them up and said, "Who are you?" They said, "This is Mujjāʿah and these are Ḥanīfah." They replied, "And who are you, may God not give you life?" Then they tied them up and waited until Khālid b. al-Walīd came to them, and brought them to him. Khālid thought that they were coming to him to meet him and to take

735. Cairo: "his."

736. Khawlah bt. Jaʿfar, the "Ḥanifite woman" [al-ḥanafiyya], became the wife of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib after the death of his first wife, the Prophet's daughter Fātimah. Cf. Ibn Saʿd, III/1, 11, l. 24.

737. Possibly Khālid b. al-ʿĀs b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah, who later served as governor of Mecca for ʿUmar and ʿUthmān. Cf. Caskel, I, Table 23 and Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 85–86.

738. Cairo index identifies him as Zayd b. Ḥārithah; but possibly Zayd b. al-Khattāb; cf. p. 105, above. Diyārbakrī, II, 211 has Zayd b. al-Khattāb, Abū Ḥudhayfah b. ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah, with other individuals and posts listed being different from version in the text.

739. Al-Muhakkam b. al-Ṭufayl, a Ḥanafī: cf. Caskel, II, 421; Wathīmah, 19/60.

740. Lit., "the march of a night."

741. Manuscript B, Cairo: "Jubaylah Hujūm."

742. Thaniyyah, "mountain pass" or possibly "mountain."

precautions against him in his business.[743] So he said, "When did you hear about us?" They replied. "We weren't aware of you; we were only returning from a [raid for] blood vengeance of ours among those around us of Banū ʿĀmir and Tamīm." (If they had been wise, they would have said, "We [wished to] receive you when we heard of you.") So (Khālid) ordered that they be killed. They were all ready to give their lives protecting Mujjāʿah b. Murārah; so they said, "If you wish good or evil with the people of al-Yamāmah tomorrow, spare this one and do not kill him." So Khālid killed them and kept Mujjāʿa imprisoned with himself, as a hostage.

[1939] According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah—ʿIkrimah—Abū Hurayrah and ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd—Abū Saʿīd—Abū Hurayrah: Abū Bakr had sent to al-Rajjāl to come to him and receive his charge; then he sent him to the people of al-Yamāmah, being of the opinion that he was being truthful when he responded to him. According to Abū Hurayrah:[744] I was sitting with the Prophet in a group of us among whom was al-Rajjāl b. ʿUnfuwah, when (the Prophet) said: "Truly there is among you a man whose molar tooth, [when he is] in the fire, will be larger than [Mount] Uḥud."[745] [Eventually] the group passed away, and only al-Rajjāl and I remained [alive], so I was afraid because of this until al-Rajjāl rebelled with Musaylimah and testified that he was a prophet.[746] The dissension[747] of al-Rajjāl was more serious than the dissension of Musaylimah. Abū Bakr[748] sent Khālid

743. I.e., he thought they were coming to conclude a truce with him.

744. Cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, s.v. "al-Rajjāl."

745. Cf. p. 118. The hadīth occurs in Ibn Mājah, Sunan, II, 1445 (no. 4322). The meaning is that the body of the unbeliever who has gone to hell will be enlarged so that it will suffer more; the molar tooth will be larger than Mt. Uhud, by Medina, and the rest of the body enlarged proportionately. Many variants are listed in Wensinck, Concordance, III, 508. I thank Dr. Iftikhar Zaman for clarifying this hadīth for me.

746. Although the text does not indicate as much, it seems likely that the account of Abū Hurayrah ends here, and that the following paragraph is transmitted not by him but by ʿIkrimah and Abū Saʿīd.

747. Fitnah. E. Landau-Tasseron notes that the word here is close to "its original meaning, i.e., an error caused by Satan's temptation" (personal communication). For a clearer sense of what the sentence means, see p. 120, below.

748. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 211 top.

against them, so he marched until, when he reached the pass of al-Yamāmah, he encountered Mujjāʿah b. Murārah, a chief of Banū Ḥanīfah, with a company from his tribe, intending to raid the Banū ʿĀmir[749] in search of blood vengeance. They were twenty-three horsemen and cameleers. They had stopped for a brief rest; but Khālid took them by surprise at night in their camp, whereupon he asked, "Whence did you hear about us?" To which they replied, "We had not heard about you, we had only gone out to exact a blood vengeance due to us from the Banū ʿĀmir." So Khālid ordered that their heads be cut off, sparing Mujjāʿah. Then he marched to al-Yamāmah, but Musaylimah and the Banū Ḥanīfah went out when they heard of [the approach of] Khālid and encamped at ʿAqrabāʾ, whereupon he alighted there with them. Now (ʿAqrabāʾ) was on the outskirts of al-Yamāmah this side of the flocks[750] with the cultivated land of al-Yamāmah at their backs. Shuraḥbīl b. Musaylimah said,[751] "Oh Banū Ḥanīfah, today is the day of vigilance; today, if you are defeated, [your] womenfolk will be carried off on horseback as captives, and will be taken as wives without being demanded in marriage.[752] So fight for your reputations and defend your women." So they fought at ʿAqrabāʾ. The standard[753] of the [1940] Muhājirūn was with Sālim,[754] the mawlā of Abū Ḥudhayfah, but (the Muhājirūn) said, "Do we have anything to fear from you for our own sake?"[755] At this he replied, "What a bad bearer of 749. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 36 middle: Banū Numayr.

750. Dūn al-amwāl; possibly we should translate amwāl as "property," but the meaning proposed would place ʿAqrabāʾ in a logical defensive situation—far enough out to defend the cultivated land (rīf), but still firmly within the territory controlled by the Banū Ḥanīfah and/or its pastoral allies.

751. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 362–63; p. 131, below; Nuwayrī, 91.

752. Reading ghayr khatībāt with Cairo, Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 149, and Emendanda; possibly "without being honored" or "not esteemed" (ghayr haziyyāt), as in text, Nuwayrī, 91, and Ibn Ḥubaysh, 45 bottom.

753. Cf. p. 105, above and p. 121, below; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 39 top, 40 bottom.

754. A Persian slave from Istakhr, he was one of the favored companions; he was later freed, then adopted, by Abū Ḥudhayfah. One of the most knowledgeable reciters of Qurʾān. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 245–47.

755. The Muhājirūn ask Sālim if he thinks he is able to defend their battle standard effectively, or whether he fears he may be incapable of doing it well enough, in which case it is a matter of concern to all of them.

the Qur'ān I would be, then!" The standard of the Anṣār was with Thābit b. Qays b. Shammās,[756] and the nomads (al-ʿarab) were [organized] according to their standards, and Mujjāʿah was prisoner with Umm Tamīm in her tent. The Muslims were dealt a setback, and people[757] from Banū Ḥanīfah entered upon Umm Tamīm and wanted to kill her, but Mujjāʿah stopped them, saying, "I am her protector; what an excellent, noble-born woman she is!" So he kept them from her. The Muslims returned, wheeling around against them so that Banū Ḥanīfah was put to flight. At this al-Muḥakkam b. al-Ṭufayl said,[758] "Oh Banū Ḥanīfah, enter the walled garden; meanwhile I will defend your backs." So he fought behind them for an hour; then God killed him ([ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr[759] killed him]). The unbelievers entered the garden; Waḥshī killed Musaylimah just as a man of the Anṣār was striking him, so he shared with him in it.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: a similar account to this account of Sayf, except that he said:[760] When it became morning Khālid called for Mujjāʿah and those who had been taken with him, and said: "Oh Banū Ḥanīfah, what do you have to say?" They replied, "We say, 'A prophet from us and a prophet from you.' So[761] he put them to the sword, until when there remained of them [only] a man called Sāriyah b. ʿĀmir[762] and Mujjāʿah b. Murārah, Sāriyah said to [Khālid], "Oh man, if you wish good or evil in this town [1941] tomorrow,[763] then spare this man," meaning Mujjāʿah. So Khālid ordered that he be bound in irons; then he sent him to

---

756. Cf. Balansī, 76.

757. Cf. p. 118, below, and parallels noted there; also Ibn Ḥubaysh, 42, and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 363, which have the story as here.

758. Cf. Balansī, 94; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 45 bottom, 47 top.

759. Son of the first caliph.

760. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 35 middle; Caetani, 642.

761. Cf. Balansī, 72.

762. Ibn Ḥubaysh: Sāriyah b. Maslamah b. ʿĀmir; Caskel, I, Table 156, II, 511: Sāriyah b. ʿAmr of Yarbūʿ clan of Ḥanīfah. According to Caskel, Sāriyah b. Maslamah was not son of ʿĀmir/ʿAmr, but of ʿUbayd b. Thaʿlabah b. Yarbuʿ . . . Ḥanīfah.

763. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 35: "if you wish good or evil with the people of al-Yamāmah."

his wife, Umm Tamīm, and said, "Look after him well." Then he proceeded until he encamped at al-Yamāmah upon a dune overlooking al-Yamāmah, and established his army in it. The people of al-Yamāmah came out with Musaylimah; he had sent ahead with his vanguard al-Raḥḥāl b. ʿUnfuwah b. Nahshal [According to al-Ṭabarī, Ibn Ḥumayd [spells the name] thus, with "ḥ," [not al-Rajjāl as other authorities have it]].[764] Al-Raḥḥāl was a man of Banū Ḥanīfah who had embraced Islām and recited the Sūrah of The Cow.[765] Then when he came to al-Yamāmah, he testified to Musaylimah that the Apostle of God had made him a partner in authority, so he was more significant in [sowing] discord[766] among the people of al-Yamāmah than was Musaylimah [himself]. The Muslims were asking about al-Raḥḥāl, fearing that he would dull their cause with the people of al-Yamāmah through his Islām. Then he met them with the first of the army squadrons. Khālid b. al-Walīd, while he was sitting upon his seat in the company of the notables of the people, the people being at their battle stations, had said while he looked at the flashing swords among Banū Ḥanīfah, "Oh company of Muslims, rejoice, for God has protected you from the cause of your enemy. The force has withdrawn, if God wills." At this al-Mujjāʿah looked while he was behind him bound in irons, and then said, "No, by God, but it is the Indian swords; they feared that they would shatter, so they exposed them to the sun so that they would be flexible for them";[767] and it was as he said. Then when they met the Muslims, the first who met them was al-Raḥḥāl b. ʿUnfuwah, whereupon God killed him.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—a chief of Banū Ḥanīfah—Abū Hurayrah: The Apostle of God said one day while Abū Hurayrah and Raḥḥāl b. ʿUnfuwah [1942]

764. On the name cf. p. 107, above.

765. The second, and longest, of the chapters or *sūrah*s of the Qur'ān; presumably this means that he could recite it from memory.

766. Fitnah.

767. Cf. Balansī, 77, Diyārbakrī, II, 211 bottom: "so that they [we] could meet them." Ibn Ḥubaysh, 39: "to warm up their blades" (li-taskhuna mutūna-hum), for the morning was cold. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 47 bottom; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 88.

were in a group meeting with him, "Oh company, the molar tooth of one of you in hellfire on the Day of Judgment will be larger than Uḥud."[768] Abū Hurayrah said, "The group passed away and only Raḥḥāl b. ʿUnfuwah and I survived, whereupon I remained frightened because of this until I heard of the rebellion of Raḥḥāl, at which I felt secure and knew that what the Apostle of God had said was true." Then the people met [in battle],[769] and no war of the Arabs had ever met them like [this] war;[770] so the people fought intensely until the Muslims were put to flight and Banū Ḥanīfah reached Mujjāʿah and Khālid, so that Khālid left his tent. The people[771] entered the tent in which Mujjāʿah was with Umm Tamīm, and a man attacked her with a sword; whereupon Mujjāʿah said, "Stop! I am her protector, and what an excellent, noble-born woman she is! Attack the men!" So they reduced the tent to tatters with swords. Then the Muslims called to one another; such that Thābit b. Qays said, "How bad is that to which you have made yourselves accustomed,[772] oh company of Muslims! Oh God, I have nothing to do with what these ones worship,"[773] [meaning the people of al-Yamāmah], "and I have nothing to do with what these ones do" [meaning the Muslims]. Then he waded into battle with his sword until he was killed. Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb, when the people became removed from their saddles, said, "There is no retreating after al-Raḥḥāl." Then he fought until he was killed. Then al-Barāʾ b. Mālik,[774] brother of Anas

768. Cf. p. 114, above.

769. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 363; Diyārbakrī, II, 212.

770. I.e., they had never seen the Arabs (i.e., nomads) fighting this intensely before.

771. Cf. Balansī, 78, 79; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 39–40, Nuwayrī, 91–92.

772. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 363: bi'sa mā ʿawwadtum anfusa-kum; Diyārbakrī, II, 212, Balansī, 79: bi'sa mā ʿawwadtum anfusa-kum al-farār; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 45 bottom: bi'sa mā ʿawwadtum al-aʿrāb, said by ʿIyād b. Bishr; Nuwayrī, 92, has bi'sa mā daʿawtum anfusakum ilayhi, which means "how bad is that to which you have summoned yourselves."

773. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 363: "I have nothing to do with what these ones do."

774. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 215–16; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 364; Balansī, 90–91; Nuwayrī, 92–93.

b. Mālik,[775] stood up; now whenever he faced battle, he used [1943] to be overcome by tremors so that men [had to] sit upon him; then he would shake violently beneath them until he urinated in his trousers. When he urinated he would be aroused as a lion is aroused. Now when he saw what the people had done, he was overcome in this manner so that the men sat upon him; then, after he had urinated, he sprang up saying, "Where [are they], oh company of Muslims? I am Barā' b. Mālik, come on with me!" A group of the rear guard of the army returned and fought the enemy until God killed them and they reached Muḥakkam al-Yamāmah, who was Muḥakkam b. al-Ṭufayl. When the fighting reached him, [Muḥakkam] said,[776] "Oh company of Banū Ḥanīfah, now the noble-born women will be carried off unwillingly behind [the riders as captives], and will be taken as wives without being requested in marriage.[777] So display whatever nobility you have." Then he fought intensely; 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddīq shot him with an arrow, hitting him in his throat and killing him.

Then[778] the Muslims advanced until they made them take refuge in the walled garden, the "garden of death," in which was the enemy of God, Musaylimah the liar. So al-Barā' said, "Oh company of Muslims, throw me onto them in the garden," but the people told Barā' that they would not do so. Whereupon he said, "By God, you surely shall cast me upon them in it!" So he was hoisted up until, when he overlooked the garden from the wall, he leapt down, fighting them from the gate of the garden in order to open it for the Muslims. The Muslims entered upon them in [the garden] and they fought until God killed Musaylimah the enemy of God. Waḥshī,[779] mawlā of Jubayr b.

775. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, has "Asad b. Mālik." Anas b. Mālik, an Ansārī and early companion of the Prophet, was considered an important source of prophetic traditions: cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 127–29; *EI*², s.v. "Anas b. Mālik," (A. J. Wensinck and J. Robson).

776. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 216; Balansī, 93–94.

777. Cf. p. 115, above.

778. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 364; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 46 top, 47; cf. references at p. 125, below.

779. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 216; Balansī, 95.

Muṭʿim,[780] and a man of the Anṣār were partners in killing him, both of them striking him; as for Waḥshī, he thrust his javelin against him, whereas the Anṣārī struck him with his sword. Waḥshī used to say, "Your Lord knows which of us killed him."

[1944] According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. al-Faḍl b. al-ʿAbbās b. Rabīʿah—Sulaymān b. Yasār—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar:[781] I heard a man crying out that day, saying, "The black slave killed him."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah—ʿUbayd b. ʿUmayr: Al-Rajjāl was opposite Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb, so when their two battle lines drew near, Zayd said, "Oh Rajjāl, God! God! For by God, you have abandoned the faith. Truly what I summon you to is nobler for you and greater for your present life." But he refused; so the two drew [their swords]. Then al-Rajjāl and the zealous supporters of Musaylimah's cause among the Banū Ḥanīfah were killed; but [the enemy] encouraged one another and each group attacked [those] in its vicinity, so that the Muslims retreated as far as their camp. Then they fell upon them, cutting the tent ropes, slashing them, and busying themselves with the army. They struggled with Mujjāʿah, intending [to seize] Umm Tamīm, but he protected her, saying, "How excellent is the mistress of the tent!"

Zayd and Khālid and Abū Ḥudhayfah urged each other on and the people backed them up with words.[782] Now it was a day of south wind with lots of dust, so Zayd said, "No, by God, I will not speak today, until either we defeat them or I meet God so that I may tell him of my devotion.[783] Grit your teeth, oh

780. Waḥshī b. Ḥarb, an Abyssinian slave, was one of Mecca's blacks; he was famed for having killed the Prophet's uncle Ḥamzah at the battle of Uhud. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 83–84. Jubayr b. Mutʿim, of the clan of Nawfal of Quraysh, was a diplomat famed for his forbearance and firm, calm manner (ḥilm); he embraced Islam relatively late, at the conquest of Mecca or just before. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 271–72.

781. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 364–65; Diyārbakrī, II, 216; Nuwayrī, 95.

782. Lit., "the people spoke," which is hardly clear. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 149 considered "the people spoke" to be a "fairly unnecessary preparation" for Zayd's statement, "I will not speak today."

783. Lit., "tell Him of my evidence (ḥujjatī)," i.e., make evident my devotion to Him through my martyrdom.

people, and strike your enemy and proceed straight ahead." So they did that, driving them back to their ranks until they made retreat farther than they had advanced from their army [in the first place].[784] Zayd was killed. Thābit spoke, saying, "Oh company of the Muslims, you are the party of God, and they are the parties of Satan; glory is to God and to His Apostle and to His parties. Advise me as I advise you." Then he began striking [1945] among them [with the whip] so that he drove them on. Abū Ḥudhayfah said, "Oh people of the Qur'ān, ornament the Qur'ān with [your] deeds." Then he drove them on until he penetrated them. [Then] he was struck down. Khālid b. al-Walīd attacked, saying to his bodyguards, "Let no one approach me from behind," until [when] he was opposite Musaylimah, he sought his opportunity and lay in wait for Musaylimah.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Mubashshir b. al-Fuḍayl—Sālim b. ʿAbdallāh: When Sālim was given the battle standard on that day, he said, "How acquainted I am with the reason why you gave it to me! You said a bearer of the Qur'ān,[785] and [that] he should stand fast just as the bearer of it before him stood fast, unto death." They replied, "Yes." Then they said, "Look how you should [do it]." At this he said, "What a bad bearer of the Qur'ān I would be if I did not stand fast!" The standard bearer before him had been ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥafṣ b. Ghānim.[786]

According to ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd b. Thābit and Ibn Isḥāq: When Mujjāʿah said to the Banū Ḥanīfah, "Attack the men,"[787] and after a group of the Muslims had incited one another to fight, (Banū Ḥanīfah) affected a show of generosity and all the Muslims did likewise. Some of the companions of the the Apostle of God made addresses. Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb said, "By God, I shall not speak until I am victorious or until I am killed.

---

784. The Arabic phrase is awkward, but I believe it means this. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 363, ll. 15–16.

785. I.e., one who had memorized and could recite all or a large part of the holy text.

786. Cf. pp. 105 and 115–16, above, and Balansī, 79. According to Balansī the standard bearer had been Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb.

787. See the earlier account in which this episode occurs, pp. 117–18, above.

Do as I do!" Then he attacked, and his companions attacked [also]. Thābit b. Qays said, "How bad is that to which you have accustomed yourselves, oh company of Muslims! Now get away from me,[788] so that I can show you [how to] fight!" Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb was killed.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Mubashshir—Sālim:[789]
[1946] When ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar returned [to ʿUmar], ʿUmar said, "Why weren't you killed before Zayd?[790] Zayd has died and you are still alive." Whereupon he replied, "I coveted that that should come to pass, but my soul drew back, whereas God honored him with martyrdom."

According to Sahl, [ʿUmar] said: "What brought you [back] even though Zayd was killed? Why didn't you hide your face from me?" [ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar] said, "He asked God for martyrdom, and it was given to him. I strove that it should be sent to me, but I was not granted it."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah b. al-ʾAʿlam—ʿUbayd b. ʿUmayr:[791] The Muhājirūn and the Anṣār accused the people of the desert of cowardice, and the people of the desert accused them of cowardice, saying to one another, "Organize yourselves separately[792] so that we may shun those who flee on the day [of battle], and may know on the day [of battle] from where we are approached [by the enemy]."[793] So they did that. The settled people said to the people of the desert, "We know more about fighting settled people than you do." Whereupon the people of the desert replied, "Settled people do not excel at fighting, and do not know what war is; so you will see, when you organize us separately, from where weakness comes." So they organized separately. No day [of battle] more intense or 788. Hākadhā ʿannī.

789. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 365–66.
790. Zayd was ʿUmar's brother; ʿAbdallāh, ʿUmar's son.
791. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 363–64.
792. Here and in the following passages, imtāza, lit., "distinguish, discriminate." The subsequent passages make it clear that the idea was to place members of particular groups together, so that the relative performance of each group in battle would be more readily apparent.
793. I.e., so that we may know who has failed to hold the enemy confronting him.

greater in casualties was ever seen than that day. It was not known which of the two groups inflicted heavier casualties [on the enemy], but the wounded were more numerous among the Muhājirūn and the Anṣār[794] than they were among the people of the desert, and those who survived were always in distress.[795] ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abū Bakr[796] shot al-Muḥakkam with an [1947] arrow, killing him while he was delivering a speech; whereupon he cut his throat. Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb killed al-Rajjāl b. ʿUnfuwah.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Yarbūʿ—his father—a man of Banū Suḥaym[797] who witnessed [the battle] with Khālid:[798] The advantage on that day was sometimes against the Muslims and sometimes against the unbelievers. When the fighting became intense, Khālid said, "Oh people, organize separately so that we may know the valor of each clan and know from where we are approached [by the enemy]." So the people of the settlements and of the desert organized themselves separately; the tribes of the desert people and of the settled people organized themselves separately, the descendants of each ancestor standing behind their banner to fight together. On that day the people of the desert said, "Now the killing will grow intense among the weaker flock";[799] then the killing did become intense among the people of the settlements. Musaylimah stood firm, and he was in the eye of the storm;[800] at which Khālid realized that it would not abate except through the death of Musaylimah, as long as the Banū Ḥanīfah took no heed of the death of those who had been killed among them. Thereupon Khālid came out against the enemy until, when he was opposite the [enemy] line, he put out a challenge for single combat and raised his lineage, saying, "I am the son of al-Walīd 794. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 364: among the Muhājirūn, Anṣār, and the villagers.

795. I.e., they were in the most intense fighting.

796. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 365.

797. Probably Suḥaym b. Murrah, a branch of Ḥanīfah: Caskel, II, 516.

798. Cf. preceding account and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 363–63; Nuwayrī, 92.

799. Reading ajzaʿ, "flock," with Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 149, Emendanda, and Cairo, for the text's ajdhaʿ.

800. Lit., "their mill turned around him."

the experienced,[801] I am the son of ʿĀmir and Zayd," and he shouted their battle slogan of that day. Their slogan that day was "Oh Muḥammad!" So he killed everyone who came out against him in single combat. All the while he was reciting,

I am the son of chiefs, and my sword is the Vehement, all the greater when rage overcomes you.

Whatever came out in single combat against him he defeated. The Muslims fought intensely and effectively.[802] Then, when Khālid drew near to Musaylimah, he called out [to him]. Now [1948] the Apostle of God had said, "With Musaylimah is a devil that he does not disobey, and whenever [the devil] comes to him, he foams [at the mouth] such that his cheeks are two gobs of froth; [Musaylimah] never forms the intention of doing any good thing, but [this devil] diverts him from it. So when you should see this opening[803] with him, seize the opportunity!"[804] So when Khālid drew near to [Musaylimah], he was searching for that. He saw [Musaylimah] standing fast with the [battle] swirling around him, and he knew that it would not cease unless [Musaylimah] was killed. So he called to Musaylimah, searching for his opening, upon which [Musaylimah] answered him. Then [Khālid] showed Musaylimah some things he liked, saying, "If we agree to half, then which half would you give us?"[805] Now when he was considering his answer, he had turned his face away in seeking advice, but his devil for bade him to accept; so he turned his face away [another] time because of that.[806] Khālid followed him closely on his mount to overtake him, so that he retreated and [his followers] yielded. Then Khālid incited the army, saying, "Here you are! Don't let them go!" They rode closely after them, and routed them. As Musaylimah stood up after the people had fled from him, some people said,[807] "Where

801. Al-ʿawd, "the aged"; cf. Ibn Manẓūr, III, 321.
802. Lit., "The mill of the Muslims turned, and ground."
803. ʿAwrah, lit., "opening in the defenses of an enemy," or possibly, "shameful thing."
804. Lit., "do not forgive him his error!"
805. A reference to Musaylimah's alleged offer to divide the earth with the Prophet; cf. p. 133, below and p. 93, above.
806. The text of this sentence is awkward.
807. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 216; Balansī, 94.

is what you used to promise us?" To which he replied, "Fight for your own reputations!"

Al-Muḥakkam[808] cried, "Oh Banū Ḥanīfah, the garden! the garden!" Now Waḥshī was coming upon Musaylimah while he was foaming [at the mouth], barely able to stand and unthinking from the fit [that had overtaken him], so he bared his lance on him and killed him. The people stormed upon them [in] the "garden of death" from its walls and gates, so that 10,000 fighting men[809] were killed in the battle and the "garden of death."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Hārūn and Ṭalḥah—ʿAmr b. Shuʿayb and Ibn Isḥāq: After they had organized themselves separately and had stood fast and Banū Ḥanīfah had retreated, the Muslims pursued them, killing them until they got them to the "garden of death." Then they differed [in opinion] regarding the killing of Musaylimah there; some say that he was killed in it, whereupon [the Banū Ḥanīfah] entered it and [the Muslims] locked them in it and surrounded them. Al-Barāʾ b. Mālik[810] screamed, "Oh company of Muslims, lift me onto the wall so that you may throw me onto them." So [1949] they did that, with the result that, when they placed him on the wall, he was thunderstruck at what he saw, and called out, "Lower me [back] down." Then he said, "Lift me up," so they did that again. Then out of fear he said, "Ugh to this!" and asked to be lifted up again. Whereupon when they placed him upon the wall, he leapt upon them to fight them by the gate, until he had opened it for the Muslims, who were by the gate on the outside. At this [the Muslims] entered [the garden]; then he locked the gate upon them and threw the key over the wall. So they fought more bitterly than has ever been seen. Those of them who were in the garden perished after Musaylimah had been killed. Banū Ḥanīfah had said to him,[811] "Where is what you used to promise us?" To which he had replied, "Fight for your own reputations!"

---

808. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 364; Nuwayrī, 92.

809. That is, on the Muslim side.

810. Cf. p. 119, above; Diyārbakrī, II, 214–15, who attributes this episode to Abū Dajānah; Balansī, 87, another version; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 45, another version; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 46.

811. Cf. p. 125, above.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Hārūn and Ṭalḥah and Ibn Isḥāq: When someone cried out that the black slave had killed Musaylimah, Khālid went out with Mujjāʿah shackled in irons to show him Musaylimah and the banners of his army. He came across al-Rajjāl and said, "This is al-Rajjāl."

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq:[812] When the Muslims had finished with Musaylimah, Khālid was approached and informed [of this], so he went out, taking Mujjāʿah in irons with him in order to show him Musaylimah. Then he began to show him the slain until he passed Muḥakkam b. al-Ṭufayl—he was a corpulent, comely man—whereupon Khālid said, "This is your companion." He replied, "No, by God, this one is better than he and more noble; this is Muḥakkam al-Yamāmah."

Then[813] Khālid continued showing him the slain until he entered the garden, upon which he rummaged through the bodies for him; then lo, there was a small, yellowish, flat-nosed man, whereupon Mujjāʿah said, "This is your companion, whom you have finished off." So Khālid said to Mujjāʿah, "This is your companion, who did with you what he did." He replied, "[So] it was, oh Khālid; but, by God,[814] only the most expeditious of the people came [against] you; the majority of the [1950] people are [still] in the fortresses." At this Khālid said, "Woe to you, what are you saying?" He replied, "By God, it is the truth; so come on, let me conclude a treaty with you in exchange for [the safety of] my tribe."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ḍaḥḥāk—his father: There was a man of the Banū ʿĀmir b. Ḥanīfah, named al-Aghlab b. ʿĀmir b. Ḥanīfah, who had the thickest neck of anyone of his time. When the polytheists had been defeated on that day and the Muslims surrounded them, he pretended he was dead. Then, when the Muslims were inspecting the slain, a man of the Anṣār named Abū Baṣīrah and some people 812. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 365; Diyārbakrī, II, 217 bottom; Balansī, 104; Nuwayrī, 93.

813. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 365; Diyārbakrī, II, 218; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 54–55; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 104; Nuwayrī, 93–94.

814. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 365; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 47, 55; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 90; Balansī, 104–5.

along with him came upon [al-Aghlab]. When they saw him lying among the slain, taking him for dead, they said, "Oh Abū Baṣīrah, you are always claiming that your sword is exceedingly sharp; so cut the head off this dead al-Aghlab. If you cut it off, everything we have learned about your sword will be true." So he unsheathed it and then strode toward him. Now they were sure he was dead, but when (Abū Baṣīrah) drew near him, (al-Aghlab) sprang up to run away from him. Abū Baṣīrah followed him and began saying, "I am Abū Baṣīrah al-Anṣārī!"[815] Al-Aghlab began to run quickly and the distance between them only increased; every time Abū Baṣīrah said that, al-Aghlab would say, "What do you think of the running of your brother the unbeliever?" until he escaped.[816]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad:[817] When Khālid had finished with Musaylimah and the army, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr said to him, "March with us and the army to encamp against the fortresses." But he replied, "Let me [first] deploy the cavalry in order to catch those who were not in the fortresses; then I will see [what] my opinion [is]." Thereupon he deployed the cavalry, so that they rounded up what they found of livestock[818] and women and children, and attached this[819] to the army. He ordered a march to encamp against the [1951] fortresses, so Mujjāʿah said to him,[820] "By God, only the most expeditious of the people came [against] you, and the fortresses are full of men. So come on, make a truce with my following." So he made a truce with him including everything short of [their] persons. Then he said, "I will go out to them to ask their advice, and we will look into this matter; then I will return to you." So Mujjāʿah entered the fortresses, in which were

815. The pre-Islamic Arabs customarily identified themselves to their enemies in the course of battle, often as a form of boasting: "I am so-and-so, take this blow!" (E. Landau-Tasseron, personal communication).

816. Cf. Ibn Durayd, Al-Ishtiqāq, 184, for a slightly different version and a Muhājir as the hero.

817. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 218.

818. māl; perhaps, "property."

819. Cf. Manuscript B and Nuwayrī, 94: "attached them."

820. Cf. p. 126, above, and references there.

nothing but women and children and worn-out elders and weak men. So he dressed the women in iron breastplates and ordered them to let down their hair[821] and to make themselves visible from the tops of the fortresses until he should return to them. Then he went back and came to Khālid, saying, "They have refused to permit what I arranged. Some of them had a commanding view of you, in opposing me.[822] They [will] have nothing to do with me." At this, Khālid looked at the peaks of the fortresses, which had become black.[823] Now the war had worn the Muslims down, and the encounter had become drawn out, and they yearned to return in triumph, and did not know what might happen if there were in [the fortresses] men and fighting. There had been killed on that day 360 of the Muhājirūn and Anṣār of the people of the chief city of Medina.

According to Sahl:[824] Of the Muhājirūn not of the people of Medina, and of the children of companions [of the Prophet],[825] 300 of the former and 300 of the latter [were killed, totaling] 600 or more. Thābit b. Qays was killed on that day. A man of the polytheists killed him; his foot was cut off, so his killer threw it [1952] and killed him.[826] Of Banū Ḥanīfah were killed in the plain at 'Aqrabā' 7,000, and 7,000 in the "garden of death," and in pursuit something like that [number]. Ḍirār b. al-Azwar said regarding the battle day of al-Yamāmah:[827]

821. Presumably young men (e.g., warriors) wore their hair long and flowing, whereas women and older men had their hair bound up and covered.

822. Mujjā'ah suggests that the people in the fortress could see the strength of Khālid's forces, and implies that they rejected Khālid's offer because they were not intimidated by his forces.

823. I.e., with people.

824. The text of the following paragraph—especially the numbers—is confused. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 365: "360 of Muhājirūn and Ansār of the people of Medina had been killed, and of the Muhājirūn of places other than Medina, [another] 360."

825. al-tābi'ūn bi-ihsān, lit., "those who follow in good works," refers to the offspring of the Muhājirūn, Ansār, and other "companions of the Prophet" (sahāba).

826. Cairo and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, has "his foot was cut off, so Thābit took it and beat [the attacker] with it until he killed him."

827. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 65, which has verses 1, 3, 4, and 5, as well as four additional verses.

If the south wind were asked about us, it would tell;
in the evening 'Aqrabā' and Malham[828] flowed.
And it flowed in the side branches of the watercourse, so that its rocks dribbled in it from the people with blood.
In the evening, the spear is not satisfied with its place, nor the arrows, except the bone-cleaving Mashrafī[829] sword.
So if you seek unbelievers free of blame,
[oh] south wind, indeed I am a follower of the faith, a Muslim.
I strive[830] [in God's way], because striving (jihād) is [itself] booty, and God knows best the man who strives.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq:[831] Mujjā'ah said what he did to Khālid because he had told him, 'Come on, so that I conclude a treaty with you in exchange for [the safety of] my tribe," [saying this] to a man whom the war had exhausted, and with whom many leaders of the people had been struck down. He had weakened, and yearned for rest and truce. So he said, "Come on, so that I may reconcile you," and then made a truce with (Khālid) on condition [of paying] gold, silver, suits of mail, and half the captives. Then he said, "I shall go to the tribe to present them what I have arranged." So he [1953] went out to them and said to the women, "Put on the armor and then make yourselves visible from atop the fortresses." So they did that; then he returned to Khālid. Now Khālid thought that what he had seen on the fortresses, wearing armor, were men, so when (Mujjā'ah) got to Khālid he said, "They rejected [the conditions] upon which I made a truce with you. But if you wish, I will arrange something and then entreat the tribe [to accept it]." (Khālid) said, "What is it?" He replied, "That you should take from me one quarter of the captives, and let a

828. A fortified village in a date-palm oasis, ca. 75 km northwest of Ḥajr: Thilo, s.v.; Yāqūt, s.v.; TAVO B VII 1. Ibn Ḥubaysh reads "in the evening 'Aqrabā' flowed with blood."

829. So called because they were made in the highlands (mashārif) of Syria or Yemen. Cf. Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon, IV, 1537 and 1539.

830. Ibn Ḥubaysh: we strive.

831. Cf. Ibn al-Athir, Kāmil, II, 365; Diyārbakrī, II, 218; Nuwayrī, 94.

quarter of them go."[832] Khālid said, "Done," and [Mujjāʿah] said, "Agreed, then." Subsequently, after the two of them were finished, the fortresses were opened and lo! there was no one in them but women and children. Whereupon Khālid said to Mujjāʿah, "Woe to you! You deceived me!" He replied, "[They were] my own kinsmen, I had to do what I did."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf:[833] The second [thing] Mujjāʿah said on that day [was], "If you wish to accept from me half the captives and [all] the gold and silver and suits of mail and the horses, I shall entreat [my tribe to accept], and will draw up a truce between me and you." So Khālid did that, making an agreement with him on condition of [payment of] the gold, silver, suits of mail, and horses, and of half the captives, and of a garden of Khālid's choice in every settlement and of a farm of Khālid's choice; whereupon they concluded the truce mutually on those terms. Then he released him and said, "You[834] have three [days] to choose: by God, if you do not complete and accept I shall attack you; then I shall never accept from you any terms except death." So Mujjāʿah came to them and said, "Accept for now." But[835] Salamah b. ʿUmayr al-Ḥanafī replied, "No, by God, we shall not accept. We shall send to [1954] people of settlements and to slaves [for reinforcement], and we shall fight and not make terms with Khālid. For the fortresses are strong and the food plentiful, and winter has come." So Mujjāʿah said, "You are an unlucky man, and you are kidding yourself; [in fact] I deceived the people[836] so that they would agree with me in the truce. Does there remain among you anyone worth anything or who has any [power of] resistance [left]? I went ahead of you [in making the truce] only [to act] before what Shurahbīl b. Musaylimah said should befall you."[837]

So Mujjāʿah went out as the seventh of seven [men] until he came to Khālid and said, after he had affirmed what they had

832. I.e., an additional quarter?
833. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 47, 55; Nuwayrī, 94–95.
834. The pronoun is plural, indicating that Khālid is addressing these words to Mujjāʿah's tribe, not to Mujjāʿah himself.
835. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 55–56; Balansī, 107.
836. I.e., the Muslims.
837. Cf. p. 115, above, for Shurahbīl's warning.

approved, "Write your document." So he wrote: "This is what Khālid b. al-Walīd made a truce with Mujjāʿah b. Murārah and Salamah b. ʿUmayr and So-and-so and So-and-so about: he bound them to [payment of] gold, silver, half the captives, suits of mail, horses, a garden in every village, and a farm on condition that they embrace Islam.[838] Then you will be secure in God's safety; you will have the protection of Khālid b. al-Walīd and the protection of Abū Bakr, successor of the Apostle of God, and the protections of the Muslims in good faith."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah—ʿIkrimah—Ibn Hurayrah: When Khālid made a truce with Mujjāʿah, he did so on [condition of payment of] gold, silver, coats of mail, and every garden that pleased us in every district, and half of those enslaved;[839] but they rejected that, so Khālid said, "You have three days to decide." Then Salamah b. ʿUmayr said, "Oh Banū Ḥanīfah, fight for your reputations and do not make a truce on any terms, for the fortress is strong, the food plentiful, and winter has come." To this Mujjāʿah replied, "Oh Banū Ḥanīfah, obey me and defy Salamah—for he is an unlucky man—before [the fate] of which Shuraḥbīl b. Musaylimah spoke befalls [1955] you, before the women are carried off against their will on the backs of horses and are taken to wife without being demanded in marriage."[840] So they obeyed him and renounced Salamah, and accepted his decision.

Now[841] Abū Bakr had sent Salamah b. Salāmah b. Waqsh[842] with a letter to Khālid, ordering him, if God had given him victory, to execute everyone of Banū Ḥanīfah over who[se face] a razor had passed. So he arrived, but found that [Khālid] had concluded a truce with them. Then Khālid observed [the truce] for them and kept to [the terms] that were in it. Banū Ḥanīfah were made to congregate before Khālid for the oath of allegiance and to renounce what they had formerly done. Khālid[843] was in

838. Or: "on condition that they submit."
839. al-mamlūkīn, i.e., the captives of war.
840. Cf. p. 115, and note 752, above.
841. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 365; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 56; Balansī, 108.
842. An early Medinan convert to Islam from the Aws tribe; later appointed governor of al-Yamāmah by ʿUmar: Caskel, II, 505; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 336–37.
843. Cf. Balansī, 113–14.

his camp, so when they gathered, Salamah b. ʿUmayr said to Mujjāʿah, "Ask permission for me to have an audience with Khālid, so that I may speak to him about a matter of mine that concerns him and for advice"; but he had resolved to assassinate him. So [Mujjāʿah] spoke to him so that he gave him permission [to enter]; then[844] Salamah b. ʿUmayr approached with the sword hidden in his clothing, intending [to carry out] what he wished. At this, [Khālid] said, "Who is this approaching?" Mujjāʿah replied, "This is the one I spoke to you about, to whom you gave permission [to enter]." Khālid said, "Get him away from me!" So they expelled him from (Khālid's) presence; then they searched him and found the sword on him, whereupon they cursed and vilified him and tied him up. They said, "You wanted to destroy your tribe, by God! You wanted nothing less than that Banū Ḥanīfah be extirpated and [their] children and women be captive, by God! If Khālid had known that you carried weapons, he would have killed you. We are not free from fear that, if he learns of it, he may yet kill the men and take the women captive for what you did, reckoning that it was done in [1956] consultation with us." So they bound him and put him in the fortress. Banū Ḥanīfah continued to make their renunciation of what they had previously done and to make their conversion to Islam. Salamah promised them that he would do nothing else if they would forgive him, but they refused, for they did not feel safe accepting a promise from him on account of his stupidity. Then one night he escaped and headed for the camp of Khālid; so the guards cried out to him. Banū Ḥanīfah were terrified and pursued him. They caught up with him in one of the gardens, whereupon he attacked them with his sword; so they surrounded him in the rocks. He passed the sword around his own throat, cutting his jugular veins. Then he fell into a well and died.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Yarbūʿ—his father: Khālid concluded a treaty with all of Banū Ḥanīfah except those who were in al-ʿIrḍ and al-Qurayyah;[845] they were taken captive when the raiding parties were sent out. So he sent to Abū Bakr 500 [persons] of those who had undergone the division [of booty] from al-ʿIrḍ and al-Qurayyah, of the Banū Ḥanīfah or Qays b. Thaʿlabah or Yashkur.[846]

844. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 57–58.

845. Al-ʿIrd (Wādī Ḥanīfah) was the fertile main valley of the Yamāmah district. Al-Qurayyah was an oasis village ca. 60 km northwest of Ḥajr. Cf. Yāqūt, s.vv; Thilo, s.vv; TAVO B VII 1.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq:[847] Then Khālid said to Mujjāʿah, "Give me your daughter in marriage." At this, Mujjāʿah said to him, "Take your time. You are destroying my reputation, and with mine, yours, in [the eyes of] your leader." [But Khālid] said, "Marry [her] to me, man!" so he did. News of that reached Abū Bakr, whereupon he wrote him a bloodcurdling letter:[848] "Upon my life, oh son of Khālid's mother, are you so free as to marry women, while in the court of your house is the blood of 1,200 men of the Muslims that has not yet dried?" When Khālid looked into the letter he began to say, "This is the work of the little left-handed man," meaning ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. Now Khālid b. al-Walīd had sent a delegation of Banū Ḥanīfah to Abū Bakr. They came before him, so Abū Bakr said to them, "Woe to you! What made you do [1957] what you did?"[849] They replied, "Oh successor of the Apostle of God, what you learned about what befell us was a man, upon whom and upon whose tribe God bestowed no blessing." He responded to that, "What was it that attracted you to him?" They said, "He used to say, [850] 'Oh frog, croak, croak, you do not bar the one drinking, nor do you make the water turbid; to us[851] half the earth, and to Quraysh half the earth, but Quraysh is a tribe that commits aggression.'" Abū Bakr said, "May God be exalted and woe to you! This talk comes neither from sacredness nor from piety, so where does it get you?"

When[852] Khālid b. al-Walīd was done with al-Yamāmah, his

---

846. Both Qays and Yashkur were tribes of the Bakr b. Wāʾil group, genealogically related to Ḥanīfah, who lived near al-Yamāmah. Cf. Donner, "Bakr," 17–18.

847. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 218 bottom; Ibn Ḥubaysh, 56; Balansī, 109; Nuwayrī, 96.

848. Lit., "a letter dripping blood."

849. Lit., "What is this that made slip from you what slipped?"

850. Cf. p. 109, above.

851. Cf. Balansī, 57, 118.

852. Cf. Nuwayrī, 97.

camp in which he used to meet people was Ubāḍ, one of the watercourses of al-Yamāmah. Then he moved to one of its watercourses called al-Wabar,[853] and it became his camp in it.

The People of al-Baḥrayn, the Apostasy of al-Ḥuṭam, and Those Who Joined with Him in al-Baḥrayn

Abū Jaʿfar said: Among the things we learned about the people of al-Baḥrayn and the apostasy of those who apostatized among them is the following:

[1958] According to ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿd—his uncle Yaʿqūb b. Ibrāhīm—Sayf:[854] Al-ʿAlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī went out toward al-Baḥrayn. Part of the story of al-Baḥrayn was that the Prophet and al-Mundhir b. Sāwī fell ill in one and the same month; subsequently al-Mundhir died a little after the Prophet, and the people of al-Baḥrayn apostatized after [his death]. As for ʿAbd al-Qays,[855] they returned [to the fold]; but Bakr[856] persisted in their apostasy. The one who persuaded ʿAbd al-Qays to turn back was al-Jārūd.[857]

According to ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf—Ismāʿīl b. Muslim—al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-Ḥasan:[858] Al-Jārūd b. al-Muʿallā came to the Prophet, seeking him out, so he said, "Embrace Islām, oh Jārūd!" But Jārūd answered, "I [already] have a religion."[859] The Prophet replied to him, "Oh Jārūd, your religion is really nothing; it is not a religion." So Jārūd said to him, "And if I were to embrace Islam, then whatever consequence [that might have] in

853. Yāqūt has "Wabarah," a village of al-Yamāmah; Hamdānī, 102, has "Wabrah."

854. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 368; Nuwayrī, 99–100; cf. note 53, above.

855. A major tribe of eastern Arabia, partly settled and partly nomadic, centered in the island Uwal (modern Bahrayn) and Qatīf on the coast. See *EI*², s.v. "ʿAbd al-Ḳays" (S. M. Stern).

856. I.e., the Bakr b. Wāʾil tribes; the rebel al-Ḥuṭam was of a Bakrī tribe, Qays b. Thaʿlaba (cf. p. 137, below).

857. Bishr "al-Jārūd" b. al-Muʿallā was a Christian of ʿAbd al-Qays who came to the Prophet in AH 10 and embraced Islam. His name is given variously. Cf. p. 137, below; Caskel, II, 227, s.v. "Bishr b. ʿAmr al-Jārūd"; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 260–61.

858. Cf. Nuwayrī, 99.

859. Dīn.

Islam would be your responsibility?"[860] (The Prophet) replied that it was so. So he embraced Islām and remained in Medina until he became learned [in the faith]. Then, when he wanted to leave, he said, "Oh Apostle of God, can we find among one of you camels on which we might reach [our destination]?" He replied, "We have no camels." He said, "Oh Apostle of God, I shall find on the road some of these strays." (Muḥammad) replied, "They are the burning of hellfire; beware of them!"[861]

When[862] (al-Jārūd) came to his people, he invited them to Islām, whereupon they all responded to him. Then it was only a short time before the Prophet died and they apostatized; ʿAbd al-Qays said, "If Muḥammad had been a prophet, he would not have died," and they apostatized. (Al-Jārūd) learned of that, so he sent to them to gather them together; then he stood up to address them, saying, "Oh company of ʿAbd al-Qays! I shall question you about things, so tell me about them if you know about them, and do not respond if you do not know." They [1959] replied, "Ask about whatever crosses your mind." He said, "Do you know that, in the past, God had prophets?" They said, "Yes." He went on, "[And] do you know it [from what you have learned from others], or have you seen it [with your own eyes]?" They said, "No, rather we know it [from others]." He continued, "Then what became of them?" They replied, "They died." He said, "In truth, Muḥammad has died just as they died, and I bear witness that there is no god but God and that Muḥammad is His Servant and His Apostle." They said, "And we [also] bear witness that there is no god but God and that Muḥammad is His Servant and His Apostle, and that you are our chief and the best of us." So they stood firm in their Islām, and did not extend 860. Famā kāna min tabiʿatin fī al-islām fa-ʿalayka. Cf. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 149.

861. According to Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon, II, 551 col. 3, this refers to the tradition stating that "the stray animals of the believer are a cause of the burning of hellfire," i.e., that anyone taking possession of the Muslims' stray beasts is in danger of hellfire. Hence in the preceding sentences, one must assume that the Prophet is stating only that there were no riding camels actually in the town at the moment, the Muslims' extra mounts being allowed to roam freely in the surroundings of Medina.

862. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 368; Balansī, 136–37; Caetani, 584–85.

[their hands in evil to anyone], nor was [an evil hand] extended toward them; they did not get involved between the rest of Rabīʿah,[863] on the one hand, and al-Mundhir[864] and the Muslims, on the other. Al-Mundhir was busy with them [for the rest of] his life; then, after al-Mundhir died, his companions were besieged in two places until al-ʿAlāʾ saved them.

Abū Jaʿfar said: as for Ibn Isḥāq, he said the following about that, according to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: When Khālid b. al-Walīd was finished with al-Yamāmah, Abū Bakr sent al-ʿĀlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī. Al-ʿĀlāʾ was the one whom the Apostle of God had sent to al-Mundhir b. Sāwī al-ʿAbdī, with the result that al-Mundhir embraced Islām. So al-ʿĀlāʾ stayed with them as commander for the Apostle of God. Then al-Mundhir b. Sāwī died in al-Baḥrayn after the death of the Apostle of God. Now ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ was in ʿUmān, the Apostle of God passing away while ʿAmr was there, whereupon ʿAmr approached, passing by al-Mundhir b. Sāwī while he was on the point of death. So [ʿAmr] visited him, so that al-Mundhir said to him, "How much of his property did the [1960] Apostle of God assign to the dying person[865] of the Muslims at the time of his death?" ʿAmr replied, "He used to stipulate a third." He said, "Then what do you advise me to do with a third of my property?" ʿAmr replied, "If you wish, you may divide it among your close kinsmen, assigning it by way of welfare; or, if you wish, you may grant it as ṣadaqah, thereby assigning it as an inviolable grant of alms that will be paid after you to those upon whom you bestowed it." [Al-Mundhir] said, "I would not like to make my property into something restricted, like the baḥīrah, the sāʾibah, the waṣīlah, and the ḥāmī;[866] rather, I shall divide it and transmit it to those to whom I bequeath it, 863. ʿAbd al-Qays was classified genealogically as part of Rabīʿah b. Nizār.

864. I.e., al-Mundhir b. Sāwī of ʿAbd al-Qays.

865. Lit., "the dead person." The question involves how much of his property the dying person was allowed to distribute to heirs of his choice.

866. Cf. Qurʾān 5:103. The words refer to four types of camels which, for various reasons, it had been prohibited during the jāhiliyyah to ride, to milk, to eat their flesh, to restrict in grazing, etc. These customs were prohibited by Islām. For the details, see Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon, I, 187 [s.v. baḥīrah]; IV, 1481 [s.v. sāʾibah]; II, 652 [s.v. ḥāmī]; and Ibn Manẓūr, II, 729 [s.v. waṣīlah].

that they may do with it as they please." So ʿAmr used to marvel because of what he said.

Rabīʿah[867] apostatized in al-Baḥrayn among those Arabs[868] who apostatized, except for al-Jārūd b. ʿAmr b. Ḥanash b. al-Muʿallā, who stood firm in Islām along with those of his tribe who were with him. When he learned of the death of the Apostle of God and of the apostasy of the Arabs, he stood up and said, "I bear witness that there is no god but God; and I bear witness that Muḥammad is His Servant and His Apostle; and I declare those who do not [so] bear witness to be unbelievers." Rabīʿah gathered in al-Baḥrayn and apostatized, saying, "Let us return the kingship[869] to the family of al-Mundhir."[870] So they proclaimed al-Mundhir b. al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir to be king. He[871] used to be called al-Gharūr ("the deceiver"); but when he had come to embrace Islām, and the people had embraced Islām and the sword had subdued them, he used to say, "I was not the deceiver, I was the deceived."

According to ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿd—his uncle—Sayf—Ismāʿīl b. Muslim—ʿUmayr b. Fulān al-ʿAbdī:[872] After the Prophet died, al-Ḥuṭam b. Ḍubayʿah, a tribesman of Banū Qays b. Thaʿlabah, [1961] rebelled with those of Bakr b. Wāʾil who followed him into apostasy, and with nonapostates who were still unbelievers who gathered ʿround him, until he alighted at al-Qaṭīf[873] and Hajar. He stirred up al-Khaṭṭ[874] and those Zuṭṭ and Sabābijah[875] in it to 867. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 73; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 46; Nuwayrī, 100.

868. Here and below, possibly "nomads."

869. Ibn Ḥubaysh: "the kingship has returned. . . ."

870. Presumably the Lakhmids of al-Ḥīrah, the most prominent of whom, al-Mundhir III (ruled A D 503–554) is referred to here; the last Lakhmid king was al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir (IV), ruled 580–602, whose son is mentioned in the next sentence. Cf. *EI*², s.v. "Lakhmids" (I. Shahid); Wathīmah, 24/66.

871. Cf. p. 146, below, with different opinion on the name; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 368; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 84; Balansī, 145–46.

872. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 368–69; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 46; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 83; Nuwayrī, 100–101. Cf. note 53, above.

873. Large oasis on Persian Gulf coast, possibly the ancient Gerrha. Cf. *EI*², s.v. "Al-Ḳaṭīf" (G. Rentz).

874. The east Arabian coastal strip in Baḥrayn and ʿUmān; cf. Yāqūt, s.v.; *EI*², s.v. "Al-Khaṭṭ" (A. Grohmann); Wüstenfeld, 181.

875. Text has "Sayābijah." The Zuṭṭ and Sabābijah were people of Indian origin who had settled around the Persian Gulf littoral (and later in Baṣrah); cf.

rebel, and sent an army to Dārīn.[876] So they rose up on (al-Ḥuṭam's) behalf, in order to put ʿAbd al-Qays between him and them. (ʿAbd al-Qays) was opposed to (these rebels), reinforcing al-Mundhir[877] and the Muslims. And (al-Ḥuṭam) sent to al-Gharūr b. Suwayd,[878] brother of al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir, and dispatched him to Juwāthā,[879] saying, "Stand fast, for if I am victorious I shall make you king in al-Baḥrayn, so that you may be like al-Nuʿmān in al-Ḥīrah." He sent[880] to Juwāthā; then he besieged [the Muslims] and pressed them, so that the siege became intense upon them. Among the besieged Muslims was one of their righteous men, called ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥadhaf, one of the Banū ʿAbū Bakr b.Kilāb.[881] Now he and they were extremely [1962] hungry, so that they were on the verge of dying. About that ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥadhaf said,[882]

Make a messenger reach Abū Bakr and all the young men of Medina.[883]
Do you want to come to the aid of the noble tribe,[884] sitting in Juwāthā, besieged?
[It is] as if their blood [is] on every path
[like] the rays of the sun, bedazzling those who watch.
We relied on the Merciful One;[885] Indeed we found that forbearance [is] for those who rely [on Him].[886]

Manẓūr, II, 294 and VII, 308; Balādhūrī, Futūḥ, 162 ("Sayābijah"); Pellat, Milieu basrien, 40–41.

876. A small island with port off the Arabian coast near al-Qaṭīf. Cf. Thilo, s.v.

877. I.e., al-Mundhir b. Sāwī.

878. Cf. Iṣfahānī, XIV, 46 and 48 on his name.

879. Citadel of 'Abd al-Qays in al-Khaṭṭ. Cf. Thilo, s.v.; Yāqūt, s.v.; Wüstenfeld, 176, 178, 181.

880. Ba'atha; one expects something like dhahaba, "he went."

881. A branch of the Kilāb of 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah; cf. Caskel, I, Table 94 and II, 222.

882. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 71; Balansī, 139; Isfahanī, XIV, 46–47. Wathīmah, 25/67–68 drops verse 3, and adds after the last verse here: "We said: we were content with God as Lord/and with Islam as a religion we were content."

883. Ibn Ḥubaysh and Balansī: "and all the residents of Medina."

884. Balansī: of a small troop.

885. al-raḥmān.

886. Ibn Ḥubaysh: "profit [is] for those . . .;" Balansī, Wathīmah, Ibn al-Athīr, II, 369 and Iṣfahānī, XIV, 47: "victory [is] for those . . . ."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ṣaʿb b. ʿAṭiyyah b. Bilāl—Sahm b. Minjāb—Minjāb b. Rāshid:[887] Abū Bakr sent al-ʿĀlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī to be in charge of fighting the apostates in al-Baḥrayn. So when he approached it and was opposite al-Yamāmah, Thumāmah b. Uthāl joined him with the Muslims of Banū Ḥanīfah, from Banū Suḥaym[888] and from the people of the settlements of the rest of Banū Ḥanīfah; he had been waiting in uncertain expectation. (Abū Bakr) had dispatched ʿIkrimah to ʿUmān and then to Mahrah, and he had ordered Shuraḥbīl [1963] to remain where he was until Abū Bakr's order should reach him, then (to go to) Dūmah[889] to raid the apostates of Quḍāʿah with ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ. As for ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ, he was raiding Saʿd and Balī;[890] and he ordered this one to (march against) Kalb, and mixed groups joined to them. Then, when (al-ʿĀlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī) drew near us[891] while we were in the high part of the country, there was no one of al-Ribāb or ʿAmr b. Tamīm who had a horse who did not lead (his horse) beside him, going out to receive (al-ʿĀlāʾ). As for Banū Ḥanẓalah, they played for time. Mālik b. Nuwayrah was in al-Buṭāḥ with groups with whom we contended,[892] and Wakīʿ b. Mālik was in al-Qarʿāʾ[893] with groups that contended with ʿAmr.[894] As for Saʿd b. Zayd Manāt, 887. Cf. pp. 76–86, above; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 369; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 47; Nuwayrī, 101.

888. Suhaym b. Murrah, a branch of Ḥanīfah, lived in the oases of al-Jawf, Malham, and Qurrān; cf. Caskel, II, 516.

889. Dūmat al-Jandal, a town in northern Najd, modern al-Jawf. Text is awkward; Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 149, wanted to delete Dūmah; editor, on basis of comparison with Ṭabarī, I, 2083, wanted to retain it.

890. I.e., the tribes of Saʿd Hudhaym b. Zayd and Balī, both of the northern Ḥijāz, or Saʿd Allāh of Balī and the rest of the tribe? Cf. Donner, Conquests 102–5.

891. The narrator, Minjāb b. Rāshid, was of Banū Ḍabbah, part of the confederation of al-Ribāb, closely connected with Tamīm; cf. Caskel, I, Table 90 and II, 408.

892. Cf. p. 53, above: Khālid b. al-Walīd is ordered to move against Mālik b. Nuwayrah at Buṭāḥ. The narrator now portrays himself and his group, al-Ribāb, as part of the Muslims.

893. A stop on the Mecca-Kufa road near the fringes of Iraq, in northernmost Arabia; cf. Yāqūt, s.v.

894. The identity of the ʿAmr is unclear. E. Landau-Tasseron (personal communication) suggests that he cannot be ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ, but might be ʿAmr b. al-Ahtam, on whom see note 631, above.

they were two divisions: ʿAwf and the Abnāʾ obeyed al-Zibriqān b. Badr, standing firm in their Islām; they were free of fault and defended it. The Muqāʿis and the Buṭūn [on the other hand] listened but did not comply, except for those with Qays b. ʿĀṣim, for he divided the ṣadaqah taxes that had been gathered to him among the Muqāʿis and the Buṭūn when al-Zibriqān marched[895] with the ṣadaqah taxes of ʿAwf and the Abnāʾ. ʿAwf and the Abnāʾ were occupied [in fighting] with the Muqāʿis and the Buṭūn, but when Qays b. ʿĀṣim saw how al-Ribāb and ʿAmr [b. Tamīm] had received al-ʿĀlāʾ, he regretted his earlier hasty actions; whereupon he received al-ʿĀlāʾ by making ready what he had divided from the ṣadaqah taxes. He shunned the business he had been involved in [before] and drove [the ṣadaqah camels] so that they reached him.[896] [Then Qays] went out with (al-ʿĀlāʾ) to fight the people of al-Baḥrayn. He recited poetry [1964] about that, as did al-Zibriqān about his ṣadaqah tax when he sent it to Abū Bakr. Al-Zibriqān said about that:

I paid in full the several camels [due to] the Apostle, when [other] collectors of ṣadaqah tax had refused, and not a camel had been returned [to him] by its trustee.[897]
Together we defended (the tax) from all the people;
the enemy's shooting at [it while it is with] us does not harm it.
So I paid it, in order not to betray my covenant—lean camels, their backs not [yet] broken in for riding.
By doing so I sought piety and the glory of its reputation, [against a time] when the boastful [man] of a company vies with my kind.
In truth I am from a clan which, when their efforts[898] are reckoned, their living and their dead[899] see glory in it.
Neither their young nor their old have been humbled, they are firmly anchored and their breasts are pure.

---

895. I.e., marched to Abū Bakr.
896. I.e., reached al-ʿAlāʾ.
897. Cf. p. 86, above.
898. Saʿyu-hum; Kos has shaʿbu-hum, "their people."
899. Lit., "their living and their graves."

I claimed my due from an ungrateful clan;
their barking and mewing did not turn my sword back.
For God, I have entered [the domain] of kings, and many a knight
I speared whenever the cavalry's raiding became intense.

So I broke through their front line[900] with a bloody thrust, [1965] in such a way that he who wished for life injures it.[901]
Many a spectacle of bravery[902] have I borne witness to, not idle in it; but today its fate is turned away.
I see my fear of the enemies as [a kind of] daring;
we weep[903] whenever the inmost thought of the soul is exposed.

Qays said, upon bringing the ṣadaqah tax to al-ʿĀlā':

Send Quraysh a letter from me, you two,
when proofs of the payments have reached them.
Many a time, over the ages, have I brought them to the sides of a well, driving every covetous man of evil conduct to despair [of seizing] them.
I found[904] that my father and maternal uncle were safe in a plain in which those whom I fended off did not alight.

So al-ʿAlā' honored him. There[905] went out with al-ʿAlā' as many [men] from ʿAmr and Saʿd and al-Ribāb as [there were regular troops in] his army. He crossed the Dahnā'[906] with us until when we were in the heart of it, with the whistling hills and sighing dunes to the right and left, and God wished to show us his signs. [Al-ʿAlā'] dismounted and ordered the people to [1966]

900. Lit., "I opened her first one."
901. I.e., the one who flees to save his life damages his reputation by fleeing.
902. Reading mashhad ṣadq for the text's mashhad ṣidq; cf. Ibn Manẓūr, X, 196, for ṣadq as "bravery." Or, perhaps, something like "moment of truth?"
903. Reading with Manuscript C, rather than "he weeps" in the text and Cairo.
904. Reading with Cairo, for the text's "I gave generously to . . . ."
905. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 369–70; Isfahānī, XIV, 47; Nuwayrī, 101–3.
906. A long, narrow stretch of sand desert in east-central Arabia, separating al-Yamāmah from Baḥrayn. Cf. *EI*², "al-Dahnā'" (C. D. Matthews).

dismount, whereupon the camels bolted from fright in the depths of the night, so that there remained with us neither camel, nor provisions, nor a water bag, nor a tent, unless he came upon it in the middle of the sands, that [happening] when the army had dismounted but before they had unpacked [the camels]. I have not known a group that was so beset by anxiety as we were, one of us appointing another his executor.[907] The herald of al-ʿAlāʾ cried out, "Assemble!" So we gathered to him; then he said, "What is this that has appeared among you and overcome you?" Whereupon the people answered, "How can we be blamed, [seeing that] even if we reach the morrow, the sun will not have waxed hot before we will have become [the subject of] a story?"[908] But he replied, "Oh people, do not be afraid. Are you not Muslims? Are you not on the path of God? Are you not the helpers of God?[909] They said, "Indeed." He went on, "Then rejoice, for by God, He will not forsake someone in a situation like yours." The herald called for the morning prayer when the dawn arose, some of us doing our ablutions with sand and others still being in a state of ritual purity.[910] After he had performed his prayer, he assumed a kneeling position and the people kneeled; then he exerted himself in praying, and they with him. Whereupon a mirage of the sun [as if reflecting off water] shimmered for them, so he turned to the row [of people] and said, "A scout to see what this is!" So [the scout] did so; subsequently he returned saying, "[It is] a mirage." Whereupon he occupied himself [again] with praying. Then it shimmered for them again, but the same thing happened. Then it shimmered for them a final time, whereupon [the scout] said, "Water!" So he got up, and the people got up, and we walked to it until we encamped at it and drank it and washed. The day was not [1967] advanced before the camels approached, driven from every

907. I.e., in anticipation of death.
908. I.e., before we will have died.
909. Ansār Allāh.
910. Ablutions with sand or dust (tayammum) are permitted when there is insufficient water to do normal ablutions by washing. Those who were still in a state of ritual purity at the morning prayer had, by implication, not slept the night before, as sleep causes the believer to enter the state of lesser impurity, necessitating ablutions before prayer.

side; then they kneeled for us, so each man went to his mount and took it. We had not lost [so much as] a thread.[911] We watered them and made them drink the second drinking after the first drinking, and we watered ourselves; then we left.[912] Abū Hurayrah was my companion, so when we had left that place he said to me, "How [well] do you know the location of that water?" So I replied, "I am one of the best of the Arabs as guides to this country." He said, "Be with me so that you may bring me straight upon it." So I came back to it, bringing him to that same place; but lo, there was no pool there, nor any trace of the water. So I said to him, "By God, if I had not seen the water I would have told you that this was the place; I have not seen any drinking water in this place before today." But lo, there was a small water bag, filled up. Whereupon [Abū Hurayrah] said, "Oh Abū Sahm, this is the place, by God; and for this I returned and brought you back. I filled my water bags, then I placed them on the edge[913] saying [to myself], 'If this was some act of [divine] grace and a sign [from God] I shall know, and if it was [merely] rainfall[914] I shall know.' Lo! It is an act of grace!" So he praised God. Then we marched until we came to Hajar.

Al-ʿAlāʾ[915] sent to al-Jārūd and to another man to betake themselves to ʿAbd al-Qays so that they could attack al-Ḥuṭam from [districts] adjacent to them. [Al-ʿAlāʾ] went out with those who came with him and those who came to him, until he attacked him from what is adjacent to Hajar. All the polytheists gathered to al-Ḥuṭam except the people of Dārīn, and all the [1968]

911. I.e., although the camels were wandering untended all night, nothing was lost from their baggage.

912. Diyārbakrī, II, 221 offers a somewhat different miracle story, involving the sudden appearance of rain clouds.

913. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 369, adds "of the pool"; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 47, adds "of the valley."

914. The text reads ghiyāthan, "divine aid," but the context of the story clearly requires some test between divine grace and accidental encounter of natural water, the idea being that naturally occurring water would still be there when Abū Hurayrah returned. I suspect that the text originally read ghaythan, "rain," and have translated accordingly. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 369, has ʿaynan, "a spring," which in unpointed texts would appear identical with ghaythan. The whole phrase is missing in Iṣfahānī.

915. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 370; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 47–48; Nuwayrī, 103.

Muslims gathered to al-ʿAlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī. The Muslims and the polytheists dug trenches; they used to fight in turns and return to their trench. They were thus for some months.[916] While[917] the people were [in that state], one night the Muslims heard a tremendous racket in the camp of the polytheists, like the clamoring of a rout or of fighting; so al-ʿAlāʾ said, "Who will bring us news of the enemy?" Whereupon ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥadhaf said, "I will bring you news of the enemy." Now his mother was a woman of ʿIjl; so he went out until, when he drew near their trench, they seized him and said to him, "Who are you?" So he related his genealogy for them, and began calling, "Oh Abjar!" At this, Abjar b. Bujayr[918] came and identified him; then he said, "What is your business?" So [ʿAbdallāh] replied, "May I not perish among the Lahāzim![919] Why should I be killed while there are all around me troops of ʿIjl, Taymallāt, Qays, and ʿAnazah? Is al-Ḥuṭam playing tricks on me, while strangers[920] of the tribes and you are witnesses? Stop it!" He said, "By God, I think you are the worst nephew to your uncles tonight." So he said, "Let me go[921] and give me [something] to eat, for I am dying of hunger." So he brought [1969] food for him, whereupon he ate. Then he said, "Give me provisions and a riding camel and let me go to my home." He said that to a man overcome by drink, who did so. He mounted him on his camel, and gave him provisions, and let him [go]. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥadhaf went out until he entered the camp of the Muslims; then he informed them that the enemy was drunk. So the Muslims went out against them so that they rushed upon their camp, putting them to the sword at will. [The enemy] rushed into the trench in flight. [Some] were thrown down,

916. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, and Nuwayrī: "a month."

917. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 71ff.; Balansī, 139–40; Nuwayrī, 103–4.

918. Thus text, but we should probably read Abjar b. Jābir, a Christian chieftain of ʿIjl, as given by Balansī. Cf. Caskel, II, 134; Donner, "Bakr," 31.

919. Lahāzim was an alliance of the Bakrī tribes of ʿIjl, Qays b. Thaʿlabah, and Taymallāt b. Thaʿlabah with the ʿAnazah b. Asad b. Rabīʿah, a non-Bakrī tribe. Cf. Donner, "Bakr," 17 and 32.

920. Nuzzāʿ; people living in a tribe under protection who are not of the tribe itself. Cf. Ibn Manẓūr, VIII, 350.

921. Daʿnī min hādha.

[others] escaped; [some stood] dumbfounded, [and were] killed or taken prisoner. The Muslims seized what was in the camp, no man escaping except with what was on him. As for Abjar, he fled; whereas al-Ḥuṭam became confused and mixed up, and his courage left him. So[922] he went up to his horse while the Muslims were all around them slaying them, in order to ride it; but when he placed his foot in the stirrup, he was unable to proceed. Then ʿAfīf b. al-Mundhir, one of the Banū ʿAmr b. Tamīm, passed him while al-Ḥuṭam was calling for help, saying, "Isn't there a man of Banū Qays b. Thaʿlabah who will lift me onto my mount?" Then he raised his voice, so that [ʿAfīf] recognized his voice; whereupon he said, "Abū Ḍubayʿah?" [Al-Ḥuṭam] replied, "Yes." He said, "Give me your foot so that I may lift you up." So he gave him his foot so he could lift him, but he struck it from the side [with his sword], severing it from the upper leg, and left him. At this [al-Ḥuṭam] said, "Finish me off!" Whereupon [ʿAfīf] replied, "I do not want you to die until I have made you suffer." Now with ʿAfīf were a number of his father's offspring; they were killed that night. Al-Ḥuṭam began [1970] to say to every Muslim who passed by him in the night, "Would you like to kill al-Ḥuṭam?", saying that even to those he did not know, until Qays b. ʿĀṣim passed him. So he said that to him, whereupon [Qays] turned to him and killed him. Then, when he saw that his thigh had been severed,[923] he said, "Oh vile one! If I had known what [a wound] he had, I would not have touched him." After the Muslims had secured the trench against the enemy, they went out in search of them, pursuing them. Qays b. ʿĀṣim caught up with Abjar; but Abjar's horse was stronger than the horse of Qays, so when he feared that he might escape him, he speared him in the hamstring, severing the tendon while the sciatic nerve remained unharmed; so that did it.[924] ʿAfīf b. al-Mundhir said,

If the tendon pulses [with the heartbeat] the sciatic nerve does not;
not everyone who falls knows about that.

---

922. Cf. Balansī, 140–41.
923. So text; i.e., that the lower leg had been severed from it.
924. fa-kānat rāddah.

Did you not see that we subdued their guards in the lineage of ʿAmr, and noble al-Ribāb?

ʿAfīf b. al-Mundhir took al-Gharūr b. Suwayd prisoner, so al-Ribāb negotiated with him on his behalf; his father was the nephew of Taym, and they asked him to grant him protection. So he said to al-ʿAlā', "I have taken this one under my protection." (Al-ʿAlā') said, "And who is he?" He replied, "Al-Gharūr." (Al-ʿAlā') said [to al-Gharūr], "You misled these [people]!" (Al-Gharūr) replied,[925] "Oh king, I am not the deceiver (al-gharūr), rather the deceived." (Al-ʿAlā') said, "Embrace Islam!" So he embraced Islām and remained in Hajar. Al-Gharūr [1971] was his proper name; it was not a nickname. ʿAfīf killed al-Mundhir b. Suwayd b. al-Mundhir.

In[926] the morning Al-ʿAlā' divided the spoils. He awarded some of the men of valor garments as booty; among those who were awarded booty were ʿAfīf b. al-Mundhir, Qays b. ʿĀṣim, and Thumāmah b. Uthāl. As for Thumāmah, he was given as booty some garments among which was a robe with ornamental borders of which al-Ḥuṭam had been very proud; he sold the garments.

The majority[927] of those who fled headed for Dārīn, and then rode boats to it; the rest returned to the country of their tribe. So al-ʿAlā' b. al-Ḥaḍramī wrote to those among them of Bakr b. Wā'il who had stood by their Islām, and sent to ʿUtaybah b. al-Nahhās[928] and to ʿAmr b. ʿAbd al-Aswad[929] to stick to what they were doing and to waylay the apostates on every road.[930] He ordered Misma'[931] to surprise them, and sent to Khaṣafah al-Taymī and al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah al-Shaybānī,[932] so that they took up positions against them on the road. Some

925. Cf. p. 137, above.
926. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 370; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 48.
927. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 371; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 48–49.
928. A Muslim of Banū ʿIjl; cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, s.v.
929. Possibly ʿAmr b. al-Aswad b. ʿĀmir (Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 84); he is, however, said to have been one of the martyrs at al-Yamāmah.
930. Or "in every way."
931. Possibly Misma' b. Shaybān of Qays b. Thaʿlabah: cf. Caskel, II, 409.
932. Chieftain of Shaybān and early ally of Muslims in Iraq. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "Al-Muthannā b. Ḥāritha" (F. M. Donner).

of [the fugitives] repented, so [the Muslims] accepted them and included them [in their forces]. Others refused and were stubborn; they were prevented from returning [to Islam], so they went back where they had come from until they crossed over to Dārīn. Thus God gathered them [all] in it. A man of Banū Ḍubayʿah b. ʿIjl called Wahb said about that, reproaching those of Bakr b. Wāʾil who apostatized:

Do you not see that God tests his creatures so that [some] peoples become wicked even as [another] group becomes pure?
God disgraces peoples afflicted by immorality;
Zayd al-Ḍallāl and Maʿmar fell upon them.[933]

Al-ʿĀlāʾ remained lodged in the camp of the polytheists until [1972] the letters came back to him from those of Bakr b. Wāʾil to whom he had written, and he had learned from them of [their] support for God's cause and zeal[934] for His religion. So when he had gotten what he desired from them in this regard, he felt sure that nothing untoward would take him from behind on the part of anyone of the people of al-Baḥrayn. He summoned the people to Dārīn; then he gathered them together and addressed them, saying: "God gathered for you in this sea the troops[935] of the devils and those fleeing in fright from the war; He has shown you His signs on land, so that you may consider them on the sea. So arise against your enemy, then cross the sea to them.[936] For in truth, God has gathered them." At this they said, "We shall do it, and by God we shall not feel any fear after [what happened in] the Dahnāʾ as long as we live." So he set out and they did likewise until, when they reached the seashore, they plunged in, [mounted upon] whinnying stallions, pack camels, bellowing mules, and braying donkeys, the rider and the infantryman [alike]. [Al-ʿAlāʾ] gave a call, and so did they; his call and 933. According to p. 151, below, Zayd amd Maʿmar were the killers of al-Ḥuṭam; this, of course, contradicts the account in pp. 144–46, in which ʿAfīf b. al-Mundhir and Qays b. ʿĀṣim are responsible for al-Ḥuṭam's death.

934. Literally, "passionate anger" (ghaḍab).

935. Or "companies, parties" (aḥzāb).

936. Lit., "make the sea broad (or ask it to be broad) to them."

theirs was, "Oh Most Merciful of forgivers! Oh Noble One! Oh Mild-tempered One! Oh Unique One! Oh Everlasting One! Oh Living One! Oh Reviver of the dead! Oh Living One! Oh Eternal One! There is no God but Thee, oh our Lord!"[937] Then they all passed over that gulf, by the will of God, walking as if on soft sand upon which was water that [only] covered the hooves of the camels.[938] In truth, between the coast and Dārīn is a trip of a day and a night for a ship of the sea under some conditions. So they reached it and fought so intensely that they did not leave anyone there to relate [what had happened]. They took as captives the offspring [of the vanquished] and drove off the [1973] flocks. The booty of the horseman reached 6,000,[939] and that of the foot soldier 2,000. They crossed over to them and marched on that [same] day;[940] then when they were done, they returned as they had come so that they crossed [back]. About that ʿAfīf b. al-Mundhir said:[941]

Did you not see that God subdued His ocean, and has sent one of the momentous happenings down among the unbelievers?
We called on Him Who divided the seas, so He brought us something more amazing than the dividing of the first seas.

After al-ʿAlāʾ returned to al-Baḥrayn and Islām became established in it, and Islām and its people grew strong and polytheism and its people were abased, those who had something [evil] in their hearts engaged in evil rumors, so the rumor mongers spread their lies. They said, "That one, Mafrūq,[942] has

937. The epithets given in the call are all among the Qur'ānic "beautiful names" of God.

938. Cf. Balansī, 143; Diyārbakrī, II, 221, gives a different version of this miraculous crossing.

939. Presumably dirhams, a silver coin.

940. Cairo, without explanation of source, has "they passed the night and marched the next day."

941. Cf. Diyārbakrī, II, 221; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 49; Balansī, 143.

942. Al-Nuʿmān "Mafrūq" b. ʿAmr of Banū Abū Rabīʿah of Shaybān of Bakr is said to have died ca. 615 at Yaum al-ʿUẓālah (Yawm Iyād); Cf. Caskel, I, Table 149, and II, 451; Balansī, 141, whose editor confirms it to have been Mafrūq b. ʿAmr al-Shaybānī. E. Landau-Tasseron suggests that either the person referred to here is a descendant of the deceased Mafrūq, or the narrator uses the name of a gathered his kinsmen of Shayban and Taghlib and al-Namir." But groups of Muslims said to them, "Then the Lahāzim will take care of them for us." Now the Lahāzim at that time had agreed to assist al-ʿAlāʾ, and they obeyed [him]. About that ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥadhaf said:[943]

Do not threaten us with Mafrūq and his family;
if he comes to us, he shall suffer among us the fate[944] of al-Ḥuṭam.
In truth, that clan of Bakr, even if it is numerous, is [nonetheless] one of the communities entering the fire.
Outside the palm grove are horses, and inside it [1974] are horses, heavily laden with young men leading camels.

Al-ʿAlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī allowed the people to go home, so the people returned, except those who desired to stay. Then[945] we headed home, and Thumāmah b. Uthāl headed home until, when we were at a spring of the Banū Qays b. Thaʿlabah, they saw Thumāmah with the robe of al-Ḥuṭam on him; they hid a man with him, saying, "Ask him how [his robe] came to be his, and whether he or someone else killed al-Ḥuṭam." So [the man] came to him and asked him about it, whereupon [Thumāmah] replied, "I was awarded it as booty." [The man] said, "Were you the one who killed al-Ḥuṭam?" He replied, "No; but I wish I had killed him." [The man] asked, "Then how is it that this robe is with you?" He replied, "Didn't I just tell you?" At this [the man] returned to them to tell them [what he had said], so they gathered to him; then they went to [Thumāmah] and surrounded him. Whereupon he said, "What do you want?" They said, "You are the killer of al-Ḥuṭam." [Thumāmah] replied, "You lie; I am not his killer, but I was given it as booty." They said, "Is anyone but the killer awarded the spoil [of a slain man]?" [Thumāmah] dead tribal hero [personal communication]. Cf. Landau-Tasseron, "The Participation of Ṭayyiʾ in the Ridda," 63, which describes how a hero of the tribe, Zayd al-Khayl, appears in some accounts about the ridda, even though he had died before it began.

---

943. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 72; Balansī, 141–42, which reverses order of verses 2 and 3.

944. Sunnah.

945. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 370–71; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 49.

replied, "(The robe) was not on him; it was found in his baggage." [But] they said, "You lie!" and struck him down.

With[946] the Muslims in Hajar was a monk; then he embraced Islām on that day, so he was asked, "What induced you to embrace Islām?" He replied, "Three things. I feared that God would transform me into something hideous after it if I did not do it; a flood in the sands and the smoothing of the highest parts of the sea;[947] and a prayer that I heard in their camp on the winds by dawn." They said, "What was it?" He said, "Oh God, You are the Compassionate, the Merciful; there is no God other than You; [You are] the Original, nothing was before You; the Enduring, not forgetful; the Living, Who does not die; Creator of what is seen and what is not seen; and each day, You are [1975] [employed] in [some] affair; Oh God, You know everything, without learning." Then I knew that a group was not aided by the angels unless they were in God's cause." The companions of the Apostle of God used to listen to that Hajarī thereafter.

Al-ʿAlāʾ wrote to Abū Bakr, "Now then: God, may He be blessed and exalted, made the Dahnāʾ flow for us in an inundation the western side of which could not be seen.[948] And He showed us a sign and a wonderful example after [our] anxiety and distress, so that we might praise God and glorify Him. So pray to God and ask His assistance for His armies and those who help His religion." So Abū Bakr praised God and prayed to Him, and said: "The Arabs still say, when speaking of their country, that when Luqmān[949] was asked whether they should dig the Dahnā" [for water] or leave it, he forbade them and said, 'The well rope does not reach it, and one is not refreshed.' In truth the case of this inundation is one of the great signs; we have not heard of it among any nation before. Oh God, appoint among us a successor to Muḥammad!"[950] Then al-ʿAlāʾ wrote to him

946. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 371; Iṣfahānī, XIV, 49.

947. A reference to the miracles related at pp. 143 and 148, above.

948. Meaning that the pool was so large one could not see across it; the Muslims were, according to the story, coming from the east; cf. p. 143, above.

949. A legendary pre-Islamic hero and sage. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "Luḳmān" (B. Heller—N. A. Stillman).

950. Ikhlif Muḥammadan fīnā.

about the defeat of the people of the trench and the killing of al-Ḥuṭam by Zayd and Maʿmar:[951] "Now then: God, may His name be blessed, robbed the enemy of their wits and took away their good fortune[952] by means of a drink that they took by day; then we rushed upon their trench against them, but found them drunk, so we killed them except for those who fled. Al-Ḥuṭam was killed." So Abū Bakr wrote [back] to him, "Now then: If you learn anything further about the Banū Shaybān b. Thaʿlabah like what you have learned [already], and the rumor mongers plunge into it, then send an army to them to crush them, and [1976] scatter in flight with them whoever is behind them." But they did not gather, nor did those rumors of theirs come to anything.

The Apostasy of the People of ʿUmān and Mahrah and the Yemen

Abū Jaʿfar said:[953] Differences of opinion exist regarding the date of the Muslims' war [with] these [people]. According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: al-Yamāmah and the Yemen and al-Baḥrayn were conquered and the armies sent to Syria in they year 12. According to Abū Zayd—Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madāʾinī—Abū Maʿshar, Yazīd b. ʿIyāḍ b. Juʿdubah, Abū ʿUbaydah b. Muḥammad b. Abī ʿUbaydah, Ghassān b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd, Juwayriyyah b. Asmāʾ—their teachers according to their chains of authority, and from others among the scholars of the people of Syria and Iraq: The conquests among all the apostates by Khālid b. al-Walīd and others were in the year 11, except for the affair of Rabīʿah b. Bujayr,[954] which was in the year 13. The story of Rabīʿah b. Bujayr al-Taghlibī is that Khālid b. al-Walīd, according to what was said in this account of his which I mentioned, was in al-Muṣayyakh and al-Ḥaṣīd;[955] then Rabīʿah rose up [in 951. Text has Mismaʿ; but cf. p. 147 and note 933, above. The form Maʿmar must be the correct one because the poem on p. 147 ends in r. Cf. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 149; Emendanda.

952. Or "took away their power" (adhhaba rīḥahum).

953. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 372.

954. A chief of Taghlib; cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2072.

955. Two places in southern Iraq conquered by Khālid b. al-Walīd, at which time the uprising of Rabīʿah b. Bujayr occurred. Cf. Ṭabarī I, 2068–2070; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 110–11.

rebellion] with a group of apostates. So [Khālid] fought him, [1977] plundering and taking captives. He gained [as booty] a daughter of Rabīʿah b. Bujayr, so he took her captive. He sent the captives to Abū Bakr; subsequently Rabīʿah's daughter became the possession of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

As for the case of ʿUmān, according to al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad and al-Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim and Mūsā al-Jalyūsī—Ibn Muḥayrīz:[956] In ʿUmān appeared Laqīṭ b. Mālik al-Azdī,[957] "the one with the crown." During the jāhiliyyah he used to be a rival of al-Julandā, and he preached something like what whoever was a prophet preached. He seized ʿUmān as an apostate and forced Jayfar and ʿAbbād[958] to take refuge in the mountains and the sea; so Jayfar sent to Abū Bakr informing him about that and asking him [to send] an army against him. At this, Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq sent Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan al-Ghalfānī of Ḥimyar[959] and ʿArfajah al-Bāriqī of the Azd, al-Ḥudhayfah to ʿUmān and ʿArfajah to Mahrah. He ordered the two of them, when they agreed, to combine against those to whom they had been sent, and to begin in ʿUmān, Hudhayfah [having precedence] over ʿArfajah on his front, and ʿArfajah [having precedence] over Ḥudhayfah on his front. So they set out supporting one another. [Abū Bakr] ordered them to march quickly until they should come to ʿUmān. Then, when they were near it, they corresponded with Jayfar and ʿAbbād and acted on their counsel; so they proceeded to what they had been ordered to. Now Abū Bakr had sent ʿIkrimah against Musaylimah in al-Yamāmah; and he sent Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah after him, and named al-Yamāmah to him [as his goal]. He commanded the two of them [to proceed] just as he had commanded [1978] Ḥudhayfah and ʿArfajah; but ʿIkrimah strove to precede Shuraḥbīl and sought the favor of victory. Then Musaylimah defeated him, so he drew back from Musaylima and wrote to Abū Bakr

956. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 372.

957. Cf. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 76; Balansī, 148.

958. Text and Cairo have ʿAbbād, here and subsequently; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, has ʿIyādh. The proper form may be ʿAbd: cf. p. 70 and note 446, above; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 76; Caskel, II, 104; Wilkinson, "The Julanda."

959. Balansī, 147, has Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān al-Azdī sent by the Prophet.

with the news. Shuraḥbīl stood firm where the news reached him. Abū Bakr wrote to Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah to remain in the nearest part of al-Yamāmah until his [further] order should come to him, and gave up making him go to the front he had [originally] sent him to. He wrote to ʿIkrimah, censuring him for his excessive haste and saying, "I shall neither see you nor hear you until after [some act of] valor. Go to ʿUmān in order to fight the people of ʿUmān; assist Ḥudhayfah and ʿArfajah. Each one of you is in charge of his cavalry; Ḥudhayfah is in charge of the army as long as you are in his district.[960] When you have finished, go on to Mahrah; then let your course from it be to the Yemen until you meet up with al-Muhājir b. Abī Umayyah in the Yemen and in Ḥaḍramawt. Crush whoever has apostatized between ʿUmān and the Yemen. Let me learn of your valor." So ʿIkrimah proceeded on the heels of ʿArfajah and Ḥudhayfah, leading those who were with him, so that he joined the two of them before they had reached ʿUmān. He[961] had made an agreement with them that, after finishing, they would follow the opinion of ʿIkrimah in marching on with him[962] or staying in ʿUmān. Then, after they had joined [forces] and were near ʿUmān in a place called Rijām,[963] they corresponded with Jayfar and ʿAbbād. Laqīṭ learned of the approach of the army, so he gathered his troops and set up camp at Dabā. Jayfar and ʿAbbād came out of the places where they had been and set up camp at Ṣuhār.[964] The two of them sent to Ḥudhayfah, ʿArfajah, and ʿIkrimah [inviting them] to come to them; so they came to them both in Ṣuhār. Then they mopped up those who adjoined them until they were satisfied with [the loyalty of] those who were near them. They wrote to chiefs who were with Laqīṭ, [1979] starting with a chief of Banū Judayd;[965] they exchanged cor-

960. fī ʿamalihi.

961. Presumably Abū Bakr imposing an agreement on the three commanders, ʿArfajah, Ḥudhayfah, and ʿIkrimah; the pronoun "them" is plural, not dual.

962. I.e., on to Mahrah and the Yemen. The text hereabouts is not always lucid.

963. A long red mountain on the western fringe of ʿUmān: cf. Thilo, s.v.

964. A seaport and sometimes capital of ʿUmān, where a Sasanian garrison was stationed on the eve of Islam: cf. Yāqūt, s.v.; Wilkinson, "The Julanda," 99.

965. Probably Judayd b. Ḥāḍir, a large subdivision of the ʿUmānī tribe of Daws—Azd.

respondence until they became dispersed from him. They fell upon Laqīṭ, meeting [him] at Dabā. Laqīṭ had gathered the families and then put them behind their lines to provoke them to battle and to protect their womenfolk. Now Dabā is the chief town (miṣr) and the most important marketplace. So they fought intensely at Dabā. Laqīṭ was prevailing over the army; but while they were in that situation, the Muslims having experienced disorder and the polytheists anticipating victory, there came to the Muslims their great reinforcements from Banū Nājiyah,[966] led by al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid, and from ʿAbd al-Qays, led by Sayḥān b. Ṣūḥān,[967] and scattered individuals of ʿUmān from Banū Nājiyah and ʿAbd al-Qays. Thus[968] God strengthened the people of Islam through them, and weakened through them the polytheists; so the polytheists turned their backs in flight, so that 10,000 of them were killed in the battle. [The Muslims] pursued them so that they made great slaughter among them and took the offspring prisoner and divided the flocks[969] among the Muslims. They sent the fifth [of booty] to Abū Bakr with ʿArfajah. ʿIkrimah and Ḥudhayfah were of the opinion that Ḥudhayfah should remain in ʿUmān so as to facilitate matters and to calm the people down.[970] The fifth [of booty] amounted to 800 heads;[971] and they plundered the marketplace completely. So ʿArfajah marched to Abū Bakr with the fifth of the captives and the plunder, while Ḥudhayfah remained to calm the people down. He invited the tribes around ʿUmān to settle what God had restored as booty to the Muslims and the expatriates[972] of ʿUmān. ʿIkrimah marched on with the people; he started with Mahrah, about which ʿAbbād al-Nājī said:

---

966. A branch of the old Quḍāʿī tribe of Jarm that had, before Islam, taken up independent residence in ʿUmān. Cf. Caskel, II, 442.

967. Cf. Caskel, II, 502.

968. Cf. Nuwayrī, 104–5.

969. Or "property" (amwāl).

970. Balansī, 149, says 700 captives, with Hudhayfah conducting them to Medina while ʿIkrimah remained in Dabā.

971. I.e., 800 people captured? Or 800 head of livestock?

972. Shawādhib (sing. shādhib), "those separated from their homeland."

By my life, Laqīṭ b. Mālik was met by [1980] an evil that would make foxes shamefaced.
He challenged in battle Abū Bakr and those who praise [God], whereupon there were thrown down two strands of his mighty torrent.
The first one did not thwart him, and the enemies were not defeated;
but then his cavalry took away the straying camels.

The Account of Mahrah in the Uplands[973]

After [974] ʿIkrimah and ʿArfajah and Ḥudhayfah had finished with the apostasy of ʿUmān, ʿIkrimah went out with his army toward Mahrah. He asked those around ʿUmān and the people of ʿUmān for assistance, and marched until he reached Mahrah, with men of Nājiyah, al-Azd, ʿAbd al-Qays, Rāsib,[975] and Saʿd of Banū Tamīm[976] whom he had asked to help him, until he fell upon the territories of Mahrah. He met in [that country] two groups[977] of Mahrah. The first of them was in a place of the land of Mahrah called Jayrūt;[978] that region had been filled up as far as Naḍadūn, [Jayrūt and Naḍadūn being] two of the plains of Mahrah. They were led by Shakhrīt,[979] a man of Banū Shakrāt. As for the other [group], they were in the uplands. Now all of Mahrah had obeyed the leader of this group, which was led by al-

973. Al-najd.

974. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 373–74.

975. A branch of Jarm, which like Nājiya had settled in ʿUmān before Islām. Cf. Caskel, II, 211, 259, s.v. "Ǧarm"; 485.

976. Saʿd min banī Tamīm. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 149 felt that text should read simply "Saʿd Tamīm," [i.e., referring to Saʿd b. Zaydmanāt b. Tamīm]; in the Emendanda, De Goeje proposed that the text should read simply "Saʿd" [referring to Saʿd Hudhaym] and that min banī Tamīm should be dropped. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 373, has, in fact, only "Saʿd," and also omits mention of al-Azd.

977. Here and elsewhere in the paragraph, jamʿ, lit., "gathering," refers to a military force, particularly one of bedouins.

978. Neither Jayrūt nor the next toponym, Naḍadūn, are known to Hamdānī; Yāqūt's information about them is derived from this account and so adds nothing.

979. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 373: Sikhrīt.

Muṣabbaḥ, one of the Banū Muḥarib,[980] and all the people were [1981] with him except those who were with Shakhrīt. So the two of them were in disagreement, each one of the two chiefs calling upon the other to [support] him, and each one of the two armies desiring that victory should be to their chief. That was how God helped the Muslims and strengthened them against their enemy, and weakened [the enemy].

Now when ʿIkrimah saw how few were those with Shakhrīt, he invited him to return to Islām. It was at the beginning of the call,[981] so (Shakhrīt) responded to him; in this way God weakened al-Muṣabbaḥ. Then (ʿIkrimah) sent to al-Muṣabbaḥ inviting him to Islām and to return from his unbelief; but he was deceived by how many there were with him, and moved further away because of Shakhrīt's situation.[982] So ʿIkrimah marched against him, and Shakhrīt marched with him; then they and al-Muṣabbaḥ met in the uplands, and fought more intensely than the fighting at Dabā. Then God put the armies of the apostates to flight and killed their leader. The Muslims pursued them, so that they killed of them what they wished and seized [as captives] what they wished. Among what they seized [as captives] were 2,000 noblewomen. Then ʿIkrimah set aside the fifth of the booty and sent the fifth with Shakhrīt to Abū Bakr, and divided the [remaining] four-fifths among the Muslims.[983] ʿIkrimah and his army grew stronger through the camels and goods and weapons [taken as booty]. ʿIkrimah remained so that he could muster them for whatever [purpose] he wished. The people of the Najd congregated—the people of Riyāḍ al-Rawḍah,[984] the people of the seacoast, the people of the 980. Several tribes with this name exist, most notably a branch of ʿAbd al-Qays in al-Baḥrayn; also bearing this name are branches of Quraysh, Qays (both Ḥijāz tribes) and ʿAnazah (of northeastern Arabia).

981. I.e., the beginning of the period when Islām was preached to the tribes of Arabia by the Muslims.

982. That is, since Shakhrīt had joined Islām, his rival al-Muṣabbaḥ distanced himself from it.

983. During the riddah and Islamic conquests, the one-fifth share of booty that in pre-Islamic times had been the share of the raid leader was set aside for the caliph to use for the good of the Muslim community.

984. Thus Yāqūt; text has "Riyāḍat al-Rawḍah." Cf. Emendanda and pp. 177–79, below.

islands, the people of [the lands of] myrrh and frankincense,[985] the people of Jayrūt, Ẓuhūr al-Shiḥr, al-Ṣabarāt, Yanʿab, and Dhāt al-Khiyam[986]—to take the oath of allegiance to Islām. Then he wrote about that with a herald—he was al-Sāʾib, one of the Banū ʿĀbid of Makhzūm—so he came to Abū Bakr with [news of] the conquest, and Shakhrīt arrived after him with the fifths [of booty]. About that ʿUljūm al-Muḥāribī said: [1982]

May God punish Shakhrīt and the splinter groups of Haysham and Firḍim,[987] since groups from every quarter came to us.
A punishment deserved, [for] he had taken no heed of protection,[988] and he did not hope for it in the way that relatives do.
Oh ʿIkrimah, but for the gathering of my tribe and their deeds, indeed the places [where you could go] would have seemed confining to you.
We would have been like someone who lets a palm [of one hand] follow its mate;[989] the vicissitudes [of fate] would have descended upon us in time.

985. Or "the people of al-Murr/al-Marr and Labbān." Text and Yāqūt have "al-Labbān." However, neither Hamdānī nor Yāqūt know of a place called al-Murr/al-Marr, and Yāqūt's entry for "al-Labbān" simply notes that it is in Mahrah and mentioned in the riddah, so his information is probably derived from this very account. The Mahrah and Ḥaḍramawt districts were, of course, well known as sources of myrrh (al-murr) and frankincense (al-lubān).

986. The four preceding toponyms are known to Yāqūt only as "places in the Mahrah mentioned during the riddah"; presumably, he got his information on them from this account.

987. Firḍim b. al-ʿUjayl was, according to Ibn al-Kalbī, from Mahrah (Caskel I, Table 328 and II, 247). Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 149, proposes to read "Qirḍim"; authorities are divided.

988. Lam yurāqib li-dhimmatin. Cf. the phrase lā yarqubu fīhi illan wa-lā dhimmatan, "he treated him ruthlessly"; Hans Wehr, A Dictionary of Modern Arabic, 352. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 373, has "took no heed of his religion (li-dīnihi)." Presumably the verse refers to Shakhrīt's betrayal of his tribe, Mahrah.

989. I.e., we would have wrung our hands?

Account of the Apostates in the Yemen

Abū Jaʿfar said: according to al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah—ʿIkrimah and Sahl—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad:[990] The Apostle of God died while over Mecca and its territory were ʿAttāb b. Asīd[991] and al-Ṭāhir b. Abī Hālah, ʿAttāb over Banū [1983] Kinānah and al-Ṭāhir over ʿAkk.[992] That was [because] the Prophet had said, "Put the governorship of ʿAkk among the descendants of his ancestor Maʿadd b. ʿAdnān."[993] Over al-Ṭāʾif and its territory were ʿUthmān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ[994] and Mālik b. ʿAwf al-Naṣrī,[995] ʿUthmān over the settled people and Mālik over the nomads, the hinder parts of Hawāzin.[996] Over Najrān and its territory were ʿAmr b. Ḥazm and Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb,[997] ʿAmr b. Ḥazm over prayer and Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb over the sadaqah taxes. Over [the territory] between Rimaʿ and Zabīd as far as the border of Najrān was Khālid b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ. Over all of Hamdān was ʿĀmir b. Shahr, and over Ṣanʿāʾ was Fayrūz al-Daylamī, supported by Dādhawayh and Qays b. Makshūḥ. Over al-Janad was Yaʿlā b. Umayyah, and over Maʾrib was Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī. Over the Ashʿarīs in addition to ʿAkk was al-Ṭāhir b. Abī Hālah. Muʿādh b. Jabal used to instruct the people, making the rounds in the district of every governor.[998]

Then al-Aswad sprang upon them during the life of the Prophet, so the Prophet waged war against him by means of

---

990. Cf. p. 19, above; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 374–75; Caetani, 569–70, 581–82.

991. An Umayyad and late convert to Islam who had been appointed governor of Mecca by the Prophet. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "ʿAttāb b. Asīd."

992. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil: ʿAkk and the Ashʿarīs. Cf. below, in this paragraph.

993. Maʿadd was the supposed ancestor of all North Arabs. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "Maʿadd" (A. Grohmann—G. R. Smith).

994. A member of the tribe of Thaqīf of al-Ṭāʾif, he converted late, just before the Prophet's conquest of his city; he was earnest in teaching the Qurʾān. Cf. Caskel, II, 579; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 272–74.

995. A chief of the Naṣr b. Muʿāwiyah clan of Hawāzin. Cf. Caskel, II, 387.

996. Aʿjāz Hawāzin.

997. Abū Sufyān, father of the Umayyad caliph Muʿawiyah, was head of the Umayyah clan of Quraysh at the time of the Prophet; he opposed the Prophet until his conversion to Islam just before the conquest of Mecca. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb" (W. M. Watt).

998. Fi ʿamali kulli ʿāmilin.

envoys and letters until God killed him and the cause of the Prophet returned to what it had been one night before the Prophet's death. However, the arrival [of the Prophet's commanders in Yemen][999] did not stir up the people since the people were prepared for it. Then, when [news of] the death of the Prophet reached them, the Yemen and the countries[1000] rebelled. The horsemen of al-ʿAnsī had been in a commotion in [the country] between Najrān and Ṣanʿā' on the side of that sea, not taking refuge with anyone nor anyone taking refuge with them. So ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib [was] opposite Farwah b. Musayk,[1001] and Muʿāwiyah b. Anas[1002] [was] leading the fugitive soldiers of al-ʿAnsī, wavering. None of the governors of the Prophet returned [to Medina][1003] after the death of the Prophet, except ʿAmr b. Ḥazm and Khālid b. Saʿīd. The rest of the governors took refuge among the Muslims. ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib confronted Khālid b. Saʿīd, so he seized as booty from him [ʿAmr's sword] "The Persistent." The messengers returned bearing the news, and Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh[1004] and al-ʾAqraʿ b. ʿAbdallāh[1005] and Wabr b. Yuḥannis came back. So until such time as Usāmah b. Zayd returned from Syria—that was estimated at three months—Abū Bakr waged war against all the apostates [only] by means of envoys and letters, just as the Apostle of God had done, except for the affairs of the people of Dhū Ḥusā and Dhū al-Qaṣṣah.[1006] Then the first clash upon the return of Usāmah was this.[1007] So [1984]

999. Cf. pp. 33 and 38, above. The text is problematic; Wellhausen, (Skizzen, VI, 149–50) and De Goeje (Emendanda) disagree on rendering and reading. I have followed De Goeje.

1000. I.e., the surrounding districts? (al-buldān).

1001. Of the Murād group of the tribe of Madhḥij, he came to the Prophet at the end of the latter's life and was sent by him over Madhḥij; cf. Caskel, II, 245; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 180–81.

1002. Of the tribe of Sulaym; cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah s.v.

1003. Cf. p. 22, above.

1004. Chief of Bajīlah who came to the Prophet in his last year and was put at head of his tribe by him. Cf. Caskel, II, 218; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 279–80.

1005. Of Ḥimyar; sent by the Prophet to Dhū Murrān. Cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, s.v.

1006. In these two instances, Abū Bakr resorted to military confrontation; cf. pp. 40ff., above.

1007. I.e., Dhū al-Qaṣṣah. Cairo, following Kosegarten, reads "the first people to clash . . . were they."

he went out to al-Abraq. He did not face a tribe directly to defeat them; rather, he incited those among them who had not apostatized against the others. So, with a group of the Muhājirūn and the Ansār and those who had been aroused among the non-apostates, (Abū Bakr) vanquished those [rebels] who were close to them, until he took care of the last of the business of the army[1008] without asking the [former] apostates for help [against the remaining rebels]. The first who wrote to him was ʿAttāb b. Asīd; he wrote to him about the pursuit of those who had stood firm in Islām by those in his governorship who had apostatized, while ʿUthmān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ [wrote] of the pursuit of those who had stood firm in Islām by those who had apostatized among the people in his governorship. As for ʿAttāb, he sent Khālid b. Asīd[1009] against the people of the Tihāmah, for there had gathered in it groups from Mudlij; and there congregated to them scattered persons from Khuzāʿah[1010] and splinter groups from Kinānah, commanded by Jundab b. Sulmā,[1011] one of the Banū Shannūq of Banū Mudlij.[1012] In the governorship (ʿamal) of ʿAttāb there was no gathering besides this, so they met at al-[1985] Abāriq, whereupon [Khālid b. Asīd] dispersed them and killed them. The slaughter was great among the Banū Shannūq, so that they remained weak and few in number [after that]. The governorship[1013] of ʿAttāb became free [of rebels], and Jundab escaped. Then Jundab said about that:

1008. Ākhiri ʾumūr al-nās, i.e., the last rebels opposing the Muslims. The sentence is difficult; cf. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 150; Emendanda.

1009. ʿAttāb's brother; he embraced Islam at the time of the conquest of Mecca and was one of those Meccans given special favors by the Prophet in order to win them over; they were called those "whose hearts were reconciled." Cf. Caskel, II, 341; Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 76.

1010. An old tribe living between Mecca and Medina, formerly dominant in Mecca before being displaced by Quraysh. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "Khuzāʿa" (M. J. Kister); Caskel, II, 350.

1011. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 374, has Salmā.

1012. Shannūq b. Murrah, a section of Kinānah, was, according to Ibn al-Kalbī, not part of Mudlij b. Murrah, but rather a lateral affiliate. Cf. Caskel, I, Table 44, and II, 416 and 526. The conflation may have been introduced to explain the verses below.

1013. ʿUmālah.

I repented and knew with certainty in the morning that I had come to something the disgrace of which remains on a man.
I bear witness that there is nothing beside God.
Banū Mudlij, God is my Lord and my Protector.[1014]

ʿUthmān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ sent a force against Shanūʾah.[1015] There had gathered in it groups of Azd and Bajīlah and Khathʿam,[1016] led by Ḥumayḍah b. al-Nuʿmān.[1017] In charge of the people of al-Ṭāʾif was ʿUthmān b. Rabīʿah.[1018] So they met in Shanūʾah; then they routed those groups and they dispersed from Ḥumayḍah. Ḥumayḍah fled into the countryside, whereupon ʿUthmān b. Rabīʿah said about that:

We broke up their groups while the pool filled with dust, and the niggardly clouds may promise relief deceitfully.
A lightning-cloud[1019] flashed when we met, then those flashings returned as rainless clouds.

The Wicked People of ʿAkk

Abū Jaʿfar said:[1020] The first rebellion in the Tihāmah after the [death of the] Prophet was [that of] ʿAkk and the Ashʿarīs. [1986]
[The story of] that was that, when the death of the Prophet reached them, scattered remnants of them gathered; then scattered remnants and large groupings[1021] from the Ashʿarīs 1014. Reading jāriyā with Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 150 and Emendanda, against jāru-hā, "its Protector" in the text and Cairo.

1015. A district in Yemen. Cf. Yāqūt, s.v.

1016. All three were tribes of the Sarāt region (modern ʿAsīr) of southwest Arabia; Khathʿam was closely associated with Bajīlah. Cf. *EI*², s.v. "Azd" (G. Strenziok), "Badjīla" (W. M. Watt), and "Khathʿam" (G. Levi della Vida).

1017. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2218: a Bāriqī (of Azd).

1018. According to Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 371, he was from Quraysh and among the emigrants to Abyssinia; according to Caskel, I, Table 115 and II, 579, he was of Hawāzin.

1019. Bāriq; perhaps "sword." In either case, evidently a pun on the name of Ḥumayḍah's clan, Bāriq.

1020. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 375.

1021. Reading khiḍamm with Emendanda, against khaḍḍama in text and Cairo; cf. Ibn Manẓūr, XII, 83. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 150 proposed ḥakam. Cf. also Caetani, 582.

came to them, so they joined with them. Then they remained on al-Aʿlāb,[1022] the coastal road. Parties of men under no leader congregated to them. So al-Ṭāhir b. Abī Hālah wrote about this to Abū Bakr, and marched against them, writing also about his marching against them—with him was Masrūq al-ʿAkkī[1023]—until he came to those parties of men on al-Aʿlāb; then they met and fought, whereupon God routed them. They slaughtered them by every means; the roads stank because of their slaughter. Their killing was a great conquest.

Abū Bakr responded to al-Ṭāhir before [al-Ṭāhir's] letter about the conquest could come to him: "Your letter has reached me, in which you inform me that you have marched against the wicked people in al-Aʿlāb and that you have asked Masrūq and his tribe for assistance. You are right, so hurry [to deliver] this blow; do not deal gently with them. Occupy al-Aʿlāb until the road of the wicked people should become secure and [until] my order should reach you." So those groups of ʿAkk and those who congregated to them have been called to this day "the wicked people," and that road has been called "the road of the wicked people." Al-Ṭāhir b. Abī Hālah said about that:

By God, if not for God, other than Whom there is no thing, the ʿAthāʿith[1024] would not have been dispersed in the rugged hills.
My eye had never seen a day like the one I saw beside the sweat of horses among the groupings of the wicked people.
[1987] We slew them from the hilltop of Khāmir[1025] as far as the red sodden plains strewn with mud dredged from wells.[1026]

1022. Yāqūt knows this as a toponym, but evidently gets his information solely from this account. Cf. Ibn Manẓūr, I, 627, which defines ʿilb as "barren place."

1023. Cf. Wathīmah, 31/74, which has "Masrūq b. Dhī al-Ḥarb al-Hamdānī al-Arḥabī."

1024. Possibly a nickname applied to the Shahrān, an important lineage of the tribe of Khathʿam, because several of their chiefs bore the name ʿAthʿath. Cf. Caskel, II, 205; Ibn Manẓūr, II, 168 left.

1025. A mountain in the ʿAkk country, according to Yāqūt, s.v.

1026. Yāqūt, s.v. "Khāmir," reads "having ʿAthāʿith."

We seized as booty the flocks of the wicked ones by force, fighting openly; we took no heed of the din of battle.

Ṭāhir encamped on the "road of the wicked ones," along with Masrūq leading 'Akk, awaiting Abū Bakr's order.

Abū Ja'far said:[1027] When the [news of the] death of the Apostle of God reached the people of Najrān—they were at that time 40,000 fighting men of Banū al-Af'ā,[1028] the community who were in [Najrān] before Banū al-Ḥārith[1029]—they sent a delegation [to Abū Bakr] to renew the pact. So they came to him, whereupon he wrote for them:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate: this is a document from the servant of God, Abū Bakr, successor of the Apostle of God, to the people of Najrān. He affords them protection from his army and himself, and decrees for them the protection[1030] of Muḥammad, except that which Muḥammad the Apostle of God had revoked on God's command regarding their lands and the lands of the Arabs, that two religions should not dwell in them. Thereafter he gave them protection for their persons, their communities, the rest of their properties,[1031] their dependents, their horses,[1032] those absent of them and those present, their bishop and their monks and their churches wherever they might be; and for what their hands possess whether little or much. They owe what is incumbent upon them; if they pay it, they will not be compelled to emigrate, nor tithed, [1988] > nor shall a bishop be changed from his bishopric or a monk from his monastic life. He shall fulfil for them everything that the Apostle of God granted them in

1027. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 375; Caetani, 582–83.

1028. Presumably descendants of al-Af'ā ("Viper") b.al-Ḥusayn, a legendary judge in Najrān; cf. Caskel, II, 142.

1029. Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b (Bal-Ḥārith) was a tribe of the Najrān area allied to Madhḥij; they had negotiated with the Prophet, but later backed al-Aswad. Cf. *EI*², s.v. "al-Ḥārith b. Ka'b" (J. Schleifer); Caskel, II, 308.

1030. Dhimmah.

1031. Possibly "flocks": amwāl.

1032. Possibly simply "troops": 'ādiyah.

writing, and everything that is in this document by way of the protection of Muḥammad, the Apostle of God, and the covenant of the Muslims. They owe [the Muslims] advice and righteousness in those just duties that are incumbent upon them. Al-Miswar b. ʿAmr and ʿAmr, the client of Abū Bakr, were witnesses [to this agreement].

Abū Bakr sent Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh back and ordered him to summon those from his tribe[1033] who had remained firm in the cause of God, and then to ask those who could reinforce them for help, so as to fight with them those who had turned away from the cause of God. He ordered him to come to Khathʿam so that he could fight those who rebelled out of zealous attachment[1034] to Dhū al-Khalaṣah[1035] and those who wished to restore it [as their deity], until God should kill them and those who participated with them in that. Then he was to direct himself toward Najrān, to remain in it until [Abū Bakr's] orders should reach him. So Jarīr went out, carrying out that which Abū Bakr had commanded him to do. No one opposed him[1036] except some men leading a small number [of followers]; so he killed them and pursued them. Then he directed himself to Najrān, and resided in it awaiting the order of Abū Bakr.

[Abū Bakr] wrote to ʿUthmān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ to impose on the people of al-Ṭāʾif [the raising of] an army, each district [contributing] according to its ability, and to put in command over them a man in whom he had confidence and whose intentions[1037] he trusted. So he imposed twenty men [as a contribution] on each district, and put his brother in command of them. [Abū Bakr] wrote to ʿAttāb b. Asīd to impose on the 1033. I.e., from Bajīlah.

---

1034. Lit., "out of anger" (ghaḍaban).

1035. A pagan shrine of Bajīlah, Khathʿam, Daws, Azd, and other tribes of al-Sarāt, located near Tabālah, 300 km southeast of Mecca. Cf. EI[2], s.v. "Dhū al-Khalaṣa" (T. Fahd).

1036. Or "detained him?" Text and Cairo read lam y-q-rr lahu; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 375, has lam y-q-m; the editor notes that Ibn Khaldūn has lam y-m-r bihi.

1037. Nāhiyah.

people of Mecca and its district 500 reinforcements, and to send over them a man in whom he had confidence. So he named [1989] those whom he would send and put Khālid b. Asīd in command of them. He appointed the commander of each tribe, and they stood at the ready for Abū Bakr's order to reach them and for al-Muhājir to come to them.

Apostasy of the People of the Yemen a Second Time

Abū Jaʿfar said: Among those of them who apostatized a second time was Qays b. ʿAbd Yaghūth b. Makshūḥ.[1038]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf:[1039] The story of Qays in his second apostasy was that when the news of the Apostle of God's death came to them, [the pact] was violated and he worked for the killing of Fayrūz and Dādhawayh and Jushaysh. Abū Bakr wrote to ʿUmayr Dhū Murrān and to Saʿīd Dhū Zūd and to Samayfaʿ Dhū al-Kalāʿ and to Ḥawshab Dhū Ẓulaym and to Shahr Dhū Yanāf,[1040] ordering them to stick to their position[1041] and to undertake the cause of God and of the people, and promising them soldiers: "From Abū Bakr, successor of the Apostle of God, to ʿUmayr b. Aflaḥ Dhū Murrān, Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀqib Dhū Zūd, Samayfaʿ b. Nākūr Dhū al-Kalāʿ, Ḥawshab Dhū Ẓulaym, and Shahr Dhū Yanāf. Now then: assist the Abnāʾ against whosoever opposes them, defend them, and obey Fayrūz and apply your utmost effort with him, for I have appointed him [governor]."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Mustanīr b. Yazīd—ʿUrwah b. Ghaziyyah al-Dathīnī:[1042] After Abū Bakr was appointed, he put Fayrūz in command. Before that, they had relied [1990] upon one another—(Fayrūz) and Dādhawayh and Jushaysh and Qays.[1043] He wrote to some of the chiefs of the people of the 1038. On his name, see note 145, above.

1039. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 375–76.

1040. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 376 has "Dhū Niyāf." On these "Dhūs" see p. 27 and note 168, above.

1041. Lit., "to stick to that in which they were," i.e., to stand fast in Islām.

1042. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 376–77 (parallels Ṭabarī through p. 169).

1043. I.e., no one had been in overall command, each leader being equal and supporting the others as need required.

Yemen. When Qays heard about that, he wrote to Dhū al-Kalāʿ and his companions, "The Abnā' are interlopers in your country and foreigners among you. Even if you leave them, they will not cease to be against you. I have come to hold the opinion that I should murder their chiefs and expel them from our country." But they declared themselves clear [of the matter], such that they did not conspire with him nor assist the Abnā', but kept aloof, saying, "We have nothing to do with this. You are their responsibility and they are your responsibility."[1044] So Qays lay in wait for them and prepared to kill their chiefs and to expel their common [followers]. Then Qays corresponded with those defeated Laḥjī troops who were roaming about, while they were going up and down through the country, waging war against all who opposed them. Qays corresponded with them in secret and ordered them to hurry to him, [proposing] that his cause and their cause should be one and that they should unite in exiling the Abnā' from the lands of the Yemen. So they wrote [back] to him responding [favorably] to him, and informed him that they were hastening to him. The people of Ṣanʿā' were taken by surprise, [learning of it] only with the news of their drawing near it.[1045] Then Qays came to Fayrūz about that, as though he were terrified of this news, and came to Dādhawayh and consulted the two of them in order to confuse them so that they would not suspect him; so they took that into consideration and had confidence in him. Then[1046] Qays invited them to a meal the next day, starting with Dādhawayh, and [asking] Fayrūz next and [1991] Jushaysh [after him]. So Dādhawayh went out to call on (Qays); but when he did so, (Qays) fell upon him quickly and killed him. Fayrūz went out to go [to Qays also] until, when he was drawing near, he overheard two women talking between the rooftops. One of them said, "This one will be killed just as Dādhawayh was killed." So he met the two of them; then he turned aside until he could see the people, high up, gathered together. [When] they were told of Fayrūz's turning back, they went out running [in pursuit]. Fayrūz ran to meet Jushaysh, whereupon he went out with him heading toward the mountain of Khawlān,[1047] for they were the maternal relatives of Fayrūz. The two of them preceded the horsemen to the mountain. Then the two of them climbed down and up the mountain, wearing only plain boots, so that their feet were cut before they arrived. They reached Khawlān, and Fayrūz entrenched himself among his maternal relatives and swore not to wear plain boots. The horsemen returned to Qays. Then he rose in rebellion in Ṣan'ā' and occupied it, and collected what was around it, playing for time.[1048] The horsemen of al-Aswad came to him. Now after Fayrūz had taken refuge with his maternal kinsmen of Khawlān, so that they guarded him and the people flocked to him, he wrote to Abū Bakr with the news. Then Qays said, "What is Khawlān, and what is Fayrūz, and in what abode have they taken refuge?" The common people of the tribes to whose leaders Abū Bakr had written sided with Qays, whereas the leaders remained withdrawn.[1049] Qays sought out the Abnā', dividing them into three subdivisions. Those who remained he safeguarded, and their families he safeguarded.[1050] The families of those who had fled to Fayrūz he divided into two groups; one of them he sent to Aden so that they could be carried [away] by sea, and the other was carried away by land. To all of them he said, "Go to your country!" With them he sent someone to make them go. The family of al-Daylamī was among those who were made to go away by land; the family of Dādhawayh were among those who were made to go away by sea. So when Fayrūz saw that the [1992] majority of the people of the Yemen had gathered to Qays, and that the families had been marched [into exile], and [that] he had exposed them to plunder, and [that] he had not found any way to separate himself from his camp in order to save them, and when [Fayrūz] learned what Qays had said out of contempt for him

1044. Lit., "You are their companion . . ." etc. The idea is that Qays and the Abnā' must settle their relationship themselves.

1045. Lit., "Nothing took the people of Ṣanʿā' by surprise except the news of their drawing near it."

1046. Cf. Ibn Ḥubaysh, 77; he says Fayrūz escaped to Abū Bakr.

1047. A tribe and mountain district southeast of Ṣan'ā' in Yemen; cf. Caskel, II, 345; Wilson, 158; Yāqūt, s.v.

1048. Lit., "advancing a foot and withdrawing a foot."

1049. I.e., neutral?

1050. Or "those who remained he settled (aqarra)" etc.

[and for his] maternal relatives and the Abnā', he said, by way of tracing his lineage and boasting, and mentioning the departure on a desert voyage:[1051]

Call, you two, for the departure of a woman to the palm-filled sands, and speak to her, so that there would be no blame on me.
What the enemies say did not harm them, even if they said much;
he came to his tribe with neither excess nor stinginess.
So desist from a woman on the road that is stretched out toward the object of her desire, as the sands seek the sands.
Even if, indeed, our residence was in Ṣan'ā', ours are the offspring of a tribe from whose noble chiefs my offspring are.
In truth, strong and stubborn Daylam, after hardship, refused the life of ease and chose the heat over shade.
Most of the lush places of Iraq belonged to my close kin, when the cooking pots of Kisrā were boiling.[1052]
My lineage [I trace to] a brave one; no matter how much I have grown, my station [in life] is just like the end of every stick, at the root.
[1993] (My ancestors) left my way level, and they fortified my mountain roads with good sayings and abundant noble deeds.
Our glory is not from the ignorance[1053] of those of enmity;
God insisted on being glorious despite ignorance.
(The enemy) did not divert us in times of peace from the family of Aḥmad,[1054] nor did they detract from Islām since they embraced Islām before me.
And if a bucketful of [the deeds of] my tribe had sprinkled me,
I would want my bucketful to drown them.

1051. The departure on a desert voyage (ẓu'n) is a common part of the classical qaṣīda or ode.

1052. I.e., in the heyday of Kisrā.

1053. Or "barbarity, coarseness": jahl.

1054. I.e., from Islām; Aḥmad = Muḥammad.

Fayrūz continued in his war and devoted himself to it. He sent a messenger to the Banū ʿUqayl b. [Kaʿb b.] Rabīʿah b. ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah[1055] [informing them] that he was taking refuge with them and asking them for reinforcements and assistance in bearing down on those who were disturbing the households of the Abnāʾ. And he sent a messenger to ʿAkk, asking them for reinforcements and assistance against those who were disturbing the households of the Abnāʾ. So ʿUqayl mounted—they were led by a man of the allies called Muʿāwiyah—so that they confronted the cavalry of Qays and then rescued those families. They killed those who were making them march into exile and barred them from the villages until Fayrūz returned to Ṣanʿāʾ. ʿAkk, led by Masrūq, sprang up to march until they rescued the families of the Abnāʾ, and barred them[1056] from the villages until Fayrūz returned to Ṣanʿāʾ. ʿUqayl and ʿAkk reinforced Fayrūz with men. After their reinforcements reached him among those who had gathered to him, he went out at the head of those who had congregated to him and those who had reinforced him [1994] from ʿAkk and ʿUqayl; then he clashed with Qays, so that they met before Ṣanʿāʾ. Then they fought, whereupon God routed Qays at the head of his tribe and those who had risen up. So he departed in flight with his army until he returned with them; they returned to the place in which they had hurried when they fled after the murder of al-ʿAnsī. Qays was in command of them. The faction of al-ʿAnsī, and Qays with them, were in a commotion between Ṣanʿāʾ and Najrān. ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib was facing Farwah b. Musayk in obedience to al-ʿAnsī.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAṭiyyah—ʿAmr b. Salamah:[1057] Part of the affair of Farwah b. Musayk was that he had come to the Apostle of God as a Muslim. About that he said:

1055. A powerful and wide-ranging tribe of the ʿĀmir group, centered around Jabal Ṭuwayq in central Arabia. Cf. Caskel, II, 365, s.v. "Kaʿb b. Rabīʿa b. ʿĀmir."

1056. Presumably referring to those who had been marching the Abnāʾ families into exile, but who are not mentioned in this sentence as they are in the preceding one. It seems probable that this repeat of the earlier phrase constitutes a dittography, rather than part of Ṭabarī's original text.

1057. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 377.

When I saw the kings of Ḥimyar, they shied away like the leg whose sciatic nerve betrayed it.[1058]
I steered my she-camel before Muḥammad;
I desire benefits and good praise for her.

Among the things the Apostle of God said to him was, "Did what befell your tribe on the day of al-Razm displease you, oh Farwah, or please you?" He replied, "Anyone whose tribe was afflicted as much as my tribe was afflicted on the day of al-Razm would dislike that." (Now the day of al-Razm was [a battle] between (Murād) and the Hamdān over Yaghūth, an idol that was sometimes with the former and sometimes with the latter. Then Murād desired to take sole control of it from (Hamdān) during their time; but Hamdān slaughtered them and their chief, al-Aḥdaʿ, the father of Masrūq.) So the Apostle of God said, "Indeed, that only increased their good standing in Islām." Whereupon (Farwah) replied, "It would please me if that were [so]." So the Apostle of God appointed him over the ṣadaqah taxes of Murād and whoever resided with them or dwelt in their [1995] territory.[1059] ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib had abandoned his tribe, Saʿd al-ʿAshīrah, leading Banū Zubayd[1060] and its allies, and he joined (Murād) and embraced Islam with them; he was in charge of them.[1061] Then, when al-ʿAnsī apostatized and most people of Madhḥij followed him, Farwah withdrew, leading those who stood fast in Islām with him, whereas ʿAmr was one of those who apostatized. So al-ʿAnsī appointed him deputy and put him opposite Farwah so that he was facing him. Each one of them stayed put because of his counterpart's being in plain view, so the two of them exchanged poetry. ʿAmr said, mentioning the command of Farwah and denouncing it:

We have found the kingship of Farwah to be the worst of kingships;
[he is] an ass whose nostrils sniff some filth.

1058. I.e., made it unable to walk because of pain.

1059. Dār.

1060. Saʿd al-ʿAshīrah was a confederation within Madhḥij, and Zubayd a section within Madhḥij living a sedentary life in the Wādī Tathlīth. Cf. Caskel, II, 493 and 608.

1061. wa kāna fī-him.

Whenever you saw Abū ʿUmayr, you were looking upon the amniotic bag of foulness and afterbirth.[1062]

So Farwah responded to him:

Some talk has reached me from Abū Thawr;
Of old he used to run among the mules.
God used to hate him before for what there was of foulness and afterbirth.

While the two of them were doing that, ʿIkrimah came to Abyan.[1063]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl—al-Qāsim and Mūsā b. al-Ghuṣn—Ibn Muḥayrīz:[1064] Then ʿIkrimah went out from Mahrah, marching towards the Yemen, until he came to Abyan. With him were many people from Mahrah, Saʿd b. Zayd,[1065] al-Azd, Nājiyah, ʿAbd al-Qays, and Ḥudbān of Banū Mālik b. Kinānah[1066] and ʿAmr b. Jundab from al-ʿAnbar.[1067] [1996]
Then he gathered al-Nakhaʿ after he struck those of them who had retreated, and said to them, "What was your position[1068] in this matter?" At this they told him, "During the jāhiliyyah we were the people of a religion,[1069] not dealing [with people] the way some of the Arabs used to deal with others. All the more so since we have come to a religion whose merit we recognize and which we have come to love."[1070] Whereupon he asked about them, [and found that] the situation was as they said. Their 1062. Or "treachery" (al-ghadr); also in poem immediately following.

1063. A place in the mountains near Aden; also a place on the coast near Aden and a district near ʿAden; cf. *EI*², s.v. "Abyan" (O. Löfgren); Yāqūt, s.v.
1064. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 377 bottom.
1065. Either the tribe of Saʿd b. Zaydmanāt of Tamīm, or Saʿd Hudhaym b. Zayd.
1066. Ḥudbān b. Jadhīmah was part of Mālik b. Kinānah; cf. Caskel, I, Table 47, II, 327.
1067. ʿAmr b. Jundab was a branch of Banū ʿAnbar of ʿAmr b. Tamīm; cf. Caskel I, Table 81, II, 173.
1068. Lit., "how were you . . . ?"
1069. dīn; presumably meaning here a revealed religion such as Christianity, not pre-Islamic Arabian polytheism.
1070. Fa-kayfa binā idhā ṣirnā ilā dīnin ʿarafnā faḍlahu.

common people stood fast [in the faith], and those of their notables who had withdrawn fled. ('Ikrimah) purged[1071] al-Nakha' and Ḥimyar and remained so they could gather 'round him. When 'Ikrimah descended upon the Yemen, Qays b. 'Abd Yaghūth fled to 'Amr b. Ma'dīkarib; but after he had joined him, a dispute broke out between them and they found fault with one another. Then 'Amr b. Ma'dīkarib said, reproaching Qays for his treachery toward the Abnā' and his killing of Dādhawayh, and mentioning his flight from Fayrūz:

You acted treacherously and did not do well in faithfulness; no one can endure [such] deeds except the one who is accustomed.
How could Qays exalt himself
if he were to compete with a [truly] noble leader?

And Qays said:

I was faithful to my tribe and, preparing for action, I gathered [to meet] a company that struck 'Amr and Marthad despite the tribes.
When I met the Abnā', I was to them like a lion who aspires to lionhood through might.

And 'Amr B. Ma'dīkarib said:

Dādhaway[h] is not [a source of] glory for you;
rather, Dādhaway[h] disgraced what must be protected.
And Fayrūz by morning spread affliction among you and remained in your groups and sought refuge.

[1997] The Story of Ṭāhir When He Marched to Reinforce Fayrūz

Abū Ja'far al-Ṭabarī said: Abū Bakr had written to Ṭāhir b. Abī Hālah and to Masrūq to go down to Ṣan'ā' and to assist the Abnā'; so the two of them went out until they came to Ṣan'ā'. and he wrote [also] to 'Abdallāh b. Thawr b. Aṣghar[1072] to gather to himself the Arabs and those people of the Tihāmah who responded to him, and then to remain in his place until his command should reach him. Now[1073] [the story of] the first apostasy of ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib was that he had been with Khālid b. Saʿīd, but he clashed with him and responded [favorably] to al-Aswad. So Khālid b. Saʿīd marched against him until he encountered him; then they exchanged two blows. Khālid struck [ʿAmr] on his shoulder, severing the harness for his sword, which fell, and the blow reached his shoulder. ʿAmr struck [Khālid], but did not produce any effect. Then when Khālid wished to [strike him] a second time, [Amr] dismounted and climbed up into the mountains [in flight]. [Khālid] plundered him of his horse and his sword, "The Persistent"; ʿAmr took refuge among those to whom he fled.

1071. Istabra'a.
1072. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2136: of Ghawth (Ṭayyi').

Now the estate of the family of Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ the Elder became the property of Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ the Younger;[1074] then, after [Saʿīd the Younger] was appointed [to govern] al-Kūfah, ʿAmr [b. Maʿdīkarib] offered him his daughter [in marriage], but he did not accept her. [Saʿīd] came to [ʿAmr] in his house, bringing a number of swords that Khālid had taken in the Yemen. Whereupon [Saʿīd] said, "Which of them is 'The Persistent'?" [ʿAmr] said, "This one." [So] he said [to ʿAmr], "Take it, it is yours." So he took it. Then he saddled a mule of his and struck the pad [with the sword], severing it and the saddle, and making the mule hurry. Then he returned it to Saʿīd, saying, "If you had visited me in my house and it was mine, I would have given it to you. But I cannot accept it since it fell."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Mustanīr b. Yazīd— [1998]
ʿUrwah b. Ghaziyyah and Mūsā—Abū Zurʿah al-Shaybānī:[1075] When al-Muhājir b. Abī Umayyah left Abū Bakr—he was among the last who left—he took the Mecca road. So he passed by it, whereupon Khālid b. Asīd followed him; and he passed by al-

1073. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 377.

1074. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ the Younger, of the Umayyah clan of Quraysh, was grandson of Saʿīd the Elder; Cf. Caskel, II, 500.

1075. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, II, 377–78. Text, following Mss, has "al-Saybānī," but cf. p. 34.

Ṭā'if, upon which ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ followed him. Then he continued on until, when he was opposite Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh, he joined him to him[self]; and ʿAbdallāh b. Thawr joined him when he was opposite him. Then he came to the people of Najrān, upon which Farwah b. Musayk joined him. ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib abandoned Qays [b. ʿAbd Yaghūth] and approached in response until he entered upon al-Muhājir without any [pledge of] protection. So al-Muhājir tied him up, and he tied up Qays, and wrote of their situation to Abū Bakr and sent the two of them to him. Then, when al-Muhājir marched from Najrān to the Lahjites[1076] and the cavalry gathered against those fugitive soldiers, they demanded protection. But he refused to give them security, whereupon they separated into two groups. So al-Muhājir encountered one of [the two groups] at ʿAjīb,[1077] destroying them. His cavalry found the other on the "road of the wicked ones," destroying them and the cavalry of ʿAbdallāh. He killed the scattered remnants on every byway.

Then Qays and ʿAmr were brought before Abū Bakr; so he said, "Oh Qays, did you wage aggression against the servants of God, killing them and adopting as followers the apostates and polytheists, to the exclusion of the believers?" Now he intended [1999] to kill him if he found a clear case. Qays denied that he was in any way involved in the affair of Dādhawayh, for that deed had been done in secret, of which there was no evidence. So [Abū Bakr] shrank from [taking] his blood. To ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib [Abū Bakr] said, "Aren't you ashamed that you are every day defeated or captive? If you had aided this religion, God would have exalted you." Then he released him, and returned the two of them to their tribes. ʿAmr said, "There is no avoiding it; verily I shall consent [to embrace Islam], and not recant."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Mustanīr and Mūsā: Al-Muhājir marched from ʿAjīb until he descended upon Ṣanʿā'. He commanded that the scattered [men] of the tribes who had 1076. Al-Lahjiyyah. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 150, wished to read this as "al-Rāfiḍah." Lahj is a town in southwestern Arabia, ca. 25 km northwest of Aden, and surrounding district. Cf. EI^{2}, s.v. "Lahdj" [G. R. Smith].

1077. Yāqūt, doubtless basing his remark on this account, describes it only as "a place in Yemen."

fled should be pursued, so they killed those of them they could by every means. He did not pardon [any] rebel; [but] he accepted the penance of those who repented without rebellion. They did that to the extent that they saw [justification in] the actions [of the repenting people], and [to the extent that] they held some hope [of finding] them. He wrote to Abū Bakr about his entry into Ṣanʿāʾ and about the consequences of that.

The Account of Ḥaḍramawt during Their Apostasy

According to Abū Jaʿfar—al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—al-Ṣalt—Kathīr b. al-Ṣalt:[1078] [When] the Apostle of God died, his governors over the country of Ḥaḍramawt [were] Ziyād b. Labīd al-Bayāḍī over Ḥaḍramawt, ʿUkkāshah b. Thawr[1079] over the Sakāsik and Sakūn, and al-Muhājir over Kindah. [Al-Muhājir] was [still] in Medina; he did not go out until [after] the Apostle of God died; so Abū Bakr sent him afterward to fight those in the Yemen, and to continue on afterward to his governorship (ʿamal). [2000]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū al-Sāʾib ʿAṭāʾ b. Fulān al-Makhzūmī—his father—Umm Salamah and al-Muhājir b. Abī Umayyah:[1080] [Al-Muhājir] had held back from [the raid on] Tabūk, so the Apostle of God returned angry with him. While Umm Salamah[1081] was washing the head of the Apostle of God, she said, "How can I enjoy anything[1082] while you are angry with my brother?" Then she noticed some pity on his part, so she nodded to her manservant; then she left him, and he remained with the Apostle of God seeking[1083] [al-Muhājir's] forgiveness until he forgave him and became pleased with him and appointed

1078. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 378.

1079. Text has ʿUkkāshah b. Miḥṣan, but this seems an error; cf. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 150 and pp. 19–20, above. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 378, has ʿUkkāshah b. Abī Umayyah, presumably a conflation with the name of al-Muhājir [b. Abī Umayyah] on the next line.

1080. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 378.

1081. One of the Prophet's wives, sister of al-Muhājir. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 588.

1082. Lit., "How can anything profit me?" Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil: "How can life profit me?"

1083. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil: mentioning.

him over Kindah. Subsequently (al-Muhājir) fell ill and was unable to go out [to his governorship], so (the Apostle) wrote to Ziyād to occupy his governorship for him. (Al-Muhājir) became well afterward; then Abū Bakr confirmed his command and ordered him to fight whoever was between Najrān and the farthest [corner] of the Yemen. For that reason, Ziyād and ʿUkkāshah were slow to fight the Kindah, as they were waiting for him.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad:[1084] The cause of the apostasy of Kindah and[1085] their responding [favorably] to al-Aswad al-ʿAnsī, so that the Apostle of God cursed the four kings,[1086] was [as follows]: When they had embraced Islām before their apostasy and all the people of the Ḥaḍramawt country had embraced Islām, the Apostle of God, among what was being imposed by way of ṣadaqah taxes, had ordered that the ṣadaqah tax of part of Ḥaḍramawt be assigned among the Kindah, and he assigned the ṣadaqah tax of the Kindah among part of the Ḥaḍramawt; [likewise he assigned] part of the [tax of] Ḥaḍramawt among the Sakūn, and [the tax of] the Sakūn among part of the Ḥaḍramawt. Then some people of Banū Walīʿah[1087] said, "Oh Apostle of God, we are not possessors of camels; do you think (Ḥaḍramawt) would send (the tax) to us on pack camels?" So he asked [Ḥaḍramawt] what they thought was proper.[1088] They said, "We [2001] shall look [into it], and if they really have no camels we shall do it." Now after the Apostle of God had died and that time came,[1089] Ziyād summoned the people to [fulfill] that. So they gathered to him, whereupon Banū Walīʿah said [to Ḥaḍramawt], "Pay us [the camels] as you promised the Apostle of God!" But they (Ḥaḍramawt) said, "You have pack camels, so go on!"[1090]

1084. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 378–79.

1085. Reading with Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, and Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 150.

1086. On the "four kings" of Kindah, cf. p. 180, below.

1087. A clan of Kindah, according to Ibn Manẓūr, VIII, 411 and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil.

1088. The text is awkward. Lit., "So he said, 'If you think proper.'"

1089. Presumably the time when the payment of tax was due. Wa jāʾa dhālika al-ibbān.

1090. I.e., "so go get it yourselves."

At this (Banū Walīʿah) became angry and quarreled with them, to the point that they quarreled with Ziyād [also], saying to him, "You are [siding] with them, against us." Subsequently the Ḥaḍramīs refused [to send any ṣadaqah] while the Kindīs insisted, so they returned to their homes and bided their time. Ziyād kept aloof from (the Ḥaḍramīs), waiting for al-Muhājir. When al-Muhājir reached Ṣanʿā' and wrote to Abū Bakr about everything that he had done, he remained [there] until the reply to his letter came from Abū Bakr. Abū Bakr wrote to him and to ʿIkrima that they should march until they reached Ḥaḍramawt, and confirm Ziyād over his governorship, and permit those who were with them from [the country] between Mecca and the Yemen to return home, unless a group preferred jihād, [in which case] he would reinforce him with ʿUbaydah b. Saʿd. So he did [that]. Then al-Muhājir marched from Ṣanʿā' heading for Ḥaḍramawt, and ʿIkrimah marched from Abyan heading for Ḥaḍramawt; so the two of them met at Maʾrib. Then they entered the desert from Ṣayhad[1091] until they fell upon Ḥaḍramawt, one of them staying with al-Ashʿath[1092] and the other with Wā'il.[1093]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—his father—Kathīr b. al-Ṣalt:[1094] When the Kindīs returned [to their homes] and became obstinate and the Ḥaḍramīs became obstinate, Ziyād b. Labīd administered the ṣadaqah taxes of Banū ʿAmr b. Muʿāwiyah himself, approaching them while they were in al-Riyāḍ[1095] and collecting the ṣadaqah tax from the first of them whom he reached, a youth called Shayṭān b. Ḥujr. He admired one of the young she-camels of the ṣadaqah tax and called for fire and put the branding iron to her. Now the she- [2002] camel belonged to the brother of al-Shayṭān, al-ʿAddā' b. Ḥujr,

---

1091. Text has Ṣahīd, manuscripts have other variants. Cf. note 143, above.

1092. Text has "al-Aswad"; cf. Emendanda.

1093. Perhaps Wā'īl b. Ḥujr al-Ḥaḍramī, said by Ibn al-Athīr to have been appointed by the Prophet over the chiefs (aqyāl) of Ḥaḍramawt; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 81–82.

1094. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 379–81 (through, p. 185, below); Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 100; Balansī, 161–62.

1095. Or "the meadows." Cf. p. 156, above, on Riyāḍ al-Rawḍah.

who owed no ṣadaqah tax; but his brother had made a mistake when he gave her out [in payment], thinking that she was another [camel]. So al-ʿAddā' said, "This is Nugget," [calling the camel] by her name. At this al-Shayṭān said, "My brother is right; I only gave her to you because I thought she was another. So release Nugget and take another, for she is not one to be relinquished." But Ziyād thought that that was [merely] a pretext of his, and accused him of unbelief and of being estranged from Islām and of intending evil; so he grew hot [with anger], and the two men did also. So Ziyād said, "No, she will not be given up. She is not yours; the branding-iron of the ṣadaqah has fallen upon her and she has become God's property.[1096] There is no way to return her, so may Nugget not weigh upon you like al-Basūs."[1097] At this al-ʿAddā' called out, "Oh family of ʿAmr in al-Riyāḍ! I am being wronged and oppressed! Contemptible is whoever is destroyed in his own abode!" He called out, "Oh Abū al-Sumayṭ!" So Abū al-Sumayṭ Ḥārithah b. Surāqah b. Maʿdīkarib[1098] approached and headed for Ziyād b. Labīd while he was standing [there], and said to him, "Let this youth have his she-camel, and take a [different] camel in her place, for it is only a camel instead of [another] camel." But [Ziyād] said, "There is no way to [do] that." At this [Abū al-Sumayṭ] replied, "That [would be so only] if you were a Jew"; and he turned to her and released her tether. Then he struck her on the side, sending her off.[1099] He stood up near her while saying:

She is protected by an old man with white hair on his cheeks, mottled as the robe is mottled.

So Ziyād ordered some youths of Ḥaḍramawt and al-Sakūn on [2003] him; they roughed him up and trampled him and handcuffed him and his companions and took them hostage, and they seized

---

1096. ḥaqq Allāh.

1097. Fa-lā takūnanna Shadharatun ʿalaykum ka-l-basūs. Probably a reference to the she-camel of al-Basūs bt. Munqidh, the killing [or wounding] of which precipated a bitter feud between the tribes of Bakr and Taghlib, according to legend. This she-camel became proverbial for something unlucky (ash'amu min nāqat al-Basūs). Cf. *EI*², s.v. "Al-Basūs" [J. W. Fück]; Ibn Manẓūr, VI, 28.

1098. Cf. Balansī, 161–62.

1099. Or perhaps, "making her get up" (fa-baʿatha-hā).

the she-camel and fettered her as she had been. About that Ziyād b. Labīd said:

A whole company of riders could not protect Nugget [from being taken], but the old man may turn it back....[1100]

The people of al-Riyāḍ cried out to one another and called each other. Banū Muʿāwiyah [b. Kindah] became angry on behalf of Ḥārithah and openly showed their attitude. The Sakūn became angry on behalf of Ziyād, as did the Ḥaḍramawt, and they stood together to defend him. There gathered two great armies [drawn] from the former and the latter. Banū Muʿāwiyah did not initiate anything because of the existence of their captives, and [so] the companions of Ziyād did not find any pretext for taking on the Banū Muʿāwiyah. Then Ziyād sent to them: "Either put down [your] weapons or give notice of war." So to this they replied, "We shall never put down [our] weapons, until you have sent our [captive] companions." To this Ziyād said, "They shall never be sent until you disperse in abasement and shame. Oh most wicked of people, are you not inhabitants of Ḥaḍramawt, and protected neighbors[1101] of al-Sakūn? Then what can you be and do in the abode of Ḥaḍramawt and at the side of your masters, [except follow them]?" The Sakūn said to [Ziyād], "Rush the group, for only that will disengage them." So he rushed upon them by night, killing some of them, and they fled in groups, going in every direction. Ziyād quoted, when morning found him in their camp:

I was not a man to start war unjustly, but, when they refused, I was obliging in the War of Ḥāṭib.[1102]

After the group had fled, he let the three people go; and Ziyād returned to his residence in victory. After the captives returned [2004]

1100. The second hemistich reads: wa al-shaykhu qad yathnī-hi urjūb. The final word is unknown; cf. manuscript C, which has arḥūb or urḥūb.

1101. jīrān.

1102. The War of Ḥāṭib was a major clash among the Arab clans of Medina on the eve of Islam, which ended indecisively in the bloody battle of Buʿāth. Cf. Watt, Muḥammad at Medina, 156–58.

to their companions, they chided them so that they incited one another to fight, saying, "This country is not fit for us or for them until it becomes free for one of the two groups." So they gathered and formed an army together, and called for withholding the ṣadaqah tax. But Ziyād left them [alone], and did not go out against them; so that they left off marching against him. He sent al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr[1103] to them, and he kept seeking reconciliation of what divided them from Ziyād, Ḥaḍramawt, and al-Sakūn, until they calmed one another down. This was the second secession; about that al-Sakūnī said:

By my life—and my life is not something taken lightly!—
Banū ʿAmr could draw bitter things from it.
You lied; by the house of God, you do not hold it back from Ziyād after we had come to Ziyād as equals.

They remained a little while after that; then Banū ʿAmr b. Muʿāwiyah especially went out to the reserved places of pasture[1104]—to pastures that they had restricted [from public use]. So Jamad encamped in a reserved pasture, Mikhwaṣ in a reserved pasture, Mishraḥ and Abḍaʿah[1105] in others, and their sister al-ʿAmarradah in a reserved pasture. The Banū ʿAmr b. Muʿāwiyah were under these leaders,[1106] and Banū al-Ḥārith b. Muʿāwiyah encamped in their reserved pastures, such that al-Ashʿath b. Qays encamped in a reserved pasture, and al-Simṭ b. al-Aswad[1107] in a pasture. All of [Banū] Muʿāwiyah agreed to withhold the ṣadaqah tax and resolved unanimously to apos-

---

1103. Two individuals bear this name: one, an Anṣārī, participated in the conquest of Tabūk and may have been ʿUmar's governor of al-Urdunn; the other, of Sakūn, was commander of the army sent against Mecca by the Umayyad caliph Yazīd I in the early AD 680s. Cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, s.vv.

1104. Maḥājir (sing. maḥjar). The following three words, ilā ʿaḥmā' ḥamawhā, appear to be a gloss clarifying the meaning of maḥjar in terms of the more familiar word ḥimā, which has the same meaning.

1105. The four kings of Banū Walīʿah/Banū Muʿāwiyah b. Kinda, who embraced Islam and then apostatized. Cf. Caskel, II, 409 (s.v. "Mišraḥ b. Maʿdikarib"); p. 176, above; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 101.

1106. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 380: "They were the four kings, the chiefs of ʿAmr whom the Apostle of God had cursed."

1107. Chief of Kindah; his deeds are confused with those of his son Shuraḥbīl b. al-Simṭ. Cf. Caskel, II, 523; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, s.v.v.

tatize, except for Shuraḥbīl b. al-Simṭ and his son; the two of them stood up among the Banū Muʿāwiyah and said, "By God, this is disgraceful for tribes of free men. [For] noble men, even when [committed] to a doubtful [cause], consider themselves more noble than to change from it to a better one, out of fear of the disgrace [of changing sides]. How, then, [can you countenance] turning back from what is proper and true to [2005] what is false and shameful? Oh God, we do not help our tribe with this! We regret their joining together to this day"—meaning the day of the she-camel and the day of the secession.

Shuraḥbīl b. al-Simṭ and his son, al-Simṭ, went out until they came to Ziyād b. Labīd and joined him. Ibn Ṣāliḥ and Imruʾ al-Qays b. ʿĀbis[1108] [also] went out until they came to Ziyād and said to him, "Attack the enemy by night, for groups of al-Sakāsik have joined them, and a group of al-Sakūn and isolated individuals from Ḥaḍramawt have hurried to them. Perhaps we may deliver to them a blow that will bequeath enmity between us and draw a distinction between us. If you refuse, we fear that the people will drift from us to them, while the enemy are raiding the place of those who have come to you, hoping [to conquer] those who remained [behind]." At this, he said, "Carry out your plan." So[1109] they gathered their troop and came on (the Banū ʿAmr b. Muʿāwiyah) by night in their reserved pastures, finding them sitting around their fires. They knew whom they wanted, so they fell upon the Banū ʿAmr b. Muʿāwiyah from five directions in five groups, for they were the majority of the enemy and the strongest[1110] of them. Thus they struck down Mishraḥ, Mikhwaṣ, Jamad,[1111] Abḍaʿah, and their sister al-ʿAmarradah. The curse [of the Prophet] reached them. They killed many, and those who could do so fled. Banū ʿAmr b. Muʿāwiyah were so weakened that they [never] recovered after it.

1108. Poet of Kindah, said to have come to the Prophet in a delegation of his tribe and to have remained loyal to Medina during the riddah.

1109. Cf. Balansī, 163.

1110. Or, perhaps, "bravest" or "best armed": shawkatu-hum, lit., "their thorn."

1111. Balansī: Jamd.

Ziyād took away the captives and the flocks,[1112] and took a road that brought them to the army of al-Ashʿath and the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Muʿāwiyah. So when they passed by them in it, the womenfolk of Banū ʿAmr b. Muʿāwiyah asked Banū al-Ḥārith for help, and called to him: "Oh Ashʿath! Oh Ashʿath! Your maternal aunts! Your maternal aunts!" At this, Banū al-Ḥārith became stirred up to rescue them. This [was] the third [secession]. Al-Ashʿath said:

I defended Banū ʿAmr after their troop had come with more goats and more prisoners than the day of al-Buḍayḍ.[1113]

[2006] Now al-Ashʿath knew that Ziyād and his army, if they learned of that, would not desist from [attacking] him nor from Banū al-Ḥārith b. Muʿāwiyah and Banū ʿAmr b. Muʿāwiyah; so he gathered to him[self] Banū al-Ḥārith b. Muʿāwiyah and Banū ʿAmr b. Muʿāwiyah and those who obeyed them of al-Sakāsik and small groups[1114] of whatever tribes were around them. Those tribes who were in Ḥaḍramawt became estranged from one another because of this battle. Ziyād's companions stood firm in obedience to Ziyād, and Kindah was unyielding; so after the tribes had become estranged from one another, Ziyād wrote to al-Muhājir and the people[1115] corresponded with him, meeting him with the letter after he had crossed Ṣayhad,[1116] a desert between Maʾrib and Ḥaḍramawt. He left ʿIkrimah in charge of the army and hurried ahead with the fastest troops. Then he marched until he came upon Ziyād, whereupon he rushed upon Kindah, who were led by al-Ashʿath, so that they met in the reserved pasture (maḥjar) of al-Zurqān[1117] and fought in it.

1112. Or "property" (amwāl).

1113. Possibly a watering place in Ṭayyiʾ country in north central Arabia; cf. Yāqūt, s.v.

1114. Khaṣāʾīṣ. This rendering seems more natural to me than that proposed by De Goeje, "[people of] huts"; cf. Glossary, s.v. "Khaṣāʾiṣ."

1115. Or "the army": al-nās.

1116. Mss. B and C have Ṣahbadh and Ṣahyad, respectively, but cf. note 143, above.

1117. Yāqūt's information on al-Zurqān is derived from this account.

Consequently Kindah were defeated and killed. They went out in flight and took refuge in al-Nujayr,[1118] having repaired and fortified it [beforehand]. Al-Muhājir said regarding the day of the reserved pasture of al-Zurqān:

We were at Zurqān when you were dispersed by a sea that drives firewood in its waves.
We slew you in your reserved pasture until you rode off out of fear of us,
To a fortress the easiest [part] of whose [conquest] is capturing the offspring and driving them off at a brisk pace.

Al-Muhājir marched with the people from the reserved pasture of al-Zurqān until he descended upon al-Nujayr, the Kindah having gathered there and fortified themselves in it. With them were those whom they had asked for help from al-Sakāsik and isolated individuals from al-Sakūn and Ḥaḍramawt. Now al-Nujayr is at [the intersection of] three roads; so Ziyād descended upon one of them, and al-Muhājir upon another, and the third was [free] for them to come and go until ʿIkrimah should arrive with the army. Then he settled (ʿIkrimah) upon that [third] road, so that he cut off (Kindah's) supplies and repulsed them. He divided the cavalry among Kindah and ordered them to crush them. Among those whom he sent was Yazīd b. Qanān of Banū Mālik b. Saʿd;[1119] so he killed those who were in the settlements of Banū Hind[1120] as far as Barahūt.[1121] Among those whom he dispatched to the coast were Khālid b. Fulān al-Makhzūmī and Rabīʿah al-Ḥaḍramī; they killed the people of Maḥā and other clans. Kindah learned what had befallen the rest of their people while they were in their fortress, so they said, "Death is better than the situation you find yourselves in [now]; shear your forelocks, so that you are like a people who have given your souls to God—so may He be gracious to you, and [2007]

1118. A famous old fort in Yemen; cf. Hamdānī, 87, 203. Yāqūt, s.v. gives, in a long entry, a summary of the events of this chapter of the riddah, but little additional information on al-Nujayr.

1119. A branch of Zaydmanāt of Tamīm; cf. Caskel, I, Table 75 and II, 394.

1120. A branch of Kindah; cf. Caskel, I, Table 234 and II, 283.

1121. An old well in lower Ḥaḍramawt; cf. Hamdānī, 128, 201.

may you return [from God] with His blessings! Perhaps He will assist you against these tyrants." So they sheared their forelocks and made a pact, agreeing that no one of them would flee leaving another behind. Their poet began to recite rajaz[1122] in the middle of the night from the top of their fortress:

A morning of evil for Banū Qatīrah[1123] and for the commander from Banū al-Mughīrah.[1124]

The Muslims' poet, Ziyād b. Dīnār, took to replying to them:

Do not threaten us and endure the confinement.
We are the cavalry of the child of al-Mughīrah.
In the morning the tribe shall be victorious.

[2008] When it was morning, they went out against the people, killing in the courtyards of al-Nujayr until there were many slain opposite each one of the three roads. On that day, 'Ikrimah began to recite rajaz, saying:

I pierce them while I am in haste,
A piercing that I will repeat[1125] [when] on the way back.

He also said:

My word was spent; indeed it has effect,
And everyone who seeks my protection is protected.

So Kindah was vanquished, they having killed many of them.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad:[1126] After al-Muhājir had finished with the enemy, 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl came as a reinforcement for him. So Ziyād and al-Muhājir said to those who were with them, "Your brethren have arrived as reinforcement for you [only] after you had [completed] the conquest; but let them share in the booty [anyway]." So they did that and allowed 1122. A common form of verse in iambic meter.

---

1123. Qatīrah b. Ḥarithah was a branch of Sakūn/Kindah; cf. Caskel, II, 468. Balansī, 164ff., vocalizes the name "Quṭayrah." However, the rhyme makes it obvious that Qaṭīrah is the correct form.

1124. The clan of Makhzūm (of Quraysh) to which 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl belonged; cf. Caskel, I, Tables 22 and 23; EI[2], s.v. "Makhzūm" (M. Hinds).

1125. Reading with Cairo, instead of "that I confess" in the text.

1126. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 382.

those who joined them to share [the booty], recommending that to each other. They sent the fifths [of booty] and the captives [to Medina]; the heralds marched so that they got there before them. (The heralds) were spreading the news among the tribes and reading to them [news of][1127] the conquest.

According to al-Sarī: Abū Bakr wrote to al-Muhājir with al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah:[1128] "If this letter of mine reaches you before you have achieved victory, then—if you conquer the enemy—kill the fighting men and take the offspring captive if you took them by force, or let them fall under my verdict.[1129] If [on the other hand] you have [already] concluded a treaty with them before (my letter reaches you), then [let it be] on condition that you expel them from their abodes; for I am averse to leaving intact in their homes enemies who have done what they did. Let them know that they had done evil, and let them taste the offensiveness of some of what they did."

According to Abū Jaʿfar:[1130] When the people of al-Nujayr saw [2009] that the Muslims' supplies were not cut off and they ascertained that (the Muslims) would not turn back from them, their souls were filled with fear. They feared being killed, and the leaders feared for themselves. If they held out until al-Mughīrah should arrive, they would have been saved because they had [concluded] a treaty for the third time on condition of being expelled. Al-Ashʿath hurried to go out to ʿIkrimah with an assurance of protection. (Al-Ashʿath) did not trust anyone else. That was because (ʿIkrimah) was married to Asmāʾ bt. al-Nuʿmān b. Abī al-Jawn;[1131] he had become engaged to her while he was in al-

1127. Ms. B adds kitāb, "the letter" or "the book" (about the conquest). Cf. Wellhausen, Skizzen, VI, 150 on bashīr as "heralds."

1128. A felon from al-Ṭāʾif who fled to Medina and attached himself to the Prophet's entourage as bodyguard and military commander; later employed as emissary and governor by the caliphs. Cf. Caskel, II, 419–20.

1129. Ḥukm. I.e., let them surrender unconditionally, so that they fall under my verdict.

1130. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 381.

1131. Emendanda proposes "... al-Nuʿmān b. al-Jawn," but sources vary on the name; Cf. Caskel, II, 451 ("al-Nuʿmān b. ʿAmr b. Muʿāwiya"); cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 396–98; Ibn Saʿd, VIII, 102–5; and p. 190, below. Asmāʾ was a noble Kindite woman whose marriage to the Prophet was never consummated. Subsequently she married both al-Muhājir b. Abī Umayyah and ʿIkrimah b. Abī Jahl.

Janad[1132] awaiting al-Muhājir, so her father presented her to him before they set out. So ʿIkrimah conveyed [al-Ashʿath] to al-Muhājir and asked him to grant him protection for his life and nine people with him, on condition that he should stand as surety for them and their families if they would open the gate for them. So he complied with his [request] in this, and said, "Go away so as to save yourself; then bring me your letter so I may seal it."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū Isḥāq al-Shaybānī—Saʿīd b. Abī Burdah—ʿĀmir:[1133] [Al-Ashʿath] came to him and requested protection for his family, his property, and nine of those whom he wished, on condition that he would open the gate for them so that they could enter in upon his tribe. Whereupon al-Muhājir said to him, "Write down what you want, and be quick about it"; so he wrote his pledge of security and one for them. Among them were his brother and his paternal cousins and their families; but, in [his] haste and perplexity, he forget [to include] himself. Then he brought the letter, whereupon [al-Muhājir] sealed it and went back, letting those [mentioned] in the letter go their way.

According to Al-Aǰlaḥ and al-Mujālid: When the only thing remaining was for [al-Ashʿath] to write himself [into the pledge of security], [someone named] Jaḥdam pounced upon him with a blade and said, "Your life unless you write me [into it!]" So he wrote him [into it] and left himself out.

According to Abū Isḥāq:[1134] After [al-Ashʿath] opened the [2010] gate, the Muslims rushed upon [al-Nujayr], not letting any combatant go, but rather killing them by cutting off their heads while in captivity. One thousand of the women of al-Nujayr and al-Khandaq were counted up, and guards were placed among the captives and booty. Kathīr[1135] agreed with them [in their recounting of events].

According to Kathīr b. al-Ṣalt:[1136] After the gate had been 1132. Or: "with the army." Cf. p. 190, below.

1133. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 381.
1134. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 381.
1135. See following sanad.
1136. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 381–82.

opened and whoever was in al-Nujayr had been finished off and after what God had bestowed on [the Muslims] as booty had been calculated, [al-Muhājir] summoned al-Ashʿath with those persons [he had mentioned], and called for his document. Then he reviewed them and pardoned those who were [mentioned] in the document;[1137] but lo, al-Ashʿath was not [named] in it. At this al-Muhājir said, "Praise be to God, who made your star to miss,[1138] oh Ashʿath, oh enemy of God! I had been wishing that God would abase you." Then he bound him in ropes and intended to kill him. But ʿIkrimah said to him, "Grant him a postponement and send him to Abū Bakr, for he is more knowledgeable about judging [cases such as] this. If a man forgot to write his [own] name but was promised good treatment by word of mouth,[1139] does [the oversight] nullify [the promise]?" To this al-Muhājir replied, "His case is perfectly clear, but I will follow [your] advice and show it preference."[1140] He granted him a postponement and sent him to Abū Bakr along with the captives. So he was with them, the Muslims and the captives from his tribe [alike] cursing him. A woman of his tribe called him "favor of fire,"[1141] a Yemenite phrase by which they call a traitor. Now al-Mughīrah was perplexed one night because that was God's will. So he came with the enemy [still stained] with blood and the captives, on camels. The captives and prisoners marched and the group reached Abū Bakr with [news of] the conquest and with the captives and prisoners. Then [Abū Bakr] called for al-Ashʿath, whereupon he said,[1142] "Banū Walīʿah led you astray; you would not lead them astray, [for] they do not think enough of you [to do] that. [So] they were destroyed and destroyed you. Aren't you afraid [to rebel, seeing] that something of the [2011] message of the Apostle of God had reached you? What do you 1137. Lit., "he declared them legal" (ajāza).

1138. I.e., who brought you bad luck.

1139. Lit., "he was the friend of conversation."

1140. Reading, with the text, u'thiru-hā rather than the Emendanda's u'thiru-hu.

1141. ʿUrf al-nār.

1142. The text of Abū Bakr's comment is problematic, and the Cairo and Leiden editions offer slightly different readings, neither of which is entirely lucid.

think I should do with you? He replied, "I have no idea what you are thinking; you know best what you think." (Abū Bakr) said, "I think you should be killed." (Al-Ashʿath) replied, "I am the one who persuaded the adversary[1143] [to spare] ten [people], so that my blood should not be licit." (Abū Bakr) said, "Did they empower you [to do so]?" He replied, "Yes." (Abū Bakr) said, "Then you brought them what had been entrusted to you, whereupon they placed [their] seal upon it?" He replied, "Yes." (Abū Bakr) said, "Peace is required after sealing of a document only for those [named] in the document; before that, you were only a negotiator." Then, when he feared that (Abū Bakr) would fall upon him, (al-Ashʿath) said, "And do you reckon there to be some good in me? Then release me and forgive my misbehavior, accept my Islām and do with me as you have done with others like me, and return my wife to me"—he had been engaged to Umm Farwah bt. Abī Quhāfah[1144] when he [first] came to the Apostle of God, whereupon (Abū Bakr) had married him [to her], but withheld her [from him] until he should come a second time; then the Apostle of God had died and al-Ashʿath had done what he did, so he feared that she would not be returned to him—"[should you do these things], you will find me the best of the people of my land in the religion of God." So (Abū Bakr) spared him[1145] and accepted [this] from him. He returned his wife to him, and said, "Go, and let me hear [only] good about you," and let the people alone so that they went away. Abū Bakr divided the fifth [of booty] among the people, and the army distributed the four-fifths [among themselves].

Abū Jaʿfar said: According to Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq—ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr: After al-Ashʿath was brought before Abū Bakr, he said, "What do you think I should do to [2012] you? For you know what you have done." He replied, "You should be gracious to me and release me from the irons and marry your sister to me, for I have come back and embraced Islām." So Abū Bakr said, "Done," and married him to Umm 1143. Qawm; here, referring to the Muslims.

1144. Abū Bakr's sister; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 208.
1145. Lit., "relinquished to him [claim to] his blood."

Farwah bt. Abī Quḥāfah. (Al-Ash'ath) was in Medina until the conquest of Iraq.

Continuation of the Report of Sayf

When[1146] 'Umar acceded [to the caliphate], he said, "It is disgraceful that one of the Arabs should own another, God having enriched [us] and conquered the non-Arabs." He consulted about ransoming the captives of the Arabs from the jāhiliyyah and Islam (except for the woman who had borne a child to her master), and made the ransom of each person seven camels and six camels,[1147] except for Ḥanīfah and Kindah, on whom he lightened [the ransom] because of the slaughter of their men, and [except for] those who were not able [to pay] the ransom because of their great number,[1148] and the people of Dabā. So their men searched for their womenfolk in every place.[1149] Then al-Ash'ath found two women among the Banū Nahd[1150] and the Banū Ghuṭayf.[1151] [The story of] that was that he stopped among them, asking after "Raven" and "Eagle," so he was told, "What do you intend with that?" He replied, "At the battle of al-Nujayr, the eagles and ravens and wolves[1152] and dogs snatched away our women." Whereupon Banū Ghuṭayf said, "This is 'Raven.'" He asked, "What is his position among you?" They replied, "Under protection."[1153] He said, "Good, then," and departed. 'Umar said, "No one shall be master of an Arab,"[1154] because of that which he and the Muslims agreed upon.

1146. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 382.

1147. I.e., six or seven camels per captive. Kos has "six young camels"; lacking in B.

1148. Reading, with Emendanda, li-fi'āmihim for the text's li-qiyāmihim.

1149. Although the word sabāyā ("captives") can apply to captives of either gender, the passage implies that the majority of captives were women.

1150. Nahd b. Zayd was a Quḍā'ah tribe with branches in Syria and Yemen. Cf. Caskel, II, 443.

1151. Ghuṭayf b. 'Abdallāh was a prominent clan of Murād. Cf. Caskel, II, 275.

1152. Manuscript C: flies.

1153. Fī al-ṣiyānah, lit., "in keeping."

1154. Lā mulka 'alā 'arabiyyin; here the word 'arab seems to mean not "nomad," but rather something like "speaker of Arabic."

They[1155] said: Al-Muhājir looked into the case of the woman whose father, al-Nuʿmān b. al-Jawn, had offered her to the Apostle of God, whereupon he described her as having never been ill.[1156] But (the Prophet) returned her, saying, "We have no
[2013] need of her," after he had seated her in front of him; he said, "If she had any merit with God, she would have become ill." Then al-Muhājir said to ʿIkrimah, "When did you marry her?" He said, "While I was in Aden; she was given to me in al-Janad,[1157] whereupon I traveled with her to Maʾrib. Then I brought her to the army,[1158] whereupon some of them said, "Leave her! For she is not fit to be desired." Others said, "Don't leave her!" So al-Muhājir wrote to Abū Bakr asking him about that, whereupon Abū Bakr wrote back to him, "Her father, al-Nuʿmān b. al-Jawn, came to the Apostle of God, having beautified her for him, so that (the Apostle) ordered him to bring her to him. After he had brought her to him, he said, 'I give you in addition [the good news] that she has never suffered pain.'" At this (the Apostle) said, "If she had any merit with God, she would have become ill. He disliked her, so you should dislike her [also]." Then he sent her away.

A number [of women] remained among Quraysh [as captives] after ʿUmar ordered the ransoming of the captives. Among them was Bushrā bt. Qays b. Abī al-Kaysam; she was with Saʿd b. Mālik,[1159] to whom she bore [his son] ʿUmar. [Another] was Zurʿah bt. Mishraḥ, with ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās,[1160] to whom she bore ʿAlī.

Abū Bakr wrote to al-Muhājir, giving him the choice [of the governorship] of the Yemen or Ḥaḍramawt; whereupon he chose the Yemen. So the Yemen was under two commanders, Fayrūz and al-Muhājir. Ḥaḍramawt was [also] under two commanders, ʿUbaydah b. Saʿd over Kindah and al-Sakāsik, and Ziyād b.

1155. I.e., the narrators of the account.

1156. Lit., "she had never complained" [innahā lam tashtaki qaṭṭ]. This is again Asmāʾ bt. al-Nuʿmān, cf. p. 185, above, and note 1131. Note that al-Muhājir is said to have married her after the Prophet and before ʿIkrimah.

1157. Or "with the army (al-jund)." Cf. pp. 185–86, above.

1158. Al-ʿaskar.

1159. I.e., Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ.

1160. Cousin of the Prophet, later famed as Qurʾān commentator.

Labīd over Ḥaḍramawt. Abū Bakr wrote to the governors of the apostasy:[1161] "Now then: The dearest to me of those whom you have brought into your cause are those who did not apostatize. So gather together whoever did not apostatize, then garner [2014] recruits[1162] from them; but grant leave to whoever [of them] wishes to depart.[1163] Do not ask aid of a [former] apostate in fighting against an enemy."

Al-Ashʿath b. Miʾnās al-Sakūnī, lamenting the people of al-Nujayr, said:[1164]

By my life—and my life has not been easy to me—
I was really niggardly concerning the slain.
No wonder, except the day lots were cast among them;
after them, fate is not secure for me.
Would that the flanks of the people were under their flanks;
after them, no female walked with an embryo.
I am like the she-camel whose young one has died who, when frightened, came up to her dummy calf[1165] as she cried out in yearning for her young one.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Mūsā b. ʿUqbah—al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Khalīfah: There arrived before al-Muhājir two singing women. One of them sang reviling the Apostle of God, so he cut off her hand and pulled her front tooth. Then Abū Bakr wrote to him: "I have learned what you did regarding the woman who sang and piped with abuse of the Apostle of God. If you had not beaten me to (punishing her), I would have ordered you to kill her, for the punishment [for abuse] of prophets is not like [other] punishments. So whoever does [something like] that among [2015] those claiming to be Muslims is [actually] an apostate; or among 1161. That is, to the governors (ʿummāl) placed over tribes, some of whom had apostasized.

1162. Ṣanāʾiʿ, lit., "protegés."

1163. I.e., those who do not wish to join the army should not be required to do so.

1164. Cf. Wathīmah, 29/72, which has the same first half-line but is different thereafter.

1165. Baww, the skin of the deceased young stuffed with grass and made available to soothe the mother.

those claiming to be at peace with the Muslims[1166] is [actually] at war [with them] and a traitor." Abū Bakr wrote to him about the woman who had sung satirizing the Muslims, "Now then: I have learned that you cut off the hand of a woman because she sang satirizing the Muslims, and that you pulled her front tooth. If she was among those who claim [to have embraced] Islam, then [it is] good discipline and a reprimand, and not mutilation.[1167] If she was a dhimmī woman, by my life that which you forgave [by way] of polytheism is greater [than what she was punished for]. If I had [had a chance to] precede you [to punishment] in [a cause] like this, I would have done something loathsome; so undertake to be gentle and beware of mutilation among the people, for [mutilation] is an offense and generates fear [among the people], unless [made] in chastisement [for a crime]."

In this year[1168]—I mean year 11—Muʿādh b. Jabal left the Yemen, and Abū Bakr appointed ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb judge. He was in charge of judgeship for the entire time of [Abū Bakr's] caliphate.

In [this year][1169] Abū Bakr put ʿAttāb b. Asīd in charge of the pilgrimage ceremonies, according to those upon whom ʿAlī b. Muḥammad based his account, whose names I mentioned beforehand in this book of mine.[1170] [But] according to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad: [Another] group said no, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf led the people on pilgrimage in the year 11, upon Abū Bakr's ordering him to do that.

1166. Muʿāhid, a non-Muslim who has concluded a pact (ʿahd) with the Muslims recognizing their superiority and agreeing to pay tribute. The discussion here uses the vocabulary of, and betrays the influence of, second and third century AH classical Islamic jurisprudence.

1167. The terms involved are adab, taqdimah, and muthlah.

1168. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 383; Caetani, 685.

1169. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 383.

1170. Cf. p. 38, above, for full isnād of ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī.

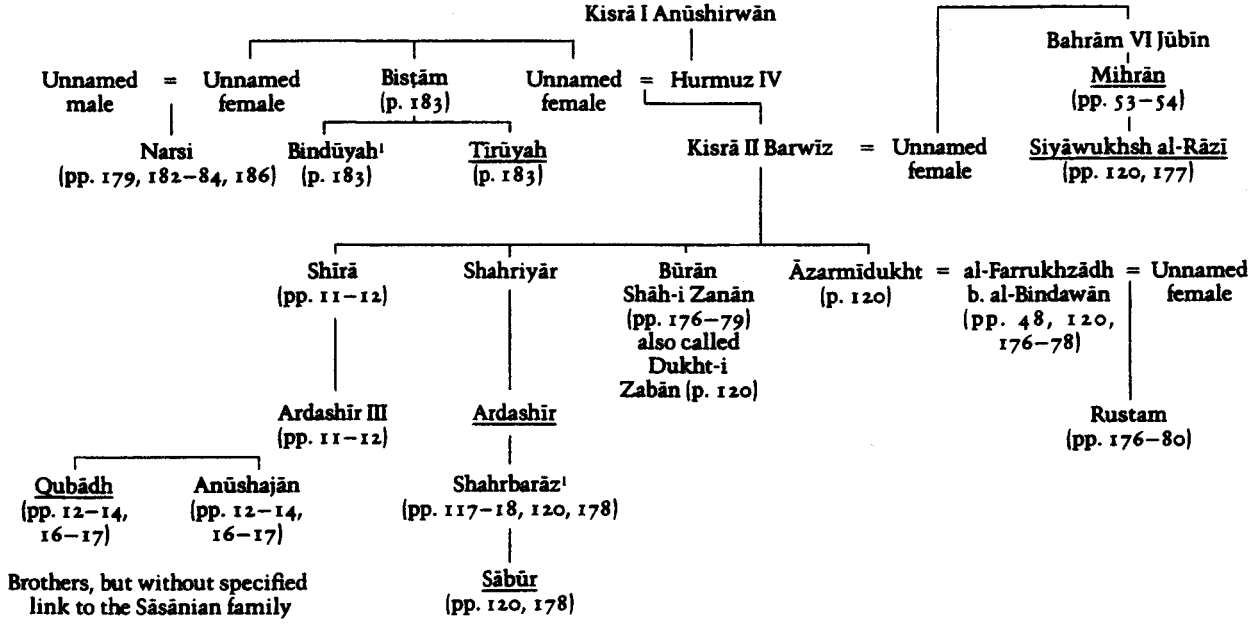
The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XI



The Challenge to the Empires

TRANSLATED BY KHALID YAHYA BLANKINSHIP

Genealogical Table of the Later Sāsānians as Represented by Sayf b. ʿUmar (Names mentioned only in Sayf's transmissions and apparently invented by him are underscored).

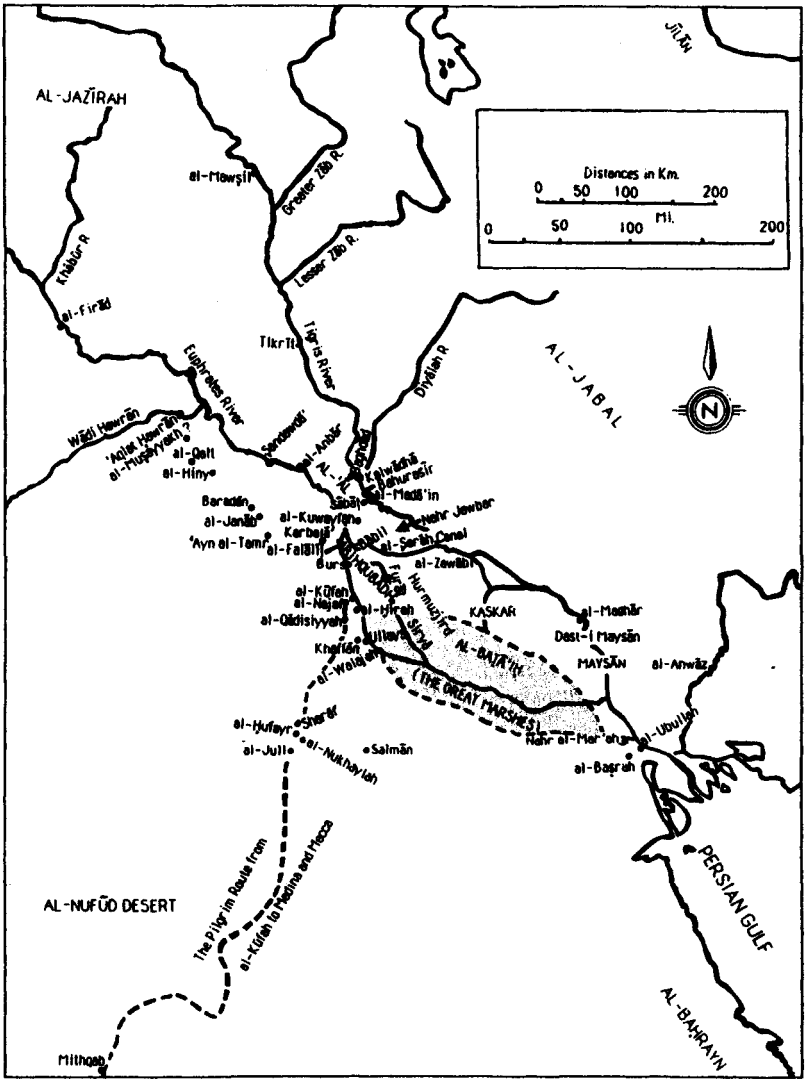
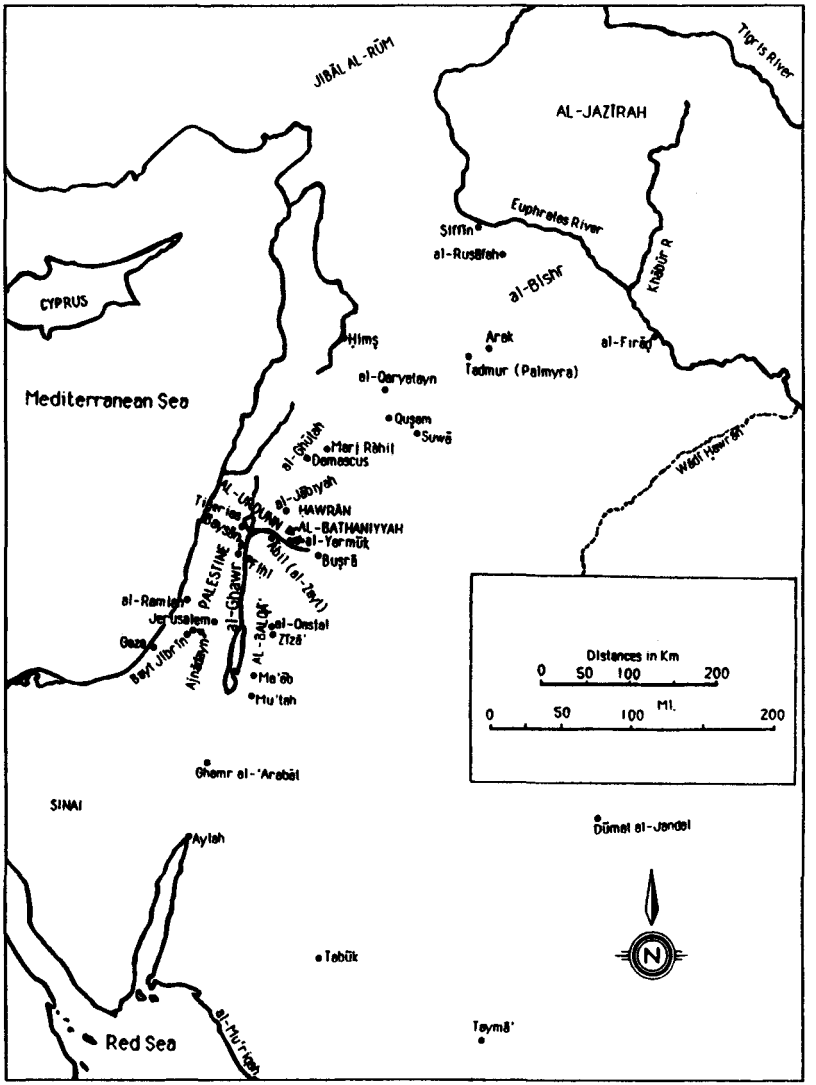
[1]Falsely located in the genealogy



Genealogical Table of the Later Sāsānians as Attested in Sources Other than Sayf b. ʿUmar

(Names are given in Arabic form; all dates are C.E.)



1. A Christian from Khūzistān.
2. The marriage of Kisrā II to this daughter o the Byzantine emperor Maurice is generall believed to be legendary.
3. This group is said to be of royal descent, bu no link with the dynasty is found save i Sayf's accounts (p. 182); Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 100, 114.
4. Of Nahr al-Marʾah.

Sources: Ṭabarī, I, 993–98, 1045–67, 2245, 2253, 2346; II, 1518, 1874; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 318, 325, 418, 560; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, I, 176–98; Christensen, L'Iran, 438–40, 470, 487–96; Frye, History, 335–37, 361; Morony, Iraq, 185–86; CHI, III, 176, 547, 988; Sebeos, History, 21–22.

Map 1. Iraq at the Time of the Muslim Conquest.

Map 2. Syria at the Time of the Muslim Conquest.

The Events of the Year [2016]

12

(March 18, 633–March 6, 634)

Abū Jaʿfar:[1] When Khālid[2] was done with the business of al-Yamāmah,[3] Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq wrote to him while Khālid was still there.

ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿd al-Zuhrī[4] — his uncle[5] — Sayf b. ʿUmar[6] — ʿAmr b. Muḥammad[7] — al-Shaʿbī:[8] [Abū Bakr wrote,] "Go on toward

---

1. That is, Ṭabarī.

2. That is, Khālid b. al-Walīd al-Makhzūmī, the famous conqueror. The actual extent of his role in the conquests of Iraq and Syria described in this volume is in dispute. Patricia Crone, in *EI*², s. v. Khālid b. al-Walīd, is too one-sided, rejecting Khālid's participation in the conquest of Iraq at all. The fact that Khālid is a major hero in the historical traditions of Iraq certainly suggests ties there that can have come only from his early participation in its conquest.

3. The modern region of Najd in Arabia, where Khālid had just defeated the Ḥanafī pseudo-prophet Musaylimah. See Ṭabarī, I, 1929–57.

4. Abū Faḍl al-Baghdādī, 185–260/801–74, a descendant of the famous Companion ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf and twice judge of Iṣfahān. He resided in Sāmarrāʾ. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 15–16. He compiled a book on the conquests of Khālid b. al-Walīd. See Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 107.

5. Abū Yūsuf Yaʿqūb b. Ibrāhīm, d. 208/824. Of Medinan origin, he was a transmitter and historian at Baghdad. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 15; XI, 380–81.

6. Al-Usayyidī, d. between 170/786 and 193/809, the famous Kūfan-Baghdādī transmitter of sagas of the conquests whose reports have often been impugned. See Wellhausen, Prolegomena, 3–7; Sezgin, GAS, I, 311–12; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 295–96; Dhahabī, Mīzān, II, 255–56; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, Jarḥ wa taʿdīl, IV, 278; Ibn Ḥibbān, Majrūḥīn, I, 345–46; Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 106; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVI, 66.

7. One of Sayf's numerous informants who otherwise are unknown and untraceable and hence possibly invented. This ʿAmr often is named as the mediator of reports that Sayf attributes to al-Shaʿbī.

8. Abū ʿAmr ʿĀmir b. Sharāḥīl al-Ḥimyarī, d. between 103/722 and 109/727, the famous Kūfan traditionist. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 246–56; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, Iraq until you enter it. Begin with the gateway to India, which is al-Ubullah.[9] Render the people of Persia (Fārs)[10] and those nations under their rule peaceable."

ʿUmar b. Shabbah[11]—ʿAlī b. Muhammad,[12] by the chain of transmitters previously mentioned—those I recorded in that chain: Abū Bakr sent Khālid b. al-Walīd to the territory of al-Kūfah, in which was al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah al-Shaybānī.[13] Khālid departed in al-Muḥarram 12 (18 March–16 April 633), going by way of al-Baṣrah, where Quṭbah b. Qatādah al-Sadūsī[14] was.

Abū Jaʿfar—al-Wāqidī:[15] There is a difference of opinion about the matter of Khālid b. al-Walīd. One view holds that he went straight from al-Yamāmah to Iraq, whereas another states that he returned from al-Yamāmah to Medina and then went to Iraq from Medina, going by way of al-Kūfah until he reached al-Ḥīrah.[16]

V, 65–69. For an analysis of his tendencies, see Petersen, ʿAlī and Muʿāwiya, 28–31, 33–34, 37–44, and passim.

9. Ancient Apologos, on the site of present-day Iraqi al-Baṣrah, a few miles up the Shaṭṭ al-ʿArab from the Persian Gulf. Its position as the chief port of Iraq probably earned it the title "the gateway to India." See Ṭabarī, I, 2377; EI[1], s.v. al-Obolla; Le Strange, Lands, 47; Donner, Conquests, 329 n. 66. Donner notes that it is unlikely that Khālid b. al-Walīd had anything to do with the conquest of al-Ubullah, which was actually accomplished by ʿUtbah b. Ghazwān somewhat later. However, Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 100–1, records Khālid's campaign in the vicinity of al-Baṣrah independently of Sayf, which suggests that Khālid at least may have led a raid there although ʿUtbah actually reduced the area. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 418–22, mentions Khālid's prior presence in the vicinity of al-Baṣrah but gives the major role in its conquest to ʿUtbah.

10. Although this word often refers to the mountainous province of southwestern Iran centered around Shīrāz, which was the homeland of the Sāsānian dynasty, its meaning here and elsewhere appears to encompass the whole Sāsānian kingdom. In such cases I have used its English cognate Persia to translate.

11. Abū Zayd, the mawlā of the Banū Numayr, c. 172–262/788–876, well-known historian and traditionist from al-Baṣrah. See Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 125; Sezgin, GAS, I, 345–46.

12. Al-Madāʾinī, d. between 215/830 and 230/845. See EI[2], s.v. al-Madāʾinī.

13. The famous tribal leader from northeastern Arabia, d. 14/635 or later. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 147; II, 438; Donner, Conquests, 181–83, 189–95, 197–200, 202–3, 377–78, 380–81.

14. He is sometimes called Suwayd b. Quṭbah b. Qatādah. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 75–76; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 100–1, 114; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 295; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 90; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, III, 257; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 237–38; Donner, Conquests, 181, 330 n. 71, 411.

15. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar, d. 207/823. See EI[1], s.v. al-Wāḳidī; Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 111.

16. Important town on the west bank of the Euphrates, capital of the defunct Lakhmid kingdom. See EI[2], s.v. al-Ḥīra; Musil, Middle Euphrates, 102–3, esp. n. 57.

Ibn Ḥumayd[17]—Salamah[18]—Ibn Isḥāq[19]—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān:[20] Abū Bakr wrote to Khālid b. al-Walīd, ordering him to go to Iraq. Khālid went on his way toward Iraq, until he stopped at certain towns [2017] in al-Sawād[21] called Bāniqyā,[22] Bārūsmā,[23] and Ullays.[24] Their people made peace with him. The man who made peace with him on their behalf was Ibn Ṣalūbā.[25] That took place in the year 12. Khālid accepted the jizyah[26] from them and wrote a document for them, which read:

> In the name of God, the All-Compassionate, the Merciful. From Khālid b. al-Walīd to Ibn Ṣalūbā al-Sawādī, whose residence is on the bank of the Euphrates:[27] You are safe by the guarantee of God (for he had spared his blood by paying the jizyah) and you have paid one thousand dirhams for yourself and for those having to pay the land tax and head tax[28] and those who are in your two towns, Bāniqyā and Bārūsmā. I have accepted it from you, and those of the Muslims who are with me are satisfied with this amount from you. You have the solemn guarantee (dhimmah) of God, the guarantee of 17. Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd, d. 248/862, a traditionist of al-Rayy. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 127–31.

18. Ibn al-Faḍl, d. 191/807, traditionist, historian of maghāzī, and judge of al-Rayy. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 153–54.

19. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, d. 151/768, the famous historian and biographer of the Prophet. See *EI*², s.v. Ibn Isḥāḳ.

20. Medinan traditionist, d. 141/758. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 399–401.

21. The alluvial plain of Iraq, especially central Iraq. See *EI*¹, s.v. al-Sawād; Morony, Iraq, 121, 127 map.

22. Aramaic Beth Neqya, north of al-Ḥillah. See Morony, Iraq, 148–49, 177 n. 48.

23. Aramaic Beth Rushme, north of al-Ḥillah, though Morony places it between the two branches of the Euphrates; Le Strange has it east of the eastern branch. See Morony, Iraq, 147–48, 177 n. 48; Le Strange, Lands, 70, 81, map II. Donner, Conquests, 334 n. 127, expresses doubts about its exact location.

24. If this town was near the other two just named, it must have been north of al-Ḥillah in the district called Bihqubādh (Veh-Kavat); otherwise it was south of al-Ḥīrah. It has been considered the ancient Vologesias. See Morony, Iraq, 127 (map), 152; Donner, Conquests, 329 n. 66. Musil, Middle Euphrates, 288, 293, places it firmly about 35 km. southeast of al-Ḥīrah on the west bank of the Euphrates at the present town of al-Shāṭi'.

25. Buṣbuhrā b. Ṣalūbā, the Aramaean Christian dihqān of the districts. See Morony, Iraq, 148–49, 173–74. Called Ibn Ṣalūtā in Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 101.

26. Tax paid by non-Muslims to the Muslims to guarantee the peace. See *EI*², s.v. Djizya.

27. See *EI*², s.v. al-Furāt.

28. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, CCXVII, DCXI.

Muḥammad, and the guarantee of the Muslims regarding that. Witnessed by Hishām b. al-Walīd.[29]

Then Khālid went on with those in his company until he reached al-Ḥīrah, whose nobles came out to him with Qabīṣah b. Iyās b. Ḥayyah al-Ṭā'ī.[30] Kisrā[31] had made Qabīṣah the governor of al-Ḥīrah after al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir.[32] Khālid said to him and his companions: "I call you to God and to Islam. If you respond to the call, then you are Muslims: You obtain the benefits they enjoy and take up the responsibilities they bear. If you refuse, then [you must pay] the jizyah. If you refuse the jizyah, I will bring against you tribes of people who are more eager for death than you are for life. We will then fight you until God decides between us and you."

[2018] Qabīṣah b. Iyās answered, "We have no need to fight you; rather, we will keep to our religion and pay you the jizyah." Thus he made peace with the Muslims, agreeing to pay ninety thousand dirhams. This was the first jizyah agreed to in Iraq: al-Ḥīrah and the villages for which Ibn Ṣalūbā made the agreement.

Abū Ja'far — Hishām b. al-Kalbī:[33] When Abū Bakr wrote to Khālid b. al-Walīd while the latter was in al-Yamāmah, that he [should] set out for Syria, he also commanded him to begin with Iraq, so that he might pass through it. Khālid then began his journey from al-Yamāmah, going along until he reached al-Nibāj.[34]

Hishām — Abū Mikhnaf[35] — Abū al-Khaṭṭāb Ḥamzah b. 'Alī[36] —

---

29. Khālid's brother. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 323.

30. This appears to be a mistake for Iyās b. Qabīṣah, who ruled 602–11 in succession to al-Nu'mān III as the last prince of the Sāsānian tributary state of al-Ḥīrah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, II, 361; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 101. Conceivably that Iyās could have had a son Qabīṣah who was present here, but that is doubtful in view of the confusion about this personage in the sources. See Donner, Conquests, 329 n. 67.

31. Arabic name of the Sāsānian king Khusraw II Parwīz [590–628 C.E.].

32. Last Lakhmid ruler of al-Ḥīrah, c. 580–602 C.E. See EI[1], s.v. al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir.

33. Ibn Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib, d. 206/821, the great scholar, historian, and genealogist. See EI[2], s.v. al-Kalbī; Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 108ff.

34. Although several possible localities with this name exist, the one meant here is that on the route from al-Baṣrah to al-Yamāmah, deep in the desert. The Bakr and the Tamīm fought over it before Islam, and it was thus in Arab territory, not under Persian control. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 255–56.

35. Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā, d. 157/774, the well-known Kūfan historian. See EI[2], s.v. Abū Mikhnaf.

36. He is further identified as Ḥamzah b. 'Alī b. Muḥaffiz on p. 211, below, but does not seem to be found elsewhere.

a man from the Bakr b. Wā'il:[37] Al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah traveled until he reached Abū Bakr. Al-Muthannā said, "Give me command over those of my people who are nearby, and I will fight those Persians who border me and will cover my district." Abū Bakr acceded to his request. Al-Muthannā then came back, collected his men together, and began to raid the district of Kaskar[38] one time and the lowest Euphrates another time. Khālid b. al-Walīd stopped at al-Nibāj while al-Muthannā was encamped at Khaffān.[39] Khālid b. al-Walīd wrote to al-Muthannā [ordering] that the latter come to him and also sent al-Muthannā a letter from Abū Bakr enjoining him to obey Khālid. At this, al-Muthannā rushed to Khālid by fast horse until he caught up with him. The Banū ʿIjl[40] claim that one of their men named Madhʿūr b. ʿAdī[41] went forth with al-Muthannā. Madhʿūr contended with al-Muthannā [over the command], so that the two of them wrote to Abū Bakr. The latter wrote back to al-ʿIjlī, bidding him to go with Khālid to Syria, while he confirmed al-Muthannā in his command. Al-ʿIjlī reached Egypt, where he enjoyed a noble estate and an important position. His house there is well known today.

Khālid pressed on. Jābān,[42] the governor of Ullays, opposed him. Khālid sent against him al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah, who fought and defeated Jābān, killing most of his troops beside a canal there called [2019]
Blood Canal (nahr dam) because of that battle. Khālid then made peace with the inhabitants of Ullays. [After this] he went on until he neared al-Ḥīrah. The cavalry of Āzādhbih,[43] who was the commander of the Sāsānian cavalry[44] stationed in outposts along the

37. The most important part of the Rabīʿah group of tribes, the Bakr were located in northeastern Arabia. They tended to be more sedentary than their nemesis, the Tamīm. They played a big role in the conquest of Iraq. See *EI*², s.v. Bakr b. Wā'il.

38. A major district east of the Great Swamp between the Euphrates and Tigris. See *EI*², s.v. Kaskar; Le Strange, Lands, 39, 43, 80, map II; Morony, Iraq, 155–59.

39. The modern Qaṣr al-Qā'im, a spring and favorite campground on the edge of the desert west of the Euphrates, 22 km. southeast of al-Qādisiyyah. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 284, and accompanying map of northern Arabia.

40. A Rabīʿah tribe later prominent in al-Kūfah and evidently already found in the vicinity before Islam. See *EI*², s.v. ʿIdjl; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 141; II, 24–26, 353.

41. On him, see Donner, Conquests, 181–82, 330 n. 74, 365, 378, 383, 398.

42. Attested independently as well in Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 108. See also Morony, Iraq, 187.

43. The marzubān of al-Ḥīrah. See Donner, Conquests, 180, 329 n. 67; Morony, Iraq, 187.

44. Lit., "Kisrā's cavalry."

frontier between the Sāsānian domains and the Arabs, came out to fight Khālid. They met the Muslims at the confluence of the rivers. Al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah went against the Iranian cavalry, and God routed them. When the people of al-Ḥīrah saw that, they came out to receive Khālid. Among them were ʿAbd al-Masīḥ b. ʿAmr b. Buqaylah[45] and Hāniʾ b. Qabīṣah.[46]

Khālid asked ʿAbd al-Masīḥ, "From where do you come?" He replied, "From my father's back." Khālid asked, "From where did you come out?" ʿAbd al-Masīḥ answered, "From my mother's womb." Khālid said, "Woe to you! On what are you standing?" He replied, "On the ground." Khālid said, "Woe to you! What are you in?" ʿAbd al-Masīḥ responded, "In my clothes." Khālid said, "Woe to you! Do you comprehend [taʿqil]?" He replied, "Yes, and I register [uqayyid] too."[47] Khālid said, "I only ask you." ʿAbd al-Masīḥ said, "And I answer you." Khālid then asked, "Are you for peace or war?" ʿAbd al-Masīḥ replied, "For peace." Khālid went on, "Then what are these fortresses that I see?" ʿAbd al-Masīḥ answered, "We built them for the foolish, in order to confine him, until the mild-tempered comes to restrain him."[48]

Then Khālid said to them, "I call you to God, to His worship, and to Islam. If you accept, you obtain the benefits we enjoy and take up the responsibilities we bear. If you refuse, then [you must pay] the jizyah. If you refuse the jizyah, then we will bring against you a people who love death more than you love drinking wine." They answered, "We have no need to fight you." He made peace with them on [the payment of] one hundred and ninety thousand dirhams.[49] It

45. Al-Azdī. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 207; II, 126; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 297; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 485; Donner, Conquests, 183, 331 n. 83; Morony, Iraq, 176.

46. Hāniʾ b. Qabīṣah b. Hāniʾ b. Masʿūd al-Shaybānī. Abū ʿUbaydah says he already was an important leader at the time of the Battle of Dhū Qār, but that statement also could refer to his grandfather. See Ṭabarī, I, 1028–29; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 149; II, 279; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 297; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 293–94; Donner, Conquests, 183, 331 n. 84.

47. This contains an untranslatable play on the two words, both of which mean "to bind or tie," in addition to their other meanings.

48. This story appears in a slightly different form in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 297, and also is repeated below, p. 33.

49. Elsewhere the payment of al-Ḥīrah is said to have been eighty, eighty-four, or one hundred thousand dirhams, the latter possibly rounded up from the former figures, which have the authority of Yaḥyā b. Ādam. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 297–98. This report would seem to represent the mathematical sum of two versions giving ninety and one hundred thousand as the amount.

was the first jizyah that was borne to Medina from Iraq.

After this Khālid descended on Bāniqyā. Buṣbuhrā b. Ṣalūbā made peace with him on the payment of one thousand dirhams and a hooded cloak (ṭaylasān). Khālid wrote a document for them.

Khālid made peace with the inhabitants of al-Ḥīrah in exchange for their agreeing to scout,[50] which they did. [2020]

Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mujālid b. Sa'īd[51]—al-Sha'bī: The Banū Buqaylah[52] read to me the letter of Khālid b. al-Walīd to the inhabitants of al-Madā'in:[53]

> From Khālid b. al-Walīd to the rulers of the Persians: Peace be upon whosoever follows right guidance. Praise be to God, Who has scattered your servants, wrested your sovereignty away, and rendered your plotting weak. Whoever worships the way we worship, faces the direction we face in prayer, and eats meat slaughtered in our fashion, that person is a Muslim who obtains the benefits we enjoy and takes up the responsibilities we bear. Now then, when you receive this letter, send me hostages and place yourselves under my protection. Otherwise, by Him other than Whom there is no god, I will most certainly send against you a people who love death just as you love life.

When they read this letter, they became astonished. That was in the year 12.

Abū Ja'far: As for others beside Ibn Isḥāq, Hishām, and those I have mentioned before, regarding the matter of Khālid and his march to Iraq, they include what was reported by [the following]:

'Ubaydallāh b. Sa'd al-Zuhrī—his uncle—Sayf b. 'Umar—'Amr b. Muḥammad—al-Sha'bī: When Khālid b. al-Walīd was done with al-Yamāmah, Abū Bakr wrote to him, "God has given you victory; therefore, go into Iraq until you meet 'Iyāḍ."[54] He also wrote to 'Iyāḍ

---

50. Kos. has help here instead, which is also possible.

51. Al-Hamdānī, d. 144/762, a Kūfan traditionist. See Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 103; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 39–41.

52. Of the Azd. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 207; II, 312 (under al-Ḥārith b. Subain Buqaila).

53. The former Sāsānian capital of Ctesiphon east of the Tigris.

54. 'Iyāḍ b. ['Abd] Ghanm b. Zuhayr al-Fihrī, the famous conqueror of upper Mesopotamia, d. 20/641. His mention here would imply that Khālid's orders were to enter Iraq from the middle or south, then pass through it to the north, possibly following

b. Ghanm when he was between al-Nibāj and al-Ḥijāz, "Go until you reach al-Muṣayyakh.[55] Begin with it, then enter Iraq from its uppermost part and penetrate it until you meet Khālid. Let both of you permit whoever wants to return to do so. And do not open the campaign with mutual aversion." When the letter came to Khālid and [2021] ʿIyāḍ, they allowed men to return according to the command of Abū Bakr. The people of Medina and its vicinity went back, leaving the forces of the two commanders bare. Therefore they sought reinforcements from Abū Bakr. Abū Bakr reinforced Khālid with al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr al-Tamīmī.[56] Abū Bakr was told, "Are you reinforcing a man whose troops have deserted him with [only] one man?" Abū Bakr answered, "An army in which there is the like of this man will not be defeated." He also reinforced ʿIyāḍ with ʿAbd b. ʿAwf al-Ḥimyarī.[57] Abū Bakr wrote to the two commanders, saying, "Call to arms those who fought against the apostates (ahl al-riddah)[58] and those who have remained steadfast to Islam after the Prophet. Do not let anyone who had apostatized campaign with you until I give my opinion." The campaigns of conquest (al-ayyām) did not subsequently see any apostate [participating].

---

the Euphrates. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 35; II, 360; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 398; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 131, 142, 158; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 165–66, 174, 176–77, 204–10, 221, 225, 236, 409; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 48, 50; Theophanes, Chronicle, 39–40.

55. The actual location of this place is doubtful, as it may lie in either Syria or Iraq. A middle course would place it on the Euphrates toward Syria. See Donner, Conquests, 312 n. 163, 333 nn. 113–14; Morony, Iraq, 192. Musil, Middle Euphrates, 311, places it at ʿAyn al-Arnab, a desert spring about 42 km. west of Hīt on the Euphrates.

56. Though often referred to in this volume, he is probably a legendary character invented to glorify Sayf's tribal group, the Tamīm, and in particular his subtribe, the Usayyid. The fact that he is made out to be an Usayyidī like Sayf suggests that Sayf rather than his informants is responsible for inventing him. This al-Qaʿqāʿ is absent from the genealogy books, and there is no evidence for his existence outside of Sayf's reports, as shown in Donner, Conquests, 365, 370, 390–91, 406, 409–10, 430. Reports mentioning al-Qaʿqāʿ, like this one, usually contain legendary glorifications. See al-ʿAskarī, Khamsūn wa miʾah ṣaḥābī, 71–146, and ʿAbdallāh b. Saba', 161–81. He is the alleged brother of the commander ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr al-Usayyidī, whose existence is independently attested in Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 108, 110. The existence of this ʿĀṣim may have suggested the invention of al-Qaʿqāʿ.

57. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 99, gives b. Ghawth. He is unknown from any source other than Sayf, from whom Ibn Ḥajar's report is probably derived.

58. On the so-called Apostasy Wars of the year 11/632–33, see Volume X of this translation series.

When the letter came to Khālid appointing him to command in Iraq, he wrote to Ḥarmalah,[59] Sulmā,[60] al-Muthannā, and Madhʿūr, ordering them to join him. He also ordered them to bring their troops against al-Ubullah on an appointed day, which he named. That was because Abū Bakr, in his letter, [had] commanded Khālid when he entered Iraq to begin with the gateway to the people of Sind and India, which today is al-Ubullah. Then Khālid gathered to arms whoever was between him and Iraq. In this way he mobilized eight thousand from the Rabīʿah and the Muḍar,[61] adding them to the two thousand who were already with him. After that he came with this ten thousand to [add to] the eight thousand who were with the four amīrs, meaning by the four amīrs al-Muthannā, Madhʿūr, Sulmā, and Ḥarmalah. Thus he met Hurmuz[62] with eighteen thousand men.

ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf b. ʿUmar—al-Muhallab al-Asadi[63] —ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Siyāh,[64] and Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam[65]—al-Mughī-

59. Ḥarmalah b. Murayṭah al-ʿAdawī of the Tamīm, mentioned only by Sayf. See Donner, Conquests, 417, 425, 434. His name and that of his father are both terms for garments, meaning approximately "Wrap, the son of Skirt," which suggests a legendary invention. The inclusion of the two Tamīmīs illustrates Sayf's anxiety to show the role of the Tamīm in the conquest, which in fact was accomplished more by the Rabīʿah, in conjunction with certain Ḥijāzī tribes. Al-ʿAskarī gives a detailed analysis, in which he denies Ḥarmalah's existence. See al-ʿAskarī, Khamsūn wa mi'ah ṣaḥābī, 245–60.

60. Sulmā b. al-Qayn al-ʿAdawī of the Tamīm, always mentioned by Sayf in conjunction with Ḥarmalah, as here, and also said to be an imaginary figure; see previous note. However, his mention by Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 67; II, 509, with a complete genealogy shows that he was not invented by Sayf but already existed in the Tamīmī tribal tradition and could have been a real person.

61. Two of the great tribal groupings of the Arabs, the Rabīʿah and the Muḍar represent the two major branches of the Nizār or Maʿadd. This genealogical connection could be brought forth to jusify an alliance in case of need, but more often the Rabīʿah were at odds with the Muḍar in Islamic times. The Rabīʿah generally derived from settled or partly settled tribes of eastern Arabia and Iraq, whereas the Muḍar tended to represent the nomads of northern Arabia. See EI[1], Supplement, s.v. Rabīʿa and Muḍar.

62. This commander appears only in Sayf and probably is a fabrication of the tribal tradition, as Caetani, Annali, II, 957 n. 3, holds. The name may have been suggested by that of the mawlā Hurmuz, who was captured at ʿAyn al-Tamr and whose descendants lived in al-Baṣrah in early ʿAbbāsid times. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 102.

63. Ibn ʿUqbah, unknown except in Sayf's isnāds.

64. Al-Aḥmarī, unknown except in Sayf's isnāds.

65. Al-Ḥanafī; he occurs almost exclusively in Sayf's isnāds and very frequently is [2022] rah b. ʿUtaybah:[66] Abū Bakr wrote to Khālid b. al-Walīd, when he made him commander on the Iraqi front, enjoining him to enter it from its lowest reaches. [He also wrote] to ʿIyāḍ, when he made him commander on the Iraqi front, that he [should] enter it from its uppermost part. Then they would race to al-Ḥīrah, and whoever reached al-Ḥīrah first would become the commander of the other. He also said, "When you have joined each other at al-Ḥīrah, have broken the defenses to Persia, and are sure that the Muslims will not be attacked from behind, let one of you cover the Muslims and his comrade [by staying] at al-Ḥīrah. Let the other attack God's enemy and your enemy among the Persians in their own house and the abode of their power: al-Madā'in."

ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — al-Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī: Khālid wrote to Hurmuz before the latter's going forth with Āzādhbih, the ancestor of al-Zayādhibah[67] who are in al-Yamāmah. Hurmuz was then the commander of that front. [Khālid's letter read,] "Now then, embrace Islam so that you may be safe, or else make a treaty of protection for yourself and your people and agree to pay the jizyah. Otherwise, do not at all blame anyone but yourself, for I have brought you a people who love death as you love life."

Sayf — Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam — al-Mughīrah b. ʿUtaybah, who was the judge of the people of al-Kūfah: When Khālid departed from al-Yamāmah for Iraq, he divided his troops into three groups. He did not send them by one way. Rather, he sent out al-Muthannā, with his guide Ẓafar, two days ahead of him. Then he sent out ʿAdī b. Ḥātim[68] quoted by him in this and other volumes of Ṭabarī. For his full name, see Ṭabarī, I, 221, below. Al-ʿAskarī, Khamsūn wa mi'ah ṣaḥābī, 274, 278, points out, however, that this Ṭalḥah is attested as a transmitter in an isnād other than through Sayf; the one such case of this that I have come across is in Ṭabarī, I, 3139, which would show that he is not one of Sayf's inventions. Ḥanẓalah b. al-Aʿlam, who appears in Ṭabarī, I, 3249, is probably a Ḥanafī and in the right generation to be Ṭalḥah's brother.

---

66. Al-Mughīrah b. ʿUtaybah b. al-Nahhās al-ʿIjlī. He was appointed the judge of al-Kūfah by either ʿUmar b. Hubayrah (gov. 103–5/722–24) or Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh (gov. 105–20/724–38). See Wakīʿ, Quḍāh, 23–24.

67. Presumably a plural of al-Zādhabī or rather al-Zādhabihī. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXI; Samʿānī, Ansāb, VI, 228; Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, I, 488 (al-Zādhabihī).

68. Son of the famous pre-Islamic poet Ḥātim al-Ṭā'ī, who was renowned for his generosity. ʿAdī was the most important leader of the Ṭayyi' in early Islam. See *EI*², s.v. ʿAdī b. Ḥātim; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 256; II, 139; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 402; Donner, Conquests, 33, 178–79, 195, 201, 243, 371, 385, 387.

and ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr[69] and their guides Mālik b. ʿAbbād[70] and Sālim b. Naṣr, one before the other by a day. Finally, Khālid and his guide Rāfiʿ [2023] set out. Khālid had set for all of them a redezvous at al-Ḥufayr,[71] where they were to combine and fight their enemy. The gateway of India was the most important and the most strongly guarded of the entrances into Persia, and its commander would fight the Arabs on the land and the Indians at sea. (Al-Muhallab b. ʿUqbah and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Siyāh al-Aḥmarī — to whom the Ḥamrāʾ attribute their origin and are thus called Ḥamrāʾ Siyāh[72] — also participated with Khālid).

When Khālid's letter reached Hurmuz, he sent the news to Shīrā b. Kisrā[73] and to Ardashīr b. Shīrā[74] and mobilized his forces. Then he hastened to al-Kawāẓim[75] with those of his forces who were first 69. Al-Usayyidī, whose alleged brother is al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr al-Tamīmī. ʿĀṣim's existence is rejected as legendary by al-ʿAskarī, Khamsūn wa mi'ah ṣaḥābī, 149–78, and ʿAbdallāh b. Saba', 182–85; however, his participation in a raid against Jūbarah (or Jawbarah) in the Kaskar district is attested in Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 108, in a report from Ibn Isḥāq, which would show that this ʿĀṣim was not fabricated by Sayf, though Sayf has exaggerated his role. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 110, mentions his participation at the disastrous Battle of the Bridge. Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 196, also reports his presence at al-Qādisiyyah. Donner, Conquests, 370, 378, 390, 406, 425, summarizes the list of reports about him, all of which probably derive from Sayf except that of Ibn Khayyāṭ.

---

70. Al-Awsī of the Anṣār. Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 177; II, 384. Not mentioned by Ibn Ḥajar in Iṣābah or by Maqdisī in Istibṣār.

71. The first stage on the pilgrimage route from al-Baṣrah to Mecca. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 277.

72. This implies that ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Siyāh in fact may be a legendary eponymous ancestor, for the Ḥamrāʾ were certainly not all descended from one male ancestor contemporary with Khālid b. al-Walīd. On the Ḥamrāʾ, see Morony, Iraq, 197, 243. However, note that the texts on which he relies are drawn exclusively from Sayf's reports in Ṭabarī and that these texts contain exaggerated legendary matter regarding "al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr," who is made the commander of the Ḥamrāʾ.

73. An anachronism representing Shīrūyah, who ruled as Qubādh II over the Sāsānian empire in February–September 628 C.E., before dying of the plague. Christensen, L'Iran, 487–91; CHI, III/1, 170; Caetani, Annali, II, 951 n. 1, 957 n. 4.

74. An anachronism representing Ardashīr III, who reigned over the Sāsānian realm September 628 – April 630. See Morony, Iraq, 72. According to CHI, III/1, 170–71, however, he had already been killed in June 629. Also Ardashīr appears as an adult in Sayf's reports, whereas he actually seems to have been a very young child. See also Christensen, L'Iran, 491–92; Frye, The History of Ancient Iran, 337, 361; Caetani, Annali, II, 957 n. 4, 963 n. 1.

75. The same as (al-)Kāẓimah, a watering place containing many wells of brackish water two stages south of al-Baṣrah on the road to al-Baḥrayn. It also was the southern extremity of the great trench dug by the Sāsānian king Sābūr II Dhū al-Aktāf (309– to arrive, in order to meet Khālid, sending ahead his fast horses, but he did not find it to be Khālid's trail. However, Hurmuz learned that the Muslims had set a rendezvous at al-Ḥufayr; therefore he changed his line of march, preceding them[76] to al-Ḥufayr. Hurmuz stopped there to arrange his forces. He put in charge of his two wings[77] two brothers named Qubādh and Anūshajān,[78] who shared a common descent with Ardashīr and Shīrā from Ardashīr the Great.[79] The Persians bound themselves together in chains. Those who did not favor that said to those who did, "You have chained yourselves for your enemy! Do not do so, for this is an evil omen." Those chained answered the others, saying, "As for you, you are telling[80] us that you intend to flee."

When the news reached Khālid that Hurmuz was at al-Ḥufayr, he turned his troops toward Kāẓimah.[81] That reached Hurmuz, who then hastened to precede Khālid to Kāẓimah and reached it exhausted. Hurmuz was one of the worst of the governors of that frontier in his treatment of the Arabs, so that all the Arabs were enraged at him. He had become a proverbial paragon of wickedness to them, [2024] so that they would say, "More wicked than Hurmuz" and "More ungrateful than Hurmuz."

Hurmuz and his troops ordered their ranks, binding themselves with chains. The water was in their hands. Khālid, coming against them, stopped in a waterless place. His men spoke to him about that; therefore, he commanded his herald to say, "Will you not make camp and put down your baggage, then fight them over the water?

---

79 C.E.] as far as Hīt on the Euphrates to keep the Arabs out of Iraq. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 431; Caetani, Annali, II, 957 n. 7.

76. Text: yubādiruh; read: yubādiruhum, as in Ms. C.

77. Text: mujannabatih; read: mujannabatayh, as in Kos., IH², and Ibn Kathīr.

78. Qubādh is found only in Sayf's transmissions and is possibly an embellishment. But Anūshajān was evidently a member of one of the prominent Persian noble families of al-Sawād. He is called the son of Jushnasmā = Gushnasp Māh, who may have held the rank of hirbadh. See Ṭabarī, I, 2245; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 119 (where he is called al-Nūshajān); Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 418; Morony, Iraq, 186.

79. Founder of the Sāsānian royal house, he ruled 224–41 C.E. See Frye, The History of Ancient Iran, 292, 294. The tradition that the family of Anūshajān was a branch of the Sāsānian royal house also is found independently in Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 114, with reference to his first cousin Ṭamāhīj.

80. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXI.

81. Apparently the same as al-Kawāẓim just mentioned. See note 75, above.

For, by my life, the water will most assuredly go to the more persistent of the two forces and the most noble of the two armies." Then the baggage was put down while the cavalry was standing by. The infantry came forward and then advanced against the enemy until it met them and the two sides fought. God sent a cloud, which left [puddles of] water[82] behind the Muslims' line, thereby giving them strength. When the daylight shone forth, there was no chained man in the valley.

'Ubaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Aṭā' al-Bakkā'ī:[83] Likewise. Both this and the preceding isnāds report: Hurmuz sent his men treacherously to trick Khālid, and they plotted with him to do that. Thus Hurmuz went forth while different men [of his] called out, "Where is Khālid?" Meanwhile, Hurmuz had made an arrangement with his horsemen [to surprise Khālid]. When Khālid showed himself[84] Hurmuz dismounted and summoned him to individual combat. Khālid dismounted and walked over to Hurmuz. They met, exchanging a couple of blows. When Khālid seized him closely, Hurmuz's bodyguards attacked treacherously and pursued Khālid. But that did not keep Khālid from killing Hurmuz. Al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr attacked Hurmuz's bodyguards, laying them low,[85] while Khālid was fighting them. The Persians were defeated. The Muslims rode hard in pursuit of them until night. Khālid collected their equipment, which included the chains. These were a camel load, a thousand pounds (raṭl). The battle was called Dhāt al- [2025] Salāsil.[86] Qubādh and Anūshajān escaped.

'Ubaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — 'Amr b. Muḥammad — al-Sha'bī: The Persians made their conical caps (qalānis) suit the level of their ranks in their tribes ('ashā'ir). Those of the highest nobility had caps worth one hundred thousand dirhams. As Hurmuz was from among the highest nobility, his cap was worth one hundred 82. Text: mā; read: mā'.

83. Another name known only from Sayf's isnāds.
84. Text: nazal; read: baraz, as in IH.
85. Text: anāmūhum; read: anāmahum.
86. This battle, which is found only in Sayf, has the same name as the expedition of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī in the year 8/629, where it refers to a place. Probably Sayf has only taken a popular etymology that would suggest itself for that battle and created another battle out of it. On 'Amr's expedition, see Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 623–24; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 769–74; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II, 131.

thousand. Abū Bakr gave it as spoil to Khālid. It was inlaid with jewels. The highest nobility among the Persians is to be from [one of] the seven houses.[87]

ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — Muḥammad b. Nuwayrah[88] — Ḥanẓalah b. Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah:[89] When those sent out in pursuit came back on that day, Khālid's herald called [on the troops] to break camp. Khālid went with his forces, followed by the baggage train, until he stopped at the site of the present great bridge at al-Baṣrah. Qubādh and Anūshajān had escaped. Khālid sent news of the victory and what was left of the spoils (akhmās), as well as the elephant, [to Medina] and also proclaimed the victory to his men. When Zirr b. Kulayb[90] brought the elephant along with the spoils and it was led around in Medina so that the people might see it, the weak among the women would say, "Is what we are seeing from among God's creatures?" for they considered it invented. Then Abū Bakr sent it back with Zirr.

When Khālid stopped at the site of the present great bridge at al-Baṣrah, he sent al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah in pursuit of the enemy. He also sent Maʿqil b. Muqarrin al-Muzanī[91] to al-Ubullah to collect its money and captives for him. Maʿqil went forth until he reached al-Ubullah and then collected the money and captives.

Abū Jaʿfar: This story about al-Ubullah and its capture differs from what is known to the biographers and differs from what the [2026] true traditions have brought [us].[92] For the conquest of al-Ubullah was only in the days of ʿUmar, when it was accomplished at the hands of ʿUtbah b. Ghazwān[93] in the year 14 (635–36) of the hijrah.

---

87. Text: buyūtāt; read: al-buyūtāt, as IH.

88. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Sawād b. Nuwayrah, another transmitter unknown except in the isnāds of Sayf's reports. The element b. Sawād in his nomenclature suggests "a son of the soil of Iraq." For his full name, see p. 221, below.

89. Possibly an imaginary transmitter made up by Sayf. See al-ʿAskarī, Khamsūn wa miʾah ṣaḥābī, 238–39.

90. Mentioned only by Sayf. Donner, Conquests, 373, 434.

91. Brother of al-Nuʿmān b. Muqarrin, the Muslim commander at Nihāwand. Also said to have been killed at Nihāwand. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 19; Donner, Conquests, 328 n. 64, 371, 429.

92. Al-Ṭabarī here takes the rare and unusual step of denouncing Sayf's story of the conquest of al-Ubullah by Khālid b. al-Walīd as false. This is remarkable because he has just spent several pages relating this same story. However, it must be admitted that some of the points of Sayf's story also are related by Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 100–1, with isnāds from others than Sayf.

93. Al-Māzinī of the Qaysī Māzin b. Manṣūr, a confederate of the Quraysh, d. 17/638, an early Muslim and Companion of the Prophet. His leadership of the conquest

We will mention this matter and the story of its conquest when we reach that [time], God willing.

Continuation of the report of Sayf—Muḥammad b. Nuwayrah—Ḥanẓalah b. Ziyād: Al-Muthannā went along until he reached the canal of the woman (nahr al-mar'ah),[94] where he came to the fortress in which the woman was [holding out]. He left al-Mu'annā b. Ḥārithah[95] to besiege her in her castle. Meanwhile, al-Muthannā moved against the man, besieging him. Al-Muthannā stormed their positions by force, killing them and dividing up their property as spoil. When the woman heard that, she made peace with al-Muthannā and became a Muslim. After that al-Mu'annā married her.

Khālid and his amīrs did not move the peasants during any of their conquests, because Abū Bakr had instructed him beforehand [not to do so]. Thus he took captive the children of the fighters who had been acting on behalf of the Persians but left alone those of the peasants who had not resisted, making a covenant of protection for them.

On the day of Dhāt al-Salāsil and al-Thiny,[96] the share of a horseman [in the spoils] reached one thousand dirhams, whereas that of a foot soldier was a third of that.

The Battle of al-Madhār[97]

[This battle] occurred in Ṣafar 12 (17 April–15 May 633). In those days people would say, "The Ṣafar of Ṣafars,[98] in which every mighty of al-Ubullah and founding of al-Baṣrah are well attested in many sources. See EI[1], s.v. 'Otba b. Ghazwān; Donner, Conquests, 411–13; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 98–99, VII, 5–8; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 113–15; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 163; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 121, II, 577; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 260–61.

---

94. A canal that led into the Tigris from the west a little north of al-Ubullah. Donner, Conquests, 179, 329 n. 66. Her name is given as Ṭamāhīj or Kāmin Dār. She is called the wife of Anūshajān and variously described as the daughter of Khusraw II, which is unlikely, or of Khusraw II's alleged relation Narsī. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 100, 114; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 418; Morony, Iraq, 186. The canal's mention as Nahr al-Murrah in Ibn Khayyāṭ is a mistake, but Ibn Khayyāṭ's version also states, in contrast to Sayf's typically bloody version given here, that the woman made peace with the Muslims for twelve thousand dirhams.

95. Al-Muthannā's possibly legendary brother, known only from Sayf's reports. Donner, Conquests, 382, 397–98.

96. The same as al-Madhār in the next report. Al-Thiny refers to a canal there.

97. This place also actually was conquered by 'Utbah b. Ghazwān later, so that Sayf's report here is chronologically improbable. See Morony, Iraq, 127 (map), 160; Donner, Conquests, 329 n. 66.

98. Musil, Middle Euphrates, 292–93, insists that this phrase shows that this battle actually occurred in October 633.

oppressor was slain upon the confluence of the rivers."

ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf—Ziyād[99] and al-Muhallab—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Siyāh al-Aḥmarī; but in the version of al-Sarī[100]—Shuʿayb[101]—Sayf (the report is from Sayf)—al-Muhallab b. ʿUqbah, [2027] Ziyād b. Sarjis al-Aḥmarī, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Siyāh al-Aḥmarī, and Sufyān al-Aḥmarī:[102] Hurmuz had written to Ardashīr and Shīrā with the news of Khālid's letter to him about his setting out from al-Yamāmah against him. Ardashīr[103] supplied Hurmuz with Qārin b. Qaryānis.[104] Qārin went forth from al-Madāʾin to reinforce Hurmuz until, when he came to al-Madhār, word of the defeat reached him, as well as those who were fleeing from it. They encouraged each other to [return to the] fight, the remnants of [the forces of] al-Ahwāz[105] and Fārs saying to the remnants of al-Sawād and al-Jabal,[106] "If you split up, you will never join together again afterward. Therefore join together to go back [to fight] once more. These are the king's reinforcements, and this is Qārin. It may be that God will give us victory and cure us of our enemy, so that we may regain some of that which they took from us." They followed this advice, making camp[107] at al-Madhār. Qārin put Qubādh and Anūshajān in charge of his two wings.[108]

Al-Muthannā and al-Muʿannā brought back the news to Khālid. When the news reached Khālid about Qārin, he divided the spoils among those to whom it had been granted by God and also distributed a certain amount from the [state's] fifth. He then sent al-Walīd b. ʿUqbah[109] to Abū Bakr with the rest of the fifth and the news of the victory, as well as the report about the enemy's gathering by the twisting stream (thiny), both those of them needing help and those 99. Ibn Sarjis al-Aḥmarī, another informant of Sayf whose name occurs only in Sayf's isnāds.

---

100. Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā, as elsewhere in Ṭabarī.

101. Shuʿayb b. Ibrāhīm. See Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 106.

102. Unknown except in Sayf's isnāds.

103. Or Shīrā.

104. Vocalization conjectural.

105. The capital of Khūzistān in southwestern Iran. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ahwāz.

106. The mountainous region of Media in western Iran, centered around Hamadhān. See *EI*², s.v. Djibāl.

107. Text: ʿaskar; read: ʿaskarū, as IH and Cairo ed.

108. Text: mujannabatih; read: mujannabatayh, as Kos., IH, and Ibn Kathīr.

109. ʿUthmān's notorious half-brother and governor of al-Kūfah, he died at al-Balikh near al-Raqqah in the reign of Muʿāwiyah. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 138–40; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 637–38.

coming to the rescue. (The Arabs call every river[110] nahr, a twisting stream thiny. Khālid went forth, going along until he descended on Qārin with his masses of troops at al-Madhār. The two sides met while Khālid was in battle formation. They fought with rage and rancor. Qārin came out to challenge the Muslims to individual combat. Khālid and Abyaḍ al-Rukbān[111] Maʿqil b. al-Aʿshā b. al-Nabbāsh[112] responded to the challenge, racing for him. Maʿqil beat Khālid to Qārin and killed him, while ʿĀṣim slew Anūshajān[113] and ʿAdī slew Qubādh. Qārin's nobility had lapsed. After him the Muslims did not fight anyone whose nobility had lapsed among the Persians. An [2028] enormous number of the Persians were slain. At this the Persians gathered their ships together, so that the waters kept the Muslims from pursuing them.

Khālid stayed at al-Madhār. He turned over the spoils to those who had taken them [in combat], as much as these spoils amounted to. He divided [the four-fifths of] the spoils [that the troops were entitled to among them] and also gave out of the fifths to those who had been tried in battle. Then he sent the rest of the fifths with a delegation under Saʿīd b. al-Nuʿmān[114] of the Banū ʿAdī b. Kaʿb.[115]

ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf—Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh—Abū ʿUthmān:[116] Thirty thousand were slain on the night of al-Madhār, aside from those who were drowned. If not for the water [obstructing the Muslims' pursuit], they would have been wiped out completely. Those who escaped did not get away except weaponless or virtually so.

Sayf — ʿAmr and Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī: The first to encounter Khālid when he descended on Iraq was Hurmuz at al-Kawāẓim. Then he stopped on the Euphrates on the Tigris bank,[117] finding no

---

110. Or, "canal."

111. Lit., "the white horseman."

112. Cited only by Sayf, in this report. Donner, Conquests, 373.

113. Text: al-Anūshajān; read: Anūshajān.

114. Cited only by Sayf. Donner, Conquests, 374.

115. The text is not entirely clear, but it appears that Khālid is portrayed as distributing some of the fifth of the spoils to which the government was entitled among those who had stood out in the battle.

116. Either Abū ʿUthmān al-Nahdī or Abū ʿUthmān Yazīd b. Asīd al-Ghassānī, neither of whom is found anywhere except in the isnāds of Sayf in Ṭabarī. For their complete names, see pp. 87, 94, 107, 193, below; and Ṭabarī, I, 2226.

117. This odd phrase appears to mean that Khālid, after having been at al-Kawāẓim, in the relative safety of the desert south of al-Baṣrah, ventured to cross the Eu-treachery and having an easy time there. Then came al-Thiny. He did not meet anyone after Hurmuz but that the subsequent battle was greater than that which had preceded it, until he came to Dūmat al-Jandal.[118] He increased the share of a horseman in the spoils on the day of al-Thiny above what it had been at Dhāt al-Salāsil. Khālid remained at al-Thiny, taking captive the families of the [enemy's] troops and those who had helped them. But he left the peasants alone, as well as whoever agreed to pay the kharāj[119] among all the people after they had been summoned [to do so]. All that had been conquered by force, but nevertheless they were invited to pay the kharāj.[120] They responded favorably, returned, and came under the protection of the Muslims, while their land became theirs. This [2029] is how what had not been divided [as spoils] was treated, but, if it had been divided, it was not [returned].

Among the captives were Ḥabīb Abū al-Ḥasan, that is, the father of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī,[121] who was a Christian, as well as Māfannah,[122] the mawlā[123] of ʿUthmān, and Abū Zayd, the mawlā of al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah.[124]

Khālid put Saʿid b. al-Nuʿmān in charge of the troops and Suwayd b. Muqarrin al-Muzanī[125] in charge of the kharāj.[126] He commanded phrates to the other bank, the one nearer to the Tigris and thus called the Tigris bank. This is confirmed by the context, which shows that he was exercising caution in the new environment. The whole report occurs also in the context of his campaign up the lower Tigris.

---

118. The present oasis of al-Jawf in northern Saudi Arabia, to which Khālid is said to have gone on his departure from Iraq for Syria. See *EI*², s.v. Dūmat al-Djandal.

119. The land tax, but often used in historical texts interchangeably with jizyah. See *EI*², s.v. Kharādj.

120. Text: al-jizā'; read: al-kharāj, as Ms. C.

121. The famous early scholar of al-Baṣrah, who lived 21–110/642–729. But his father's name is more usually given as Yasār. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥasan al-Baṣrī; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 263–70.

122. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 414; XII, 309, provides the information that Māfannah was a woman's name.

123. A mawlā is basically a client of an Arab tribe. In the Jāhiliyyah mawlās appear to have been most often freed slaves, as is the case here. But in Islamic times, in the wake of the early conquests, it became normal for a non-Arab embracing Islam to enroll in an Arab tribe under the sponsorship of a tribal member as his mawlā, and this latter sense of mawlā as client became more widespread than the first meaning. The second meaning is virtually ignored in *EI*¹, s.v. Mawlā.

124. These two mawlās do not seem to appear elsewhere.

125. Brother of al-Nuʿmān b. al-Muqarrin, he particpated in the conquest of Tihāmah, settled in al-Kūfah, and took part in later campaigns in Iraq and Iran. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 19; Donner, Conquests, 87, 371, 406, 428–29, 438.

126. Text: al-jizā': read: al-kharāj.

the latter to scatter his agents about and put his hand on the tax money. Then he waited for his enemy, gathering intelligence.

The Battle of al-Walajah[127]

Next, [the Battle of al-Walajah] occurred in Ṣafar 12 [17 April – 15 May 633]. Al-Walajah is among the districts directly adjoining Kaskar.

ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — ʿAmr and Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī: When Khālid was done with al-Thiny and the news reached Ardashīr, the latter sent forth al-Andarzaghar,[128] who was a Persian from among the mixed-bloods of al-Sawād.

ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — Ziyād b. Sarjis — ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Siyāh; and al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Muhallab b. ʿUqbah, Ziyād b. Sarjis, and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Siyāh: When news of the defeat of Qārin and the army at al-Madhār reached Ardashīr, he sent al-Andarzaghar, who was a Persian from among the mixed-bloods of al-Sawād and one of its inhabitants. However, he was not among those who had been born at al-Madāʾin, nor had he grown up there. Ardashīr then sent Bahman Jādhūyah after him with an army, [2030] commanding him to cross the path of al-Andarzaghar. Before that al-Andarzaghar had been in charge of the frontier of Khurāsān. Al-Andarzaghar set out, going from al-Madāʾin until he came to Kaskar. Then he passed beyond it to al-Walajah. Bahman Jādhūyah followed after him, taking another way, going through the middle of al-Sawād. Of those between al-Ḥīrah and Kaskar both the Arabs of that quarter and the dihqāns[129] mustered to join al-Andarzaghar. These camped beside his camp at al-Walajah. When those forces he desired had joined him and become complete, [the strength] he possessed pleased him, so that he resolved to march against Khālid.

When the news about al-Andarzaghar and his encampment at al-Walajah reached Khālid while he was at al-Thiny, he commanded [his forces] to decamp. He left behind Suwayd b. Muqarrin, ordering him to stay at al-Ḥufayr, and also sent forward to those whom he had left behind on the lowest reaches of the Tigris, commanding them to 127. See Donner, Conquests, 329 n. 66; Musil, Middle Euphrates, 293, places it at ʿAyn Dāhik near the Euphrates about 52 km. southeast of al-Ḥīrah.

---

128. Unidentified.

129. Local notables of the Sāsānian empire and its former territories in the caliphate. See *EI*², s.v. Dihḳān.

be wary and to avoid negligence and overconfidence. He then went forth with the rest of his troops toward al-Walajah until he attacked al-Andarzaghar, his troops, and those who had gathered to him. They fought a hard battle, greater than the battle of Thiny.

ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — Muḥammad — [130] Abū ʿUthmān: Khālid attacked al-Andarzaghar at al-Walajah in Ṣafar. They fought a hard battle there so that the two sides thought that their ability to persevere had been exhausted. Khālid considered his ambush too slow. He had laid an ambush for the enemy on two sides. These forces were commanded by Busr b. Abī Ruhm[131] and Saʿīd b. Murrah al-ʿIjlī.[132] When the ambush came out from two directions, the ranks of the Persians were defeated and they turned in flight. Khālid then took them from the front and the ambush from behind, [2031] so that no man among them saw his companion being slain. Al-Andarzaghar escaped from his defeat but died of thirst.

Khālid stood up to speak, making the men desire the land of the Persians and shun the land of the Arabs. He said, "Do you not regard [your] food like a dusty gulch? By God, if struggle for God's sake and calling [people] to God were not required of us, and there were no consideration except [our] livelihood, the [wise] opinion would [still] have been that we strike this countryside until we possess it and that we leave hunger and decrease to whoever of those too slow to join your enterprise possesses them."

Khālid behaved among the peasants as he had previously. He did not kill them but took captive the children of the warriors and those who had aided them. He called on the inhabitants of the land to pay the jizyah and accept protection. Then they withdrew.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf, and ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — ʿAmr — al-Shaʿbī: On the day of al-Walajah Khālid fought in single combat a Persian who was equal to a thousand men and slew him. When he was done, he leaned on him and called for his midday meal.

---

130. Text: bn; read: ʿan. Muḥammad b. Abī ʿUthmān is unknown except in this isnād, whereas Muḥammad — Abū ʿUthmān is frequent. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXI.

131. Al-Juhanī, apparently found only in reports derived from Sayf. See Donner, Conquests, 373, 385, 403. His mention in Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 164, probably also derives from Sayf.

132. Of the ʿAbdallāh b. Sayyār b. Asʿad branch of the ʿIjl. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 501.

Among those taken from the Bakr b. Wā'il he captured a son of Jābir b. Bujayr[133] and a son of ʿAbd al-Aswad.[134]

About Ullays, Which Is on the Euphrates Itself

Abū Jaʿfar — ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah[135] — Abū ʿUthmān, and Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam — al-Mughīrah b. ʿUtaybah; and al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh — Abū ʿUthmān and Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam — al-Mughīrah b. ʿUtaybah: When on the Day of al-Walajah Khālid had taken captive certain of the Christians of the Bakr b. Wā'il who had helped the Persians, the [other] Christians among their people became enraged on their account. Therefore they corresponded with the Persians, and the Persians wrote back to them. Subsequently, they gathered at Ullays under the command of ʿAbd al-Aswad al-ʿIjlī. The fiercest people against those Christians were the Muslims of the Banū ʿIjl: ʿUtaybah b. al-Nahhās,[136] Saʿīd b. Murrah, Furāt b. Ḥayyān,[137] al-Muthannā b. Lāḥiq,[138] and Madhʿūr b. ʿAdī. [2032]

133. Al-ʿIjlī. He founded an important political lineage, as his grandson Ḥajjāj b. Abjar was active in al-Kūfah from c. 35–72/656–91. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 159; II, 250, 291.

134. ʿAbd al-Aswad b. Ḥanẓalah b. Sayyār al-ʿIjlī, a chief of the ʿIjl. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 157, II, 122.

135. Unknown except in this isnād. Probably a mistake for Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, whom Sayf often uses to transmit from Abū ʿUthmān, caused in this text by the proximity of Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam in this same isnād.

136. He is apparently the father of al-Mughīrah b. ʿUtaybah b. al-Nahhās, the judge of al-Kūfah often cited by Sayf. Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 346, calls him the most noble ʿIjlī in al-Kūfah. Ibn al-Kalbī confirms his participation in the conquest of Persia. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 157; II, 577 (under ʿUtaiba b. ʿAbdal); Donner, Conquests, 383.

137. A ḥalīf of the Sahm clan of the Quraysh, he is reported to have been the guide for a Qurashī caravan to Iraq led by Abū Sufyān. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 50; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 346, has a caravan to Syria, which would seem less probable, owing to the lack of connection of the ʿIjl with that land. He is said to have become a Muslim at the Battle of al-Khandaq in 5/627, when he was captured as a Meccan spy. The Prophet Muḥammad is said to have given him an estate in al-Yamāmah. Later he moved to al-Kūfah, where his descendants continued to live. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 157, II, 247; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 40; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 201; Donner, Conquests, 203, 383.

138. He is referred to by Ṭabarī only here. However, Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 485, notes that he was the harshest of men against the Christians of the Bakr b. Wā'il in Khālid's campaign in Iraq, a motif that he attributes to Ṭabarī but that does not appear here.

Ardashīr wrote to Bahman Jādhūyah, who was at Qusyāthā.[139] Bahman was the spokesman (rāfid) of Persia on one day out of their month. They divided their months so that each month consisted of thirty days. On each day the Persians had a [different] spokesman, who was appointed to speak for them before the king. Their spokesman was Bahman on the second day of the month.[140] [Ardashīr wrote to Bahman,] "Go until you come to Ullays with your army and those of the Persians and Arab Christians who have joined you." Bahman Jādhūyah sent Jābān ahead, urging speed on him. But he also said, "Hold yourself and your troops back from fighting the enemy until I catch up with you, unless they attack you first." Thus Jābān went off toward Ullays, while Bahman Jādhūyah went to Ardashīr to see him in person and consult with him about what he wanted to command. When he found him sick he stayed over, leaving Jābān alone on that front. Jābān advanced until he came to Ullays, making camp there in Ṣafar (17 April–15 May 633). Those garrisons that faced the Arabs came to him, as well as ʿAbd al-Aswad with the Arab Chris-[2033] tians of the Banū ʿIjl, the Taym Allāt,[141] the Ḍubayʿah,[142] and the outlying Arabs from the people of al-Ḥīrah. Jābir b. Bujayr was a Christian who supported ʿAbd al-Aswad.

When Khālid had been informed of the concentration of ʿAbd al-Aswad, Jābir, Zuhayr,[143] and those who had rallied to them, he arose to face them. Khālid did not know of Jābān's approach, so that he was not concerned except about the Arabs and Christians of the area (ḍāḥiyah) who had gathered against him. Thus he advanced. When he appeared to Jābān at Ullays the Persians said to Jābān, "Shall we hasten against them, or shall we feed the men the midday meal in order to show them that we are not concerned about them, then attack them after finishing?" Jābān replied, "If they have left you

139. A place on the left bank of the Euphrates near al-Ḥīrah, identical to Quss al-Nāṭif and Bāqusyāthā, mentioned elsewhere in al-Ṭabarī. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 306.

140. Translated according to the note in the Leiden edition.

141. A tribe of the Bakr b. Wāʾil. See EI[1], s.v. Taimallāh; see also Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, I, 190–91, for the variety of genealogies offered for the Bakrī Taym.

142. A tribe of the Bakr b. Wāʾil later prominent in al-Baṣrah. It would seem from the existence of a separate Ḍubayʿah b. Rabīʿah that the Ḍubayʿah were originally independent of the Bakr but later joined them. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 292–93, 319–21; Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, II, 70.

143. Unidentified.

alone, making light of you, then make light, but I think they will hasten against you and quickly divert your attention from the food." But his men disobeyed him, for they spread out carpets, put out the food, and invited each other to eat, so that they came to the meal in groups.

When Khālid reached them he halted, ordering the baggage to be set down. When it had been put down he went to face them. Khālid personally appointed certain troops to guard his rear. Then he came forward[144] in front of the line and called out, "Where is Abjar?[145] Where is ʿAbd al-Aswad? Where is Mālik b. Qays?" [The last was a man from the Jidhrah].[146] These men all shrank back from him, except for Mālik, who came forth to fight in single combat. Khālid asked him, "O son of a filthy woman, what made you dare show yourself to me from among them, though there is no faithfulness in you?" Then he struck him and killed him.

Khālid thus turned the Persians away from their food before they had eaten. Jābān said, "Did I not tell you, O people? By God, I have never felt anxiety on account of any [enemy] chief until today." As [2034] they were unable to eat, [the Persian troops], to display their toughness, said, "We will leave our food until we finish with them; then we will come back to it." Jābān replied, "Nevertheless, I think, by God, that you have only put it aside for them,[147] though you do not perceive. Therefore now obey me. Poison it, so that, if it is for you, it will be the easiest way to die, whereas, if it is against you, [at least] you will have done something to justify yourselves." They answered, "No!" [believing themselves] to have the strength to defeat the Muslims.

Jābān put ʿAbd al-Aswad and Abjar in charge of his two wings. Khālid had kept to combat formation during the previous days. The two sides fought fiercely. The polytheists were increased in rabidity and ferocity because they expected Bahman Jādhūyah to come.

---

144. Text: nadar; read: badar, as Ms. C. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, CXXIX, DCXI.

145. Perhaps Abjar b. Jābir b. Bujayr al-ʿIjlī. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 159; II, 250, 291.

146. Text: Jadhrah; read: Jidhrah. This is the Jidhrah b. Dhuhl b. Shaybān, a Bakrī clan. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 142; II, 262. Mālik b. Qays seems not to be mentioned elsewhere.

147. That is, the Persians' Muslim enemy.

Therefore, they persevered against the Muslims to the extent that it was in God's knowledge that He would bring them to do so.

The Muslims raged against them. Khālid said, "O God, if You deliver their shoulders to us, I will obligate myself to You not to leave any one of them whom we can overcome until I make their canal run with their blood." Then God defeated them for the Muslims and gave their shoulders to them. Khālid then commanded his herald to proclaim to the men, "Capture! Capture! Do not kill any except he who continues to resist." As a result, the cavalry brought prisoners in droves, driving them along. Khālid had detailed certain men to cut off their heads in the canal. He did that to them for a day and a night. They pursued them the next day and the day after, until they reached al-Nahrayn[148] and the like of that distance in every direction from Ullays. And Khālid cut off their heads.

Al-Qaʿqāʿ and others like him said to Khālid, "Even if you were to kill all the population of the earth, their blood would still not run. Blood has not done more than glistened ever since it was forbidden [2035] to flow and the earth was forbidden to dry blood. Therefore send water over it, so that you may fulfill your oath." Khālid had blocked the water from the canal. Now Khālid brought the water back, so that it flowed with spilled blood. Owing to this, it has been called Blood Canal to this day. Others, among them Bashīr b. al-Khaṣāṣiyyah,[149] said, "It has reached us that the earth, when it had dried the blood of Adam's son, was then forbidden to dry [spilled] blood, and blood was forbidden to flow except enough to congeal."

When the enemy had been defeated and driven from their camp and the Muslims had returned from pursuing them and entered that camp, Khālid stood over the food and said, "I give it to you as spoils; it is yours." He also said, "The Prophet of God, if he came upon prepared food, would offer it as spoils." Thus the Muslims sat down to eat it for their dinner at night. Those who had never seen [settled] countryside and did not know of flat bread (ruqāq) would say, "What are these white patches?" Those who knew it would answer them, saying jokingly, "Have you heard of 'soft living' (raqīq al-ʿaysh)?"

148. A subdistrict on the lower Nahr Sūrā in Bihqubādh, east of the Euphrates. It disappears after the conquest. See Morony, Iraq, 149. But see note 234, below.

149. He is Zaḥm b. Maʿbad b. Sharāḥīl b. Sabʿ b. Ḍubārī al-Sadūsī. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 225; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 50; VII, 55; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 159.

The others would respond, "Yes." Then those who knew would say, "This is it; therefore it has been named ruqāq." The Arabs would call it qirā.[150] ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf—ʿAmr b. Muḥammad—al-Shaʿbī—an informant—Khālid: On the day of Khaybar, the Prophet of God gave the people as spoils bread, stew, roast meat, and whatever other than that they would put into their bellies without becoming sated.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah—al-Mughīrah: On the river were mills that ran with water red [with blood] for three days, grinding grain for the troops, who were eighteen thousand or more. Khālid sent the news by a man called Jandal from the Banū ʿIjl. A tough guide, he brought to Abū Bakr the news of the conquest of Ullays, the amount of spoils, the number of captives, how the spoils (akhmās) had been divided, and who had done great deeds of valor. When he came to Abū Bakr and the latter, noticing his toughness and the solidity of the news he had brought, said, "What's your name?" the man said, "Jandal." Abū Bakr said, "How wonderful, Jandal! [2036]

The soul of ʿIṣām has made ʿIṣām black and accustomed him to attack and daring."[151]

Abū Bakr then commanded that he be given a girl from among those captives, and she subsequently bore him a child.

The enemy's dead reached seventy thousand,[152] most of them from Amghīshiyā.[153]

Abū Jaʿfar—ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿd—his uncle: I asked about Amghīshiyā by al-Ḥīrah and was told [it is] Manīshiyā.[154] I then told Sayf, who said, "These are two [different] names."

---

150. Meaning "hospitality" or "a meal served to a guest."

151. This line is from al-Nābighah al-Dhubyānī. See Leiden text, note c. The ʿIṣām referred to here is ʿIṣām b. Shahbar al-Jarmī, the chamberlain of al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir, the last Lakhmī king of al-Ḥīrah. See al-Nābighah al-Dhubyānī, Dīwān, 105–6; Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, IX, 172; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 327; II, 359; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 544; Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 259–60.

152. This legendary fabrication of Sayf, representative of his anti-Iranian sentiment, is quoted by Morony, Iraq, 191.

153. A fortress at the junction of the Furāt Bādaqlā canal and the Ḥīrah branch of the Euphrates, hence near al-Ḥīrah, though its exact location is uncertain. Morony, Iraq, 152; Musil, Middle Euphrates, 293–94. Ṣāliḥ al-ʿAlī puts it near modern al-Ghamas and al-Shanafiyyah. Ṣ. al-ʿAlī, "Minṭaqat al-Kūfah."

154. Cairo ed. has "Manishiyā," possibly based on Ms. C.

The Affair of Amghīshiyā

[It was] in Ṣafar, and God gave the Muslims spoil without horses.

ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — Muḥammad — Abū ʿUthmān and Ṭalḥah — al-Mughīrah: When Khālid was done with the Battle of Ullays he decamped and came to Amghīshiyā. He had taken the defenders by surprise, so that they left their property and fled, scattering in al-Sawād. From that day there have been bonded laborers [2037] (sakarāt)[155] in al-Sawād. Khālid commanded that Amghīshiyā be demolished, along with everything in it. It was a military center (miṣr) like al-Ḥīrah. The Furāt Bādaqlā ended in it. Ullays was one of its subordinate military posts. The victors took spoils in it the like of which they never obtained again.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Baḥr b. al-Furāt al-ʿIjlī[156] — his father:[157] The Muslims did not obtain as spoils between the battles of Dhāt al-Salāsil and Amghīshiyā anything like what they took at Amghīshiyā. The share of a horseman reached one thousand five hundred [dirhams], aside from the additional spoils allotted to those who had stood out.

All informants together: When news of that reached Abū Bakr, he said, reporting to them what had come to him, "O people of the Quraysh! Your lion has attacked the [enemy's] lion and overcome him, [taking away] the pieces of his prey. Women are incapable of ever giving birth[158] to the like of Khālid."

The Day of al-Maqr[159] and the Mouth of Furāt Bādaqlā[160]

Abū Jaʿfar — al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad — Abū ʿUthmān and Ṭalḥah — al-Mughīrah: Al-Āzādhbih had been the gover-

155. This word appears to be related to the more familiar Arabic root s-kh-r, itself taken perhaps from Aramaic in this meaning. A gloss in the Cairo ed. from Yāqūt, Muʿjam, supports this explanation.

156. Unknown except for his mention here and in one more report shortly after this. His name, which means "Sea, the son of the Euphrates River," would seem another of Sayf's topical inventions, like Ḥarmalah b. Murayṭah (see note 59, above) and al-Rabīʿ b. Maṭar b. Thalj "Spring Herbage, the son of Rain, the son of Snow." See al-ʿAskarī, Khamsūn wa miʾah ṣaḥābī, 265–68.

157. Perhaps suggested by the name of al-Furāt b. Ḥayyān al-ʿIjlī, who chronologically could not have had a son who transmitted to Sayf.

158. Text: yunshiʾū; read: yansulna, as in Kos. and Cairo ed.

159. Apparently an unidentified place.

160. A canal flowing out of the Euphrates, perhaps near the present Abū Ṣukhayr nor (marzubān) of al-Ḥīrah from the times of Kisrā up to that day. They[161] used not to support each other except by permission of the king. Al-Āzādhbih had reached [the rank of] "half noble," and the value of his tall cap[162] was fifty thousand [dirhams]. When Khālid had destroyed Amghīshiyā and its people had become bonded laborers (sakarāt) to the landlords (dahāqīn) of the villages, al-Āzādhbih realized that he would not be left alone. Therefore he began to consider his situation and prepare for war with Khālid. He first sent forth his son and set out himself after him, until he encamped outside al-Ḥīrah. He commanded his son to dam the Euphrates. After he had departed from Amghīshiyā, carrying the infantry in boats along with the spoils and baggage, Khālid was surprised to find his boats running aground. This greatly alarmed his men. The boatmen said, "The Persians have broken the dams of the canals, causing the water to flow in other than its accustomed course. The water will not come to us unless we dam the canals up again." Khālid then hurried with his cavalry toward the son of al-Āzādhbih. When some of Khālid's horse encountered the son of al-Āzādhbih by Fam al-ʿAtīq,[163] they surprised the Iranians just at the moment that the latter thought themselves safe from Khālid's attacking them. Khālid laid them low in their battles.[164] After this he immediately departed. But the news had reached al-Āzādhbih, whom Khālid encountered along with his troops at the mouth of Furāt Bādaqlā. When they fought each other Khālid laid the Persians low, broke the dikes of the Euphrates, and blocked up the entrances to the canals, so that the water returned to its natural course. [2038]

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad—Abū ʿUthmān and Ṭalḥah—al-Mughīrah and Baḥr—his father; and ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf—Muḥammad—Abū ʿUthmān and Ṭalḥah—al-Mughīrah: When Khālid had defeated the son of al-Āzādhbih at the mouth south of al-Ḥīrah, then running parallel to the river until it reentered it at an unknown distance downstream. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 293–95.

---

161. Apparently, the governors.

162. Ar. qalansuwwah. This would appear to be the type of headgear worn by Persian and Mesopotamian officials and nobles since early antiquity. It also is parallel to, if not the same as, the high crowns of the kings shown on Sāsānian coins. See Morony, Iraq, 186–88; EI², s.v. Libās.

163. According to Musil, Middle Euphrates, 295, this was at the modern Abū Ṣukhayr, in the gardens of Jaʿārah, on the Euphrates southeast of al-Ḥīrah. The various canals originated from here, so that Fam al-ʿAtīq actually was the starting point of the ʿAtīq canal from the Euphrates.

164. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXI.

of Furāt Bādaqlā, he headed for al-Ḥīrah, commanding his companions to follow him and going on until he encamped between al-Khawarnaq[165] and al-Najaf.[166] Khālid reached al-Khawarnaq when al-Āzādhbih had already crossed the Euphrates, fleeing without a fight. He was impelled to flight only by the news that reached him about the death of Ardashīr, as well as the defeat of his own son. Al-Āzādhbih's camp was between al-Ghariyyayn[167] and al-Qaṣr al-Abyaḍ.[168] When Khālid's forces had completely gathered to him at al-Khawarnaq, he went forth from the camp [there] in order to camp at the site of al-Āzādhbih's camp between al-Ghariyyayn and al-[2039] Qaṣr al-Abyaḍ.

Meanwhile the people of al-Ḥīrah had taken to their fortifications for defense. Khālid sent horsemen from his camp into al-Ḥīrah, putting a man from among his commanders in charge of each fort, that he might besiege its defenders and engage them in battle. Thus, Ḍirār b. al-Azwar[169] laid siege to al-Qaṣr al-Abyaḍ, in which was Iyās b. Qabīṣah al-Ṭā'ī. Ḍirār b. al-Khaṭṭāb[170] besieged Qaṣr al-ʿAdasiyyīn, in which was ʿAdī b. ʿAdī,[171] who was killed. Ḍirār b. Muqar-

165. A place about 17 km. southeast of al-Najaf containing a Sāsānian palace. See *EI*², s.v. al-Khawarnaḳ; Le Strange, Lands, 75–76; Musil, Middle Euphrates, 104–6, esp. n. 59.

166. A place in Iraq 10 km. west of al-Kūfah. Although later a famous city owing to its possession of the shrine of ʿAlī, at this time it was probably of no importance, if it existed at all. See *EI*¹, s.v. al-Nadjaf; Le Strange, Lands, 76–78.

167. Lit. "the two ruined towers." These were located in the suburbs of al-Kūfah and gave their name to their locale. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 196–200.

168. One of the forts of al-Ḥīrah. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 287–88, 295.

169. Al-Asadī. A Companion of the Prophet, he is variously said to have died at al-Yamāmah in 11/632, Ajnādayn in 13/634, or Ḥarrān later and to have participated at al-Yarmūk in 15/636 and the conquest of Damascus. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 55; II, 242; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I, 292; VI, 39; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 117, 300, 317; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 86, Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 208–9; Donner, Conquests, 359, 367, 369, 388.

170. Al-Fihrī, he was a poet, fought for the Meccans at Uḥud and became a Muslim on the conquest of Mecca in 8/630. He was said to have been killed in the Battle of al-Yamāmah in 11/632, although Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 94, does not list him among the dead there. He seems to have been mentioned on the Iraqi front only by Sayf, though others said he went to Syria and died there. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 34; II, 242; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 407; Zubayrī, Nasab, 448; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 40–41, 136, 254–55, 297, 319, 328–30, 334; Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, VII, 28–29; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 209–10; Donner, Conquests, 372, 401, 405.

171. This character, along with Zayd b. ʿAdī and the latter's father, ʿAdī al-Awsaṭ, appears to be mentioned only by Sayf. Probably ʿAdī b. ʿAdī is meant to be the brother of Zayd, owing to their collocation in the tradition. See below p. 30. As ʿAdī al-Awsaṭ, their father, is said to have been slain at Dhū Qār, he cannot be the same as the famous rin al-Muzanī,[172] who was the tenth of ten brothers, besieged Qaṣr Banī Māzin, where Ibn Akkāl[173] was, while al-Muthannā laid siege to Qaṣr Ibn Buqaylah, inside of which was ʿAmr b. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ.[174] The Muslims invited all of them [to terms], giving them a day's grace, but the people of al-Ḥīrah refused obstinately, so that the Muslims skirmished with them.

ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿd—his uncle—Sayf—al-Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim[175] —a man from the Banū Kinānah[176] [Abū Jaʿfar said that ʿUbaydallāh's version was thus], and [also] al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim—a man from the Banū Kinānah: Khālid had enjoined his commanders to begin by calling on [the enemy to surrender]. If they accepted, they accepted, but if they refused, the commanders should give them a day's respite [before attacking]. Khālid also said, "Do not give your enemy access to your ears, thus lying in wait for you to meet with disaster, but rather fight them, and do not turn the Muslims away from the struggle with their enemy."

The first of the commanders to start the battle after the day when the enemy had been given a respite was Ḍirār b. al-Azwar, who was in charge of fighting the people of al-Qaṣr al-Abyaḍ. They arose in the morning to find themselves besieged. Ḍirār called on them [to choose] one of three things: Islam, payment of jizyah, or resistance. They chose resistance, shouting to each other, "Use ceramic rollers [2040] [al-khazāzīf]!" Thereupon Ḍirār said, "Stand back so that what they throw will not reach you, until we see what they are shouting about." Immediately the top of the fortress was filled with men

---

Ḥīran poet ʿAdī b. Zayd al-Marʾī, who also had a son named Zayd but was killed by al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir c. 600 C.E., long before Dhū Qār. It is not impossible that it was the poet and his son who suggested the names for this later alleged family, especially given the propensity for Sayf's traditions to show famous throwbacks to the Jāhiliyyah as embellishments. On ʿAdī b. Zayd al-Marʾī and his son, see Ṭabarī, I, 1016–29; Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, II, 18–43; *EI*², s.v. ʿAdī b. Zayd.

172. Mentioned only by Sayf, who often seems to create brothers of more famous persons. See Donner, Conquests, 372. Only six brothers are listed by Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 18–19.

173. Unidentified, but he appears below (p. 35) as Ḥīrī b. Akkāl. The first name, identifying him as a Ḥīran, seems merely a means of filling in the absence of a real first name for him in the tradition.

174. Probably the same as ʿAbd al-Masīḥ b. ʿAmr b. Buqaylah. See p. 6 and note 45, above.

175. Al-Kinānī. Only mentioned in Sayf's isnāds.

176. An important branch of the Muḍar concentrated in the Ḥijāz. See *EI*², s.v. Kināna.

[wearing] suspended bags, [from which] they pelted the Muslims with khazāzīf, which are ceramic rollers (madāḥī).[177] Ḍirār then said, "Bombard them!" At this, the Muslims drew near them, raining arrows upon them and thus clearing the tops of the walls.

Then the Muslims launched their attack against those [outside] who belonged to the people in the fortresses. The commander of each group of troops greeted his men with the like of that in the morning, so that they conquered the [enemy's] houses and monasteries (dayrāt) and slew many [of them]. The priests and monks therefore called out, "O people of the fortresses, it is only you who are killing us!" At this, the people of the fortresses shouted, "O Arabs, we now accept one of the three [choices]. Therefore, renew your [peaceful] summons to us and hold back from attacking us until you inform Khālid."

At this Iyās b. Qabīṣah and his brother went forth to Ḍirār b. al-Azwar, while ʿAdī b. ʿAdī and Zayd b. ʿAdī went out to Ḍirār b. al-Khaṭṭāb. ʿAdī al-Awsaṭ[178] was the one whose mother had sung his eulogy and who had been killed on the Day of Dhū Qār.[179] ʿAmr b. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ and Ibn Akkāl went forth, the first to Ḍirār b. Muqarrin, the other to al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah. The commanders sent them to Khālid but kept their positions.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad — Abū ʿUthmān, and Ṭalḥah — al-Mughīrah: The first one who sought peace was ʿAmr b. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ b. Qays b. Ḥayyān b. al-Ḥārith, who is Buqaylah. He was named Buqaylah only because he had come out to his people [2041] wearing two green cloaks, so that they said, "O ḥārī,[180] you are noth-

177. The exact form and purpose of these is obscure, but they were probably cylindrical household implements of some kind. See al-Fayrūzābādī, Muḥīt, s.v. m-d-y, kh-z-f.

178. The father of ʿAdī b. ʿAdī and Zayd b. ʿAdī. See note 171, above.

179. A waterhole belonging to the Bakr b. Wāʾil, where occurred the famous battle in which the Arabs of the Bakr tribes crushingly defeated the Persians, thus prefiguring the later Islamic conquests. It took place sometime between 604 and 611 C.E. See *EI*², s.v. Dhū Ḳār; Ṭabarī, I, 1015–37; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, I, 482–90. It was located between al-Kūfah and Wāsiṭ, nearer to the former west of the Euphrates. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 293–94. Musil, Northern Neǧd, 169 n. 95, 236, and Arabia Deserta, 503, identifies it with the present Abū Ghār, which in Middle Euphrates, 102, 106, he locates near al-Ḥīrah.

180. Thus the Leiden text. This word caused earlier writers considerable difficulty. If it is interpreted as the vocative of the participle of ḥarā, yaḥrī, it could mean "decreasing." Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 485 n. 3, suggests that it be read Ḥārith, Buqaylah's name.

ing but a little green herb (buqaylah)!" and that name stuck. ʿAmr sent them, the chiefs, to Khālid, each accompanied by a confidant, in order that he might make peace with the people of each fortress through the mediation of its commander.

Khālid met the party of each fortress among them separately, without the others. He began with the companions of ʿAdī, saying, "Woe to you! You are not Arabs! Why do you seek vengeance from the Arabs or the Iranians? Why do you seek vengeance from fairness and justice?" ʿAdī answered him, "Indeed we are pure Arabs, and others arabicized."[181] Khālid continued, "If you were as you say, you would not have opposed us and detested our business." ʿAdī told him, "That we have no tongue but Arabic most certainly proves what we say." Khālid said, "You have said the truth." Then he continued: "Choose one of three things. You may enter our religion, in which case you will enjoy what we enjoy, and you will bear the obligations we bear, whether you arise and migrate [with us] or stay in your dwellings. Otherwise, there is payment of the jizyah, or else resistance and fighting. By God, I have brought you a people who are more covetous of death than you are of life." ʿAdī replied, "Rather, we will give you the jizyah." At this Khālid said, "May you perish! Woe to you! Disbelief is a desert that makes one lose his way. It is the foolish [one] among the Arabs who follows it."

At this point, two guides met Khālid, one of them an Arab. Khālid left aside the Arab and employed the Iranian instead.[182]

The people of al-Ḥīrah then made peace with him for 190,000 [dirhams],[183] and they kept that [agreement]. They also gave him gifts. He sent [the news of] the conquest and the presents to Abū Bakr

---

181. Here the pure Arabs are ʿArab ʿāribah, whereas the arabicized are mutaʿarribah. This twofold division was basic to the early Arab Muslim genealogical scheme. According to the version favored by the Yemen tribes, the Arabs descended from Qaḥṭān were al-ʿāribah, the pure, original Arabs, and those descended from ʿAdnān, who in turn was distantly descended from Abraham's son Ishmael, were only arabicized Arabs, called al-mustaʿribah. See Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Qaṣd wa amam, 12–14; Inbāh, 57–58. However, another version, less favorable to the Yemen, stated that al-ʿāribah had become entirely extinct long before, so that all present Arabs were only mustaʿribah. See Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Qaṣd wa amam, 11–12; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 8–9. Here, however, Sayf's intention seems to be to show that the Christian natives of al-Ḥīrah, although they spoke Arabic, were the result of a more recent mixing of Arab and non-Arab elements and thus unlike the pure Arabs coming from the desert.

182. The purpose of these guides is obscure.

183. See p. 6, and note 49, above.

with al-Hudhayl al-Kāhilī. Abū Bakr accepted them as a part of the jizyah payment, writing to Khālid, "Reckon their gifts for them as a [204] part of the jizyah, unless they are [already] part of the jizyah. Take the rest of what is due and strengthen your troops with it."

Ibn Buqaylah said:

Do I see, after the Mundhirs,[184] freely grazing livestock herded at al-Khawarnaq and al-Sadīr?[185]
And after the horsemen of al-Nuʿmān, do I graze a young camel[186] between Murrah[187] and al-Ḥufayr?
We have become after the death of Abū Qabūs[188] like a herd of sheep[189] on a rainy day.
The tribes from Maʿadd divide[190] us up openly like the shares of a slaughtered beast.
We used to be [such] that no sacred thing of ours would be coveted, so that we were like an excellent, milk-giving udder.[191]
We give what is due after the tax (kharāj) of Kisrā and the payment of the Banū[192] Qurayẓah and al-Naḍīr.[193]

---

184. The former Lakhmid kings of al-Ḥīrah, who had possessed the greatest of the Arab kingdoms before their sudden downfall in 602 C.E. See *EI*², s.v. Lakhmids.

185. Two Sāsānian-period palaces at al-Ḥīrah. See Le Strange, Lands, 75–76. On al-Sadīr, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 201–2, where the first four lines of this poem are quoted.

186. Or "gardens." See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXI.

187. Unidentified place.

188. Text: Qubays; read: Qabūs, as Kos. This is a shortening of Qābūs by poetic license. Abū Qābūs is al-Nuʿmān III b. al-Mundhir IV (d. 602 C.E.), the last king of al-Ḥīrah.

189. Or "like the mange of goats." See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, CLXI–CLXII, DCXI.

190. Or "have divided." See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXI.

191. Ar. ka-ḍarrat al-ḍarʿ al-fakhūri. The meaning does not seem entirely satisfactory, but the words ḍarrah and ḍarʿ are connected by Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. ḍ-r-r, and Fayrūzābādī, Muḥīṭ, s.v. ḍ-r-r, where both terms give the sense of udder. In this line of poetry the implication appears to be that, when the Ḥīrans were strong, no one could dare even to covet their possessions, let alone attack them, while at the same time they were inexhaustibly generous.

192. Text: min; read: Banī, with Yaʿqūbī and M. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXI.

193. Two of the Jewish tribes of Medina who contended with the Prophet. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳurayẓa; *EI*¹, s.v. Nadīr (Banu'l).

Such is time: its turning [brings] ups and downs, a day of misfortune or joy.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim — a man from the Banū Kināna; and Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq[194] with the like of it from him: They would come to Khālid, entrusting ʿAmr b. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ [2043] with their needs. Khālid asked, "How old are you?" ʿAmr answered, "Hundreds of years." Khālid continued, "What is the strangest thing you have seen?" ʿAmr replied, "I saw the towns connected in a line between Damascus and al-Ḥīrah, so that a woman could go forth from al-Ḥīrah with no provisions except a loaf of bread." Khālid smiled and said, "Do you have anything from your old age except its effect?[195] You are senile, by God, O ʿAmr!"

Then Khālid came to the people of al-Ḥīrah and said: "Has it not reached me that you are wicked, deceitful plotters? Why do you obtain your needs through a senile man who does not know whence he has come?" ʿAmr ignored him but wished to show him from himself that by which he could know his mind and prove the soundness of what he had told him. He therefore said, "By your right, O amīr, I most certainly know whence I came." Khālid asked, "Then where did you come from?" ʿAmr asked, "More recently or earlier?" Khālid said, "Whatever you want." ʿAmr said, "From my mother's womb." Khālid then asked, "Where are you going?" ʿAmr said, "Ahead of me." Khālid said, "What is that?" ʿAmr said, "The afterlife." Khālid asked, "From where is your farthest step?" ʿAmr said, "From my father's loins." Khālid asked, "What are you in? ʿAmr replied, "In my clothes." Khālid asked, "Do you comprehend?" ʿAmr answered, "Yes, by God, and I register, too."[196]

Thus Khālid found him, when he had tested him, to be a sage. The people of his town were more knowing about him: Khālid said, "A land has killed its ignorant one, but its knowing one has killed a land. The people know best what is among them." ʿAmr said, "O

194. Abū Isrāʾīl Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq ʿAmr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Hamdānī al-Sabīʿī, he was an important Kūfan traditionist of mixed reputation who died in the period 152–59/769–76. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 228; II, 597; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 363; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 433–34.

195. Text: ʿuqlatun; read: ʿamaluhu, as in Cairo ed.

196. See p. 6, above.

amīr, the ant knows better than the camel what is in its own house."

Muḥammad[197] — Abū al-Safar[198] — Dhū al-Jawshan al-Ḍibābī:[199] [These] agree with this report from this place.

[2044] Al-Zuhrī:[200] A man from al-Ḍibāb agrees with them about this report.

All these: With Ibn Buqaylah was a servant who had a pouch tied around his loins. Khālid took the pouch and poured its contents into his palm. He inquired, "What is this, O ʿAmr?" ʿAmr answered, "This, by the faith of God, is poison of an hour." Khālid asked, "Why do you fill your pouch with poison?" ʿAmr replied, "I am afraid that you might follow other than what I prefer. I have reached my term of life, and death is dearer to me than any evil thing that I might bring upon my people and my town." After saying, "No one dies until he comes to his allotted time," Khālid declared, "In the name of God, the best of names, the Lord of the earth and the Lord of the heaven, by Whose name no sickness harms, the All-Compassionate, the Merciful!" At this, those present reached for him to stop him from [taking] it, but he was too swift for them and swallowed it. Then ʿAmr said to them, "By God, O Arabs, you will possess whatever you want as long as there is one of you, O generation!" When he came to the people of al-Ḥīrah, he said, "I have not seen anything clearer in good fortune than today."

Khālid refused to write any agreement for them except on condition of the handing over of Karāmah bt. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ to Shuwayl [as a hostage]. That was hard for the Ḥīrans to bear, but she said, "Make it easy for yourselves and hand me over, for I will ransom myself." Thus they did, and Khālid wrote the agreement between him and them, [as follows:]

> In the name of God, the All-Compassionate, the Merciful. This is the covenant that Khālid b. al-Walīd has made 197. Probably this is Sayf's informant Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh again.

198. Saʿīd b. Yaḥmad al-Hamdānī al-Thawrī; he was a Kūfan traditionist regarded as reliable. He died in 112–13/730–31. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 299; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 96–97.

199. Abū Shamir al-Kilābī, whose son Shamir was one of the killers of al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī. Dhū al-Jawshan transmitted one tradition from the Prophet. See Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 297; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 222–23, Iṣābah, I, 485. The last source shows considerable doubt about his actual identity.

200. The same as the al-Zuhrī on p. 1, above; see also note 4.

for ʿAdī and ʿAmr,[201] the two sons of ʿAdī, ʿAmr b. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ, Iyās b. Qabīṣah, and Ḥīrī b. Akkāl. [ʿUbaydallāh said [the name of the last was] Jabrī. These men were the leaders (nuqabāʾ) of the people of al-Ḥīrah, who accepted their role and enjoined it on them.] Khālid has given them a covenant in return for one hundred ninety thousand dirhams payable annually, for the jizyah of those working in this world, [including] their monks and priests, except for those among them who have no work, cut off from worldly life, abandoning it [ʿUbaydallāh reported here, "Except for those having no work, cut off from worldly life, abandoning it."] or[202] [those who are] traveling, abandoning the worldly life. Khālid promises that he will protect them. If he does not protect them, then they have no obligations until he does protect them. If they commit betrayal in deed or in word, then the [Muslims'] conscience is free of [any obligation to] them. [2045]

This was written in the month of Rabīʿ al-Awwal of the year 12 [16 May–14 June 633], and the document was given to the people of al-Ḥīrah.

When the people of al-Sawād rebelled after the death of Abū Bakr they made light of the agreement and caused it to be lost, rebelling among those who had rebelled. The Persians dominated them. When al-Muthannā conquered them for the second time they offered [to accept] the same terms [again]; however, al-Muthannā did not respond favorably, but answered them with an additional condition. When al-Muthannā was driven back from the land, they rebelled [again] among those who rebelled and assisted [the revolt], making light of the agreement and causing it to be lost. When Saʿd[203] conquered the land and they [once again] offered the same agreement, he asked them [to accept] one of two conditions, but they did not re-

201. Previously, on p. 30, above, Zayd b. ʿAdī had been mentioned. Perhaps ʿAmr here is a confusion with the name of ʿAmr b. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ.

202. Text: wa; read: aw, as Kos. and Cairo ed.

203. That is Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ Mālik al-Zuhrī, the victor of al-Qādisiyyah and the conqueror of central Iraq, who also founded the city of al-Kūfah. He was governor of al-Kūfah from its foundation to 20/641 and again in 25/646. He died at al-ʿAqīq near Medina in 50/670 or 55/675. See *EI*², s.v. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 20; II, 495; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 137–49; VI, 12–13.

spond to either. He therefore imposed [conditions] on them, investigating what he deemed that they could bear [paying]. He imposed on them [a tax of] four hundred thousand [dirhams], aside from the choice spoils (ḥarazah).[204] ('Ubaydallāh reported, "Other than al-kharazah.")[205]

'Ubaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf and al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—al-Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim al-Kinānī—a man from the Banū Kinānah; and Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq: Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh[206] was among those who had gone out to Syria with Khālid b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣī.[207] Jarīr asked Khālid leave [to go] to Abū Bakr in order to speak to him about his people, to collect them to him, for they were scattered among the Arabs, and to deliver them. Khālid b. Sa'īd gave him permission. On coming to Abū Bakr, Jarīr mentioned to him a promise from the Prophet. He brought forth witnesses to that promise and requested that the ca-[2046] liph effect it. But Abū Bakr became angry and said to Jarīr, "You see our work and what we are doing to help the Muslims against those two lions who are before them, the Persians and the Romans. Then you force me to pay attention to what will not avail me in place of what I am content with for [the sake of] God and His Prophet. Leave me and go to join Khālid b. al-Walīd so that I may see what God decrees on these two fronts." At this, Jarīr went forth until he came to Khālid when the latter was at al-Ḥīrah. Thus Jarīr did not participate in anything that occurred in Iraq, except for what happened after [the conquest of] al-Ḥīrah, nor was he present at any of Khālid's battles with the apostates (ahl al-riddah).

Regarding the battles of al-Ḥīrah, al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr said:

God has provided slain victims by the Euphrates abiding and others in the midst of the enclosing sand hills.

---

204. As is apparent from pp. 40 and 184, below, this refers to the property abandoned by either members of the defunct Sāsānian dynasty or those nobles who had fled with them.

205. This term, meaning "gem" in the singular, appears to fit the context less well.

206. Al-Bajalī; he was famous not only for his participation in the early conquests and the founding of al-Kūfah but also for his role on 'Alī's side in the First Civil War. He is said to have died at Qarqīsiyā' in 51/671. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 222, II, 258; Donner, Conquests, 68, 175, 178, 196–98, 200–2, 216, 242–43, 260, 369, 381–82, 387, 407, 409, 432, 438; Crone, Slaves, 114.

207. Al-Umawī al-Qurashī, d. 13 (635). An early Muslim, he appears to have been somewhat headstrong and to have disagreed with both Abū Bakr and 'Umar. See *EI*², s.v. Khālid b. Sa'īd; Donner, Conquests, 87, 113–14, 116–17, 135, 358, 360, 365–67.

And we trampled Hurmuz at al-Kawāẓim, and at al-Thiny [we trampled] the two horns of Qārin by the running torrents.
And on the day when we surrounded the castles, there followed directly for spacious al-Ḥīrah one of the turns of time.
We brought them down from their castles when their throne had almost [2047] begun to topple through the act of the transgressing coward.
We bombarded them with kindness after they had seen the evening draught of deaths around those extremities,
On the morning on which they said, "We are a people who went down to the countryside from the land of the Arabs of firm counsel."[208]

What Happened after al-Ḥīrah

ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿd al-Zuhrī—his uncle—Sayf—Jamīl al-Ṭāʾī[209]—his father:[210] When Shuwayl was given Karāmah bt. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ, I said to ʿAdī b. Ḥātim, "Are you not astonished by Shuwayl's asking for Karāmah bt. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ in spite of his low status (ḍaʿf)?" He responded, "He has always praised her immoderately." Shuwayl said, "That occurred because when I heard the Prophet of God naming those towns that would be given to him, he included al-Ḥīrah among those which would be given, as if the terraces of its fortresses were the molars of dogs. I knew [from this] that he had been shown it and that it would be conquered. Thereupon I brought up the matter of the request with him."[211]

---

208. That is, they claimed to be nomadic Arabs who had become sedentarized.

209. Jamīl b. Zayd. As a traditionist, he was considered weak, though some important people like Sufyān al-Thawrī transmitted from him. Although he is said to have been either a Kūfan or a Baṣran, his associations seem to have been mainly with al-Kūfah, and Sayf's claim to have transmitted from him only confirms this. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 114.

210. Unknown. Ibn Ḥajar's article on Jamīl does not mention any transmission from his father. It would appear that Sayf has tacked "his father" on to the end of an isnād, as he may have done in many other cases as well.

211. This report appears to mean that Shuwayl heard the Prophet listing the towns that would be conquered, information that he was given by God. Knowing that Karā-

[2048] ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf—ʿAmr and Mujālid—al-Shaʿbī; and al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Mujālid—al-Shaʿbī: When Shuwayl came to Khālid, he said "I heard the Prophet of God mentioning the conquest of al-Ḥīrah, so I asked him for Karāmah. He answered, 'She is yours if it is taken by force.' " His claim was attested to [by witnesses]. According to that, Khālid made peace with the Ḥīrans provided they delivered[212] Karāmah to him. But it was hard for her family and town to bear what had befallen her, and they considered the danger great. But Karāmah said, "Do not risk [resistance], but rather be patient. What do you fear for a woman who has reached eighty years of age? This is only a foolish man; he saw me when I was in my youth and supposed that [my] youthfulness would last."

Therefore they turned her over to Khālid, and Khālid gave her to Shuwayl. She said, "What do you need from an old woman such as you see? Ransom me." Shuwayl replied, "No, only by my own judgment." She said, "You may decide freely." He said, "I would not belong to Umm Shuwayl if I lowered your [price] below one thousand dirhams." Karāmah [pretended to] consider that too much in order to deceive him, but then she brought it to him. Thus she returned to her family. When the people heard about that, they rebuked him, so that he declared, "I did not think that any number was greater than a thousand." But they insisted that he quarrel with them, so that he said, "My intention was [to demand] the largest amount possible. They have stated that there are numbers greater than a thousand." Khālid said, "You wanted something, but God wanted something else. We will go by what is visible and will leave you with your intention, whether you be lying or telling the truth."

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAmr—al-Shaʿbī: When Khālid conquered al-Ḥīrah, he prayed the prayer of victory, [which is] eight prostrations (rakaʿāt) without any interruption in them.[213] Then he went away, saying "When I fought on the Day of Muʾtah,[214] nine mah was in al-Ḥīrah and that al-Ḥīrah was in the list, he requested that he be given her as part of his booty when the town was captured. Shuwayl does not appear in the Sīrah or in Ibn Ḥajar's Iṣābah. See the next report.

---

212. Text: fa dafaʿahā; read: bi-dafʿihā, as Kos.

213. Normally, ṣalāh is broken after at most every four rakaʿāt, when the leader of the worship says salām to his right and left.

214. The famous Muslim long-distance raid of the year 8/629 into modern Jordan east of the Dead Sea, in which Khālid b. al-Walid is said to have saved the Muslim army. However, there is some doubt about the actual nature of this raid, as the sources swords were broken in my hand, but never did I encounter a people like those I met from among the Persians. And I never met among the Persians a people like those of Ullays."

ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — ʿAmr and al-Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī: Khālid performed the prayer of victory and then went away. After this, he reported the like of al-Sarī's version. [2049]

ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf; and al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Ismāʿīl b. Abī Khālid[215] — Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim,[216] who came with Jarīr to Khālid: We came to Khālid at al-Ḥīrah when he was wearing his sword, which pulled his robe tight around his neck. He was offering worship in it alone. Then he went away, saying, "Nine swords were broken in my hand on the Day of Muʾtah. Then a broad-bladed Yamanī sword lasted in my hand, and it has not ceased to be with me."

ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh — Abū ʿUthmān, Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam — al-Mughīrah b. ʿUtaybah, al-Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim — a man from the Banū Kinānah, and Sufyān al-Aḥmarī — Māhān:[217] When the people of al-Ḥīrah had made peace with Khālid, Ṣalūbā b. Nasṭūnā,[218] the ruler of Quss al-Nāṭif[219] went forth report very few martyrs by name, other than the three top commanders. See Watt, Medina, 53–55; EI[1], s.v. Muʾta.

---

215. A mawlā of the Aḥmas of the Bajīlah and a miller by trade, he was a very famous Kūfan traditionist, who was regarded as reliable by such muḥaddithūn as Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal and al-Bukhārī, owing to his transmissions from al-Shaʿbī. He transmitted particularly plentifully from Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim, who is mentioned in this isnād. He is said to have transmitted between three hundred and five hundred *ḥadīth*s. He died in 145–46/762–63. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 344; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 651; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 291–92.

216. Abū ʿAbdallāh Qays b. Ḥuṣayn b. ʿAwf b. ʿAbd al-Ḥārith b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAwf al-Bajalī al-Aḥmasī, a Kūfan traditionist who nevertheless transmitted traditions from many Companions of the Prophet who never left Medina. He is said to have been on his way to render allegiance to the Prophet when the latter died. He is also claimed to have preferred ʿUthmān and to have attacked ʿAlī, wherefore many of the early Kūfan transmitters avoided quoting from him. In spite of this, he generally enjoyed a high reputation later. He died in the period 84–98/703–17. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 36, 67; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 425; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, III, 247–48; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 386–89; Iṣābah, III, 267, 271–72.

217. Apparently Māhān Abū Sālim al-Ḥanafī, a Kūfan traditionist who was executed in 83/702 by al-Ḥajjāj. This would make him a little early for Sayf's isnād, but Sayf is not meticulous about chronology. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 25–26.

218. Unidentified.

219. The same as Qusyāthā or Bāqusyāthā on the west bank of the Euphrates opposite al-Marwaḥah not far from al-Kūfah. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 306.

until he entered Khālid's camp, whereupon he made peace with him for Bāniqyā and Basmā,[220] guaranteeing to him all that was in them and their lands from the bank of the Euphrates. He also contracted for himself, his family, and his people to pay ten thousand dīnārs, other than the choice spoils, the spoils of Kisrā.[221] In addition, every person had to pay four dirhams [as capitation tax]. A document was written up for them. Both sides were faithful to the charter, which [2050] was not to apply should Persia [re]conquer [the concerned lands] by treachery.

Al-Mujālid joins the other transmitters regarding the [text of] the charter [as follows]:

> In the name of God, the All-Compassionate, the Merciful. This is a document from Khālid b. al-Walīd to Ṣalūbā b. Nasṭūnā and his people. I give you a covenant on condition [of payment] of the jizyah in return for protection. [This is a requirement] for whoever is able [to pay in] both Bāniqyā and Basmā, in the amount of ten thousand dīnārs, aside from the chosen spoils, the wealthy according to the amount of his wealth, and the poor according to the extent of his poverty, every year. You have been made your people's representative; they have accepted you. I and those with me have accepted. I am satisfied, and your people are also satisfied. Therefore, you have a guarantee of security and protection, so that, if we protect you, we are entitled to the jizyah, but, if not, then not until we do protect you. Witnessed by Hishām b. al-Walīd, al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr, Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥimyarī,[222] and Ḥanẓalah b. al-Rabīʿ,[223] and written in Ṣafar 12 [17 April–15 May 633].

---

220. Probably the same as Bārūsmā. See p. 3, above.

221. Text: kharazah; read: ḥarazah, as on p. 36, above.

222. This would seem to be a mistake for al-Bajalī, as Ms. IH somewhat clumsily tried to emend. However, it is possible that Sayf was trying to emphasize that Jarīr al-Bajalī did not participate in the earliest conquests, as he does elsewhere, e.g., p. 36, above. Note that in this list only this Jarīr is identified by a tribal surname.

223. Al-Usayyidī and a Companion of the Prophet; he was sent by the latter to al-Ṭā'if, fought later at al-Qādisiyyah and Nihāwand, settled in al-Kūfah, abandoned ʿAlī at the Battle of the Camel, and then went to Qarqisiyā', where he died in the reign of Muʿāwiyah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 83; II, 298; Ibn Muzāḥim, Ṣiffīn, 8, 95–96; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 55; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 77, 120; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 359–60; Donner, Conquests, 369, 393, 430.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh—Abū ʿUthmān—Ibn Abī Muknif,[224] Ṭalḥah—al-Mughīrah, and Sufyān—Māhān; also ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — Muḥammad — Abū ʿUthmān, and Ṭalḥah—al-Mughīrah: The dihqāns were waiting for Khālid, watching what happened to the people of al-Ḥīrah. When the relations between the people of al-Ḥīrah and Khālid stayed in order and the Ḥīrans fulfilled the agreement, the dihqāns of al-Miltāṭayn[225] came to him. Thus, Zādh b. Buhaysh, the dihqān of Furāt Siryā,[226] and Ṣalūbā b. Nasṭūnā b. Buṣbuhrā came to him. [It is given thus in the version of al-Sarī; however, ʿUbaydallāh says Ṣalūbā b. Buṣbuhrā and Nasṭūnā.] These men made peace with him for [2051] the lands from al-Falālīj[227] to Hurmuzjird[228] for two million [dirhams]. [However, ʿUbaydallāh in his version says one million heavy[229] [dirhams].] In addition, the Muslims received whatever had belonged to the family of Kisrā and those who, along with them, had left their homes and thus were not parties to the peace agreement. Khālid set up his tent in his camp and wrote out a charter for them, [as follows:]

> In the name of God, the All-Compassionate, the Merciful. This is a charter from Khālid b. al-Walīd to Zādh b. Buhaysh and Ṣalūbā b. Nasṭūnā. You have a guarantee of security and must pay the jizyah. You are guarantors of those whom you have been chosen to represent of the people of lower and central Bihqubādh.[230] [ʿUbaydallāh says: You are responsi-

224. Unidentified and considered to be a fabrication by ʿAskarī, Khamsūn wa miʾah ṣaḥābī, 87.

225. The banks of the Euphrates in the vicinity of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 192; Donner, Conquests, 180.

226. A subdistrict of lower Bihqubādh east of al-Falālīj and west of Hurmuzjird. See Morony, Iraq, 149. Zādh is not mentioned elsewhere.

227. Two districts between the two arms of the Euphrates just above the Great Swamp and extending to the modern al-Fallūjah in the north; west of the lower Nahr Sūrā. See *EI*², s.v. Fallūdja and al-Fallūdja; Le Strange, Lands, 74, 81; Musil, Middle Euphrates, 125 n. 67; Morony, Iraq, 149.

228. A subdistrict of lower Bihqubādh east of Furāt Siryā. See Morony, Iraq, 149–50.

229. Or "received," according to other manuscript evidence.

230. Bihqubādh consists of a large district divided into three subdivisions on the east bank of the medieval Euphrates, which is the modern Ḥillah branch. The most detailed discussion is in Morony, Iraq, 147–51. See also *EI*², s.v. Bihḳubādh; Le Strange, Lands, 81.

ble for the jizyah[231] of those whom you have been chosen to represent.] [The jizyah is] two million [dirhams] to be paid every year by[232] everyone who is able, other than what is required of Bāniqyā and Basmā. You have given satisfaction to me and the Muslims, and we have given satisfaction to you, to the people of lower Bihqubādh, and to whoever has joined with you of the people of central Bihqubādh, regarding your possessions, that there is in them nothing belonging to the family of Kisrā or those who fled with them. Witnessed by Hishām b. al-Walīd, al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr, Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥimyarī, Bashīr b. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Khaṣāṣiyyah, and Ḥanẓalah b. al-Rabīʿ, and written in Ṣafar 12 (17 April–15 May 633).

[2052] Khālid b. al-Walīd sent out his agents (ʿummāl) and support troops. He sent as agents [the following]: ʿAbdallāh b. Wathīmah al-Naṣrī[233] stayed at the upper part of the district at al-Falālīj to offer protection and collect the jizyah. Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh was in charge of Bāniqyā and Basmā. Bashīr b. al-Khaṣāṣiyyah was in charge of al-Nahrayn and stayed at al-Kuwayfah[234] by Bānbūrā.[235] Suwayd b. Muqarrin al-Muzanī was sent to Nistar[236] and stayed at al-ʿAqr,[237] which is called ʿAqr Suwayd to this day and was not named for Su-

231. Text: ḥarb; read: jizyah, as Cairo ed. See also Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXII.

232. Text: thumma; read: ʿan, as IH and Cairo ed. See also Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXII.

233. Sayf later places him in the North African campaign in 27/648. See Ṭabarī, I, 2814.

234. Also known as Kuwayfat Ibn ʿUmar for ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who stayed there when he was out of favor for slaying the alleged assassins of his father without a hearing. It was near Bazīqiyā, which, according to Ibn Rustah, Aʿlāq, 182, lay 10 km. south of the Nahr Kūthā and 15 km. north of Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 496; Le Strange, Lands, map II. This would place it near to Bārūsmā according to Le Strange. But Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 412, followed by Morony, Iraq, 149, would place it near al-Ḥillah in Bihqubādh.

235. Described by Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 331, as a place near al-Ḥīrah, but his report parallels that of Sayf here and may be derived from it.

236. A subdistrict of lower Bihqubādh, possibly north of Furāt Siryā on the Great Sarāt Canal, a part of the Nahr Sūrā. See Morony, Iraq, 149–50; *EI*², s.v. Bihḳubādh.

237. ʿAqr Bābil, near the site of Babylon on the east side of the east branch of the Euphrates. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 136; Morony, Iraq, 150.

wayd al-Minqarī.[238] Uṭṭ b. Abī Uṭṭ[239] was sent to Rūdhmistān,[240] staying at a place on a river; that river was named after him and thus is called Nahr Uṭṭ[241] to this day. Uṭṭ is a man of the Banū Sa'd b. Zayd Manāh.[242] Those were the agents for [the collection of] the kharāj in the time of Khālid b. al-Walīd.

The frontiers in the time of Khālid were at al-Sīb.[243] Khālid sent out Ḍirār b. al-Azwar, Ḍirār b. al-Khaṭṭāb, al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah, Ḍirār b. Muqarrin, al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr, Busr b. Abī Ruhm, and 'Utaybah b. al-Nahhās.[244] They took up quarters at al-Sīb in the midst of his dominion. These were the commanders of the frontiers of Khālid. Khālid ordered them to raid and to be persevering. Thus they penetrated into what was beyond that [place] up to the bank of the Tigris.

[The same authorities] report: When Khālid had conquered one of the two sides of al-Sawād, he called for a man from among the inhabitants of al-Ḥīrah and sent with him a letter to the Persians, who were then at al-Madā'in disputing and supporting [different parties] because of the death of Ardashīr. However, they did send Bahman [2053]

238. Suwayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, who fought against al-Mukhtār in al-Kūfah in 66/685, defended it again against Shabīb b. Yazīd in 76/695, and was rewarded with the governorship of Ḥulwān in 77/696. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 76; II, 519.

239. His existence is denied by al-'Askarī, Khamsūn wa mi'ah ṣaḥābī, 277–79, and 'Abdallāh b. Saba', 187, as he is found only in reports derived from Sayf. His mention in Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 110, appears to be derived only from Sayf.

240. A subdistrict of lower Bihqubādh. See Morony, Iraq, 149–50. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 317, gives it as Dawraqistān, which is clearly wrong, as it refers to a place in Khūzistān.

241. Mentioned by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 317, as a place near al-Ḥīrah, but the report is clearly derived from Sayf, showing no independent knowledge.

242. One of the three great branches of the great northeast Arabian tribe of the Tamīm. The others are the Ḥanẓalah b. Mālik, which is divided into the Ḍārim and the Yarbū', and the 'Amr b. Tamīm. See EI[1], s.v. Sa'd al-Fizr; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 59; II, 9, 497.

243. Lit., "the watercourse." Although several places with this name are mentioned, here it refers to two subdistricts, upper and lower Sīb, in the ṭassūj of Sūrā near Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah north of al-Ḥillah and east of the east branch of the Euphrates. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 293; Le Strange, Lands, map II. In this volume, it normally appears in reference to a specific canal, presumably that from which the district took its name.

244. The first three persons on this list are attested in sources other than Sayf, though not, except for al-Muthannā, in this campaign; the presence of the latter four appears to be fictitious.

Jādhūyah[245] down to Bahurasīr.[246] It was as if he were in charge of the vanguard [of a larger force]. Accompanying Bahman Jādhūyah was al-Āzādhbih with others like him. Khālid also called on Ṣalūbā to provide a man and then sent two letters with the two men. One of the men was to be sent to the elite; the other was to go to the commoners. One of them was a Ḥīran; the other was a Nabaṭī.[247] When Khālid asked the messenger from al-Ḥīrah, "What is your name?" the latter replied, "Murrah." Khālid then said, "Take the letter and bring it to the Persians, so that God may make their life bitter, or that they may become Muslims[248] and turn to God in repentance." Khālid also asked the messenger of Ṣalūbā, "What is your name?" He answered, "Hizqīl." Khālid said, "Then take the letter," also saying, "O God, wipe them out!"[249] [Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mujālid and others reported a like version.] [The texts of] the two letters:

> In the name of God, the All-Compassionate, the Merciful. From Khālid b. al-Walīd to the kings of Persia. Praise be to God Who dissolved your order, made your plotting weak, and divided you among yourselves. Had he not done that to you, it would have been worse for you. Therefore, enter into our faith; we will leave you and your land alone and pass beyond you to others different from you. If not, that will happen [anyway], even though you loathe [it], by force, at the hands of a people who love death just as you love life.
>
> In the name of God, the All-Compassionate, the Merciful. From Khālid b. al-Walīd to the governors (marāzibah) of 245. This man is mentioned by Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 109, in connection with the Battle of the Bridge. Ibn Khayyāṭ calls him Bahmān b. Khurhurmuzān (voweling of last word is conjectural). Presumably both Jādhūyah and Khurhurmuzān are derived from a single original word, as they resemble each other somewhat in the Arabic script. As Ibn Khayyāṭ's report is derived from Ibn Isḥāq, this Bahman must not be an invention of Sayf, though Sayf may have introduced him into contexts where he did not originally exist, as here. Sayf's version of Bahman's role in the Battle of the Bridge (see below pp. 188–93) may be profitably compared with Ibn Khayyāṭ's.

246. Original Pahlavī name is Veh-Ardashīr. This city, a part of the Sāsānian capital complex of al-Madāʾin, was a round, walled city on the west bank of the Tigris and already in decline by the time the Muslims came. See *EI*², s.v. al-Madāʾin; Le Strange, Lands, 34–35, map II.

247. This term, meaning "Nabataean," is used to refer to the non-Arab Syriac-speaking population of the Fertile Crescent. See *EI*¹, s.v. Nabataeans.

248. Or "surrender."

249. Both comments to the messengers are plays on their respective names.

> Persia. Embrace Islam so that you may be safe. If not, make a covenant of protection with me and pay the jizyah. Otherwise, I have brought you a people who love death just as you love drinking wine. [2054]

ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — Muḥammad b. Nuwayrah — Abū ʿUthmān; and al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh — Abū ʿUthmān, al-Muhallab b. ʿUqbah, Ziyād b. Sarjis — Siyāh,[250] and Sufyān al-Aḥmarī — Māhān: The kharāj was brought to Khālid within fifty nights. Those who had guaranteed payment and those who were the chief men of the country districts (rasātīq) were hostages in his hands. Khālid gave all of that to the Muslims, who were thereby strengthened in their affairs. The Persians were left split by the death of Ardashīr regarding the kingship but in agreement on fighting Khālid and supporting each other [in that]. The Persians stayed like that for a year, while the Muslims were penetrating up to the Tigris. The Persians held nothing between al-Ḥīrah and the Tigris, nor did any of them have a guarantee of security except for those who had written to Khālid and received a written charter from him. The rest of the people of al-Sawād were either in flight, defending themselves in fortresses, or fighting [in the field]. The agents for collecting the kharāj were asked for written acknowledgments and would write releases for those liable to pay the kharāj out of one prototype:

> In the name of God, the All-Compassionate, the Merciful. Release is given to whoever is from such-and-such from the jizyah for which the amīr Khālid b. al-Walīd made peace with them. I have received that for which Khālid made peace with them. Khālid and the Muslims are a united force for you against whoever changes Khālid's peace. As long as you acknowledge the jizyah and refrain [from breaking the agreement], your security will be guaranteed and your peace kept. We will be faithful to you. [2055]

They made to witness for them those companions whom Khālid had caused to witness: Hishām, al-Qaʿqāʿ, Jābir b. Ṭāriq,[251] Jarīr, Bashīr, 250. Perhaps representing the father of Sayf's dubious ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Siyāh al-Aḥmarī.

251. Jābir b. Ṭāriq b. Abī Ṭāriq b. ʿAwf al-Aḥmasī al-Bajalī, he was a Companion of the Prophet who occasioned a ḥadīth. He fought at al-Qādisiyyah and settled in al-Kūfah. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 212.

Ḥanẓalah, Azdādh,[252] al-Ḥajjāj b. Dhī al-ʿUnuq,[253] and Mālik b. Zayd.[254]

ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf—ʿAṭiyyah b. al-Ḥārith[255]—ʿAbd Khayr:[256] Khālid departed after the people of al-Ḥīrah had written a document that he approved stating, "We have paid the jizyah for which Khālid, the good servant [of God], and the Muslims, God's good servants, made a covenant with us, on condition that they and their commander protect us from aggression from the Muslims or others."

Al-Sarī, in what he has written for me — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAṭiyyah b. al-Ḥārith — ʿAbd Khayr — Hishām b. al-Walīd: Khālid was finished ...; then the rest of the report is like the report of ʿUbaydallāh b. Saʿd.

ʿUbaydallāh—his uncle—Sayf; and also al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf —ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Siyāh[257]—Ḥabīb b. Abī Thābit[258]—Ibn al-Hu-

---

252. Azdādh b. Fasā'ah al-Fārisī, the Persian mawlā of Baḥīr b. Raysān al-Ḥimyarī. One of his traditions transmitted by other than Sayf appears in the collection of Ibn Mājah, so that he does not appear to be a fabrication of Sayf. But his status as Companion is denied by the best authorities, including al-Bukhārī and Abū Ḥātim. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 29. As his patron Baḥīr b. Raysān appears only as a governor of Yemen for Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah and is later mentioned in connection with al-Kūfah at the time of al-Mukhtār's revolt in 66/686, it seems that the reference to Azdādh here is chronologically far out of place. See Ṭabarī, II, 277, 601.

253. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Khuwaylid al-Aḥmasī, a noble of the Bajīlah, he governed one of the subdistricts of al-Ḥīrah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 223; II, 291; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 312.

254. Mentioned only by Sayf, apparently once. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 485, gives his name as Mālik b. Yazīd, but derives the report from Sayf; thus it is unlikely that this Mālik was a Companion of the Prophet. Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 396, lists two Mālik b. Yazīds and twenty Mālik b. Zayds but provides little information about them, so that one of them may be the one meant here.

255. Abū Rawq al-Hamdānī; he was a Kūfan transmitter generally deemed reliable who also wrote a tafsīr of the Qur'ān. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 227; II, 205; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 369; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 418 (giving his nisbah as al-Ashʿarī); Ibn Ḥajar, Taḥdhīb, VII, 224.

256. ʿAbd Khayr b. Yazīd al-Khaywānī of the Hamdān; he was a Kūfan transmitter who fought for ʿAlī at Ṣiffīn. See Ibn Muzāḥim, Ṣiffīn, 136, 342, 353; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 221; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 96; Taḥdhīb, VI, 124–25.

257. The mawlā of the Asad; he was a Kūfan transmitter of tradition and had a good reputation but is said to have been a leader of the Shīʿah. He lived with Ḥabīb b. Abī Thābit and died in the time of al-Manṣūr. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 363; Ibn Ḥajar, Taḥdhīb, VI, 340–41.

258. A Kūfan mawlā of the Banū Kāhil of the Asad and a well-known transmitter of tradition with a fair reputation; he died in 119/737 at the age of seventy-three. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 320; Ibn Ḥajar, Taḥdhīb, II, 178–80.

dhayl al-Kāhilī,[259] a similar version: Khālid commanded the two messengers whom he sent out to bring him the news. Khālid stayed [2056] in office for a year, residing at al-Ḥīrah, traveling around and about before his departure for Syria. Meanwhile, the Persians were overthrowing kings and enthroning others, there being no defensive effort except at Bahurasīr. That was because Shīrā b. Kisrā had slain all his [male] relatives descended from Kisrā b. Qubādh;[260] then the people of Persia had risen after Shīrā and after Ardashīr his son and killed all [the descendants of the kings] between Kisrā b. Qubādh and Bahrām Jūr.[261] After that, they remained unable to agree on anyone to make king.

ʿUbaydallāh — his uncle — Sayf — ʿAmr and al-Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī: In the period between his conquest of al-Ḥīrah and his departure for Syria, Khālid b. al-Walīd continued for more than a year to deal with the work of ʿIyāḍ that had been reported to him. Khālid declared:

> If not for what the caliph entrusted me with, I would not have saved ʿIyāḍ. He was grieving and causing grief at Dūmah. There was nothing left to do except to conquer Persia. It was behavior (sunnah) like the behavior of women. The caliph had enjoined him not to invade their land further as long as any of their organized forces were behind him. And the Persians [then] had a force at al-ʿAyn,[262] another at al-Anbār,[263] and another at al-Firāḍ.[264]

When Khālid's dispatches fell into the hands of the people of al-Ma-

---

259. Unidentified.

260. The Sāsānian king Khusraw I Anūshirwān, who reigned 531–79 C.E.

261. The Sāsānian king Bahrām V, who reigned 420–38 C.E.

262. ʿAyn al-Tamr. An oasis 61 km. west of Karbalāʾ and due south of al-Ramādī, it was administratively part of upper Bihqubādh. Its inhabitants were of the Taghlib, Namir, and Asad. See EI², s.v. ʿAyn al-Tamr; Le Strange, Lands, 65, 81; Musil, Arabia Deserta, 361–63, 365, esp. n. 92; Middle Euphrates, 297–98, 307–8; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 176–77.

263. A large town on the Euphrates strategically situated at the head of the irrigation system of central Iraq. See EI², s.v. al-Anbār; Le Strange, Lands, 65–66; Musil, Middle Euphrates, 295–97.

264. Identified by Musil as al-Furḍah, then further identified with the ruins of al-Ṣāliḥiyyah 48 km. northwest of Abū Kamāl on the Euphrates. The same as ancient Roman Dura Europus, which marked the Roman-Persian frontier. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 10–13, 252, 313.

dā'in, the women of Kisrā's family spoke up, so that al-Farrukhzādh [2057] b. al-Bindawān[265] was put in charge until such time as Kisrā's family agreed on a man [to make king], if they could find him.

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh—Abū 'Uthmān, Ṭalḥah—al-Mughīrah, al-Muhallab—Siyāh, and Sufyān—Māhān: Abū Bakr had charged Khālid to approach Iraq from below and 'Iyāḍ to approach Iraq from above, [saying]:

> Whichever of you two is first to al-Ḥīrah, he is the amīr of al-Ḥīrah. Then when you have joined forces at al-Ḥīrah, God willing, routed the forces between the Arabs and Persia, and are safe from the Muslims being attacked from behind, let one of you stay at al-Ḥīrah while the other attacks the Persians. Fight them patiently for the sake of what you have in your hands. Seek God's help and protect yourselves from His wrath. Prefer the matter of the afterlife to this world so that you may obtain the benefits of both, and do not prefer this world lest you be denied both. Be watchful [to uphold] that which God has cautioned you about: abandon sins and hasten to repentance. Do not by any means persist [in sinning] and delay repentance.

Khālid kept what he had been commanded [to do], stationing himself at al-Ḥīrah. The lands between al-Falālīj and the lower Sawād came under his control. At that time, he divided the Sawād of al-Ḥīrah among Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥimyarī, Bashīr b. al-Khaṣāṣiyyah, Khālid b. al-Wāshimah,[266] Ibn Dhī al-'Unuq, Uṭṭ, Suwayd, and Ḍirār.[267] He divided the Sawād of al-Ubullah between Suwayd b.
[2058] al-Muqarrin, Ḥasakah al-Ḥabaṭī,[268] al-Ḥuṣayn b. Abī al-Ḥurr,[269] and Rabī'ah b. 'Isl.[270] He confirmed [the placement] of the forces on the frontiers and left al-Qa'qā' b. 'Amr as his deputy in charge of al-Ḥīrah. Then Khālid departed for 'Iyāḍ's province to settle what was 265. Mentioned only in transmissions from Sayf in this volume; otherwise unidentified.

---

266. Unidentified.

267. But which Ḍirār?

268. As he does not occur in other sources, he is called an invention of Sayf by al-'Askarī, 'Abdallāh b. Saba', 187.

269. Al-Ḥuṣayn b. Mālik al-'Anbarī of al-Baṣrah, he founded a lineage in that city. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 81; II, 336.

270. Of the 'Amr b. Yarbū' of the Tamīm, a Baṣran, he fought on the side of 'Ā'ishah at the Battle of the Camel in 36/656, then was governor of Herat for Mu'āwiyah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 68; II, 479.

between them and to help him. He went by way of al-Fallūjah until he stopped at Karbalā',[271] where ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr was in charge of the garrison. Al-Aqraʿ b. Ḥābis[272] was in command of Khālid's vanguard because al-Muthannā was [then] in charge of a frontier post facing al-Madā'in. The Muslims would raid the Persians, reaching the bank of the Tigris, both before Khālid's departure from al-Ḥīrah and after he had left to help ʿIyāḍ.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū Rawq—someone who was present with them, giving a similar account, until the point where he said: Khālid stayed at Karbalā' some days. ʿAbdallāh b. Wathīmah complained to him of the flies. Khālid told him, "Be patient for I want only to empty the [enemy's] armed posts that ʿIyāḍ had been commanded to deal with, so that we might settle the Arabs in them. By this the Muslims' troops will be safe from being attacked from the rear, and the Arabs coming to us will be sheltered and not have to sink in the sand. Thus the caliph has commanded us, and his opinion equals the support of the [whole] community." A man of the Ashjaʿ[273] said regarding Ibn Wathīmah's complaint:

My mount has been detained in Karbalā' and in al-ʿAyn until its fat [part] has become thin.
If she slackly moves from a kneeling place, she returns to it;
by the life of her father, I most certainly despise her. [2059]
There keeps her from the water of every drinking place a company of flies whose eyes are blue.

Al-Anbār, Which Is Dhāt al-ʿUyūn, and Kalwādhā[274]

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and their companions: Khālid b. al-Walīd went forth with that mobilization in which 271. The site of al-Ḥusayn's martyrdom. See *EI*², s.v. Karbalā'.

272. Al-Mujāshiʿī al-Dārimī, of a noble Tamīmī lineage, he is said to have become a Muslim in Medina before the fall of Mecca in 8/630, more likely in the year of delegations, 9/631. He is alleged to have been the cause of the revelation of Qur'ān 49:4–5. Migrating to al-Baṣrah, he participated in many conquests in Iraq and Iran and conquered al-Jūzjān in northern Afghanistan in 32/652–53. See *EI*², s.v. al-Aqraʿ b. Ḥābis; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 61; II, 191; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I, 288, 294, 358, 447; II, 153, 161; IV, 246, 273, 282; VII, 37; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 78, 503–4; Ibn ʿAsākir, Tahdhīb, III, 89–94; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 58–59.

273. A Muḍarī subtribe and army regiment, one of the main branches of the Ghaṭafān. See *EI*², s.v. Ghaṭafān; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 92.

274. The seat of a subdistrict on the east bank of the Tigris not far south of Baghdād. See *EI*², s.v. Kalwādhā; Le Strange, Lands, 32, 80.

he left al-Ḥīrah. Al-Aqraʿ b. Ḥābis was in command of his vanguard. When al-Aqraʿ stopped at the last stage on the way to al-Anbār, a group of the Muslims had camels about to give birth but could not halt, finding no escape from proceeding forward with their camels in labor following them. When departure was commanded, they tied up the teats of the camels with young and carried the newborn camels on the rumps of others, for the newborns could not bear walking, and thus they came riding to al-Anbār.

Meanwhile, the people of al-Anbār had fortified themselves and built a ditch to stop the enemy, while they stayed high up in their castle. The commander of those troops was Shīrzādh, the governor of Sābāṭ,[275] who was the most sensible Persian on that day, as well as the most lordly and best liked among the people, both Arabs and Persians. The Arabs of al-Anbār that day called out from the wall, "Evil has overtaken al-Anbār by morning: a [grown] camel carrying its young one, and a camel[276] whose seeking of shelter has made it strong." Shīrzādh asked, "What are they saying?" When it was explained to him, he said, "As for these, they have pronounced against [2060] themselves a sentence [of defeat]. That is because, if a people pronounce a sentence against themselves, its effect tends to stick to them. By God, if Khālid had not [already] passed by, I would have made peace with him."

While they were talking, Khālid came to the vanguard and approached the ditch. Fighting broke out.[277] Khālid would become impatient regarding it if he saw it or heard of it. He came to his archers to give them instructions, saying, "I see groups of people [here] who have no knowledge of warfare. Therefore shoot at their eyes; do not aim elsewhere." The archers shot one volley of arrows, then continued. As a result, a thousand eyes were put out on that day, so that that battle was named Dhāt al-ʿUyūn. The people shouted to one another, "The eyes of the people of al-Anbār have gone!" Shīrzādh asked, "What are they saying?" Then it was explained to him. He said, "Ābādh, ābādh,"[278] and sent a messenger to Khālid requesting

275. A part of the Madā'in complex of cities, it lay on the west bank of the Tigris 5 km. south of Veh-Ardashīr = Bahurasīr. See *EI*², s.v. al-Madā'in.

276. Text ḥiml; read: jamal, as in Ms. B and Cairo ed.

277. Or "He started the fighting." See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXII.

278. This is a Persian expression meaning "Good! Bravo!" See Steingass, Persian Dictionary, 3.

peace with a condition that Khālid did not accept, so that he sent back Shīrzādh's messengers empty-handed.

Khālid came to the narrowest place in the trench with the army's weakest camels, which he slaughtered and then threw into the ditch, filling it up. Then he launched an assault across the ditch, the weak camels' [bodies] being the bridges for his troops. The Muslims and the polytheists came together in the ditch, but the enemy recoiled into their fortress. Shīrzādh sent messengers to Khālid, [again] requesting peace according to what he wanted. [This time] Khālid accepted his request, including the condition that he leave Shīrzādh's way free, delivering him with a group of light cavalry to the Persian lines,[279] but without letting them take any goods or valuables with them. Thus Shīrzādh departed.

When he came to Bahman Jādhūyah and told him the news, Bahman blamed him. Shīrzādh answered,

> I was among a people who had no minds! Their origin is from the Arabs. I heard them at their coming pronouncing upon themselves a sentence [of defeat]. Rarely does it happen that a people pronounce a sentence against themselves but that it takes effect upon them. Then the troops fought against the Muslims, but these put out a thousand eyes among our troops and the inhabitants of the land. At this, I knew it was sounder to make peace.

When Khālid and the Muslims had become secure at al-Anbār, [2061] and the inhabitants of al-Anbār, feeling safe, had come forth, Khālid saw that they wrote in Arabic and were learned in it. He asked them, "What are you?" They replied, "A group of Arabs who settled amid a group of Arabs [who were here] before. The first of them settled al-Anbār in the days of Bukhtinaṣṣar,[280] when he allowed the Arabs. Thereafter they did not leave it." Khālid then asked, "From whom did you learn writing?"[281] They answered, "We learned writing from the Iyād."[282] They quoted the saying of the poet:[283]

---

279. Lit., "a safe place for him."

280. Arabic for Nebuchadnezzar = Nabu-kudurri-uṣur, the famous king of Babylon who ruled 605–561 B.C.E. See *EI*², s.v. Bukh-Naṣ(ṣ)ar.

281. Lit., "the book."

282. An Arab tribe living in many widely dispersed locations west of the Euphrates. See *EI*², s.v. Iyād.

283. These lines are attributed to Umayyah b. Abī al-Ṣalt al-Thaqafī in Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 47.

My people are the Iyād, if they were nearby, or if they had stayed, even though their camels would have become thin,
A people who gained the broad expanse of Iraq when they went off all together, as well as gaining the script[284] and the pen.

Khālid also made peace with those around al-Anbār. He began with the inhabitants of al-Bawāzīj.[285] The people of Kalwādhā also sent a messenger to him to make an agreement. He wrote out a charter for them and they became his confidants beyond the Tigris. Then the people of al-Anbār and the areas around it rebelled as a part of what would happen between the Muslims and the various nations of polytheists, except for the people of al-Bawāzīj, for they remained loyal just as did the people of Bāniqyā.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, that is, Ibn Siyāh—Ḥabīb b. Abī Thābit: No one in al-Sawād obtained a treaty before the battle except for the Banū Ṣalūbā, who are the people of al-Ḥīrah, Kalwādhā, and some of the towns on the Euphrates. Then these betrayed their agreements until they were invited to accept a guarantee of security [even] after they had committed betrayal.

[2062] Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad b. Qays:[286] I asked al-Shaʿbī, "Was al-Sawād taken by force?" He answered, "Yes, including all the land except for some of the castles and fortresses. For some of these made peace on terms with their besieger,[287] whereas some were conquered outright." Then I inquired, "Did the people of al-Sawād obtain a security agreement that they concluded before the flight?" He replied, "No, but after they were called on [to accept an agreement], when they had shown willingness to pay the kharāj and it was taken from them, their security then became guaranteed."

---

284. Or, "the cut sheet," referring to writing material, as in Ibn Hishām.

285. Here Bawāzīj al-Anbār, near the town of al-Anbār, is meant, rather than the distant Bawāzīj on the upper Tigris. According to Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 301, and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 503, it was conquered not by Khālid, but by Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī, certain of whose mawlās settled it.

286. Apparently Abū Naṣr Muḥammad b. Qays al-Asadī al-Wālibī, a Kūfan traditionist who transmitted from al-Shaʿbī. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 361; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 412–13.

287. Lit., "him," with no antecedent.

About ʿAyn al-Tamr

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, and Ziyād: When Khālid was done with al-Anbār, it being thoroughly under his control, he left al-Zibriqān b. Badr[288] as his deputy in charge of it. Khālid then headed for ʿAyn al-Tamr, where at that time there were Mihrān b. Bahrām Jūbīn[289] with a great force of Persians and ʿAqqah b. Abī ʿAqqah[290] with a mighty force of Arabs from the Namir,[291] Taghlib,[292] Iyād, and those who rallied to them.

When they heard of Khālid, ʿAqqah said to Mihrān, "Arabs are more knowledgeable about fighting Arabs. Therefore, leave Khālid to us." Mihrān said, "You have spoken the truth. By my life, you are indeed more knowledgeable about fighting the Arabs, just as you indeed are our equals in fighting the Persians." Thus he deceived ʿAqqah and used him for defense [against the Muslims]. Mihrān then said, "There they are for you! If you need us, we will help you." When ʿAqqah had marched off toward Khālid, the Persians asked Mihrān, "What made you say these words to this dog?" Mihrān replied, "Let me be, for I sought only what is better for you and worse for them. There have come against you those who have slain your

---

288. Ḥuṣayn b. Badr al-ʿAwfī of the Saʿd Tamīm. He was appointed by the Prophet to collect the ṣadaqah of part of the Tamīm and the Ribāb. He stayed in the desert later, though he frequently visited al-Baṣrah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 77; II, 335, 606.

289. This would be a son of Bahrām Chūbīn, the general who rebelled against Khusraw II Parwīz 590–91 C.E. and is enumerated as Bahrām VI in the list of Sāsānian monarchs. In view of the fact that the rebellion was put down and its adherents executed, it is unlikely that anyone from this family would reemerge as a commander of a frontier garrison at this late date. Rather, this is probably another case of Sayf's adorning his reports with invented personages of illustrious ancestry, a tendency that also occurs with the reappearance of the defunct dynasty of al-Ḥīrah in Ṭabarī, I, 2226. On Bahrām Chūbīn, see Theophylact, History, 101–2, 150, 152–53, and passim; Pseudo-Sebeos, History, 14–16, 18–20, 29, 31–32.

290. ʿAqqah b. Qays al-Namarī, the defender of ʿAyn al-Tamr, who was captured and executed by Khālid. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 167; II, 191.

291. Al-Namir b. Qāsiṭ, a smaller branch of the Rabīʿah who originated in southern Yamāmah, then migrated in the wake of the Taghlib to al-Jazīrah, where they were located partly at Raʾs al-ʿAyn on the Khābūr River. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 141; II, 444.

292. One of the two branches of the Wāʾil, the other being the Bakr, the Taghlib were located in the Jazīrah. They opposed Islam and clung to Christianity for a long time. See EI[1], Supplement, s.v. Taghlib; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 27–28, 541–42.

kings and routed your crack troops. I am warding them off with [2063] these Arabs. If our Arabs defeat Khālid, it is your victory. If it is the other way, you will not be reached by them until they have become exhausted. Then we will fight them while we are strong and they are weakened." At this, they admitted the excellence of his view.

Thus Mihrān stuck to the spring, while ʿAqqah confronted Khālid on the road. In charge of ʿAqqah's right was Bujayr b. So-and-So,[293] one of the Banū ʿUtbah[294] b. Saʿd b. Zuhayr.[295] On his left was al-Hudhayl b. ʿImrān.[296] Between ʿAqqah and Mihrān was half a day's journey.[297] Mihrān was in the fortress with the mobile troops of Persia, while ʿAqqah was on the road of al-Karkh[298] in a defensive position.

Khālid came upon him while putting his troops in battle formation. Khālid completed readying his troops for battle and then said to his two wings, "Hold back for us what the enemy has, for I am going to charge." He personally assigned covering forces and then charged while ʿAqqah was arranging his lines. Khālid engaged him in close combat and took him prisoner. ʿAqqah's line was defeated without fighting, the Muslims taking many of them prisoner. Bujayr and al-Hudhayl fled, with the Muslims in pursuit. When the news reached Mihrān, he fled with his troops and abandoned the fortress. When the defeated remnants of ʿAqqah's forces, both Arabs and Persians, reached the fortress, they rushed into it, taking refuge there.

Khālid approached with the Muslim troops to besiege the fortress. He had with him ʿAqqah as a prisoner and ʿAmr b. al-Ṣaʿiq.[299] The 293. Bujayr b. al-ʿAbd b. ʿAlqamah, the grandfather of ʿAlī's wife Umm Ḥabīb al-Sahbāʾ. See Ibn al-Kalbi, Ğamharat, I, 164; II, 228.

---

294. Text: ʿUbayd; read: ʿUtbah. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXII.

295. A clan of the Saʿd b. Zuhayr of the Taghlib. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 164; II, 578.

296. Al-Taghlibī from al-Jazīrah; he seems to be featured only in reports from Sayf, who improbably alleges that he was a follower of the Tamīmī false prophetess Sajāḥ, who was really from the Taghlib. This seems to be an attempt to remove the stigma of Sajāḥ's resistance to Islam from the Tamīm by transferring it to their Taghlibī rivals. See Ṭabarī, I, 1911, 1913, 1915, 1920, 1930.

297. Ar. rawḥah aw ghadwah, lit. "a going home at night or a going forth in the morning."

298. A common Iraqi place name. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 447. None of the specific Karkhs that he lists fit here.

299. Apparently ʿAmr b. Khuwaylid al-Ṣaʿiq al-Kilābī. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 96; II, 176; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 297; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 166. His death does not seem to be reported except in this place.

enemy hoped that Khālid would be like those of the Arabs who would raid [and withdraw], but when they saw Khālid was intent [on taking them], they asked for a safe-conduct. But Khālid refused any but his own terms, and they agreed to this readily. When they opened [the gates], Khālid handed them over to the Muslims, who bound them.[300] Khālid commanded that ʿAqqah, who had been their protector, be beheaded so that the prisoners might despair of life. When the prisoners saw him thrown onto the bridge, they despaired of life. Then Khālid called for ʿAmr b. al-Ṣaʿiq, who was beheaded as well. Khālid beheaded all the men of the fortress and took possession [2064] of all that their fortress contained, seizing as spoils what was in it.

Khālid found in their church forty boys who were studying the Gospel behind a locked door, which he broke down in getting to them. He asked, "What are you?" They replied, "Hostages." He divided them among the Muslims who had performed outstandingly in battle. They included Abū Ziyād, the mawlā of the Thaqīf,[301] Nuṣayr, the father of Mūsā b. Nuṣayr,[302] Abū ʿAmrah,[303] the grandfather of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā the poet,[304] Sīrīn,[305] the father of Muḥammad b. Sīrīn,[306] Ḥurayth, and ʿUlāthah.[307] Abū ʿAmrah went to 300. See Cairo ed., n. 2.

301. Unidentified.

302. The later conqueror of North Africa and Spain, he died in 97/716. His father, Nuṣayr, was the commander of Muʿāwiyah's guard. They usually are considered to have been mawlās of the Lakhm, but other identifications also exist. See EI[1], s.v. Mūsā b. Nuṣair; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, V, 318–29; ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd, Taʾrīkh al-maghrib al-ʿarabī, 238–56.

303. An Arab, al-Shaybānī of the Murrah b. Dhuhl b. Shaybān, he founded a famous family in Medina, celebrated by the great poet al-Farazdaq. See ʿAṭwān, Sīrah, 73–75.

304. An accomplished traditionist, poet, and orator, he was the tutor of Ayyūb, son of the caliph Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik. This was an important post, as Sulaymān was grooming Ayyūb for the succession when the latter died in 98/716. ʿAbdallāh continued to be a companion of the Umayyad caliphs, including ʿUmar II and Yazīd II, but fell afoul of Hishām. He lived until at least 126/744. See ʿAṭwān, Sīrah, 77–82. See also note 658, below.

305. According to Ṣafadī, Wāfī, III, 146, he was taken captive at Jarjarāyā, not ʿAyn al-Tamr. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 303, reconciles the two reports by making him a visitor from Jarjarāyā in ʿAyn al-Tamr at the time of the capture. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 176, has the information that Sīrīn was Ibn Sīrīn's mother, rather than his father, which may represent an attempt to harmonize the conflicting traditions.

306. The mawlā of the Anṣār, one of the most famous traditionists of his time; he lived in al-Baṣrah. His dates are 33–110/654–729. See Ṣafadī, Wāfī, III, 146; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 214–17.

307. These two men are unidentified.

Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah,[308] Ḥurayth to a man from the Banū ʿIbād,[309] ʿUlāthah to al-Muʿannā, and Ḥumrān[310] to ʿUthmān.[311] They also included ʿUmayr and Abū Qays,[312] who retained his family relationship (nasab) as one of the old mawlās of the Syrians. Nuṣayr was considered one of the Banū Yashkur,[313] whereas Abū ʿAmrah was considered one of the Banū Murrah.[314] These captives also included Ibn Ukht al-Namir.[315]

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, Abū Sufyān

---

308. Reportedly an early Muslim, he is said to have been of the marginal al-Ghawth (or Ṣūfat al-Rabīṭ) b. Murr b. Udd, who were confederates of the Jumaḥ of the Quraysh, according to Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 532; Ibn ʿAsākir, Tahdhīb, VI, 299. However, according to another tradition, he was the son of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. al-Muṭāʿ al-Kindī but was attributed to his mother Ḥasanah, a mawlāh of the Jumaḥ. This tradition also states that Shuraḥbīl was himself a confederate of the Qurashī Zuhrah clan. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 514; Ibn Qutaybah, Maʿārif, 325; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 162. Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 214, gives both versions but prefers that of Ibn al-Kalbī. In any case, he was associated with the Qurashī nobles. He participated in the conquest of Syria and died in 18/639.

309. This tribal grouping from al-Ḥīrah contained settled Christian elements from various origins. See Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, II, 111; Trimingham, Christianity, 156, 171, 225, 278.

310. Ḥumrān b. Abān al-Namarī; he was actually the captive of a Fazārī, who sold him to ʿUthmān. He became one of the secretaries or the chamberlain of ʿUthmān during the latter's caliphate. ʿUthmān became angry with him for an indiscretion, whereupon Ḥumrān moved to al-Baṣrah, where he lived in the quarter of al-Jufrah and was one of the leaders of the pro-Umayyad party against al-Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr in 71/692. After al-Muṣʿab was killed he was able to take power briefly as governor of al-Baṣrah for the Umayyads. He also is said to have taken power in al-Baṣrah for the Umayyads on the abdication of al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī at the beginning of 41/661, which would appear to be a retrospective duplication of the later occasion. He is further said to have been a Syriac speaker, to have had a Jewish mother, and to have been given his Namarī genealogy by his descendants. See Ṭabarī, I, 2923–24, 3030, II, 11, 799, 801, 817–18, 837; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 167; II, 332; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 283; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 195, 342; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 432; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 176.

311. That is, Ibn ʿAffān the caliph. See Note 310, above.

312. These two men are unidentified.

313. The Yashkur were an important subgroup of the Bakr b. Wāʾil, who were settled mostly in the oases of al-Yamāmah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 26, 592.

314. The Murrah b. ʿAwf, a subgroup of the Ghaṭafān who were later prominent in al-Jazīrah. See *EI*², s.v. Ghaṭafān; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 92, 127; II, 19–20, 433. However, the family of Abū ʿAmrah are usually considered to have belonged to the Shaybān. See notes 303 and 304, above.

315. Ibn Ukht al-Namir is al-Sāʾib b. Yazīd al-Kindī. His tribal designation is in some doubt, however. Both he and his father are usually considered to have been Companions. Some have held Ibn Ukht al-Namir to have been the last Companion alive in Medina, dying in 82/701 or later. His paternal uncle was al-ʿAlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī, the early governor of al-Baḥrayn. The caliph ʿUmar is said to have put him in charge of the market of Medina. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 239; II, 499; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 12–13; Tahdhīb, III, 450–51.

Also it is most striking that this list does not include Yasār, the grandfather of the Ṭalḥah b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān,[316] and al-Muhallab b. ʿUqbah: When al-Walīd b. ʿUqbah came from Khālid to Abū Bakr bringing what Khālid had sent with him of the fifths [of the spoils reserved for the state], Abū Bakr sent him on to ʿIyāḍ as support. Al-Walīd came to ʿIyāḍ when the latter was besieging the enemy and they were besieging him, having seized the road from him. Al-Walīd advised him, "Circumspection in some cases is better than numerous troops. Send a message to Khālid asking him for reinforcements." ʿIyāḍ did so. His messenger came to Khālid just after the Battle of al-ʿAyn asking for help. Khālid rushed a letter to ʿIyāḍ from him, [saying,] "From Khālid to ʿIyāḍ. I am coming to you.

Hold [them] off a little, for there will come to you milch camels bearing lions wearing worn-out clothes, regiments following upon them regiments."

Dūmat al-Jandal [2065]

[The same transmitters]: When Khālid was done with ʿAyn al-Tamr, he left in charge of it ʿUwaym b. al-Kāhil al-Aslamī[317] and then marched forth in the same formation with which he had entered al-ʿAyn. When the people of Dūmah heard that Khālid was marching against them, they sent [messages] to their allies among the Bahrā',[318] the Kalb,[319] the Ghassān,[320] the Tanūkh,[321] and the Ḍa-historian Ibn Isḥāq. This could be because Sayf did not want to include in this glorious ancestry the dean of the more sober Medinan school of historians. For other, different lists of the captives of ʿAyn al-Tamr, see Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 102; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 395; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 176.

316. Al-ʿAskarī, Khamsūn wa miʾah ṣaḥābī, 154, 274, considers him a fabrication by Sayf because he appears only in Sayf's isnāds.

317. Unidentified.

318. A tribe belonging to the Quḍāʿah, they were already concentrated in northern Syria and the reaches of the Euphrates at the time of the Islamic conquest. See *EI*², s.v. Bahrā'; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 88–89, 220.

319. The great Syrian tribe of the Quḍāʿah that tended to hold a dominant position under the Umayyads, it dominated a large territory in the Syrian Desert stretching from Dūmat al-Jandal to Palmyra. See *EI*², s.v. Kalb b. Wabara; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 76–79, 369; Donner, Conquests, 106–7.

320. This tribe, which was basically established in southern Syria, particularly in the area of the present state of Jordan, is best known for the sixth century C.E. Roman client state that it had founded east of the Jordan river, with its capital at Buṣrā al-Sha'm (ancient Bostra). The Banū Ghassān were Monophysite Christians, so that, although here they are portrayed as resisting the Muslims, the actual extent of their support for the Romans is doubtful. See *EI*², s.v. Ghassān; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 176; II, 35–38, 273; Donner, Conquests, 107–8.

321. An Arab tribal confederation not linked closely with either the Maʿadd or the jā'im.[322] Even before Wadī'ah[323] had come to them with the Kalb, the Bahrā', and his supporter Ibn Wabarah b. Rūmānis,[324] and Ibn al-Ḥidrijān[325] had come to them with the Ḍajā'im, and Ibn al-Ayham[326] with groups of the Ghassān and the Tanūkh, they caused grief to 'Iyāḍ and suffered from him as well.

When word of Khālid's approach reached them, their two leaders, Ukaydir b. 'Abd al-Malik[327] and al-Jūdī b. Rabī'ah,[328] disagreed [about what to do]. Ukaydir said, "I am the most knowledgeable of people about Khālid. No one is better omened than he, nor sharper in war. No people, regardless of whether they are few or many, ever see Khālid's face but that they flee from him. Therefore obey me and make peace with the enemy." But they refused him, so that he said, "I will never conspire with you to make war on Khālid. It is your affair." Then he went on his way. That [word] reached Khālid, who sent out 'Āṣim b. 'Amr to stop Ukaydir. 'Āṣim captured Ukaydir, who said, "I have not met other than the amīr Khālid." When he was brought to Khālid, the latter had him beheaded and took the property that had been with him.

Yemen, the Tanūkh lived between al-Ḥīrah and al-Anbār on the Euphrates, with other branches in Qinnasrīn and around Aleppo. See EI[1], Supplement, s.v. Tanūkh; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 297; II, 80–84, 544–45.

322. Phylarchs of the Arab marches for the Romans before the Ghassānids, also possibly associated with northern Syria, as they were of the Salīḥ, a branch of the Quḍā'ah. See EI[1], s.v. Salīḥ; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 326; II, 86, 240, 296. See also note 433, below.

323. Unidentified.

324. Al-Kalbī. Wabarah was the half brother of the last Lakhmid king of al-Ḥīrah, al-Nu'mān b. al-Mundhir, through their mother. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 290; II, 581; Zubayrī, Nasab, 267. Possibly this Ibn Wabarah is simply another adornment to the narrative.

325. Neither of the two al-Ḥidrijāns found in Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 323, nor the one in Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 327, seems remotely connected with this personage.

326. Jabalah b. al-Ayham al-Ghassānī, the last ruler of the Ghassānid client state of the Romans. He embraced Islam but afterward reverted to Christianity, retiring to an estate in Cappadocia, where his descendants long flourished. Caskel places his reversion to Christianity after the Battle of the Yarmūk. See EI[2], s.v. Djabala b. al-Ayham; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 193; II, 248; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 125–27, 132.

327. Al-Sukūnī al-Kindī. He was the Christian prince of Dūmat al-Jandal who was forced to pay tribute by the Prophet's expedition of 9/631 to Tabūk. At the Prophet's death in 11/632 he stopped and either migrated or was forced to migrate toward al-Ḥīrah, near which he built a new Dūmah, according to Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 241; II, 566–67. This suggests that the Dūmah in question here may have been nearer to al-Ḥīrah than Dūmat al-Jandal, which would better fit Khālid's itinerary in the text. See also Ṭabarī, I, 1702–3, 2374; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 526.

328. Unidentified.

Khālid then went along until he besieged the people of Dūmah, who were commanded by al-Jūdī b. Rabīʿah, Wadīʿah al-Kalbī, Ibn Rūmānis al-Kalbī, Ibn al-Ayham, and Ibn al-Ḥidrijān. Khālid put Dūmah between his own troops and the troops of ʿIyāḍ. The Christian Arabs who had reinforced the people of Dūmah surrounded the [2066] fortress of Dūmah, for the fortress could not hold them. When Khālid was secure, al-Jūdī came out, bringing Wadīʿah. They marched against Khālid, while Ibn al-Ḥidrijān and Ibn al-Ayham went forth against ʿIyāḍ. They fought, and God defeated al-Jūdī and Wadīʿah at the hands of Khālid, while ʿIyāḍ defeated those facing him, and the Muslims pursued them. As for Khālid, he seized al-Jūdī most strongly, while al-Aqraʿ b. Ḥābis took Wadīʿah. The rest of the people recoiled into the fortress, which could not hold them [all]. When the fortress was full, those inside shut the fortress against their comrades, who remained around it, cut off. ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr said, "O Banū Tamīm,[329] the Kalb are your confederates. Be charitable[330] to them and offer protection to them, for you cannot do [anything else] like it for them." They did [as he said], and the reason they were saved on that day was ʿĀṣim's advice to the Banū Tamīm concerning them.

Khālid came against those who had retreated toward the fortress and slew them until he blocked the gate of the fortress with them. Also, Khālid had al-Jūdī beheaded. Then he had the [other] captives beheaded, except for the captives from the Kalb, for ʿĀṣim, al-Aqraʿ, and the Banū Tamīm said, "We have given them a guarantee of safe-conduct." Therefore, Khālid released them to them, but he said, "What is the matter between me and you? Do you keep the custom of the Jāhiliyyah[331] and neglect the commandment of Islam?" ʿĀṣim answered him, "Do not begrudge them well-being, and do not let the devil possess them (yuḥawwizhum)."[332] Then Khālid ap-

329. A great tribal grouping of northeastern Arabia, the Tamīm represented the archetypical Arab nomads more than nearly any other group. They consisted of three main branches—the Saʿd, the Ḥanẓalah, and the ʿAmr—clans not belonging to these groups joined later. They were strongly represented in al-Baṣrah, al-Kūfah, and Khurāsān. See EI[1], s.v. Tamīm b. Murr; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 59; II, 7–10, 544.

330. Text: āsirūhum; read: āsūhum, as in Ms. IH and Cairo ed.

331. The pre-Islamic period, especially in Arabia, often translated as "the Age of Ignorance," "ignorance" meaning ignorance of Islam; thus the term is used today to refer to what is un-Islamic. See EI[2], s.v. Djāhiliyya.

332. Another possible translation, based on the text of IK, is "do not give them over to the devil's possession."

proached the gate and did not leave it until he had torn it out. The Muslims rushed in upon the enemy, killing the troops and making captives of the children, whom they kept with those who were left over. Khālid purchased the daughter of al-Jūdī, who[se beauty] was [2067] extolled. Khālid remained at Dūmah but sent al-Aqraʿ back to al-Anbār. When Khālid was returning to al-Ḥīrah and had gotten near enough to reach it by morning, al-Qaʿqāʿ made the people of al-Ḥīrah welcome him; thus, they went out to meet him in celebration. Certain of them would say to others, "Pass on by us, for this is liberation from evil."

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and al-Muhallab: While Khālid was staying at Dūmah, the Persians [only] made suppositions about him, but the Arabs of al-Jazīrah,[333] being angry on account of ʿAqqah, wrote to them. As a result, Zarmihr[334] went forth from Baghdādh[335] with Rūzbih,[336] and the two of them headed for al-Anbār and set a meeting at Ḥuṣayd and al-Khanāfis.[337] Al-Zibriqān, who was in command at al-Anbār, wrote to al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr, who was at that time Khālid's deputy in charge of al-Ḥīrah. Al-Qaʿqāʿ sent out Aʿbad b. Fadakī al-Saʿdī,[338] giving him charge of al-Ḥuṣayd, and also sent out ʿUrwah b. al-Jaʿd al-Bāriqī,[339] giving him charge of al-Khanāfis. He said to the two of them, "If you see any forward troops, advance boldly [against them]." They went forth [2068] and blocked the two Persians from [entering] the countryside, shut-

333. The area between the Euphrates and Tigris rivers, inhabited at this time mostly by the Rabīʿah. See *EI*², s.v. al-Djazīra.

334. Unidentified and mentioned only by Sayf in this section.

335. Text: Baghdād; read Baghdādh, as elsewhere. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXII. The mention of the ʿAbbāsid capital here is possibly an anachronism.

336. Unidentified and mentioned only by Sayf in this section.

337. Musil, Middle Euphrates, 134 n. 70, 309–10, based on Sayf's traditions, locates al-Khanāfis at al-Kāẓimayn, the modern northern suburb of Baghdād, 55 km. east of al-Anbār, though placing al-Ḥuṣayd closer to ʿAyn al-Tamr. The sparseness of the textual evidence and the doubtful value of Sayf's transmissions renders these possibilities uncertain, however.

338. Mentioned only by Sayf. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 110; ʿAskarī, Khamsūn wa miʾah ṣaḥābī, 87, 89, 340.

339. Al-Azdī, enumerated as one of the Prophet's Companions and a transmitter of tradition. After settling in Syria, he much later was sent to al-Kūfah by ʿUthmān, where he was one of the latter's opponents. He must have lived a long time, for he is also reported to have been an informant for al-Shaʿbī at al-Kūfah. See Ṭabarī, I, 2921; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 247; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 476.

ting them up. Rūzbih and Zarmihr [did not engage] the Muslims while waiting for those of the Rabīʿah who had corresponded with them to gather, for they had been corresponding with each other and had agreed on a time to meet.

When Khālid returned from Dūmah to al-Ḥīrah, on the eve of his departure, and that [news] reached him, when he had laid plans to attack the people of al-Madāʾin, he disliked disobeying Abū Bakr and adding anything to his instructions. Therefore, he hastened to send al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr and Abū Laylā b. Fadakī against Rūzbih and Zarmihr. These two preceded him to ʿAyn al-Tamr. A letter came to Khālid from Imruʾ al-Qays al-Kalbī, [340] saying that al-Hudhayl b. ʿImrān had gathered troops at al-Muṣayyakh and Rabīʿah b. Bujayr[341] was encamped at al-Thiny[342] and at al-Bishr[343] with troops. Both were angry on account of ʿAqqah and were heading for Zarmihr and Rūzbih. Khālid went forth with al-Aqraʿ b. Ḥābis in command of his vanguard, leaving ʿIyāḍ b. Ghanm as his deputy in charge of al-Ḥīrah. He followed the route of al-Qaʿqāʿ and Abū Laylā to al-Khanāfis until he reached them at al-ʿAyn. Then he sent al-Qaʿqāʿ to Ḥuṣayd, putting him in command of the troops, and he sent Abū Laylā to al-Khanāfis. Khālid said [to the two of them], "Push them so that they may be gathered along with those who called on them for help in seeking revenge. And, if not, then attack them." But the two [Persian commanders] refused except to remain in their positions.

---

340. Imruʾ al-Qays b. al-Aṣbagh of the Banū ʿAbdallāh; according to Sayf, he was the Prophet's agent in charge of taxes for the Kalb. Tumāḍir bt. al-Aṣbagh al-Kalbiyyah, also of the Banū ʿAbdallāh and the mother of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf's son Abū Salamah, may have been his sister, but no Imruʾ al-Qays appears among the sons of al-Aṣbagh in Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 282. Therefore we may be faced with another of the siblings of distinguished persons with whom Sayf is wont to embellish his reports. See Ṭabarī, I, 1872; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 63; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istiʿāb, I, 107; Zubayrī, Nasab, 267.

341. Al-Taghlibī, attested in an isnād other than from Sayf in Ṭabarī, I, 1976–77. Otherwise, outside Sayf's reports he figures only as the father of ʿAlī's concubine al-Sahbāʾ. Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 164; II, 288, refers to the father of al-Sahbāʾ as Ḥabīb b. Bujayr. For his daughter, see note 369, below.

342. On the southern slope of Jabal Bishrī in the Syrian desert, it is still known as Jubaylat al-Thiny. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 312.

343. The earlier form of the name of the present Jabal Bishrī in the Syrian desert west of Dayr al-Zawr. See *EI*², s.v. al-Bishr; Musil, Middle Euphrates, 312.

Ḥuṣayd

When al-Qaʿqāʿ saw that Zarmihr and Rūzbih made no move, he set [2069] off toward Ḥuṣayd. Rūzbih was in charge of those Arabs and Persians whom al-Qaʿqāʿ passed by. When Rūzbih saw that al-Qaʿqāʿ intended [to attack] him, he sought reinforcements from Zarmihr, who came to his aid in person, leaving al-Mahbūdhān[344] in charge of his troops. The two sides met at Ḥuṣayd and fought. God slew the Persians in great numbers. Al-Qaʿqāʿ killed Zarmihr, and Rūzbih was also killed. ʿIṣmah b. ʿAbdallāh, one of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Ṭarīf of the Banū Ḍabbah,[345] killed him. ʿIṣmah was one of al-bararah. Every clan (fakhdh) that migrated in toto is called al-bararah, whereas every group that migrated out of a tribe (baṭn) is called al-khiyarah.[346] Thus the Muslims consisted of khiyarah and bararah. On the Day of Ḥuṣayd the Muslims captured many spoils. The remnants of Ḥuṣayd retreated to al-Khanāfis and gathered there.

Al-Khanāfis

[The same transmitters]: Abū Layla b. Fadakī set out with those already with him and those who had joined him for al-Khanāfis. The defeated remnants of Ḥuṣayd had retreated to al-Mahbūdhān. When al-Mahbūdhān perceived [that], he and those with him fled, retreating to al-Muṣayyakh, where al-Hudhayl b. ʿImrān was. Abū Laylā met no treachery at al-Khanāfis. They sent the news to Khālid together.

Al-Muṣayyakh of the Banū al-Barshā'[347]

[The same transmitters]: When the news reached Khālid about the defeat of the forces at al-Ḥuṣayd and the flight of those at al-Khanā-

---

344. Unidentified and mentioned only by Sayf in this place.

345. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf. As the Ḍabbah were a part of the Tamīm tribal division to which Sayf also belonged, the reports of ʿIṣmah's rather exaggerated and otherwise unattested exploits should not appear surprising. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 482; Donner, Conquests, 195, 198, 373, 383, 436, 438.

346. The term al-bararah literally means "the righteous," and al-khiyarah means "the best."

347. According to Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 141; II, 224, and Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 314, the Banū al-Barshā' are Shaybān, Dhuhl, and Qays, the sons of Thaʿlabah, three subtribes of the Bakr b. Wā'il. However, their genealogy suggests that this group might have been associated with the Taghlib originally, which would better fit the fis, he wrote to his own forces, appointing for al-Qaʿqāʿ, Abū Laylā, Aʿbad,[348] and ʿUrwah a night and an hour on which they were to meet at al-Muṣayyakh, which is between Ḥawrān[349] and al-Qalt.[350] Khālid departed from al-ʿAyn, heading for al-Muṣayyakh on camels, avoiding horses. He stopped at al-Janāb,[351] then al-Baradān,[352] then [2070] al-Hiny,[353] from which he then departed. When it was that [appointed] hour on the night of the rendezvous they all came together at al-Muṣayyakh. Then from three directions they attacked al-Hudhayl, those with him and those who had fled to him, when [all of] them were asleep and slew them, though al-Hudhayl escaped with a few men. The ground was filled with the slain. The Muslims could liken them only to prostrated sheep.

Ḥurqūṣ b. al-Nuʿmān[354] had given the non-Muslims sincere advice and excellent counsel, but they had not benefited from his warning. Ḥurqūṣ b. al-Nuʿmān said before the attack:

Did the two of them not give me to drink before the horses of Abū Bakr?

and so on. Ḥurqūṣ was married to a woman of the Banū Hilāl[355] called Umm Taghlib. She was killed on that night along with ʿUbādah b. Bishr, Imruʿ al-Qays b. Bishr, and Qays b. Bishr, who are the Banū al-Thawriyyah[356] of the Banū Hilāl.

---

geographical location here on the upper Euphrates. Curiously, the following report reveals the inhabitants of al-Muṣayyakh not to have been of the Rabīʿah at all, let alone of the Bakr or the Taghlib.

348. Abū Laylā and Aʿbad are not the same person. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 110, understands them as brothers.

349. Possibly ʿAqlat Ḥawrān in the Wādī Ḥawrān, in the Syrian Desert 27 km. southwest of Alūs on the Euphrates. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 311–12.

350. Possibly the wadi of Abū Jaltah, about 45 km. southwest of Hīt. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 310–11.

351. Possibly the spring of al-ʿAṣībiyyah, 27 km. north-northwest of ʿAyn al-Tamr. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 311.

352. A large waterhole still having the same name, 10 km. beyond al-ʿAṣībiyyah. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 311.

353. A site 60 km. northwest of al-Baradān, also still bearing the same name. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 311.

354. Either al-Bahrānī or al-Namarī. See Donner, Conquests, 312 n. 163, 333 n. 113.

355. A nomadic Qaysī tribe from western Najd, the Hilāl emigrated out of their homeland less than the other Qaysī tribes in this period. See *EI*², s.v. Hilāl (tribe); Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 92; II, 15, 282.

356. This family and its members do not seem to be identifiable or to appear elsewhere.

On the Day of al-Muṣayyakh, Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh killed, among the Namir, ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā b. Abī Ruhm b. Qirwāsh, one of the Aws Manāh of the Namir,[357] who, along with Labīd b. Jarīr,[358] had a written document from Abū Bakr attesting their [profession of] Islam. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā's statement reached Abū Bakr, who had [re]named him ʿAbdallāh on the night of the attack. Abū Bakr said, "Glory be to You, O God, the Lord of Muḥammad!" He paid the blood money for ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā, just as he paid it for Labīd, both of them having been slain in the battle. He also said, "But that is not required of me if they joined the fight against the Muslim army (ahl al-ḥarb)." He also appointed guardians to look after their children. ʿUmar held their slaying against Khālid, in addition to his killing of Mālik, that [2071] is, Ibn Nuwayrah.[359] But Abū Bakr said, "The like of this is what those who dwell next to an army will find in their lands." ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā had said:

I say when the morning brings an attack,
"Glory be to You, O God, the Lord of Muḥammad.
Glory be to my Lord, there is no god but He,
the Lord of the lands and the Lord of newcomers."[360]

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAṭiyyah — ʿAdī b. Ḥātim: We attacked the people of al-Muṣayyakh. A man appeared there called by his name Ḥurqūṣ b. al-Nuʿmān of the Namir. Around him were his sons and his wife. In their midst was a vat of wine, with which they were busy. The family said to Ḥurqūṣ, "Who will drink at this hour and in the latter part of the night?" He replied, "Drink a parting draft, for I do not think that you will drink wine after it. Here is

357. For the Aws Manāh, see Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 167. The element Qirwāsh could be a confusion with the Qawqān that appears in Ibn al-Kalbī's tree, for the consonantal outlines of the two words in Arabic are similar.

358. Almost certainly the same as the Labīd b. ʿUtbah al-Namarī mentioned in Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 167; II, 375, for the latter was also of the Aws Manāh and was slain by Khālid. The appearance of the element Jarīr in his name presumably is a confusion with the name of Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī, who also appears in this report.

359. He was a chief of the Tamīmī Yarbūʿ who was killed by Ḍirār b. Mālik al-Azwar during the Riddah wars of 11/632. ʿUmar held his killing against Khālid b. al-Walīd, and it became a famous episode. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 69; II, 393; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 75, 83–84; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 530; Ṭabarī, I, 1750, 1880, 1909, 1912, 1921–24, 1926–27, 1963; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 357.

360. Possibly, the lands in the line may refer to Iraq with its original inhabitants, whereas the newcomers [lit., "those who come to water"] may refer to the Arab Muslim migrants to it.

Khālid at al-ʿAyn, while his troops are at Ḥuṣayd. He has heard about our mustering and will not leave us alone." Then he said:

Will you not drink before the disaster, a little after the people have been puffed up with abundant dregs
And before our deaths, which by fate will strike [2072]
at a time that will neither increase nor decrease.

Certain of the horsemen hastened toward him while he was in the middle of that and struck his head, [knocking] him into his vat. We took his daughters captive and slew his sons.

Al-Thanī[361] and al-Zumayl[362]

Rabīʿah b. Bujayr al-Taghlibī had descended on al-Thanī and al-Bishr out of anger for ʿAqqah and set an appointed time to meet Rūzbih, Zarmihr, and al-Hudhayl. After Khālid had struck the forces at al-Muṣayyakh with what he struck them with, he went to al-Qaʿqāʿ and Abū Laylā, commanding them to set out ahead of him. On the night on which they parted, he appointed for them a time when they would come together, attacking the enemy from three directions, as he had done to the forces at al-Muṣayyakh. Then Khālid went forth from al-Muṣayyakh, stopping at Ḥawrān, then al-Ranq,[363] then al-Ḥamāh,[364] which today belongs to the Banū Junādah b. Zuhayr[365] of the Kalb, then al-Zumayl, which is al-Bishr including al-Thanī, both of which today are east of al-Ruṣāfah.[366]

Khālid started at al-Thanī, which he and his companions, coming together from three directions, attacked by night along with those who had gathered to [defend] it and had come to it, as well as those young men[367] who had joined in a motley group [there] for that [purpose]. The Muslims unsheathed their swords against them, and no

361. Same as al-Thiny, note 342, above.

362. Identified by Musil, Middle Euphrates, 312, with the rise of al-Zumaylī in the flatland north of Jabal Bishrī.

363. Emended by Musil, Middle Euphrates, 312–13, to al-Rathqah, a waterhole about 140 km. northwest of ʿAqlat Ḥawrān.

364. Unidentified place.

365. This is the Junādah b. Suḥbān b. Imruʾ al-Qays b. Zuhayr. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 285; II, 265.

366. Ancient Sergiopolis, the famous city 40 km. south of the Euphrates in Syria. See EI[1], s.v. al-Ruṣāfa; Musil, Palmyrena, 260–72.

367. Text: al-shaʾn; read: al-shubbān, as IH and Cairo ed.

one of that army escaped to deliver the news. Khālid took the children captive, sent God's fifth to Abū Bakr with al-Nuʿmān b. ʿAwf b. al-Nuʿmān al-Shaybānī,[368] and divided the spoils and the captives [among his troops]. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib bought the daughter[369] of Ra-[2073] bīʿah b. Bujayr al-Taghlibī, taking her [for himself], and she bore him ʿUmar[370] and Ruqayyah.[371]

Al-Hudhayl, when he had escaped, took refuge at al-Zumayl with ʿAttāb b. So-and-So,[372] who was at al-Bishr with a large force. Khālid attacked them at night with an attack like the last one, from three directions. They had already heard the news about Rabīʿah. They were slain in great numbers, unlike the numbers killed before. The Muslims got from them what they wanted. Khālid had taken an oath that he would most certainly seek out the Taghlib in their own homeland. Khālid divided their spoils among the men and sent the fifths to Abū Bakr with al-Ṣabbāḥ b. So-and-So al-Muzanī.[373] In the fifths were the daughter of Muʾdhin al-Namarī,[374] Laylā bt. Khālid,[375] and Rayḥānah bt. al-Hudhayl b. Hubayrah.[376]

Then Khālid turned from al-Bishr toward al-Ruḍāb,[377] where Hilāl b. ʿAqqah[378] was. His troops had deserted him when they heard of 368. Meant to be the son of the ʿAwf b. al-Nuʿmān mentioned in Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 147; II, 211, this al-Nuʿmān seems to be mentioned only by Sayf.

369. Umm Ḥabīb al-Sahbāʾ. Ibn al-Kalbī calls her the daughter of Ḥabīb b. Bujayr and, with Ibn Saʿd, reports she was captured at ʿAyn al-Tamr. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 164; II, 535; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 20; V, 117; al-Zubayrī, Nasab, 42.

370. He had an extensive progeny. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 20; V, 117; Zubayrī, Nasab, 80; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 66–67. He lived into the reign of al-Walīd I. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 42–43.

371. ʿUmar's twin sister, she married her paternal first cousin Muslim b. ʿAqīl, to whom she bore at least three sons. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 45.

372. Unidentified.

373. Unidentified.

374. Unidentified.

375. Unidentified.

376. Al-Taghlibiyyah; she is supposed to have been the daughter of a famous Taghlibī leader who flourished c. 610 C.E. She is not mentioned elsewhere, however. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 163; II, 286; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 336.

377. Probably a place at or near al-Ruṣāfah is meant. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 50; Musil, Middle Euphrates, 313.

378. Al-Namarī, the son of ʿAqqah b. Qays, who had already been killed at ʿAyn al-Tamr. See above, pp. 53–55. In Ibn Isḥāq's report, p. 124, below, however, his name is given as Hilāl b. ʿAqqah b. Bishr. Probably Qays, not Bishr, is correct, as Bishr is probably owing to a corruption introduced by the name of Jabal al-Bishr that occurs in his story here. See Ṭabarī, I, 1911, etc.; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 167.

Khālid's approach, and Hilāl drew back from it, so that Khālid did not meet any treachery there.

Al-Firāḍ

Then, after al-Ruḍāb and his surprise attack on the Taghlib, Khālid headed for al-Firāḍ. Al-Firāḍ is [on] the border of Syria, Iraq, and al-Jazīrah. He completed the fast of Ramaḍān on that journey,[379] in which the attacks and battles had been continuous, one after another[380]—the rajaz[381] poets often speak of them—connected with whatever battles had gone before. [2074]

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah, as well as ʿAmr b. Muḥammad—a man from the Banū Saʿd—Ẓafar b. Dahī,[382] and al-Muhallab b. ʿUqbah: When the Muslims came together at al-Firāḍ, the Romans became hot and angry and sought help from the nearby outposts of the Persians, who had also become hot and angry and sought reinforcements from the Taghlib, Iyād, and Namir.[383] These supplied them with reinforcements, then came to blows with Khālid, so that when the Euphrates was between them they said, "Either cross over to us, or we will cross over to you." Khālid answered them, "Rather, cross over to us." They said, "Then back away so that we may cross." Khālid replied, "We will not do [that], but cross over downriver from us." That was in the middle of Dhū al-Qaʿdah of the year 12 (21 January 634).

The Romans and the Persians said to one another: "Keep your sovereignty in your own hands. This is a man who is fighting on the basis of religion. He has intelligence and knowledge. By God, he will most definitely be victorious, whereas we will most certainly fail." But they did not profit from that [advice] and crossed the river below Khālid. When their lines were complete, the Romans said, "Wear distinctive emblems so that we may know from which of us came 379. That puts him on his way to al-Firāḍ on 1 Shawwāl 12 (9 December 633).

380. Or "like pearls on a string."

381. One of the Arabic poetic meters, the only one allowing for couplets instead of continuous rhyme. See EI[1], Supplement, s.v. Radjaz.

382. Vocalization of Dahī conjectural. His mention in Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 243, is culled entirely from Sayf.

383. J. W. Fück, in EI[2], s.v. Iyād, considers the claim that Khālid defeated all these groups together dubious.

what was good or bad today," and they did [this]. Thereupon, they fought a long, hard battle. Then God defeated the enemy. Khālid said to the Muslims, "Press your pursuit of them. Do not grant them any respite." The cavalry commander would corner a group of them with the spears of his men; having collected them, they would kill them. On the day of al-Firāḍ, one hundred thousand were slain in the battle and the pursuit.

After the battle Khālid stayed at al-Firāḍ for ten [days], then announced[384] the return to al-Ḥīrah on 25 Dhū al-Qaʿdah [31 January [2075] 634]. He commanded ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr to lead them on their journey and ordered Shajarah b. al-Aʿazz[385] to take charge of the rear. Khālid himself gave out that he was in the rear.

Khālid's Pilgrimage[386]

Abū Jaʿfar: Khālid set out as a pilgrim from al-Firāḍ on 25 Dhū al-Qaʿdah [31 January 634] but kept his pilgrimage a secret. He had with him a number of his companions. He wandered through the land randomly until he arrived at Mecca by dead reckoning. That came to him easily, in a way that it would not come to either guide or wolf.[387] He traveled on one of the roads of the people of al-Jazīrah; no stranger way nor one more appropriate[388] than it, despite its difficulty, has been seen. Therefore his absence from the troops was short, so that the last of them had not arrived in al-Ḥīrah before he came to them in the company of the commander of the rear whom he had appointed, and the two of them arrived together. Khālid and his companions had shaven their heads. His pilgrimage was unknown except to those in the rear whom he had told about that. Abū Bakr did not learn of that until later, when he reproached him for it. His punishment was that he was sent to Syria.

Khālid's journey from al-Firāḍ [crossed] the width of the land randomly by his own reckoning. The road from al-Firāḍ passed through 384. Text: adhina; read: ādhana.

---

385. His mention in Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 165, derives only from Sayf, which shows that he was unknown except in Sayf's report. It is possible that his name was either confused with or suggested by that of the poet Abū Shajarah b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā al-Sulamī, who returned to Islam in 11/632 and might have joined Khālid's forces. On Abū Shajarah, see Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 5; IV, 101.

386. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 314.

387. Text: rībāl; read: riʾbāl, with Cairo ed.

388. Text: ashadd; read: asadd. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXII.

Mā' al-ʿAnbarī,[389] then Mithqab,[390] then ended at Dhāt al-ʿIrq.[391] [2076]
The road then headed east from there, bringing him from ʿArafāt[392] to al-Firāḍ. That road is named al-Sudd.[393] A letter from Abū Bakr came to him when he had just returned to al-Ḥīrah from his pilgrimage. It ordered him to Syria, bringing him both nearer and farther.

Abū Jaʿfar — his authorities: The letter of Abū Bakr came to Khālid at al-Ḥīrah when he had just returned from his pilgrimage. It said, > Go until you reach the Muslim armies at al-Yarmūk,[394] for they are distressed and causing distress. Do not by any means return to the like of what you have done, for your worry will not, with God's help, worry the masses of the troops, and your method of removing the people's distress will never remove it. May your intention[395] and your favored position gladden you, Abū Sulaymān! Therefore, complete [your work], so that God may make [it] complete for you. Do not by any means let self-admiration enter you, so that you lose and fail. See that you do not rely upon any work [of yours], for God controls the bestowal of favor, and He is the Owner of reward.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAṭā' b. al-Bakkā'ī — al-Muqaṭṭaʿ b. al-Haytham al-Bakkā'ī[396] — his father: The veterans

---

389. Unidentified.

390. In the territory of the tribe of Asad, it is to be located near al-Buzākhah, which was an area about 50 km. southwest of Ḥā'il, according to Musil, Northern Neǧd, 222–23. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 54, is not very helpful.

391. Properly Dhāt ʿIrq, it is a station two stages (about 90 km.) northeast of Mecca just below the Ḥijāz escarpment on the pilgrimage route from al-Kūfah. It is also the mīqāt for the pilgrims coming from Iraq, meaning that they must don the pilgrim's garb there, if not before. See Iṣṭakhrī, Masālik, 27; Ibn Khurdādhbih, Masālik, 125, 132, 147, 186, 190; Ibn Rustah, Aʿlāq, 179–81; Ibn al-Faqīh, Buldān, 26–27; Ibn Ḥawqal, Ṣūrat al-Arḍ, 34; Muqaddasī, Taqāsīm, 78, 106, 109.

392. The famous plain some 22 km. east of Mecca where the pilgrims assemble annually on 10 Dhū al-Ḥijjah. See *EI*², s.v. ʿArafa.

393. Possibly this name refers to the mountain al-Sudd in the territory of the Ghaṭafān. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 197.

394. This is the river, still bearing the same name, that separates the present-day states of Syria and Jordan. It was the site of the decisive battle that gave the Muslims control of Syria. See *EI*¹, s.v. al-Yarmūk; Ṭabarī, I, 2347–49; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 118–19, Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 218–71.

395. Or "prosperity" (Ar. naʿmah), following Ms. IH.

396. He is mentioned in Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 107; II, 277, as al-Haytham al-Muqaṭṭaʿ b. Hubayrah; therefore the name given here is probably a confusion.

of the battles of the conquest among the people of al-Kūfah would make threats at Muʿāwiyah[397] upon [hearing] certain things that reached them. They would say: "What does Muʿāwiyah want? We are the men of Dhāt al-Salāsil!" They would name what was between it and al-Firāḍ without mentioning what was after, out of contempt for what was after in comparison to what occurred before.

ʿUmar b. Shabbah — ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, according to the last-mentioned isnād: Khālid b. al-Walīd came to al-Anbār. They made [2077] peace with him on condition of [their] evacuating, but then they gave him something he was content with, so that he confirmed them [in their possessions]. He also raided the market of Baghdādh[398] from the district (rustāq) of al-ʿĀl.[399] He sent al-Muthannā to attack a market in which there was a gathering of the Quḍāʿah[400] and the Bakr, and he took what was in the market. Then he[401] went to ʿAyn al-Tamr and took it by force, killing and taking captives. He sent the captives to Abū Bakr. They were the first Persian captives to come to Medina. He then went to Dūmat al-Jandal, where he killed Ukaydir and took captive the daughter of al-Jūdī. After this, he returned and stayed at al-Ḥīrah. All this was in the year 12.

In this year ʿUmar married ʿĀtikah bt. Zayd.[402]

In it Abū Marthad al-Ghanawī[403] died.

---

397. This is the caliph Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān, who reigned 40–60/661–80. See EI[1], s.v. Muʿāwiya.

398. This would appear to be the predecessor of Baghdād, the ʿAbbāsid capital on the west side of the Tigris.

399. That is, from the west. Ustān al-ʿĀl consisted of a large district containing the territory on the ʿĪsā Canal between al-Anbār and Baghdad. It appears to have been much larger that a rustāq, being rather an ustān. See Ibn Khurdādhbih, Masālik, 7, 235; Ibn al-Faqīh, Buldān, 199; Muqaddasī, Taqāsīm, 133; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 70–71; Le Strange, Lands, 80; Morony, Iraq, 145. On the usage of ustān and rustāq, see Morony, Iraq, 129, 534, 536.

400. A great Arab tribal grouping, the Quḍāʿah basically represented the original tribes of northwestern Arabia and Syria. See EI[2], s.v. Ḳuḍāʿa; Ibn al-Kalbī, Gamharat, I, 274; II, 73–76, 470; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Inbāh, 59–64; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 8, 440.

401. That is, Khālid.

402. A close relative of ʿUmar from the same Qurashī clan, the ʿAdī, she was successively the wife of ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr, ʿUmar's brother Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb, ʿUmar himself, and finally al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām. ʿIyāḍ b. ʿUmar was her son. She died after 36/656. See EI[2], s.v. ʿĀtika; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 356–57; Zubayrī, Nasab, 277, 349, 365–66.

403. Kannāz b. al-Ḥuṣayn, he fought for Islam at Badr, was present at the conquest of Mecca, and died at Medina at the age of sixty-six. He was said to have been a confederate of Ḥamzah, the Prophet's uncle, and thus was counted among the Quraysh.

In it Abū al-ʿĀṣī b. al-Rabīʿ[404] died in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (6 February–6 March 634). He made al-Zubayr[405] the executor of his will. ʿAlī married his daughter.[406]

In it ʿUmar bought his mawlā Aslam.[407]

There is a disagreement about who led the pilgrimage in this year. Some say Abū Bakr led it.

Those Who Say Abū Bakr Led the Pilgrimage

Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq — al-ʿAlāʾ b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Yaʿqūb, the mawlā of the Ḥuraqah[408] — a man from the Banū Sahm[409] — Ibn Mājidah al-Sahmī:[410] Abū Bakr made the pilgrimage

---

See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 138; II, 369; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 139, 153; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 678; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 47; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 270, 354; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 177.

404. A noble Qurashī, the husband of the Prophet's eldest daughter Zaynab, he became a Muslim in 6/627. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 121–23.

405. The well-known Companion, cousin of the Prophet's wife Khadījah, husband of Abū Bakr's daughter Asmāʾ, father of the anti-Umayyad ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, he is best known for his role in the Battle of the Camel in 36/656, in which he was slain fighting ʿAlī. See EI[1], s.v. al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām.

406. This daughter, Umāmah, born before 8/630, died before 61/680, had for her mother Zaynab, the eldest daughter of the Prophet Muḥammad, and thus had the Prophet's blood in her veins. Later ʿAlī married her, and she bore him Muḥammad al-Awsaṭ, who died young. When ʿAlī had died, her distant Hāshimī cousin al-Mughīrah b. Nawfal b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib married her to prevent Muʿāwiyah from doing so. She bore a son, Yaḥyā, to al-Mughīrah. She also remained al-Mughīrah's wife for more than twenty years and went into exile with him at al-Ṣafrāʾ, where both died. The existence of her children leaves the possibility that descendants having the Prophet's blood from other than the line of Fāṭimah may exist, though none is attested in the nasab books. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 400; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 253; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 236–37; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 16. Interestingly, Zubayrī, Nasab, 22, specifically denies that Umāmah had any children, and on p. 88 he claims that Nawfal b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib has no descendants in the male line.

407. An important transmitter of tradition, with access to the house of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, he seems to have died c. 64/684 in Syria. He is said to have been of Ethiopian origin, specifically from the Cushitic Beja people, but also, with less probability, to have been among the captives from ʿAyn al-Tamr. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 10–11; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 99; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 266.

408. A Medinan transmitter of tradition with a fair reputation, he died in 132/750 or, less probably, 139/756. His patrons the Ḥuraqah are the Banū Ḥamīs b. ʿAmir b. Thaʿlabah b. Mawdūʿah b. Juhaynah. See Samʿānī, Ansāb, IV, 129; Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, I, 293; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 186–87.

409. One of the clans of the Quraysh of Mecca. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 4; II, 498; Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 5–7, 94.

410. ʿAlī b. Mājidah, he transmitted from ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. Little seems to be known about him. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 463; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 375.

in his caliphate in the year 12, when I had viciously fought a boy from my family. The boy bit my ear, cutting off a piece of it, or I bit his ear and cut off a piece of it. Our matter was referred to Abū Bakr, who said, "Take the two of them to ʿUmar so that he can look [into it]. If one causing the injury has reached adulthood, then let ʿUmar punish him." When we were brought to ʿUmar he said: "By my life, this one has certainly reached adulthood. Call a cupper for me!"
[2078] When he mentioned the cupper ʿUmar said, "Did I not hear the Prophet say, 'I gave my maternal aunt a boy. I hope that God will give her a blessing in him. I have forbidden her to make him into a cupper, a butcher, or a goldsmith.' " Then he punished the other boy.[411]

Al-Wāqidī—ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar[412] — Abū Wajzah Yazīd b. ʿUbayd[413] — his father:[414] Abū Bakr made the pilgrimage in the year 12. He appointed ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān as his deputy in charge of Medina.

Some authorities report that ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb led the pilgrimage in the year 12.

Those Who Say ʿUmar Led the Pilgrimage

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Some people say that Abū Bakr did not make the pilgrimage in his caliphate and that in the year 12 he sent either ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb or ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf[415] to take charge of the [pilgrimage] season.

---

411. This entire report also appears in Ibn Ḥanbal, Musnad, I, 17, where the text differs only slightly. Interestingly, Ibn Ḥanbal's report does not specify the year. His version is also distinguished by a different chain of transmitters from Ibn Isḥāq on down.

412. A descendant of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. His family was in the service of the early ʿAbbāsids, when two of his first cousins [or brothers] held high posts in the administration of Medina. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 360.

413. An Arab mawlā of the Saʿd b. Bakr b. Hawāzin, he was a Medinan poet and traditionist, who died in 130/748. See Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, XI, 79–85; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 349.

414. Improbably said to have been a contemporary of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. See Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, XI, 79–80.

415. Al-Zuhrī, one of the great Companions of the Prophet and a part of the Qurashī aristocracy. He is credited especially with a major role in the election of the caliph ʿUthmān. He left an enormous progeny of some twenty sons and at least eight daughters who are named in the sources. Many of these were later transmitters of tradition who always were sure to emphasize his role, as did also his other relatives at Medina, like Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī and al-Miswar b. Makhramah. He died in 32/653 at the age of seventy-two. See *EI*², s.v. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 124–37; Zubayrī, Nasab, 265–73; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 131–35; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 416–17.

The Events of the Year

13

(March 7, 634–February 24, 635)

This year Abū Bakr sent the armies to Syria after his return from Mecca to Medina.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: When Abū Bakr returned from the pilgrimage of the year 12, he prepared the armies [to go] to Syria. He sent out ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣī[416] in the direction of Palestine.[417] ʿAmr took the road of al-Muʿriqah[418] to Aylah.[419] Abū Bakr [2079]

416. Al-Sahmī. He earned fame for his military exploits, particularly the conquest of Egypt, which he then governed twice. He embraced Islam in 8/629. He supported Muʿāwiyah in the civil war and is supposed to have played an important role in the arbitration that followed Ṣiffīn. He died in office in 43/663. His mother was from the ʿAnazah. See *EI*², s.v. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ; Zubayrī, Nasab, 409–11; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 2–3.

417. Ar. Filasṭīn. Although this is a well-known geographical term, it should be noted that the boundaries of late Roman Palestine were not the same as those of the modern territory established under the British Mandate. Roman Palestine consisted of three provinces, Palaestina Prima, Secunda, and Salutaris, embracing some territory east of the Jordan and also extending into what is now southern Lebanon. Early Muslim Filasṭīn, however, basically consisted of only the Roman Palaestina Prima, extending from the Mount Carmel ridge in the north to Gaza and the desert in the south. Any specific report in this volume could refer to either the wider Roman or the narrower early Muslim definition. See Le Strange, Palestine, 26–35; *EI*², s.v. Filasṭīn; also see map in this volume.

418. Lit. "the sweat causing." It is the road from Mecca to Syria via the humid Red Sea coast. See Caetani, Annali, II, 1121 n. 3; Donner, Conquests, 115.

419. A town at the northern end of the Gulf of ʿAqabah, located just to the northwest of the present Jordanian city of al-ʿAqabah. See *EI*², s.v. Ayla; Le Strange, Palestine, 549.

also sent out Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān,[420] Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ,[421] and Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah, who was one of the Ghawth, commanding them to follow the Tabūk[422] road to al-Balqāʾ,[423] [approaching] from the higher part of Syria.

ʿUmar b. Shabbah — ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, according to the isnād that I have previously mentioned — his authorities who have been mentioned before: Then Abū Bakr sent the troops to Syria at the beginning of the year 13. The first standard that he assigned was the standard of Khālid b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣī. Then he removed him before he had gone, appointing Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān [instead]. He was the first of the commanders who set out for Syria. They went forth with seven thousand [troops].

Abū Jaʿfar — Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq — ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr:[424] The reason for Abū Bakr's removal of Khālid b. Saʿīd was that Khālid b. Saʿīd, on coming from Yemen after the death of the Messenger of God, held back for two months from rendering the oath of allegiance to him. Khālid would say, "The Messenger of God gave me a command and did not remove me after that until God took him." Khālid had met ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān and 420. Al-Umawī al-Qurashī. He was the elder brother of Muʿāwiyah, with whom he embraced Islam in 8/630. Afterward, he governed Syria for ʿUmar for a rather brief period until his death in 18/639. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 8; II, 596; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 405–6; Zubayrī, Nasab, 124–26; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 103, 130, 157; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 656–57.

---

421. ʿĀmir b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Jarrāḥ al-Fihrī of the Quraysh. He was one of the earliest Muslims and greatest Companions. He played an important role in the election of Abū Bakr. Later, he governed Syria until his death of the plague at the age of fifty-eight in 18/639 at ʿAmwās in Palestine. See *EI*², s.v. Abū ʿUbayda b. al-Djarrāḥ; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 384–85; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 252–54. Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 122, makes him the overall commander on the Syrian front from the outset. On the exact route he took to Syria, see Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 100–1.

422. An important city in the northernmost Ḥijāz of Saudi Arabia, it has kept its original name. See *EI*¹, s.v. Tabūk.

423. Basically al-Balqāʾ is the plateau east of the Jordan River, corresponding roughly to the modern state of Jordan. In early Islamic times it was both a region and an administrative district. Its capital was ʿAmmān. It included at the minimum the land from the Wādī al-Zarqāʾ in the north to the Wādī al-Mūjib in the south. Thus it appears to have corresponded partially to the defunct Ghassānid phylarchy. See *EI*², s.v. al-Balqāʾ; Ibn Khurdādhbih, Masālik, 77; Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 326; Muqaddasī, Taqāsīm, 187; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 489; Le Strange, Palestine, 32–35, 41.

424. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī, he was a Medinan traditionist from a family of early traditionists and jurists and therefore well placed to transmit the Medinan tradition. He died in 130/748 or 135/753. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 164–65.

said, "O Banū ʿAbd Manāf,[425] you have willingly renounced your [right to] command; others have taken it up." As for Abū Bakr, he did not hold it against him, but, as for ʿUmar, he harbored a secret grudge against him on account of it. Then Abū Bakr sent the troops forth to Syria. The first man he put in command of a division (rubʿ) of them was Khālid b. Saʿīd. But ʿUmar took to saying, "Are you going to put him in command even though he has done what he has done and has said what he has said?" He kept on [about it] with Abū Bakr until the latter dismissed him and appointed Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān to command. [2080]

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mubashshir b. Fudayl[426] — Jubayr b. Ṣakhr, the Prophet's guard[427] — his father: Khālid b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣī was in Yemen at the time of the Prophet, being [still] there when the Prophet died. He came [to Medina] a month after his death wearing a silken robe. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib encountered him. ʿUmar shouted at those with him: "Rip up his robe! Can he wear silk and be left alone, in peace, in the midst of our men?" At this they ripped up his robe. Khālid said: "O Abū Ḥasan! O Banū ʿAbd Manāf! Have you been defeated regarding it?" ʿAlī answered, "Is it a power struggle that you prefer or a caliphate?" Khālid responded, "No one will struggle over this matter who is more deserving of it than you, O Banū ʿAbd Manāf." ʿUmar said to Khālid: "May God break your teeth! By God, [if] a liar will not cease talking about what I have said, then he will harm only himself." After this ʿUmar reported to Abū Bakr what Khālid had said. When Abū Bakr assigned the commands for the fight against the apostates, he included Khālid among those whom he appointed. ʿUmar [sought to] prevent him from doing that, saying: "He is bound to fail. He is too impulsive (ḍaʿīf al-tarwīʾah). He has indeed told such a lie that whoever propagates it or talks about it will not leave the earth.[428] Therefore

425. The Banū ʿAbd Manāf were the branch of the Quraysh from which the Prophet's family, the ʿAlids, the Umayyads, and the ʿAbbāsids were all derived. Here Khālid b. Saʿīd, who also was one of them, is taunting them for allowing Abū Bakr to become ruler, for the latter was not of the ʿAbd Manāf, who had hitherto possessed the command. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳuraysh; Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 5–7, 13, 17.

426. Apparently yet another transmitter mentioned only by Sayf.

427. Unidentifiable, but evidently not a Companion. Perhaps his title is meant to indicate he was the guardian of the Prophet's tomb. His only other mention is in Ṭabarī, I, 2575, where he transmits from ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who lived c. 6/627 to 70–73/689–692. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 53.

428. Ar. lā yufāriq al-arḍa mudlin bihā aw khāʾiḍun fīhā. This obscure phrase do not seek his aid." But Abū Bakr did not go along[429] with him, rather putting Khālid in command of support troops at Taymā'.[430] He followed ʿUmar in part of his affair and resisted him in part.

[2081] Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Abū Isḥāq al-Shaybānī[431] — Abū Ṣafiyyah al-Taymī[432] [of the] Taym b. Shaybān, Ṭalḥah — al-Mughīrah, and Muḥammad — Abū ʿUthmān: Abū Bakr commanded Khālid to stay at Taymā'. He went forth in a detachment until he stopped at Taymā'. Abū Bakr had ordered him not to leave it, to summon those around him to join him, to accept only those who had not apostatized, and to fight only those who fought against him until he received a different command. Thus he remained, and large numbers [of troops] joined him. The Romans, on hearing of the hugeness of that army, levied forces in Syria from the adjoining Arabs to send against the Muslims. Khālid b. Saʿīd wrote to Abū Bakr about that and about the gathering of those whom the Romans had mobilized and those who had joined them from the Bahrā', the Kalb, the Salīḥ,[433] the Tanūkh, the Lakhm,[434] the Judham,[435] and the Ghassān, from the near side of Zīzā'[436] at Thuluth.[437] Abū Bakr wrote back to him: "Advance, and do not flinch. Seek God's help."

---

would seem to imply that Khālid's supporters should not be allowed to set out in further military campaigns.

429. Text: yuḥtamal; read: yaḥtamil, with Cairo ed. and Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXII.

430. An important oasis in the northern Ḥijāz between Khaybar and Tabūk, it has retained the same name to the present. See EI[1], s.v. Taymā'.

431. Sulaymān b. Abī Sulaymān Fayrūz, the mawlā of the Shaybān. He was a Kūfan traditionist, who died between 129/747 and 142/759, probably nearer to the former, in which case Sayf can barely have transmitted from him. He enjoyed a high reputation. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 345; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 641; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 197–98.

432. Unidentified.

433. An Arab tribe concentrated in the region of Ḥawrān in Syria, the Salīḥ seem to be little mentioned after this time and perhaps were absorbed by other groups. See EI[1], s.v. Salīḥ; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 279; II, 86, 507. See also note 322, above.

434. The ruling tribe of al-Ḥīrah in Iraq; the Syrian branch of the Lakhm seems to have migrated as early as the fourth century C.E. to the area of Ḥawrān, al-Jawlān, and Palestine, where it was absorbed by the Judhām. See EI[2], s.v. Lakhm; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 176; II, 53–56, 375–76; Donner, Conquests, 105–6.

435. A major Arab tribe of Palestine, Transjordan, and northwestern Arabia at the time of the conquest and later. See EI[2], s.v. Djudhām; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 176; II, 53–56, 264; Donner, Conquests, 105–6.

436. A village in central Jordan east of the Dead Sea, less than 30 km. south of ʿAmmān on the pilgrimage route; it is now al-Jīzah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 163–64; Le Strange, Palestine, 393, 554–55.

437. Unidentified.

Thus Khālid set off toward them. When he had drawn near them they split up, abandoning their camp, whereupon Khālid made camp there. Nearly all those who had gathered against him entered Islam. Khālid wrote to Abū Bakr about that, and Abū Bakr wrote back to him, "Advance, but do not make any attacks, so that you will not be assaulted from the rear." Therefore he set off with those who had gone forth with him from Taymā' and those who had joined him from the edge of the sand[438] until they stopped in the area between Ābil,[439] Zīzā', and al-Qasṭal.[440] One of the Roman patricians called Bāhān[441] came against him, but Khālid defeated him, slaying his troops. He wrote about that to Abū Bakr and asked him for reinforcements. [2082]

The first of the recruits of Yemen and what is between Mecca and Yemen had come to Abū Bakr, among them Dhū al-Kalā'.[442] Also 'Ikrimah[443] came back to him, having campaigned with those who

438. This presumably refers to the great Nufūd Desert of northwestern Arabia.

439. That is, Ābil al-Zayt, which is mentioned by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 50; Le Strange, Palestine, 382. Its site is near the present village of Ḥartā in northernmost Jordan just south of the Yarmūk River.

440. A town of al-Balqā' 25 km. south of 'Ammān and hence directly adjacent to Zīzā'. Though the existing fort there dates from Umayyad times, the town most likely already existed before, especially as the name seems to reproduce the Latin castellum. Numerous Qasṭals exist in greater Syria. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 347; Le Strange, Palestine, 483; Creswell and Allan, Early Muslim Architecture, 173–77.

441. This Roman general, who is called Baanes by Theophanes, was probably of Armenian origin (Bāhān = Vahan). He may have joined Herakleios when the latter passed through Armenia in his fight against the Sāsānians, for he is first recorded defeating the Persians in northern Iraq in late Rajab 6 [early December 627]. Later, at the Yarmūk, he was defeated and killed, though Ibn al-Biṭrīq, Ta'rīkh, II, 15, says that he escaped and fled Herakleios's wrath by becoming a monk at Mount Sinai. Dissensions caused by him may have contributed to the defeat, though it would seem unlikely that he would have been declared emperor as asserted by Theophanes. See Theophanes, Chronicle, 23, 37–38; Stratos, Byzantium, II, 58–72, 206–9. He is identified by Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 118, who erroneously calls him Hāhān, as a Persian who became a Christian, which lends some support to an Armenian origin for him. On Theophanes's dating being off by a year, see Theophanes, Chronicle, xvii–xviii.

442. Samayfa' b. Nākūr al-Ḥimyarī, of the leading family of Yemen, embraced Islam before the Prophet's death, settled in Ḥimṣ, and later fought for Mu'āwiyah at Ṣiffīn, where he fell. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, II, 236, 510; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, I, 266; III, 261, 264; V, 18; VII, 440; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 219–20, 222; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 434; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 492–93; Crone, Slaves, 95.

443. 'Ikrimah b. Abī Jahl 'Amr al-Makhzūmī. He was the son of the Prophet's most irreconcilable opponent and himself remained an opponent of Islam until after the conquest of Mecca in 8/630. After he embraced Islam, however, he threw into it much of the energy that had characterized his earlier opposition, was entrusted by Abū Bakr had been with him from Tihāmah,[444] ʿUmān, al-Baḥrayn,[445] and al-Sarw.[446] Abū Bakr wrote on their behalf to those in charge of taxes (al-ṣadaqāt) that they replace those who asked to be replaced. All of the troops asked to be replaced, so the army was named the Replacement Army (jaysh al-bidāl).[447] Then they went to Khālid b. Saʿīd.

At this point Abū Bakr became anxious on account of Syria, whose matter caused him concern. Abū Bakr had sent ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣī back to a post to which the Messenger of God had appointed him — that of [overseeing] the taxation of the Saʿd Hudhaym,[448] the ʿUdhrah,[449] and those associated with them of the Judhām and the Ḥadas[450] — before his going to ʿUmān. Then he departed for ʿUmān with a promise that his office would be restored to him when he returned. Abū Bakr fulfilled that promise. When he became anxious about Syria, Abū Bakr wrote to ʿAmr, saying, "I have restored you to the office to which the Messenger of God appointed you once and with a grand campaign in which he circled the Arabian Peninsula during the Riddah wars, and was martyred fighting for the faith at Ajnādayn, Marj al-Ṣuffar, or al-Yarmūk, the first being perhaps the most likely. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 17; II, 353; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 404; Zubayrī, Nasab, 310–11; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 20–21, 63, 98, 104, 107, 118–19; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 72–75, 78–80, 82–84, 121, 123; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 496–97.

---

444. The coastal plain of Arabia adjoining the Red Sea. Tihāmah is clearly set off from the interior by the great Ḥijāz escarpment that extends along the length of Arabia. Tihāmah is mostly a desert plain, hot and humid. See EI[1], s.v. Tihāma; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 63–64.

445. The coastlands of Arabia fronting on the Persian Gulf. The modern eastern province of Saudi Arabia, also called al-Aḥsāʾ, makes up most of this territory. Its capital was Hajar, in the vicinity of modern al-Dammām. Early Islamic Baḥrayn is not to be confused with the modern usage, which confines the term to the present-day island state of al-Baḥrayn. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 346–49.

446. Lit., "the escarpment." It refers to the great west Arabian escarpment adjoining the Red Sea. It begins in Yemen and gradually declines in height from there north to Syria. Many specific al-Sarws are identified, but here it should be taken as meaning (north) Yemen in general. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 204–5 (al-Sarāh, which means the same), 217–18.

447. The passage is obscure. It appears that ʿIkrimah's troops were sent home and that he received replacements, which he then led to Syria. Thus Caetani, Annali, II, 1180–81. Those in charge of taxation were also in charge of recruitment. Perhaps each tribe had to furnish a certain quota. Alternatively, the text may mean that those who volunteered were sent to Syria, and all did so.

448. A Quḍāʿah tribe of northwestern Arabia associated with the ʿUdhrah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 330; II, 91–92, 494; Donner, Conquests, 102–3, 105–6, 109.

449. A Quḍāʿah tribe of the northern Ḥijāz, they were concentrated around Wādī al-Qurā, extending to Tabūk and Taymāʾ. See EI[2], s.v. ʿUdhra; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 330; II, 91–93, 565–66; Donner, Conquests, 88, 102–3, 105–6, 109.

450. A large subtribe of the Lakhm. Their territory before Islam lay in Transjordan. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 247; II, 290; Donner, Conquests, 105–6, 109.

named you once more, when you were sent to ʿUmān. [I have done this] in fulfillment of the promises of God's Messenger, so that you have taken it up once and then again. I would like, Abū ʿAbdallāh, to devote you entirely to that which is better fo you in your [present] life and your return to God, unless that which you have now is preferable to you." ʿAmr wrote back to him, "I am one of the arrows of Islam, and you, after God, are the one who shoots them and collects them. Look for the strongest, most fearsome, and best of them and aim at something with it, if [news] comes to you from some direction." He also wrote to al-Walīd b. ʿUqbah with the like of that, and [2083] he replied expressing preference for going forth to fight (jihād).

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Sahl b. Yūsuf[451] — al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad:[452] Abū Bakr wrote to ʿAmr and to al-Walīd b. ʿUqbah, who was in charge of half of the tax district of the Quḍāʿah. Abū Bakr had seen them off when he sent them to collect taxes. He gave each a single piece of advice:

> Fear God in secret and in open, for "Whoever keeps his duty to God, God makes for him a way out and bestows provision on him from whence he does not expect";[453] "And whoever keeps his duty to God, God forgives his sins and makes his reward great."[454] For keeping one's duty to God is the best admonishment God's worshipers can give to one another. You are on one of God's paths. On that path may you not be diverted from, abandon, or be careless regarding those things that hold support for your religion and protection for your affairs. Therefore neither flag nor slacken.

He also wrote to the two of them: "Appoint deputies in charge of your offices. Call to arms those in the areas around you." Thus ʿAmr put ʿAmr b. So-and-So al-ʿUdhrī[455] in charge of the upper part (ʿulyā)

---

451. Al-Salamī of the Salimah b. Saʿd of the Anṣār; he may have been the grandnephew of the pro-ʿUthmān Anṣārī poet Kaʿb b. Mālik, a connection that would fit Sayf's pro-ʿUthmān tendencies. His identity and existence are in some doubt, however. Ṭabarī, I, 2574; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 90; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, II, 98–99.

452. The grandson of the caliph Abū Bakr and hence an authority on the latter, al-Qāsim was one of the famous traditionists and scholars of Medina. His father was Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr (10–38/631–58), the partisan of ʿAlī who participated in the revolution against the caliph ʿUthmān, but al-Qāsim can hardly have known him. He lived 36–106/656–725. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 187–94; Zubayrī, Nasab, 279; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 333–35.

453. Qurʾān, 65: 2–3.

454. Qurʾān, 65: 5.

455. Unidentified.

of Quḍāʿah,[456] while al-Walīd appointed Imruʾ al-Qays to take charge of the district of Quḍāʿah adjoining Dūmah. They also summoned the people to arms, so that many men came to join them. Then they awaited the command of Abū Bakr.

Abū Bakr preached a sermon to the people. He praised God and lauded His Messenger and said:

> Every affair has factors that bring it together. Whoever reaches [an understanding of] them, they suffice him.
> [2084] Whoever works for God, God protects him. You must [work] earnestly and deliberately, for deliberation is more likely to accomplish goals. Is it not the case that anyone who has no faith has no religion, that whoever has no account of good deeds gets no goodly reward, and that whoever has no intention has no [reward for his] work?[457] Indeed, the reward in God's book for jihād in God's path is something for which a Muslim should love to be singled out. It is a commerce that God has pointed out, by which God has saved [people] from humiliation, and through which He has bestowed nobility in this world and the next.

Abū Bakr then supplied ʿAmr with some of those who had mustered to those who had gathered about him and put him in command of Palestine, ordering him [to take] a certain road that he specified. He also wrote to al-Walīd, ordering him to al-Urdunn[458] and supplying him with some of those available. He also summoned Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān, putting him in command of a large army that included most of those who had mustered to Abū Bakr. Among his troops were Suhayl b. ʿAmr[459] and the like of him from the people of Mecca.

---

456. This probably is the area of the northern Ḥijāz near the Red Sea, where ʿAmr had close relations with the Quḍāʿah tribe of Balī, which was the tribe of his grandmother and one of his wives. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 408, 411; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 111, seems to err in asserting that ʿAmr's mother was also from the Balī.

457. On the reward for works being according to intention, see the famous ḥadīth in Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, I, 2.

458. A division (jund) of Syria with its capital at Tiberias, al-Urdunn was probably derived from the Roman province of Palaestina Secunda but did not exactly correspond to it. See EI[1], s.v. al-Urdunn (second part); Iṣṭakhrī, Masālik, 58–59; Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 327–28; Ibn Khurdādhbih, Masālik, 78; Muqaddasi, Taqāsīm, 161–64; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 147–49; Le Strange, Palestine, 30–32.

459. Al-ʿĀmirī of the ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy of the Quraysh. He embraced Islam in 8/630 after Ḥunayn. Participating in the conquest of Syria, he died there of the plague in 18/639 or else at Marj al-Ṣuffar or al-Yarmūk. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 404–5; Zubayrī, Nasab, 417–18; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 123; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 93–94.

Abū Bakr saw them off on foot. He also put Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ in charge of [some of] those who had gathered and put him in command of Ḥimṣ.[460] Abū Bakr went out with him; his two commanders [also] walked, the troops being with the two of them and behind them. Abū Bakr admonished each of the two.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Sahl — al-Qāsim, Mubashshir — Sālim,[461] and Yazīd b. Asīd al-Ghassānī — Khālid and ʿUbādah:[462] When al-Walīd came to Khālid b. Saʿīd to support him, when the troops of the Muslims whom Abū Bakr had supplied him with came — they were named the Replacement Army — and when Khālid had heard about the commanders and their coming to him, he attacked the Romans, seeking credit for himself but exposing his rear. The commanders hastened to fight the Romans. Bāhān feigned flight from him, recoiling with his army on Damascus. Khālid attacked [2085] with his army, which included Dhū al-Kalāʿ, ʿIkrimah, and al-Walīd, until he stopped at Marj al-Ṣuffar[463] between al-Wāqūṣah[464]

460. The Emesa of Roman times, it is still one of the largest cities of Syria. In early Islamic times the name also applied to its province (jund). See *EI*², s.v. Ḥimṣ; Iṣṭakhrī, Masālik, 61; Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 324–25; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 302–4; Le Strange, Palestine, 25, 35–36, 39.

461. This is a reference to Sālim b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who died in 106/725. In the preceding parallel isnād Sayf—Sahl—al-Qāsim, Sayf quotes an unidentifiable and probably fictional transmitter to link himself with the famous grandson of Abū Bakr; here he probably is doing the same to link himself with the famous grandson of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. On Sālim b. ʿAbdallāh, see Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 195–201; Zubayrī, Nasab, 357; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 436–38.

462. These two transmitters, who are always cited together by Sayf in this volume, appear to be Khālid b. Maʿdān al-Kalāʿī al-Ḥimsī (d. 104–8/721–26) and ʿUbādah b. Nusayy al-Kindī al-Urdunnī (d. 118/736), as suggested in Ṭabarī, Indices, 164, 309. These identifications appear plausible in view of their biographies, which reveal them to have been important Syrian traditionists. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 455–56; Ibn ʿAsākir, Tahdhīb, V, 89–91; VII, 217–18; Dhahabī, Siyar, IV, 536–41; V, 323–24; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 118–20; V, 113–14. Donner, Conquests, 134, 317 n. 211, appears unaware or unconvinced of their identities, however, and indeed they are never fully identified in Sayf's reports; nor do the rijāl books ever say that they transmitted to Abū ʿUthmān, Sayf's rāwī here. Sayf may have wanted to imply that his reports were derived from these outstanding traditionists without having actually to say so. In other instances he has attributed reports to famous, reliable traditionists through unknown persons of his own invention.

463. A plain extending south of Damascus, near Tall Shaqhab. See *EI*², s.v. Mardj al-Ṣuffar; Le Strange, Palestine, 504. It was the site of a famous battle mentioned here and on pp. 107, 109, below. For the battle, see also Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 104. Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 150, has turned the apparent Muslim defeat in this battle into a victory, led by Khālid b. al-Walīd no less, in which not a single Muslim was either killed or wounded!

464. The present-day village of al-Yāqūṣah at al-Yarmūk. See *EI*¹, s.v. al-Yarmūk. The report of Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 354–55, seems to be derived wholly from Sayf.

and Damascus. But the outlying forces of Bāhān surrounded him, blocking the roads against him without his knowing of it. Also Bāhān marched against him. He found Khālid's son Sa'īd b. Khālid[465] leading his men and seeking bounty (yastamṭir).[466] The Romans killed them. When the news reached Khālid he left, fleeing with a troop on bare animals (jarīdah), as those of his companions who could escaped on the backs of the horses and the camels, having been driven from their camp. The rout of Khālid b. Sa'īd did not end until he had reached Dhū al-Marwah.[467] Meanwhile, 'Ikrimah stayed with the troops to offer rear-guard protection. He repelled Bāhān and his soldiers from them, [keeping them] from pursuing him. He also stayed near Syria.

Meanwhile, Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah had come [to Abū Bakr] as an emissary from Khālid b. al-Walīd. Abū Bakr summoned the men to [join] him, then placed him in charge of al-Walīd's district and set out with him to give him counsel. When Shuraḥbīl came to Khālid [b. Sa'īd] he marched away with Khālid's troops, except for a few. [At the same time other] troops mustered to Abū Bakr, who put Mu'āwiyah in command of them and ordered him to join Yazīd. Mu'āwiyah then set out, [going] until he caught up with Yazīd. When Mu'āwiyah marched past Khālid, he took away the rest of Khālid's men.

Al-Sarī — Shu'ayb — Sayf — Hishām b. 'Urwah[468] — his father: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb did not cease speaking to Abū Bakr about Khālid b. al-Walīd and about Khālid b. Sa'īd. Abū Bakr refused to listen to 'Umar regarding Khālid b. al-Walīd saying, "I will not put away a sword that Allāh has drawn against the unbelievers." But he

---

465. His mother was Ḥamīnah (or, improbably, Umayyah) bt. Khalaf b. As'ad al-Khuzā'iyyah. Sa'īd was born in Ethiopia when many of the Muslims went there to escape persecution by the Quraysh about 615 C.E., which would make him very young at the time of Marj al-Ṣuffar. See Ibn 'Asākir, Tahdhīb, VI, 126; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 45.

466. Lit., "asking for rain."

467. A place in Wādī al-Qurā in the Ḥijāz. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 14, 128–29, 779; Donner, Conquests, 114.

468. Hishām b. 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām al-Asadī al-Qurashī, the nephew of 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr and the grandnephew of the Prophet's wife 'Ā'ishah. He was well placed to transmit traditions in Medina and was one of the most important traditionists of his generation. Like many of the early traditionists from noble Qurashī families, he was the son of a slave mother. He visited al-Kūfah three times and finally became one of the companions of al-Manṣūr in Baghdād, where he died. He lived c. 61/680 to 145–46/762–63. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 321; Zubayrī, Nasab, 248; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 48–51.

listened to ʿUmar with regard to Khālid b. Saʿīd after the latter had done his deed.

ʿAmr took the coastal road, and Abū ʿUbaydah followed the same route. Yazīd took the Tabūk road, and Shuraḥbīl went by the same [2086] path. Abū Bakr named the chief cities of Syria for them [as objectives]. He knew that the Romans would divert their attention; therefore he desired to have the descending one ascend and the ascending one descend, so that they would not forsake one another.[469] It turned out as he had supposed, and they achieved what he had wanted.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAmr — al-Shaʿbī: When Khālid b. Saʿīd came to Dhū al-Marwah and the news [of that] came to Abū Bakr, he wrote to Khālid, "Remain where you are, for, by my life, you are one who plunges forward then shrinks back in fear, ever seeking to save [yourself] from deep difficulties that you do not wade into [intending] what is right, nor do you persevere for it." When afterward, Abū Bakr gave permission to him to enter Medina, Khālid said, "Pardon me." Abū Bakr replied, "Is it to be stupid prattle, even though you are a man of cowardice in warfare?" When Khālid had gone from his presence, Abū Bakr said, "ʿUmar and ʿAlī were more knowledgeable about Khālid. If only I had listened to them about him, I would have feared[470] him and avoided him."

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mubashshir and Sahl; and Abū ʿUthmān — Khālid, ʿUbādah; and Abū Ḥārithah:[471] The commanders led the whole of the army toward Syria. ʿIkrimah served as a covering force for the army. The Romans heard about that, so they wrote to Herakleios.[472] Herakleios went forth until he stopped at Ḥimṣ, where he prepared troops to [face] the Muslims and mobilized his

469. This would appear to mean that he had them fan out to fill in the gaps along the front so that the different divisions could support one another more easily in the event of a Roman attack.

470. Or "been ashamed to use."

471. Muḥriz b. Jāriyah [or Ḥārithah] b. Rabīʿah b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā b. ʿAbd Shams al-ʿAbshamī al-Qurashī, he was said to have governed Mecca for ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and to have been killed in the Battle of the Camel in 36/656. Sayf's frequent citations from him are probably owing to the fact that his descendants had settled in al-Kūfah and were prominent there. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 159; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 153; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 78; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 368. The same person also is mentioned as one of the witnesses against Ḥujr b. ʿAdī in 51/671 in Ṭabarī, II, 132. For the identification of Abū Ḥārithah as Muḥriz, see Ṭabarī, I, 2573, which appears decisive; cf. Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIV.

472. Ar. Hiraql. The Roman emperor, ruled 610–41 C.E. The best native source for his reign is Theophanes, Chronicle, 6–40.

forces against them. He intended that the different Muslim forces would be too busy to cooperate, owing to the number of his troops and the excellence of his men. He sent his full brother Theodore[473] against ʿAmr. When Theodore set out toward the Muslims with ninety thousand [men], Herakleios sent out a rear guard, [which went along] until the commander of the rear guard camped at Tha-[2087] niyyat Jilliq[474] in the highest part of Palestine. He also sent Jurjah[475] b. Tawdhurā[476] toward Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān, so that he encamped facing him. In addition, he sent out al-Durāqiṣ,[477] who confronted Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah. He sent al-Fīqār[478] b. Nasṭūs in command of sixty thousand against Abū ʿUbaydah.

The Muslims dreaded them, as all the Muslim divisions together amounted to only twenty-one thousand, beside ʿIkrimah, who had six thousand. They all expressed their fears to ʿAmr by letter and messenger, saying, "What should we do?" He wrote letters back to them, sending them by messenger, saying: "The best plan is to join together. That is because the likes of us, if we combine, will not be beaten owing to [our] fewness. On the other hand, if we split up, there will not remain a man among us with enough troops to defeat any of those who are before us and are ready for us, for each of our divisions." Therefore, they set a time [to be] at al-Yarmūk in order to combine forces there.

Abū Bakr had also received letters like those they had sent to ʿAmr. His reply came back to them with the like of ʿAmr's view saying:

---

473. Ar. Tadhāriq. A genuine character attested in history, he defeated the Persians in Anatolia in 5–6/626–27, supervised the Persian withdrawal from the occupied lands of the Roman empire in the Near East in 7–8/628–29, and was defeated by the Muslims in 13–14/634–35, though after Abū Bakr's death. See Theophanes, Chronicle, 22, 29, 37.

474. Most likely to be the present village of Jillīn in southern Ḥawrān in Syria. See *EI*², s.v. Djilliḳ. It could be considered part of Palestine as it lay on the border of the former Roman province of Palaestina Secunda, which was to become the Muslim jund of al-Urdunn.

475. Text: Jarajah; read: Jurjah, as in Mss. B and IH; surely it is a form of George.

476. Vocalization based on Theodore. Thus the whole name is probably George, son of Theodore. He is also mentioned by Ibn Isḥāq in Ṭabarī, I, 2347.

477. Unidentified.

478. As explained in the notes to the Leiden text, this is probably the title bikarios, Latin vicarius. A bikarios was attached to the patrikios as an assistant in the early fifth century C.E., and therefore was of lower rank. Jones, Later Roman Empire, 609.

Combine, so that you may be one army. Meet the armies of the polytheists[479] with the army of the Muslims, for you are God's helpers. God comes to the aid of those who support Him and deserts those who show ingratitude to[480] Him. The likes of you will not be destroyed on account of [your] small numbers. Rather, ten thousand or more than ten thousand will be destroyed if they are attacked from the rear. Therefore take precautions about the rear. Join together at al-Yarmūk under your separate banners.[481] Let every man among you unite[482] with his companions. [2088]

[News of] that reached Herakleios, who wrote to his patrikioi:[483] "Combine against them. Camp the Romans in a place rich and generous, with a wide space for pursuit, [but] with [only] a narrow way of escape. Theodore is in overall command, Jurjah is in charge of the vanguard, Bāhān and al-Durāqiṣ are in charge of the two wings, and al-Fīqār is in charge of mobilization (ḥarb). Be of good cheer, for Bāhān is an effective reinforcement for you." They did [as the emperor had commanded] and camped at al-Wāqūṣah, which is on the bank of al-Yarmūk. The wadi became a trench for them, as it was a deep ravine between two mountains and could not be crossed. Bāhān and his companions wanted only for the Romans to recover their senses and behave in a nonaggressive manner toward[484] the Muslims, so that their courage might return to them.

---

479. Although the Romans were Christians and therefore People of the Book (ahl al-dhimmah) and thus properly speaking not polytheists, they often are referred to as such in these passages of Sayf. It is difficult to tell whether or not this reflects the development of Muslim-Christian polemic in Sayf's time, but it is not unlikely, given the increasingly ideological content of the struggles of the early ʿAbbāsid period. For the development of some of this polemic, see Sahas, John of Damascus, passim; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 232–33.

480. Or "disbelieve in."

481. Lit., "in mutual support." See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. s-n-d.

482. Text: li-yuṣalli; read: li-yaṣil, with Mss. IH^1, Kos., and IA. The other reading, which is preferred by the Leiden and Cairo eds., based on Ms. IH^2, would mean "lead his companions in worship," which does not appear to fit the context.

483. Ar. baṭāriqah, Latin patricii. It was an honorary title, revived by Constantine for his closest associates, but it gained greater meaning when it was added to the nomenclature of the supreme military commander, a magister utriusque militiae, in 415 C.E. In Justinian's time (527–65 C.E.) there were five such magistri, but it is not clear whether they yet held the title of patrikios. See Jones, Later Roman Empire, 106, 176, 178, 192, 609.

484. Or perhaps "find out the qualities of."

The Muslims moved from the camp where they had joined forces and camped against the Romans, right in front of them, on their route. The Romans had no route except against the Muslims. ʿAmr said, "O people, rejoice! By God, the Romans are surrounded! It rarely has happened that anything good comes to he who is surrounded." Thus the Muslims remained before them, on their road and their [only] way out, during Ṣafar 13 (6 April–4 May 634) and the two months of Rabīʿ (5 May–2 July). The Muslims were able neither to do anything against the Romans nor to reach them, the ravine —which is al-Wāqūṣah— being behind them and the trench before them. The Romans could not go forth at all but that the Muslims prevailed against them, until the month of Rabīʿ al-Awwal (5 May–3 June) had gone by.

[2089] Meanwhile, the Muslims had requested reinforcements from Abū Bakr, informing him of the situation in Ṣafar. He then wrote to Khālid [b. al-Walīd] to join them and commanded him to leave al-Muthannā in charge of Iraq. Khālid came to them in Rabīʿ.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, ʿAmr, and al-Muhallab: When the Muslims had camped at al-Yarmūk and requested reinforcements from Abū Bakr, he said, "Khālid is for it," and thereupon sent a message to him while he was in Iraq, asking him and urging him to get going. Thus it was that Khālid came through. Khālid came to the Muslims, while Bāhān came to the Romans, having sent ahead before him the deacons, monks, and priests to incite desire [for victory] in the Romans and to urge them to fight. The arrival of Khālid coincided with the arrival of Bāhañ. Bāhān led his forces out like a powerful [leader]. Khālid took charge of fighting him, while the [other] commanders fought those in front of them. Bāhān was defeated, and the [other] Romans followed one another successively into defeat, plunging into their trench [in flight]. The Romans saw a good omen in Bāhān,[485] and the Muslims rejoiced in Khālid. The Muslims fought in a ferocious rage, and the polytheists fought with vehement anger. The latter numbered one hundred forty thousand, of whom eighty thousand were bound, forty thousand of these chained and forty thousand tied with turbans.[486] They were

485. This reference seems out of place, but it means that, before the battle, the Romans were cheered by the arrival of Bāhān, as is clear from p. 160, below.

486. This was to prevent their fleeing in the face of danger or defeat.

eighty thousand cavalry and eighty thousand infantry.[487] The Muslims who had been present [at first] numbered twenty-seven thousand, until Khālid came with nine thousand, whereupon they became thirty-six thousand.

Abū Bakr became ill in Jumādā al-Ūlā (3 July–1 August). He died in the middle of Jumādā al-Ākhirah (16 August 634), before the victory by ten days.[488]

Al-Yarmūk [2090]

Abū Ja'far: Abū Bakr had assigned to each one of the commanders in Syria a district (kūrah) [to conquer]. Thus he assigned Ḥimṣ to Abū 'Ubaydah b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Jarrāḥ, Damascus to Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān, al-Urdunn to Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah, and Palestine to 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī and 'Alqamah b. Mujazziz.[489] When the latter two had accomplished their mission in Palestine 'Alqamah stayed on, and 'Amr[490] went to Egypt. When the commanders were about to enter Syria a large enemy force attacked each commander among them. Thus they agreed in their opinion to join together in one place and meet the combined force of the polytheists with the combined force of the Muslims. When Khālid saw the Muslims fighting under separate banners he said to them, "Are you interested, O chiefs, in something by which God will strengthen his religion, and through which neither loss nor harm will come to you either with it or from it?"

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Abū 'Uthmān Yazīd b. Asīd al-Ghassānī—Khālid and 'Ubādah: There came to it[491] with the commanders and the four divisions (junūd) twenty-seven thousand [men], in addition to three thousand from the defeated remnants of Khālid b.

---

487. These numbers do not add up to the alleged total of one hundred forty thousand. Probably there is a scribal error. In any case, the numbers are fanciful.

488. This version thus dates the Battle of al-Yarmūk to 5 Jumādā al-Ākhirah 13 (6 August 634).

489. Al-Mudlijī al-Kinānī. He was put in charge of several expeditions by the Prophet and the early caliphs, beginning in 9/630, until he was killed in a seaborne attack on Ethiopia in 20/641. His father's name is also given as Muḥarriz. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 44; II, 154; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 639–40; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II, 163; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 505–6.

490. 'Amr is not mentioned in the text here, but the addition is demanded by the context.

491. That is, al-Yarmūk.

Sa'īd whom Abū Bakr appointed Mu'āwiyah and Shuraḥbīl to command. There were also ten thousand in the reinforcements of the [2091] people of Iraq with Khālid b. al-Walīd. This was beside six thousand who remained with 'Ikrimah as a rear guard after Khālid b. Sa'īd. Thus they [all] amounted to forty-six thousand.

The Muslims did all their fighting under separate banners, each division and its commander [operating independently], with no one in overall command, until Khālid came to them from Iraq. The troops of Abū 'Ubaydah at al-Yarmūk were next to the troops of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī, and the troops of Shuraḥbīl were next to the troops of Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān. Thus Abū 'Ubaydah might conduct public worship with 'Amr and Shuraḥbīl with Yazīd, whereas 'Amr and Yazīd would not conduct public worship with Abū 'Ubaydah and Shuraḥbīl [all together]. Khālid b. al-Walīd arrived when they were in that situation. He encamped separately and held public worship for the people of Iraq. Khālid found the Muslims hard pressed by the Roman reinforcements under Bāhān, whereas he found the Romans cheered by their reinforcements.

But, when they met, God defeated them, to the extent that he forced them and their reinforcements to seek refuge in the trench,[492] for which al-Wāqūṣāh was one of the borders. They stayed in their trench for almost a whole month, while the priests, deacons, and monks urged them on and bewailed to them [the fate of] Christianity, so that, upon reflecting, they went forth into the battle, after which there was no battle like it, in Jumādā al-Ākhirah (2–30 August). When the Muslims perceived their sally and desired themselves to go forth under their separate commanders, Khālid b. al-Walīd went out among them. He praised God and lauded Him and then said:

> This is a day from among the days of God. There should be in it neither pride nor wrongdoing. Make your striving sincere, seeking God by your work, for this day also has what lies beyond it. Do not fight any people in a formation and ar-> [2092] rangement under separate banners and dispersing your-

492. Text: khanādiq; read: al-khandaq, with Kos. This change is demanded by the following reference to "borders" in the singular and also accords with the rest of the text. On trench warfare, see *EI*², s.v. Khandak.

> selves [along a line], for that is neither legitimate nor ought it to be. Those behind you, if they knew what you know, would keep you from [doing] this. In those areas about which you have not received [explicit] instructions, act according to what you believe would be the opinion of your ruler and what he would prefer.

They responded: "Give [it to us]! What is the [right] opinion?" He answered:

> Abū Bakr sent us [as separate commands] only because he thought that things would be easy for us, but, if he knew what has happened and is happening, he would have brought you together. Your situation is severer for the Muslims than that which has descended upon them and more helpful to the polytheists than their reinforcements. I have learned that this world has divided you from one another. God, God! Each man among you has received sole assignment of one of the cities for himself. It will not reduce his province for him if he admits the superior authority of one of the divisional commanders, nor will it increase his province if they submit to him. The appointment of one of you as overall commander will not diminish you [in stature] with God or with the caliph of God's Messenger. Let us get to it, for these [enemies] have readied themselves [for us]. This is a day of consequences. If we drive them back to their trench today, we will not cease driving them back. If, on the other hand, they defeat us, we will not succeed afterward. Come on, then, let us take the overall command by turns. Let one of us be in command today, another tomorrow, and another after tomorrow, so that each of you commands [at some time]. Leave me to take charge of you today.

Thus they put Khālid [temporarily] in command, considering it like the sallies of their troops, but the matter went on longer than what they had thought. The Romans went out in a formation the like of which those seeing [it] had never seen before. Khālid also went forth in a battle order that the Arabs had not used before: He set forth with between thirty-six and forty closely packed cavalry squadrons (kardūs).[493] He said: "Your enemy is numerous and terrible. There is no battle order more numerous to eyesight than [2093] squadrons."

Thus he deployed his center into squadrons and put Abū ʿUbaydah there. He also put his right into squadrons, with ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣī in charge of it and Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah in it. He arranged his left into squadrons as well, with Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān in command. In command of one of the Iraqi squadrons was al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr. Madhʿūr b. ʿAdī also commanded a squadron, ʿIyāḍ b. Ghanm a squadron, Hāshim b. ʿUtbah[494] a squadron, Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah[495] a squadron, and Khālid a squadron.

Commanding the defeated remnants of Khālid b. Saʿīd, Diḥyah b. Khalīfah[496] held charge of a squadron, Imruʾ al-Qays a squadron, Yazīd b. Yuḥannis[497] a squadron, Abū ʿUbaydah a squadron, ʿIkrimah a squadron, and Suhayl a squadron. Furthermore, ʿAbd al-Rahman b. Khālid,[498] who on that day was eighteen years old, commanded a

493. These would appear to be battalion-sized units, based on the numbers given, perhaps akin to the tribal regiments, but Sayf's information is not trustworthy. Their appearance here is almost certainly an anachronism, as Marwān b. Muḥammad is explicitly credited with initiating the use of karādīs in the second (eighth) century. See Ṭabarī, II, 1941, 1944; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 373.

494. Al-Zuhrī al-Qurashī, the newphew of Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ. He embraced Islam in 8/630, commanded at Jalūlāʾ in 17/638, settled in al-Kūfah, and was killed fighting on ʿAlī's side at Ṣiffīn in 38/658. See *EI*², s.v. Hāshim b. ʿUtba; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 20; II, 280; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 127, 132, 219–21; Kūfī, Futūḥ, 103–4, 114–16; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 593–94; Donner, Conquests, 119, 137, 207, 362, 400, 405, 409–10.

495. Al-ʿAmrī al-Tamīmī. He is mentioned only by Sayf. See Donner, Conquests, 365. He is meant to represent the father of Sayf's alleged authority Ḥanẓalah b. Ziyād b. Ḥanẓalah, mentioned on p. 000.ʿAskarī, Khamsūn wa miʾah ṣaḥābī, 227–41, identifies him as one of Sayf's fabrications for the glorification of the Tamīm tribal grouping. Sayf's Usayyid clan was a part of the ʿAmr Tamīm.

496. Al-Kalbī. He was allegedly sent as an emissary to the Roman emperor in 7/628, migrated to Syria, and died in al-Mizzah near Damascus c. 50/670. A variant tradition alleges that he became a Muslim only in the time of Abū Bakr. See *EI*², s.v. Diḥya; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 288; II, 232; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 234, 607, 612–13; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, IV, 249–51; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 47, 51, 74; Ibn ʿAsākir, Tahdhīb, V, 221–23; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 473–74; Donner, Conquests, 137, 366.

497. Abū al-Ḥasan al-Kūfī. It is curious that a Kūfan should be mentioned among the defeated remnants of Khālid b. Saʿīd. Perhaps this is a further embellishment by Sayf. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 664; Donner, Conquests, 366.

498. The son of Khālid b. al-Walīd and a Khathʿamī woman, he later served Muʿāwiyah as governor of Ḥimṣ, bore his standard at Ṣiffīn, and died of poison at Ḥimṣ in 46/666. His role at al-Yarmūk is found only in Sayf's report, which is doubtful, as he otherwise first appears as a commander in the reign of ʿUthmān. See *EI*², s.v. ʿAbd squadron, Ḥabīb b. Maslamah[499] a squadron, Ṣafwān b. Umayyah[500] a squadron, Saʿīd b. Khālid[501] a squadron, Abū al-Aʿwar b. Sufyān[502] a squadron, and Ibn Dhī al-Khimār[503] a squadron.

On the right ʿUmārah b. Makhshī b. Khuwaylid[504] commanded a squadron, Shuraḥbīl a squadron, [in which] Khālid b. Saʿīd was with [2094] al-Raḥmān b. Khālid; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 23; II, 129; Zubayrī, Nasab, 324–27; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 198, 222, 240–41; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 67–68 (discounting Sayf's version); Donner, Conquests, 366.

---

499. Al-Fihrī. He is chiefly famous for having led many of the original Muslim conquests in northern Syria, al-Jazīrah, and Armenia. Later he led one of Muʿāwiyah's wings at Ṣiffīn. Said to have been born in Mecca c. 620 C.E., he died in Armenia or Damascus in 42/662. If his birth date is accurate, he can hardly have fought at al-Yarmūk or commanded conquests soon after. Perhaps his birth date was invented to explain how he could have been a Qurashī but not a Companion. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥabīb b. Maslama; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 34; II, 289; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 409–10; Zubayrī, Nasab, 447; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 149, 157–58, 169, 222, 237; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 132 (improbably subordinated to Khālid b. al-Walīd), 161, 174, 176–77, 189, 207–8, 219, 221, 225, 228, 234–39, 241; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 309; Taḥdhīb, II, 190–91; Theophanes, Chronicle, 44; Donner, Conquests, 150, 153, 247, 363.

500. Al-Jumaḥī. He was the son of one of the Prophet's inveterate opponents who had been slain at Badr. His wife was a daughter of Abū Sufyān. Ṣafwān became a Muslim in 8/630, visited Medina to make hijrah, then returned to Mecca, where he died in 36–42/656–662. As it is denied that he participated in any campaigns, his presence at al-Yarmūk, which is found only in Sayf, probably is yet another of the latter's attempts to improve on the reputations of Companions unpopular with the Shīʿah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 24; II, 535; Zubayrī, Nasab, 388; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 187–88.

501. This same Saʿīd, the son of Khālid b. Saʿīd, had already been slain by the Romans according to another report of Sayf; see p. 82, above; cf. note 465, above.

502. ʿAmr b. Sufyān al-Sulamī, a confederate of Abū Sufyān who seems to have become a Muslim even after Ḥunayn, which makes his status as Companion doubtful (Bukhārī makes no mention of it). He figured as a commander in several campaigns, especially naval ones, including that against Cyprus in 26/647 and the very significant victory over the emperor Constans II off Lycia in 34/655. A supporter of Muʿāwiyah, he fought for the latter at Ṣiffīn, was with ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ in Egypt, and settled in the jund of al-Urdunn. See *EI*², s.v. Abu'l-Aʿwar al-Sulamī; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 219, 222; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 123; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 540–41; Theophanes, Chronicle, 45; Donner, Conquests, 136–38, 363.

503. Only found in Sayf, this name would appear to refer to a son of ʿAbhalah al-Aswad Dhū al-Khimār b. Kaʿb al-ʿAnsī, the false prophet of Yemen who appeared in the Riddah period. However, another, perhaps more likely candidate for the father of this man is Subayʿ (or Sabʿ) Dhū al-Khimār b. al-Ḥārith b. Mālik (al-Thaqafī? al-Hilālī?), who was killed fighting against the Muslims at Ḥunayn in 8/630. See *EI*², s.v. al-Aswad b. Kaʿb al-ʿAnsī; Ṭabarī, I, 1655, 1664; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 272; II, 199; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 885, 907, 911; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 437; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 62.

504. Al-Ḍamrī. He concluded peace with the Ḍamrah for the Prophet, then later fought in Syria. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 42; II, 572; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 185. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 517, is taken from Sayf.

him, ʿAbdallāh b. Qays[505] a squadron, ʿAmr b. ʿAbasah[506] a squadron, al-Simṭ b. al-Aswad[507] a squadron, Dhū al-Kalāʿ a squadron, Muʿāwiyah b. Ḥudayj[508] another, Jundab b. ʿAmr b. Ḥumamah[509] a squadron, ʿAmr b. So-and-So[510] a squadron, and Laqīṭ b. ʿAbd al-Qays b. Bajrah, the confederate of the Banū Ẓafar from the Banū Fazārah,[511] a squadron.

On the left Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān held command of a squadron, al-Zubayr a squadron, Ḥawshab Dhū Ẓulaym[512] a squadron, Qays b. ʿAmr b. Zayd b. ʿAwf b. Madhbūl b. Māzin b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah b. Hawāzin, 505. Apparently the famous Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī is intended. An Iraqi who governed al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah, he died at al-Kūfah or Mecca between 41/661 and 53/673. As he is not otherwise attested in Syria, he is most unlikely actually to have taken part there, so that his presence in this list is probably another of Sayf's pro-Iraqi embellishments. In Ṭabarī, I, 2523, Sayf even says that ʿUmar made him governor of the Syrian coast, which is certainly false. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ashʿarī, Abū Mūsā; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 359–60; Donner, Conquests, 176, 212, 215–16, 366, 417, 420–21, 433, 436, 438.

506. Al-Sulamī. He dubiously claimed to have been one of the very earliest Companions. He joined the Prophet toward the end of the latter's mission, perhaps c. 7/629 or more probably 9/631. He settled in Ḥimṣ. Sayf later claims a post for him in Syria. See Ṭabarī, I, 1166, 1168, 2523, 2526; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 125; II, 167; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 403; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 5–6; Donner, Conquests, 366.

507. Al-Kindī. He also settled in Ḥimṣ, where he, or at least his son, became one of the most important men in the city. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 236; II, 513; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 115; Donner, Conquests, 132, 139, 150, 363; Crone, Slaves, 101.

508. Al-Sakūnī al-Kindi. He settled in Egypt and supported ʿUthmān, then Muʿāwiyah, in the first civil war. From Egypt he campaigned against the Sudan and North Africa. He died in 52/672. His alleged participation at al-Qādisiyyah is probably an embellishment by Sayf, meant to show harmony and cooperation between the Companions of Syria and Iraq, as well as to refute Shīʿī criticism of prominent pro-Umayyad Syrians. See Ṭabarī, I, 2220–22; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 178, 218, 241, 247–49; Kindī, Wulāh wa quḍāh, 12, 15, 17–19, 21, 27–30; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 431; Donner, Conquests, 207, 367, 396.

509. Al-Dawsī, the confederate of the Banū Umayyah, said to have been martyred at Ajnādayn, in which case he could not have fought at al-Yarmūk. His daughter married ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 215; II, 266; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 135; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 249; Donner, Conquests, 359, 363.

510. This could be anyone.

511. Mentioned only by Sayf, as indicated by Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 330; Donner, Conquests, 367. The Ẓafar here are a branch of the Aws of the Anṣār. See Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 152, 154, 161–62.

512. Ḥawshab b. Yazīd al-Ḥamdānī. He was from Ḥimṣ and fell fighting for Muʿāwiyah at Ṣiffīn in 37/657. His participation at al-Yarmūk is mentioned only by Sayf. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 232; II, 322; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 220, 222; Donner, Conquests, 367.

the confederate of the Banū al-Najjār,[513] a squadron, ʿIṣmah b. ʿAbdallāh, the confederate of the Banū al-Najjār from the Banū Asad,[514] a squadron, Ḍirār b. al-Azwar a squadron, Masrūq b. So-and-So[515] a squadron, ʿUtbah b. Rabīʿah b. Bahz, the confederate of the Banū ʿIṣmah,[516] a squadron, Jāriyah b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ashjaʿī, the confederate of the Banū Salimah,[517] a squadron, and Qabāth[518] a squadron. Abū al-Dardāʾ[519] was the judge, Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb[520] was the preacher [2095]

513. One of the earliest Companions from the Anṣār, he is said to have attended the swearing of allegiance at al-ʿAqabah by Mecca before the hijrah, then to have fought at Badr, and is last mentioned at al-Khandaq in 5/627. All other sources give him a straight Najjārī genealogy. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 185; II, 457; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 26, 164, 447; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 458, 613, 705; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 517; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 244; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 83; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 251; Donner, Conquests, 367.

514. Unidentified and mentioned only by Sayf. See Donner, Conquests, 367.

515. Masrūq b. Ḥarmalah al-ʿAkkī. He seems to have been mentioned only by Sayf in the conquests, but other sources mention his siding with Muʿāwiyah in the first civil war. Presumably, then, Sayf's description of Masrūq's early military activities is meant to palliate his other, later role. See Ṭabarī, I, 1986–87, 1993, 1997, 2399–2400; Ibn Muzāḥim, Ṣiffīn, 507; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 408; Donner, Conquests, 367.

516. Al-Bahrānī (or al-Sulamī), the confederate of the Lawdhān of the Aws. He fought at Badr and disappears from the sources after Uḥud. Only Sayf has him at al-Yarmūk and gives his allegiance as belonging to a Banū ʿIṣmah, the identity of whom cannot be discerned; probably the name results from a copyist's error in which there was confusion with the just-mentioned ʿIṣmah b. ʿAbdallāh. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 177, 328; II, 578; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 168; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 695; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 554; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 453; III, 103; Donner, Conquests, 367.

517. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf, as shown by Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 218; Donner, Conquests, 367. The Salimah were a tribe of the Anṣār. See Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 152, 154, 169.

518. Qabāth b. Ashyam (Qays) al-Laythī al-Kinānī. After fighting at Badr against the Muslims he embraced Islam about 8/630, settled in Ḥimṣ, and shed blood in defense of the caliph ʿUthmān's house in Medina in 35/656. See Ṭabarī, I, 967, 3016; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 36; II, 454; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 411; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 9; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 221–22; Donner, Conquests, 362 (under Qiyātha).

519. ʿUwaymir (or ʿĀmir) b. Zayd al-Khazrajī, a famous Companion who settled in Damascus, where he transmitted many traditions before his death in 31–32/651–52. No military exploits of his are recorded except by Sayf. See *EI*², s.v. Abu'l-Dardāʾ; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 188; II 165; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 391–93; Donner, Conquests, 131, 136, 367.

520. An outstanding opponent of Islam until the fall of Mecca, he is often portrayed in an advisory capacity thereafter until his death in 32/653 at a great age. He was the father of the caliph Muʿāwiyah. His ties with Syria before Islam are widely reported. See *EI*², s.v. Abū Sufyān; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 8; II, 536; Donner, Conquests, 96, 362.

(qāṣṣ),[521] Qabāth b. Ashyam was in charge of reconaissance, and ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd[522] was the paymaster (ʿalā al-aqbāḍ).

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah, and, similarly, Abū ʿUthmān: The Qurʾān reciter (qārīʾ) was al-Miqdād.[523] It was from the practice followed by the Prophet of God after Badr[524] that Sūrat al-Jihād be read before a battle, and it is al-Anfāl.[525] The people did not cease doing this after that.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Abū ʿUthmān Yazīd b. Asīd al-Ghassānī — Khālid and ʿUbādah: One thousand of the Prophet's Companions participated at al-Yarmūk, among them about one hundred who had been at Badr. Abū Sufyān would go about, stopping at the squadrons to say: "God, God! You are the defenders of the Arabs and the supporters of Islam. They are the defenders of the Romans and the supporters of polytheism. O God, this is a day from among your days. O God, send down your help to your worshipers."

A man said to Khālid, "The Romans are so numerous and the Muslims so few." Khālid answered: "How few are the Romans, and how many the Muslims! Armies become numerous only with victory and few only with defeat, not by the number of men. By God, I would love it if the roan horse were cured of the pain in its hooves, and if the enemy were twice as many." His horse's hooves had become abraded during his journey.

---

521. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳāṣṣ.

522. Al-Hudhalī, the confederate of the Qurashī Zuhrah. He was one of the humbler early Muslims and later appeared, after his migration to al-Kūfah, aligned with ʿAlī and opposed to ʿUthmān. The latter is said to have brought him back to Medina, abused him, and put him under a kind of house arrest until his death in 32/653. Ibn Masʿūd's fame has reverberated down through the ages owing to his crucial role in the transmission of tradition to the next generation in al-Kūfah, the crucible of the earliest Islamic writing and systematization of Islamic legal thinking. No military roles are attested for him in the conquests except in Sayf's reports. See *EI*², s.v. Ibn Masʿūd; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 58, II, 114; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 150–61, VI, 13–14; Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 36–37; Donner, Conquests, 243, 367.

523. Al-Miqdād b. ʿAmr al-Kindī or al-Ḥaḍramī, the confederate of the Zuhrah, he also was one of the famous early Muslims of humble origin who had great popularity later. He died near Medina at seventy in 33/654. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 328; II, 408; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 161–63; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, III, 483–84; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 454–55.

524. The famous first victory of the Muslims over the Quraysh in 2/624. See *EI*², s.v. Badr.

525. The usual name of the eighth sūrah of the Qurʾān. Note that originally this also may have included the ninth sūrah, al-Tawbah, as well, for the latter is not separated from the former by a basmalah. See Zamakhsharī, Kashshāf, II, 171; Ibn Kathīr, Tafsīr, II, 331.

Khālid then commanded ʿIkrimah and al-Qaʿqāʿ, who were in charge of the two wings of the center, to start the battle. Al-Qaʿqāʿ recited some verses of rajaz, saying: [2096]

If only I could meet you in the chase,
Before the harsh violence of the numerous, oncoming army,
While you are among your reddish bay horses assembled for the chase.

ʿIkrimah said:

The light-spirited among the girls has learned that I by noble deed offer protection.

The battle began, the troops fought, and the cavalry pursued one another. They were in the midst of that when the post arrived from Medina. The horsemen took the post rider, asking him what news there was, but he told them only that things were normal. He also told them about reinforcements. But he [actually] had come only to report the death of Abū Bakr and the appointment of Abū ʿUbaydah to command. They brought him to Khālid, and the rider informed him of the news about Abū Bakr, giving it to him in secret. He also [2097] told him what he had told the troops. Khālid said, "You have done well; therefore stay." He took the letter, putting it in his quiver. He feared that, if he displayed that, its effect would spread among the troops. Maḥmiyah b. Zunaym,[526] who was the messenger, stayed with Khālid.

Jurjah went forth until he was between the two [front] lines. He called out for Khālid to come out to him. Leaving Abū ʿUbaydah in his place, Khālid went out to Jurjah and stood right beside him between the two lines, so that the necks of their mounts touched. One of them had given a guarantee of safe-conduct to the other. Jurjah said: "O Khālid, tell me the truth and do not lie to me, for the free-born does not lie, and do not try to deceive me, for the noble-natured does not try to deceive one who is acting kindly by God. Did God send down a sword from heaven on your Prophet, giving it to him, so that you do not draw it against a people but that you defeat them?" Khālid answered, "No." Jurjah asked, "Then why are you named 'the Sword of God?'" Khālid replied:

526. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 487.

> God sent us His Prophet, who summoned us, but we all avoided him and removed ourselves far away from him. Then some of us believed him and followed him, whereas others distanced themselves from him and called him a liar. I was among those who called him a liar, distanced themselves from him, and fought him. Then God gripped our hearts and our forelocks, guiding us by him, so that we followed him. The Prophet said [to me], "You are a sword among the swords of God, which God has drawn against the polytheists," and prayed for victory for me. Thus I was named "the Sword of God" according to that, for I am the harshest of the Muslims against the polytheists.

The Roman said, "You have told me the truth."

Then Jurjah continued with him, "O Khālid, tell me what you are calling me to." Khālid answered, "To witnessing that there is no god but God and that Muḥammad is His servant and His messenger, and to the acknowledgment of that which he brought from God." The Roman continued, "And he who does not accept [your religion]?" Khālid replied, "Then [they must pay] the jizyah payment, and we will protect them." The Roman went on, "And if he does not pay it?" Khālid said, "We give him warning of war; then we fight him."
[2098] Jurjah asked, "What is the rank of he who joins you and responds positively to you regarding this matter today?" Khālid answered, "Our rank is one regarding that which God has imposed on us, both the noble among us and the humble, both the first of us and the last." Then Jurjah asked yet again, "Does he who joins you today, O Khālid, obtain the same amount of payment and supplies as you do?" Khālid said, "Yes, and better." The Roman went on, "And how can he be your equal, when you have preceded him [in joining Islam]?" Khālid replied:

> We came into this affair and gave the oath of allegiance to our Prophet when he was [still] living among us, when the revelations (akhbār) of heaven would come to him and he would tell us about the books[527] and show us the verses (āyāt).[528] It was imperative for anyone who saw what we saw and heard what we heard to embrace Islam and swear alle> giance. But you have not seen the wonders and proofs that we saw, nor have you heard what we heard. Therefore whoever among you enters into this affair sincerely and with [true intention] is better than we.

527. That is, the heavenly books or divine revelations.
528. This can also mean "signs."

Jurjah said, "By God, you have indeed told me the truth and not tried to deceive me or to persuade me with a friendly tone." Khālid said: "By God, I have indeed told you the truth. I do not bear any hostility toward you or toward anyone among you. God is indeed the master of what you have asked about." Jurjah said, "You have spoken the truth to me." He turned his shield over and inclined toward Khālid, saying, "Teach me Islam." Therefore Khālid brought him to his tent and poured over him a skin of water. Then Jurjah made two prostrations (rakʿatayn) of worship.

The Romans attacked when Jurjah had gone over to Khālid, for they thought Jurjah was making a charge. They drove the Muslims from their positions, except for those covering them, ʿIkrimah and al-Ḥārith b. Hishām.[529] Khālid rode, and Jurjah was with him, while the Romans were in the midst of the Muslims. The troops called to each other and regrouped, and the Romans retreated to their positions. Khālid then marched with them until the two sides were striking each other with swords. Khālid and Jurjah kept smiting the enemy from before sunrise until the sun had inclined toward setting. Then Jurjah was struck down, without having performed any worship in which he prostrated himself, except for the two prostrations by which he had embraced Islam. The troops performed the first worship[530] (al-ūlā) and the midafternoon worship by sign.[531] [2099]

The Romans weakened. Khālid rushed upon the enemy with the center until he was between their cavalry and their infantry. The battle site had a wide space for pursuit [but only] a narrow way of es-

---

529. Al-Makhzūmī, the brother of Abū Jahl and first cousin of Khālid b. al-Walīd. He embraced Islam at the conquest of Mecca in 8/630 and took part in the conquest of Syria, where he died in the plague of 18/639, or else at al-Yarmūk. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 404; Zubayrī, Nasab, 301–2; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 60, 119, 130; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 120–21; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 293–94.

530. Evidently the noon worship (ẓuhr).

531. This means that, with the battle going on, the men did not assemble for the formal worship in the usual way but performed their assigned worship in some unspecified symbolic way. Usually ṣalāt al-khawf, the "fear prayer," involves shortening the worship ritual, delaying it, or doing it in turns; but the term also may mean performing it by sign, especially from an animal's back. See Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, II, 17–19; Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, I, 277–78, 334–6; Mālik, Muwaṭṭaʾ, 130–31.

cape.[532] When their horsemen found a way to go they went, leaving behind their infantry in their battle order. Their horses went along, speeding away with their riders into the desert. The [Muslim] troops delayed their worship so that they worshiped after the victory. When the Muslims saw the Roman cavalry heading to escape, they opened [their ranks] for them [to pass] and did not impede them. Thus they went on and scattered throughout the country.

Khālid and the Muslims rather advanced on the infantry, breaking them as if a wall had been pulled down on them. Then they were attacked in their trench. Khālid rushed against them in it, so that they headed for al-Wāqūṣah until the bound [men] and the others of them fell into it. Those who were bound who feared for themselves pulled into it those who persisted in fighting. Thus one would pull in ten who could not bear his [weight]. As often as two fell in, the rest were weaker. One hundred twenty thousand plunged into al-Wāqūṣah, eighty thousand bound and forty thousand unfettered, beside those who were killed in the battle among the cavalry and infantry. The share [in the spoils] of a cavalryman on that day was one thousand five hundred [dirhams]. Al-Fīqār and some of the Roman nobles wrapped themselves up in their mantles (barānis) and then sat down, saying, "We do not like seeing such a day of evil, because we have not been able to see a day of joy, and because we have not succeeded in protecting Christianity." They were struck down while [2100] wrapped in their mantles.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū ʿUthmān—Khālid and ʿUbādah: Khālid awoke the morning after that night in the tent of Theodore. When he entered the trench he took up quarters in it, while his cavalry surrounded it. The troops fought until the morning.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Abū ʿUthmān al-Ghassānī — his father:[533] On that day, ʿIkrimah b. Abī Jahl said, "[Would] I fight the Messenger of God in every place, yet flee from you today?!" Then he called out, "Who will take an oath [to fight] to the death?" Al-Ḥārith b. Hishām and Ḍirār b. al-Azwar gave him their oaths of allegiance [on that condition], along with four hundred of the Muslim notables and horsemen.[534] They fought in front of Khālid's tent until they all 532. This echoes the words of Herakleios on p. 85, above.

533. There is no independent evidence for his existence or for that of his son.

534. Or "knights." But this word seems too loaded with medieval Christian connotations.

were disabled with wounds. Many were killed, though some recovered, including Ḍirār b. al-Azwar. ʿIkrimah was brought wounded to Khālid after the men had arisen. Khālid put ʿIkrimah's head on his thigh. [He was also brought] ʿAmr b. ʿIkrimah,[535] and he put his head on his leg. He began to wipe their faces and let water dribble into their throats while saying, "Ibn al-Ḥantamah[536] claimed that we would not die as martyrs."

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū ʿUmays[537]—al-Qāsim b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān[538]—Abū Umāmah,[539] who participated at al-Yarmūk along with ʿUbādah b. al-Ṣāmit:[540] The women fought on that day during 535. Alleged son of ʿIkrimah b. Abī Jahl, to whom Zubayrī, Nasab, 311, credits no offspring, rather specifically denying that ʿIkrimah had any children. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 145, has ʿUmar for ʿAmr b. ʿIkrimah but may have derived his report from Sayf.

---

536. That is, ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. Al-Ḥantamah bt. Hāshim b. al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmiyyah was his mother. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 347.

537. ʿUtbah b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd al-Hudhalī, the great-grandson of Ibn Masʿūd and a Kūfan traditionist in early ʿAbbāsid times. He enjoyed a good reputation. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 366; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 97.

538. A mawlā of the family of Abī Sufyān b. Ḥarb al-Umawī and a Damascene transmitter of tradition. According to differing reports, he was either the mawlā of Khālid b. Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah or of Juwayriyyah bt. Abī Sufyān. He participated in an attack on Constantinople and died in 112/730. His reputation as a transmitter is weak. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 449–50; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 322–24.

539. Al-Ṣudayy b. ʿAjlān al-Bāhilī, he settled in Syria and fought at Ṣiffīn, probably for Muʿāwiyah, despite a report to the contrary, for he died at Ḥimṣ. A visitor to the caliph al-Walīd I, he was known as the last of the Companions alive in Syria. His birth date was either c. 617 C.E., or 25/646, according to two variant versions, the latter of which would exclude his having been either a Companion or probably even having fought at Ṣiffīn. Although not featured in the Sīrah, he is reported by Abū Mikhnaf to have been sent out to fight a Roman force in al-ʿArabah during the conquest of Syria. He died in 86/705. Caskel thinks two Abū Umāmahs, a Companion and a traditionist, have been conflated. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 539; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 411–12; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 382; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 130, 177, 318; Ibn ʿAsākir, Tahdhīb, VI, 419–24; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 182; Tahdhīb, IV, 420–21; Donner, Conquests, 115–16.

540. Al-Khazrajī, one of the few important Anṣār in the conquest period. He was one of the *naqīb*s appointed by the Prophet for Medina, fought in all the Prophet's famous battles, then migrated to Syria, where he died in Palestine at al-Ramlah or Jerusalem in 34/655 at the age of seventy-two. He governed Ḥimṣ under ʿUmar and participated in the conquest of Egypt and the Cyprus campaign of 28/649. He reportedly expressed opposition to Muʿāwiyah during the latter's governorship. This would not be surprising in view of Muʿāwiyah's hostility to the Anṣār. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 189; II, 559; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 387; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 157, 166, 180; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 156–58, 161, 166–67, 181–82; Ibn ʿAsākir, Tahdhīb, VII, 209–17; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 268–69; Donner, Conquests, 153–54, 364.

one round of fighting. Juwayriyyah bt. Abī Sufyān[541] was wounded[542] [2101] during one round and was with her husband[543] after heavy fighting. On that day Abū Sufyān's eye was hit. Abū Ḥathmah[544] removed the arrow from his eye.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Mustanīr b. Yazīd[545]—Arṭāh b. Juhaysh:[546] Al-Ashtar[547] took part at al-Yarmūk and did not participate at al-Qādisiyyah. A man of the Romans went forth on that day and said, "Who will fight [me] in single combat?" Al-Ashtar went forth against him. They exchanged a couple of blows, whereupon he said to the Roman, "Take that, for I am the Iyādī lad!" The Roman responded: "May God increase the likes of you among my people! Why, by God, if you were not of my people, I would have supported[548] the Romans, but now I will not help them!"

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū ʿUthmān and Khālid:[549] Among those who were struck down among the three thousand killed at the Battle of al-Yarmūk were ʿIkrimah, ʿAmr b. ʿIkrimah, Salamah b.

---

541. She first married al-Sāʾib b. Abī Ḥubaysh b. al-Muṭṭalib b. Asad b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā, who was captured at Badr, became a Muslim in 8/630 at the conquest of Mecca, and died in the reign of Muʿāwiyah. Later she married ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Umayyah al-Aṣghar b. ʿAbd Shams. No children of hers are mentioned in the sources. On these persons, see Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 19; II, 499; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 239; Zubayrī, Nasab, 125, 151; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 9, 394; Donner, Conquests, 365.

542. Text: kharajat; read: juriḥat, with Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXII.

543. See note 541, above.

544. Ibn Ḥudhayfah al-ʿAdawī al-Qurashī. He embraced Islam in 8/630. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 26; II, 321; Zubayrī, Nasab, 370, 374; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, IV, 41–42; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 42.

545. Al-Nakhaʿī. He is mentioned only by Sayf and hence is regarded by ʿAskarī, Khamsūn wa miʾah ṣaḥābī, 115–16, 133, 142, 193, as a fabrication by Sayf, and this is not unlikely.

546. Unidentified but probably intended as a Nakhaʿī to serve as the link between the Nakhaʿī al-Ashtar in the report and al-Mustanīr.

547. Mālik b. al-Ḥārith al-Nakhaʿī, a Kūfan leader and strong supporter of ʿAlī, who made him governor of Egypt. He is alleged to have been poisoned when going there to take up his post in 37–38/658–59. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ashtar; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 213; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 181, 218, 232; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 482; Donner, Conquests, 153, 207, 241, 364, 394.

548. Text: la-zurt; read: la-āzart, an emendation suggested in note to the Leiden ed. and followed by the Cairo ed.

549. Perhaps this bracketing of one of Abū ʿUthmān's main sources with him in the same level of the isnād, coupled with the omission of Khālid's constant companion in the isnād, ʿUbādah, means that the text is corrupt here.

Hishām,[550] ʿAmr b. Saʿīd,[551] and Abān b. Saʿīd.[552] Khālid b. Saʿīd was disabled, and it is unknown where he died afterward. [Other casualties included] Jundab b. ʿAmr b. Ḥumamah al-Dawsī, al-Ṭufayl b. ʿAmr,[553] Ḍirār b. al-Azwar, who was wounded but survived, Ṭulayb b. ʿUmayr b. Wahb of the Banū ʿAbd b. Quṣayy,[554] Habbār b. Sufyān,[555] and Hishām b. al-ʿĀṣī.[556]

---

550. Al-Makhzūmī, he seems to have been a Muslim by 7/629. He usually is said to have been martyred at Ajnādayn or Marj al-Ṣuffar; only Sayf puts him and the others in this list at al-Yarmūk. Thus it would appear that Sayf has adapted this martyrs' list for his purposes, naming them as victims of al-Yarmūk, which is the first of his Syrian battles, just as the other sources put them at Ajnādayn, the first of those sources' Syrian battles. On Salamah, see Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 23; II, 504; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 322, 383; Zubayrī, Nasab, 302–3; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 135; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 147; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 68–69; Donner, Conquests, 357, 368.

551. Al-Umawī al-Qurashī. Despite the statement that he was one of the early Muslims, he seems only to have taken part in those battles occurring from the fall of Mecca in 8/630 onward. He is said to have governed Wādī al-Qurā for the Prophet and to have been slain at Ajnādayn, Marj al-Ṣuffar, or Fiḥl, according to sources other than Sayf. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 9; II, 183; Zubayrī, Nasab, 174–75; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 72, 104, 118; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 40, 135; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 539; Donner, Conquests, 357, 360, 363.

552. Al-Umawī al-Qurashī. He embraced Islam in 7/629. Being literate, he was one of the Prophet's secretaries and is said to have governed al-Baḥrayn for him. He is also said to have been slain at Ajnādayn or Marj al-Ṣuffar or else to have died in 27/648 or 29/650. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 9; II, 101; Zubayrī, Nasab, 174–75; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 73, 104, 118; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 99, 127, 135, 580, 582; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 147; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 13–14; Donner, Conquests, 357, 360, 368.

553. Actually ʿAmr b. Ṭufayl b. ʿAmr al-Dawsī, he also is stated to have been martyred at Ajnādayn. Ibn al-Kalbī also confused ʿAmr with his father, who already had perished fighting against Musaylimah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 214; II, 185, 558; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 91; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 135; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 225–26, 544; Donner, Conquests, 358–59, 364, 368, 373.

554. Son of the Prophet's paternal aunt Arwā, an early Muslim and a veteran of Badr. He was killed at Ajnādayn according to all the sources other than Sayf. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 18; II, 559; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 123–24; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 135; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 147; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 233–34; Donner, Conquests, 357, 368.

555. Al-Makhzūmī al-Qurashī. He is said to have been an early Muslim. He is reported in the other sources to have died at Ajnādayn or even Muʾtah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 22; II, 276; Zubayrī, Nasab, 338; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 135; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 147; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, III, 609; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 559; Donner, Conquests, 358, 368.

556. Al-Sahmī al-Qurashī, brother of ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣī and one of the earliest Muslims. He is said by other sources to have died at Ajnādayn. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 25; II, 284; Zubayrī, Nasab, 409; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 104; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 116, 135; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 126–27, 132; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 604; Donner, Conquests, 357, 368.

[2102] Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAmr b. Maymūn[557]—his father:[558] A man from among the Romans of the Arabs[559] met Khālid when he arrived in Syria as aid for the troops at al-Yarmūk. He said: "O Khālid, the Romans are in a numerous assemblage, two hundred thousand or more. If you think you should fall back on your rear guard, then do so." Khālid answered: "Are you going to frighten me with the Romans? By God, I would love it if the roan horse were cured of the pain in its hooves and if the enemy were twice as many."[560] Then God defeated them through him.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Mustanīr b. Yazīd — Arṭāh b. Juhaysh: Khālid said on that day: "Praise be to God, Who decreed death for Abū Bakr, although he was dearer to me than ʿUmar. And praise be to God, Who gave the authority to ʿUmar and then obliged me to love him, even though he was more distasteful to me than Abū Bakr."

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and ʿAmr b. Maymūn: Herakleios had made a pilgrimage before the rout of Khālid b. Saʿīd. The pilgrimage was to Jerusalem. While he was there word reached him that the troops were nearby him. Therefore he assembled the Romans and said: "I believe it is best if you do not fight those people but rather make peace with them. By God, that you give them half of what Syria produces and take half, [provided that] the mountains of Rome [jibāl al-rūm][561] remain with you, is better for you than that they overpower you in Syria and share with 557. Al-Jazarī. He died 145–48/762–65 in al-Kūfah or al-Raqqah. He had a good reputation as a traditionist. He is said to have had charge of the army roll of al-Jazīrah while his father was governor there for ʿUmar II. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 478; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 108–9. See note 558, below.

558. Maymūn b. Mihrān al-Jazarī, mawlā of the Naṣr. Born c. 40/661, he grew up in al-Kūfah but c. 81/700 moved to al-Raqqah, whence his nisbah, al-Jazarī, referring to al-Jazīrah. Originally called a supporter of ʿAlī like most Kūfans, his affinities were with the Qaysī tribes of al-Jazīrah, which tended to be anti-ʿAlid, so that he changed his position in favor of ʿUthmān. He served as treasurer to the Jazīran governor Muḥammad b. Marwān, then was put in charge of taxation and justice in al-Jazīrah by the caliph ʿUmar II. He was one of the most knowledgeable religious scholars in the time of the caliph Hishām, and his career most interestingly combines political and religious roles. He died in 117/735. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 477–79; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 390–92.

559. "Romans of the Arabs" refers to the Syrian Arab tribes supporting Rome.

560. This sentence is repeated on p. 94, above.

561. This can refer to hardly any other than the Taurus Mountains above Cilicia in Anatolia, which formed the border between the Muslims and the East Roman Empire for centuries. In Herakleios's mouth it is a retrospective anachronism.

you the mountains of Rome." At this, his brother snorted, his brother-in-law (khatanuh) also snorted, and those around him split from him. When he saw them disobeying him and talking back to him, he sent forth his brother, nominated the commanders, and directed a division toward every [enemy] division. When the Muslims had combined Herakleios ordered the Romans to make one broad, [2103] well-fortified collective camp. Thus the Romans encamped at al-Wāqūṣah, while the emperor went off to stay at Ḥimṣ. When he heard that Khālid had appeared at Suwā[562] and carried off its inhabitants and their possessions and that he had gone on to Buṣrā,[563] conquering it and permitting a virgin [to be ravished or seized], he said to those sitting with him: "Did I not tell you, 'Do not fight them'? You have no staying power with these people. Their religion is a new religion that renews their persistence, so that no one will stand up to them but he will be tested." They responded, "Fight for your religion, and do not make the people out to be cowards, but rather decide what you are responsible for." Herakleios said, "What do I seek except to increase your religion?"

When the Muslim troops encamped at al-Yarmūk the Muslims sent [a message] to the Romans, saying: "We would like to speak to your commander and meet him. Therefore allow us to come to speak to him." The Romans informed him, and he gave the Muslim delegation permission. Abū ʿUbaydah, Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān as the messenger, al-Ḥārith b. Hishām, Ḍirār b. al-Azwar, and Abū Jandal b. Suhayl[564] came to him. The emperor's brother had on that day thirty tents (rawāq) and thirty pavilions (surādiq), all of them of silk. When they reached them, they refused to enter [the tents] to see him, saying, "We do not consider silk to be lawful; therefore come forth to us." He came out to carpets that had been spread out. That reached Herakleios, who said: "Did I not tell you that this was the beginning of the humiliation? As for Syria, it is no good (sha'm).[565] Woe to the Romans from the ill-omened child born in Syria!" Peace was not attained between them and the Muslims. Therefore Abū ʿUbaydah and his companions went back, making their own arrangements with each other, so that it became a fight to victory.

562. It is identified by Musil, Arabia Deserta, 79 n. 20, 336 n. 81, 556, 558, as Sabʿ Biyār, a waterhole in the Syrian desert 150 km. east-northeast of Damascus and 101 km. south-southwest of Palmyra, located in the Wādī Suwā, which has apparently kept the same name.

563. Still a large town in southern Syria bearing the same name, it was the ancient Bostra, seat of the Ghassānid phylarchs allied with the Romans. As such it was an important target. See *EI*², s.v. Boṣrā.

564. Al-ʿĀmirī al-Qurashī. An early Companion of the Prophet, he died in Syria in 18/639. In some traditions he has been confused with his brother ʿAbdallāh. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 27; II, 257; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 405; Zubayrī, Nasab, 419–20; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 322–23; IV, 34.

[2104] Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muṭarraḥ[566]—al-Qāsim—Abū Umāmah; and Abū ʿUthmān—Yazīd b. Sinān—men of the Syrians and their authorities: On the day that Khālid took over the command God defeated the Romans by nightfall. The Muslims directed themselves toward the steep abyss, taking what was in the [Romans'] camp. God slew their outstanding men, their chiefs, and their horsemen.[567] God killed Herakleios's brother, and Theodore was taken.[568] The rout reached Herakleios while he was before Ḥimṣ. He departed, putting it between him and them.[569] He appointed a commander for it, leaving him behind in it, just as he had already appointed a commander for Damascus.

When the Muslims defeated the Romans they sent out horsemen to track them down. When Abū ʿUbaydah assumed command after the rout [of the Romans][570] he announced departure, so that the Muslims left, marching until they had established their encampments at Marj al-Ṣuffar.

---

565. This is a dialectical variant of shām, the plural of shāmah, a beauty mark, which here is related to the connected word shīmah, meaning a quality. This sentence and the next make a play on the root sh-ʾ-m. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.vv. sh-ʾ-m, sh-y-m.

566. Ibn Yazīd al-Asadī al-Kinānī, a Kūfan transmitter who also was considered one of the Syrians, possibly owing to his having been one of the Syrian Qaysī immigrants to al-Kūfah under the Umayyads. He had a poor reputation. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 171–72.

567. Or "knights."

568. According to Theophanes, Chronicle, 38, the Theodore present at al-Yarmūk was not Herakleios's brother but another Theodore, the Sakellarios (Keeper of the Purse). This is confirmed by Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 118, who calls him the Sakellarios, a eunuch of Herakleios. See note 882, below.

569. Either the defeated Roman remnants or the Muslims.

570. That Abū ʿUbaydah would have assumed command so soon after a victory while the victorious Khālid was still present seems unlikely. Far more probably Abū ʿUbaydah was in command from the very beginning, but Sayf or the tradition behind him, at pains to show the superiority of the Iraqis over the Syrians, has concealed his true role in order to exaggerate the role of Khālid. In historical traditions other than those of Sayf, Abū ʿUbaydah, not Khālid, was the commander at al-Yarmūk. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 118; Donner, Conquests, 361–62.

Abū Umāmah: Having two horsemen with me, I was sent out to reconnoiter from Marj al-Ṣuffar until I entered al-Ghūṭah.[571] I pried around in it between its houses and its trees. One of my two companions said, "You have reached to where you were commanded. Therefore go back, and do not cause us to perish." I responded, "Stay in your place until morning comes to you or until I come to you." Then I went along until I wended my way to the city gate. There was not a soul to be seen on the earth. I removed my mare's bridle, hung her nosebag on her, and leaned on my spear. Then I put my head down and did not perceive [anything] until [I heard] the key being moved in the gate to open it. I arose and performed the morning worship;[572] [2105] then I mounted my horse and attacked it.[573] I stabbed the gatekeeper, killing him.[574] Then I turned away, going back. They came out to search for me but then left me alone out of fear that I would have an ambush [ready]. I found my way to my nearer companion, whom I had commanded to stay. When they saw him they said, "This is an ambush. He has reached his ambush." Thus they went away. My companion and I traveled until we found our way to our other companion. Then we went on until we came to the Muslims.

Abū ʿUbaydah had resolved not to depart until ʿUmar's advice and command came to him. When it came to him the Muslims departed, [traveling] until they encamped before Damascus. Abū ʿUbaydah left Bashīr b. Kaʿb b. Ubayy al-Ḥimyarī[575] behind at al-Yarmūk with a cavalry force.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd[576]—Abū Saʿīd[577]—

---

571. The cultivated area around Damascus. See *EI*², s.vv. Ghūṭa, Dimashḳ.

572. Ṣalāt al-fajr, which is between first light and sunrise.

573. Or "him," apparently referring either to the gate or the gatekeeper, who has not yet been mentioned.

574. This indicates that Abū Umāmah was trying to get out of the city at the time to make the rendezvous with his impatient companion. Down to the thirteenth–fourteenth/nineteenth–twentieth centuries, the gates of Near Eastern cities usually were closed from dusk to dawn.

575. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf, according to Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 159.

576. The grandson of Abū Saʿīd Kaysān al-Maqburī and not ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd b. Thābit b. al-Ḍiḥḥ al-Anṣārī, as is suggested by the index of the Leiden edition, p. 324. See note 577, below.

577. Kaysān al-Maqburī, mawlā of Umm Sharīk al-Laythiyyah and a Medinan transmitter of traditions, who died in 100/719 or, according to other reports, between 123/741 and 126/744. See Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, III, 168; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 38; VIII, 453–54, who shows that he transmitted to his grandson, as in this isnād.

Qabāth: I was in the delegation about the victory of al-Yarmūk. We had gained wealth and much spoil. The guide brought us to the waterhole of a man whom I had followed in the Jāhiliyyah, when I came of age and became aware of myself, to learn from him. When I was shown who he was I came to him and told him [my purpose]. He said, "You have done right." He turned out to be one of the daring brigands of the Arabs. Every day he would eat the rump of a slaughtered camel with its condiment and an amount equal to that [of meat] other than the rump. Nothing would be left over from it, except enough to nourish me. He would raid the tribe (ḥayy) and leave me nearby, saying, [2106] "If a rajaz poet comes by reciting rajaz saying such-and-such, I am that [man]." He became crippled while he was with me. I stayed in that condition until he gave me a portion of wealth, which I brought to my family. It was the first property I obtained. Then I became the leader of my people and reached the level of the Arabs' [leading] men.

When we were brought by that waterhole I recognized it and asked about his house, but they did not know it, though they said he was alive. [His] sons whom he had begotten after me were brought to me. After I told them my story, they said, "Come to us tomorrow morning, for he is as close as possible to what you would like in the morning."[578] I came to them in the morning and was ushered in to him. He was brought forth from his bedchamber and seated for me. I did not cease jogging his memory until he remembered. He listened attentively and began to delight in the conversation, asking me to feed him more of it, so that our sitting drew long and we became burdensome to their boys. Therefore they frightened him with certain things he was frightened of, so that he would enter his bedchamber. That suited his mind. He said, "It used to be that I could not be frightened." I said, "Of course." I gave him [something] and left no one from his family without bestowing on him what was fitting. Then I departed.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū Saʿīd al-Maqburī: Marwān b. al-Ḥakam[579] said to Qabāth, "Are you older or [was] God's Messen-

578. That is, "he is sharper in the morning."

579. The founder of the Marwānid branch of the Umayyads, he reigned briefly as caliph 65–66/684–85. Because of later opposition to Marwānid rule, he often is made the scapegoat of vitriolic attacks in the historical tradition; especially he is blamed for having stirred up the first civil war, in which he is made to have played an evil role in his position as secretary to his first cousin, the caliph ʿUthmān. See *EI*², s.v. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam.

ger?" Qabāth answered, "God's Messenger is greater, but I am older." Marwān said, "What is your earliest memory?" Qabāth replied, "The dung of the elephant[580] when it was a year old." Marwān continued, "What is the strangest thing that you have seen?" Qabāth answered: "A man from the Quḍā'ah. When I came of age and became aware of myself I sought a man whom I could be with and learn from. I was directed to him." Then he told this story. [2107]

Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq — Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān: When the troops set out Abū Bakr went forth with Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān to give him advice. Abū Bakr walked while Yazīd rode. When he had completed his admonition, he said: "Farewell. I leave you in God's keeping." Then he turned back, while Yazīd went on, taking the Tabūk road. Then Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah followed him, then Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ in charge of a division[581] as a reinforcement for the two of them, all following that road. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī went forth until he encamped at Ghamr al-'Arabāt.[582] The Romans meanwhile camped at Thaniyyat Jilliq in uppermost Palestine with seventy thousand [men] under Theodore, Herakleios's full brother. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī wrote to Abū Bakr to inform him about the matter of the Romans and to ask him for reinforcements. Also Khālid b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣī set forth. He was seeking bounty on a rainy day at Marj al-Ṣuffar in the land of Syria when the louts (a'lāj) of the Romans gathered against him, killing him. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣī had already written to Abū Bakr to inform him about the matter of the Romans and seek reinforcements.

Abū Ja'far — Abū Zayd — 'Alī b. Muḥammad, according to the isnād that I have mentioned before: Just days after Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān had gone forth heading for Syria, Abū Bakr sent out Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥa-

580. This refers to the elephant that accompanied Abrahah on his attempt to capture Mecca, an event mentioned in the 105th sūrah of the Qur'ān. Modern scholars believe that this campaign must have taken place c. 555 C.E. or earlier, though Muslim tradition holds that it coincided with the year of the Prophet's birth, c. 571 C.E. See EI², s.v. al-Fīl.

581. Lit., "a fourth." The term is probably used here because there were four divisional commanders, hence four divisions, that prefigure the later four divisional districts of Syria under the early Umayyads, the junds of Filasṭīn, al-Urdunn, Damascus, and Ḥimṣ.

582. A place in the Wādī 'Arabah two marches north of Aylah, which lay just northwest of the modern port of al-'Aqabah in Jordan. See EI², s.v. 'Araba; Le Strange. Palestine, 441; Donner, Conquests, 115–16. Thus 'Amr's line of march lay on the "low road," following the coast to Aylah, then the bottom of 'Arabah until he ascended into the Palestinian Naqab [Negev] to the west.

[2108] sanah. (He is Shuraḥbīl b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Muṭāʿ b. ʿAmr from the Kindah.[583] It is also said [he was] from the Azd.[584]) He set out with seven thousand; then Abū ʿUbaydah [set out] with seven thousand. Yazīd stopped in al-Balqāʾ, Shuraḥbīl stopped in al-Urdunn, or, it is said, Buṣrā, and Abū ʿUbaydah camped at al-Jābiyah.[585] Then Abū Bakr reinforced them with ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣī, who encamped at Ghamr al-ʿArabāt. At that time the people desired to wage jihād. They would come to Medina, and Abū Bakr would direct them to Syria. Among them were those who would go with Abū ʿUbaydah, and among them were those who would go with Yazīd. Every group went with whom it liked.

[The same authorities]: The first peace agreement that happened in Syria was the peace agreement of Maʾāb,[586] which is a tribal meeting place, not a city. Abū ʿUbaydah passed by them on his way to Syria. It is a village of al-Balqāʾ. They fought him but then sought peace, and he made a peace agreement with them. The Romans massed together in al-ʿArabah in the land of Palestine. Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān sent against them Abū Umāmah al-Bāhilī, who routed that massed army.

[The same authorities]: The first warfare that occurred in Syria after the expedition of Usāmah was in al-ʿArabah; then they went to al-Dāthinah[587] — it is also said al-Dāthin. Abū Umāmah al-Bāhilī defeated the enemy, killing a patrikios among them. Then occurred

---

583. A great Yemenī tribe later prominent in Syria as well as Egypt and al-Kūfah. See EI², s.v. Kinda; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 47–53, 371–72.

584. Another great Yemenī tribal grouping having two main branches: the Azd al-Sarāh located in ʿAsīr and the Azd ʿUmān of ʿUmān, the latter apparently being added to the former in the Islamic period. See EI², s. v. Azd; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 41–44, 217.

585. An important place in the early Islamic history of Syria, Jābiyah lies some 80 km. south of Damascus, just north of Nawā. See EI², s.v. Djābiya; Le Strange, Palestine, 460–61; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 91–92.

586. This is the ancient town of Rabbath Moab, now al-Rabbah, a dozen kilometers north of al-Karak. Interestingly, the very early Armenian writer Pseudo-Sebeos, History, 123–24, states that the Arabs began their invasion of Syria from "Moabite Rabbath, at the borders of Ruben's [land]." This accords not only with the tradition cited here but also with the tradition asserting that the first expedition to Syria, which was sent by the Prophet himself, reached Muʾtah, a place about a dozen kilometers south of al-Karak. See Le Strange, Palestine, 494–95, 509–10; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 134; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 31; Donner, Conquests, 116, 314 n. 188.

587. A village near Gaza. Variant accounts give its name as al-Dabiyyah or al-Dābiyah, the latter being the same as al-Dāthinah, with different pointing of the Arabic letters. Possibly it was ancient Anthedon. See Le Strange, Palestine, 437; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 130; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 417; Donner, Conquests, 115.

Marj al-Ṣuffar, in which Khālid b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣī was martyred. Adrunjār[588] came against them with four thousand [troops] while they were off guard, so that Khālid and a number of the Muslims were martyred.

Abū Ja'far: It has also been said that the one killed in this battle was a son of Khālid b. Sa'īd and that Khālid retreated when his son was killed, so that Abū Bakr sent Khālid b. al-Walīd as overall com- [2109] mander over the commanders who were in Syria; these he joined to his forces. Khālid departed from al-Ḥīrah in Rabī' al-Ākhir of the year 13 (4 June–2 July 634) with eight hundred [men].[589] It is also said five hundred. He left behind in charge of his province al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah. The enemy met him at Ṣandawdā',[590] but he conquered them and left Ibn Ḥarām al-Anṣārī[591] behind there. He also met an assemblage at al-Muṣayyakh and al-Ḥuṣayd led by Rabī'ah b. Bujayr al-Taghlibī, defeated them, and took captives and spoils. He went on, going into the desert from Qurāqir[592] to Suwā. He raided the people of Suwā, taking their possessions and slaying Ḥurqūṣ b. al-Nu'mān al-Bahrānī.[593] Then he came to Arak,[594] whose people made a 588. Greek droungários, the title of a high-ranking military officer, who might command a division or a fleet. See Ostrogorsky, History, 251. It is first mentioned by Theophanes, Chronicle, 68, referring to the year 79–80/698–99. Probably better read as al-Durunjār.

589. The itinerary for Khālid's march from Iraq to Syria suggested by this report follows a northern route not far from the Euphrates, then descending on Damascus via Palmyra. It thus contrasts with the route given by Sayf on p. 113, below, which passed through Dūmat al-Jandal far to the south. The northern route suggested here is favored by Caetani, Annali, II, 1192–1236, and opposed by Musil, Arabia Deserta, 553–73. Donner, Conquests, 119–27, does not favor one route over the other. The route given in Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 135–36, closely follows that presented here.

590. Musil, Middle Euphrates, 34 n. 23, identifies it as the shrine of al-Mushayhid about 5 km. east of the present Iraqi city of al-Ramādī, on the right bank of the Euphrates. See also Donner, Conquests, 121, 180, 185; Morony, Iraq, 221, 224 n. 55.

591. Sa'd b. 'Amr b. Ḥarām al-Khazrajī, said to have fought at Uḥud and much later to have fought for 'Alī at Ṣiffīn. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 284–85; 32; Donner, Conquests, 422 (under Sa'īd). On his family's connection with Ṣandawdā', see Musil, Middle Euphrates, 300.

592. It is identified by Musil, Arabia Deserta, 555, as Qulbān Qirājir, a waterhole on the eastern border of the Wādī Sirḥān some 37 km. east-southeast of Kāf in al-Qurayyāt district of northernmost Saudi Arabia and 500 km. southwest of 'Ayn al-Tamr. This is considered plausible by Donner, Conquests, 123. However, Qurāqir could also be an unknown place whose name is now lost.

593. He is called al-Namarī on p. 64, above.

594. A town in the Syrian Desert 25 km. east-northeast of Tadmur (Palmyra); it is now called Rakah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 153; Le Strange, Palestine, 395; Musil, Arabia Deserta, 565.

peace agreement with him. He also came to Tadmur,[595] whose people had fortified themselves but then made a peace agreement with him. Then he came to al-Qaryatayn,[596] where he fought the inhabitants, conquered them, and took spoils. He also came to Ḥuwwārīn,[597] fought the inhabitants, defeated them, killed, and took captives. He came to Quṣam,[598] where the Banū Mashjaʿah[599] of the Quḍāʿah made a peace agreement with him. He came to Marj Rāhiṭ[600] and raided the Ghassān on the day of their Easter (24 April 634),[601] slaying and taking captives. He sent Busr b. Abī Arṭāh[602] and Ḥabīb b. Maslamah against al-Ghūṭah. They came to a church, where they took the men and the women captive and drove the children to Khālid.

---

595. The ancient Palmyra (biblical Tadmor), it still bears the same Arabic name of Tadmur and lies 140 km. east of Ḥimṣ. It used to belong to the Kalb. See EI[1], s.v. Palmyra; Le Strange, Palestine, 540–42. Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 140–41, details Khālid's attack.

596. A town in the Syrian desert about halfway between Tadmur and Damascus; it still has the same name. See Le Strange, Palestine, 79, 481.

597. It is a settlement in the Jabal Sanīr and in any case near al-Qaryatayn, with which it is confused in one report. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 315–16; Le Strange, Palestine, 456, 481; Musil, Arabia Deserta, 564.

598. Identified by Musil, Arabia Deserta, 563, with the Roman station of Casama, which he further identifies with Khān al-Manqūrah, some 31 km. south-southeast of al-Qaryatayn and 95 km. east-northeast from Damascus.

599. A minor branch of the Quḍāʿah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 279 (under Masǧaʿa b. at-Taim), II, 403.

600. A plain about 25 km. east-northeast of Damascus near ʿAdhrāʾ. It is considered part of al-Ghūṭah. See EI[2], s.v. Mardj Rāhiṭ; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 21–22; V, 101; Le Strange, Palestine, 69, 503–4; Musil, Arabia Deserta, 558, 560.

601. The Islamic date for this Easter is 19 Ṣafar 13, which does not accord with the other dates given in the text. On this, see Musil, Arabia Deserta, 563.

602. Text: Arṭāh; read: Abī Arṭāh. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXII–DCXIII. He is Busr b. Abī Arṭāh al-ʿĀmirī al-Qurashī. A young Companion of the Prophet, he first appeared—apart from this tradition—in the reinforcements sent by the caliph ʿUmar from Medina to assist in the conquest of Egypt in 20/641. Later he settled in Damascus, supported Muʿāwiyah against ʿAlī in the first civil war, fighting at Ṣiffīn, after which he was sent to track down ʿAlī's followers in the Ḥijāz and Yemen, where he gained an evil reputation for the executions he perpetrated and methods he followed. He often campaigned against the Romans and became governor of al-Baṣrah. He died after 52/672, when he last campaigned. See EI[2], s.v. Busr; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 28; II, 230; Ibn Muzāḥim, Ṣiffīn, 44, 412, 424, 426–29, 459–60, 462, 503–4, 507; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 409; Zubayrī, Nasab, 439; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 136, 222, 227, 230, 238, 259, 382; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, I, 154–63; Ibn ʿAsākir, Tahdhīb, III, 223–28; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 147–48; Theophanes, Chronicle, 44, 48, 52.

[Abū Jaʿfar]:[603] The letter of Abū Bakr came to Khālid at al-Ḥīrah when he had just returned from his pilgrimage. It said, [2110]

> Journey until you reach the Muslim armies at al-Yarmūk, for they are distressed and causing distress. Do not by any means return to the like of what you have done, for your worry will not, with God's help, worry the masses of the troops, and your method of removing the people's distress will never remove it. May your intentions and your favored position gladden you, Abū Sulaymān! Therefore complete [your work], so that God may make [it] complete for you. Do not by any means let self-admiration enter you, so that you lose and fail. See that you do not rely upon any work [of yours], for God controls the bestowal of favor, and He is the Owner of reward.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAṭāʾ al-Bakkāʾī — al-Muqaṭṭiʿ b. al-Haytham[604] al-Bakkāʾī — his father: The veterans of the battles of the conquest among the people of al-Kūfah would make threats at Muʿāwiyah upon [hearing] certain things that reached them. They would say: "What does Muʿāwiyah want? We are the men of Dhāt al-Salāsil!" They would name what happened between it and [the battle at] al-Firāḍ without mentioning what followed, out of contempt for what came after in comparison to what occurred before.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAmr b. Muḥammad — Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm[605] — Ẓafar b. Dahī; Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh — Abū ʿUthmān; Ṭalḥah — al-Mughīrah; and al-Muhallab b. ʿUqbah — ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Siyāh al-Aḥmarī: Abū Bakr had sent Khālid b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣī to Syria at the time he sent Khālid b. al-Walīd to Iraq. He enjoined on him the like of what he had enjoined on Khālid [b. al-Walīd]. Khālid b. Saʿīd went along until he descended on Syria, but 603. This paragraph and the one following it are an almost exact repetition of text found on pp. 69–70, above.

---

604. Text: ʿAṭāʾ ʿan al-Haytham; read: ʿAṭāʾ al-Bakkāʾī ʿan al-Muqaṭṭiʿ b. al-Haytham, as in the isnād on p. 69, above.

605. None of the fifteen Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīms mentioned in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 213–23, seems to fit this isnād chronologically; therefore the Isḥāq here must be considered an unknown person mentioned only by Sayf.

he did not make an assault. [Rather], he summoned [more] people, [2111] becoming mighty, so that the Romans feared him and recoiled from him. He did not persevere in [following] Abū Bakr's command but entered the land in small detachments, although the Romans pretended to fall back before him, until they drew him to al-Ṣuffar. Then they turned on him after he had come to feel safe. They found his son Saʿīd b. Khālid seeking bounty and slew him, him and those with him. When the news came to Khālid he set out in flight until he came to the open country (barr)[606] and stopped at some place. The Romans gathered at al-Yarmūk and encamped there. They said, "By God, we will indeed keep Abū Bakr too busy with himself to come into our land with his horses." Khālid b. Saʿīd wrote to Abū Bakr about what had happened. At this, Abū Bakr wrote to ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣī, who was in the land of the Quḍāʿah, [commanding him] to go to al-Yarmūk, and he did. He also sent Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ and Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān, ordering each of them to raid and said, "Do not penetrate to the extent that any of your enemy are behind you." Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah came to Abū Bakr from one of the victories of Khālid. Abū Bakr dispatched him toward Syria with a division. He also nominated each man of the commanders of the divisions to a district in Syria.

They came together to al-Yarmūk. When the Romans saw their coming together, they regretted what had been manifested by them[607] and forgot with what they had been threatening Abū Bakr. They were concerned, their concern being themselves. They[608] distressed them, and they[609] were distressed by them. Then they encamped at al-Wāqūṣah. Abū Bakr said, "By God, I will certainly make the Romans forget the whisperings of the devil about Khālid b. al-Walīd." Thus, he wrote to him this letter—which is above this report—and commanded him to appoint al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah [2112] as his deputy over Iraq with half of the troops. "And if God conquers Syria for the Muslims, return to your province in Iraq." Khālid sent the fifths [of the spoils to Medina], except what had been given out

606. It would seem that "desert" is implied by the word barr in such reports.
607. That is, their braggadocio.
608. Perhaps meaning the Muslims.
609. Perhaps meaning the Romans. The text is obscure and possibly corrupt. See notes to Leiden text.

to the troops, with ʿUmayr b. Saʿd al-Anṣārī,[610] and [informed the caliph] about his setting out for Syria. Khālid summoned the guides and departed from al-Ḥīrah going to Dūmah. Then he struck into the open country to Qurāqir.

Then he said,[611] "How is there a way for me by which I will emerge behind the Roman forces, for if I face them directly, they will block me from relieving the Muslims?" All of the guides said, "We know only a route that does not bear armies, which the lone rider takes. Do not by any means expose the Muslims." Khālid nonetheless resolved on it, but no one responded to him in that except for Rāfiʿ b. ʿAmīrah,[612] [who did so] in extreme fear. Therefore Khālid stood up in their midst to say, "Do not by any means let your ways be diverse, nor your certainty weakened! Know that aid comes according to the level of the intention, and reward according to the level of the account.[613] The Muslim ought not to care about something he falls into, considering God's aid to him." They said, "You are a man for whom God has brought together the good; it is your affair." Thus they complied with his wishes, resolving on, being satisfied with, and desiring the like of what Khālid desired. He commanded them to take enough water to drink (li-al-shafah)[614] for five [nights' journey].[615] He also gave orders to the commander of each cavalry troop

---

610. Of the ʿAmr b. ʿAwf b. Mālik b. al-Aws, he was one of the very few Anṣār to play a major role in the conquests, campaigning against the Romans in al-Jazīrah, Cilicia, and Cyprus. He also governed Ḥimṣ for ʿUmar and al-Jazīrah for ʿUthmān. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 178; II, 569; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 402; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 158; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 161, 182, 185, 194, 209–12, 216, 219; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 281–82; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 32.

611. Here begins the detailed story cited by al-Ṭabarī of Khālid's famous march across the desert. Considerable effort has gone into trying to show which route he took. See Caetani, Annali, II, 1192–1236; Musil, Arabia Deserta, 553–73; Donner, Conquests, 120–27. See also pp. 109–10, above.

612. Ibn Abī Rāfiʿ al-Ṭāʾī, he is said to originally have been a Christian. He embraced Islam in 8/629. Later he was a tribal leader of the Sinbis branch of the Ṭayyiʾ in al-Kūfah. He died 23/644. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 256; II, 483; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 624–25; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 131; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 136–38; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, I, 497–98; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 497–98; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 89.

613. Ar. ḥisbah. A variant reading has ḥasanah, meaning "good deed," so that reward would be "according to the level of the good deed." In meaning this parallels the famous canonical ḥadīth in Bukhārī, I, 2.

614. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda, et Emendanda, CCCXIII–CCCXIV.

615. Musil, Arabia Deserta, 556, 569–70, explains that this means six stages, not five, because they would be camping in the desert five nights.

as to the amount of water to give to the horses. Each leader made thirsty enough of the older female camels to suffice him, then gave them to drink once and yet again. Then they made the camels prick up their ears [from thirst],[616] covered [their mouths] with bags (kamaʿūhā),[617] and left their backs free [of loads].[618] Then they rode from Qurāqir, going into the desert to Suwā, which is on the other side of [2113] it in Syria. When they had traveled for a day, they pressed the water out of the stomachs of ten of those camels for every group of horses, mixing what was in their stomachs with whatever milk there was. Then they gave the horses to drink and themselves took a swallow for a drink. They did that for four days.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥaffiz b. Thaʿlabah[619] — his informant from the Bakr b. Wāʾil: Muḥriz b. Ḥarīsh al-Muḥāribī[620] told Khālid, "Put the morning star on your right eyebrow, then head for it; you will get to Suwā." He was the best guide among them.

Abū Jaʿfar al-Ṭabarī — Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah, agreeing with them: When he reached Suwā and feared that the heat of the sun would overcome them, Khālid called out to Rāfiʿ, "What [news] do you have?" He answered, "Good. You have attained a copious source, for you are upon water." He urged them on, though he was perplexed [and] bleary eyed. He continued, "O people, look for two eminences that look like a pair of female breasts, then come to them." They said, "Two eminences." He went up on them both and said, "Strike to the right and to the left for a box-thorn like the seat of a man."[621] They found its root and said, "A root, but we do not see any tree." He said, "Dig wherever you will." They stirred up the dust [to find] small quantities of water and swampy ground with sweet 616. See Musil, Arabia Deserta, 570. On p. 554, however, he suggests that their ears were caused to tremble from thirst.

617. Or, "tied up their mouths." See Musil, Arabia Deserta, 554, 557, 570.

618. See Musil, Arabia Deserta, 570, who also suggests that this implies that the camels' urethras were bound up so they could not urinate.

619. This man seems to be quoted only by Sayf. However, his alleged father is the well-attested Kūfan who carried al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī's head to Damascus. See note 1001, below.

620. From Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 486, it appears that this is his only historical mention. The notice, which contains the same report as here, comes from Abū Ismāʿīl Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Azdī's Futūḥ al-Shaʾm, and this probably derives ultimately from Sayf.

621. Musil, Arabia Deserta, 571, suggests that this means "a low, round shrub."

water under the sand. Rāfiʿ said, "O Commander, by God, I have not come to this waterhole for thirty years. I only came to it once before, when I was a boy, with my father." Thus they prepared themselves and then attacked, the enemy not believing that any army could [2114] cross [the desert] to them.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAmr b. Muḥammad — Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm — Ẓafar b. Dahī: Khālid led us to attack from Suwā to Muṣayyakh Bahrā' in al-Quṣwānā,[622] one of the waterholes. We took al-Muṣayyakh and the Namir by morning when they were unawares, and when a company were drinking in the face of the morning, while their cupbearer was singing to them, saying,

Should you two not rouse me in the morning before the army of Abū Bakr?

Then his head was cut off and his blood was mixed with his wine.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAmr b. Muḥammad, by his isnād that has already been mentioned: When the Ghassān heard of Khālid's going out against Suwā and its destruction, and his raid on Muṣayyakh Bahrāʿ and its destruction, they assembled at Marj Rāhiṭ. [Word of] that reached Khālid, who had already left the Roman frontier fortresses and their armies on the border of Iraq behind him, so that he now lay between them[623] and the Yarmūk. He directed himself toward them,[624] going forth from Suwā after he had returned to it with the captives of the Bahrā'. He stopped at al-Rummānatayn,[625] which were two markers of the road, then he stopped at al-Kathab,[626] until he came to Damascus, then Marj al-Ṣuffar. On it, he met the Ghassān under al-Ḥārith b. al-Ayham.[627] He overthrew

622. Voweling uncertain. Possibly the same as the Quṣwān mentioned in Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 366, as it is attributed to the Bakrī Taym or the Saʿd Tamīm. This place is identified by Musil, Middle Euphrates, 311, as the modern region of al-Qāsī due west of Hīt in the desert on the south side of the Ḥawrān valley. Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 138, gives al-Kawāthil as the name at this place in Khālid's itinerary.

623. That is, the Roman forces in Iraq.

624. That is, the Ghassān at Marj Rāhiṭ.

625. According to Musil, Arabia Deserta, 572, this name denotes two low, natural domes east of Damascus that now are unidentifiable.

626. Emended by Musil, Arabia Deserta, 572, to kathīb, it denotes a low, sandy mound east of Damascus, now unidentifiable.

627. This appears to be the only mention of such a person. It could either be a mistake for Jabalah b. al-Ayham, as is likely, or else an otherwise unknown brother of Jabalah along the lines of the brothers Sayf provides for other famous men. On Jabalah, see note 326.

their camp and their families and stayed on the plain for some days. He sent Abū Bakr the fifths [of the spoils] with Bilāl b. al-[2115] Ḥārith al-Muzanī.[628] Then he went out from the plain until he came to the canal of Buṣrā, which was the first city in Syria that was conquered by Khālid and those with him of the troops of Iraq. After that, he set forth from it and came to the Muslims at al-Wāqūṣah. He was in command of nine thousand when he fought the enemy there.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and al-Muhallab: When Khālid returned from his pilgrimage, the letter of Abū Bakr came to him, [commanding him] to go forth with half of the troops and to leave al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah in charge of the remaining half and saying, "Do not by any means take brave [men] unless you also leave behind brave [men] for him too. When God grants you victory, bring them back to Iraq, and yourself with them, for then you will be governing your province." Khālid had the Companions of God's Messenger brought to his presence and appropriated them for himself, not al-Muthannā. He rather left to al-Muthannā numbers of men from among those he was satisfied with (ahl al-qanāʿah) who were not Companions. Then he looked at those who remained, pulling out those who had come to the Prophet in delegations or otherwise, and left to al-Muthannā their numbers from the people with whom he was satisfied. Then he divided the army into two halves.

Al-Muthannā said, "By God, I will not keep to other than the execution of Abū Bakr's command in its totality regarding having in [my] company half of the Companions, or a part of the half. By God, I do not hope for victory except by them. Wherefore then do you denude me of them?" When Khālid saw that, after having held back from him, he provided al-Muthannā with replacements from among the Companions until he was satisfied. Among those whom he gave him as replacements from among them were Furāt b. Ḥayyān al-ʿIjlī, 628. An important tribal leader, he was a Muslim by 6/628, was assigned land by the Prophet near Medina, commanded the Muzaynah regiment at the conquest of Mecca in 8/630, took part at al-Qādisiyyah, and later moved to al-Baṣrah, before dying in 60/680 at eighty years of age. See Ṭabarī, I, 2574–75; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 226; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 276, 425–26, 571, 799–800, 820, 896, 1014, 1029; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I, 272, 291, 339; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 273; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 13–14; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 182; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 164.

Bashīr b. al-Khaṣāṣiyyah and al-Ḥārith b. Ḥassān[629] the two Dhuhlīs, Maʿbad b. Umm Maʿbad al-Aslamī,[630] ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Awfā al-Aslamī,[631] al-Ḥārith b. Bilāl al-Muzanī, and ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr al-Tamīmī, so that, when al-Muthannā was satisfied and had taken what he needed, Khālid withdrew and went off toward his destination. Al-Muthannā accompanied him as far as Qurāqir, then returned to al-Ḥīrah in al-Muḥarram [13] (7 March–5 April 634). [2116]

Al-Muthannā remained in his [seat of] authority, putting his brother in the outpost he had been in on al-Sīb. In place of Ḍirār b. al-Khaṭṭāb, [he put] ʿUtaybah b. al-Nahhās, in place of Ḍirār b. al-Azwar [he put] Masʿūd,[632] his other brother, and he filled the places of all those commanders who had departed with men like them from the people of sufficiency (ahl al-ghanā'). He also appointed Madhūr b. ʿAdī to one of those positions.

Meanwhile, the Persians found order, one year after Khālid had come to al-Ḥīrah, a little after Khālid's departure—that was in the year 13—under Shahrbarāz b. Ardashīr b. Shahriyār,[633] one of the relatives of Kisrā, then of Sābūr.[634] He sent against al-Muthannā a 629. He probably became a Muslim in 9/631. Subsequently, he participated in the wars of conquest. However, all transmissions showing him in the conquests are through Sayf, including his part in the imaginary conquest of Khurāsān that Sayf attributed to the year 17/638. In 36/656 he was the commander of the Kūfan Dhuhl at the Battle of the Camel, where he fell. See Ṭabarī, I, 2231, 2474, 2477, 2682, 3202–3; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 154; II, 307; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 277.

630. Maʿbad b. Aktam al-Khuzāʿī, he was ʿAlī's messenger to Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī in al-Kūfah at the beginning of 36/656. See Ṭabarī, I, 1458–59, 3089; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 197; II, 204 (under ʿĀtikah bt. Khālid), 380; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 338–40, 388–89; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 102, 210; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II, 60; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 39; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 438.

631. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlqamah al-Khuzāʿī, he embraced Islam by 6/628 and later migrated to al-Kūfah, where he was the last Companion of the Prophet alive. He is said to have died as late as 80–87/699–706. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 201; II, 106; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 21; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 382; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istiʿāb, II, 264–65; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 279–80.

632. Unattested except in the transmissions of Sayf in this volume.

633. The nomenclature of this alleged Persian shows Sayf's method in conflating names of famous persons to produce new persons with which to adorn his stories. Shahrbarāz is the general of Khusraw II who was not part of the royal house. There is no precedent for his unusual name. See Ṭabarī, I, 1061–64; Christensen, L'Iran, 492. Ardashīr is borrowed from the short-lived Ardashīr III b. Shīrūyah, who was overthrown and killed by Shahrbarāz. See Ṭabarī, I, 1061–62, and above p. 11 and note 74. Shahriyār was the father of Yazdigird III who himself never held the throne. See below, p. 222 and note 1054. No such collocation of royal Persian names exists outside of Sayf's transmissions.

634. This appears to refer to the earlier Persian King Shāpūr II (309–79 C.E.).

huge army commanded by Hurmuz Jādhūyah[635] containing ten thousand men and an elephant. The forward posts wrote to al-Muthannā about his approach. Al-Muthannā left al-Ḥīrah [heading] toward him, joining the forward garrisons to himself. He put in charge of his two wings al-Mu'annā and Mas'ūd, the two sons of [2117] Ḥārithah. He waited for Hurmuz at Bābil.[636] Hurmuz Jādhūyah approached, his two flanks being commanded by al-Karukbadh[637] and al-Kharukbadh.[638] He wrote to al-Muthannā, "From Shahrbarāz to al-Muthannā. I have sent against you an army consisting of the rabble of the Persians who are nothing but keepers of chickens and swine. I am not going to fight you except with them." Al-Muthannā answered him:

> From al-Muthannā to Shahrbarāz. You are one of two men: either an oppressor, which would be worse for you and better for us, or else a liar, and the greatest of liars in punishment and shame both with God and with people are kings. But what sensible opinion shows me is that you have been forced to use only the rabble; therefore, praise be to God who has thrown back your intrigue on the keepers of chickens and swine.

The Persians were taken aback by his letter. They said, "Shahrbarāz is only weakened by the ill omen of his place of birth and the baseness of his upbringing," for he used to live in Maysān,[639] and certain countries are a disgrace to those who inhabit them. They told him, "You have encouraged our enemy against us by what you wrote to them. When you write to anyone, consult [first]."

---

635. See Hurmuz and Bahman Jādhūyah above, pp. 9–13, 16–19, 22–23, 37, 43–44, 51. This new collocation would appear to be either an accidental or intentional juxtaposition of the aforementioned names.

636. The site of ancient Babylon, it lies east of the Euphrates just north of the present al-Ḥillah. See *EI*², s.v. Bābil; Le Strange, Lands, 71–72.

637. Text: al-Kawkabad: read: al-Karukbadh, as Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIII.

638. Text: al-Khūkabad; read: al-Kharukbadh, as Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIII. Owing to the similarity of their forms, it is possible that these two names or titles are a doublet of the same original. The persons bearing them appear to be unknown except in Sayf's reports, as is the case with most of the Persians he names.

639. The large district on the lower Tigris between Kaskar and al-Baṣrah. See the detailed article in *EI*¹, s.v. Maisān; Le Strange, Lands, 43, 80, map II; Morony, Iraq, 127, 159–63; Donner, Conquests, 159–60.

They met at Bābil and fought each other a fierce battle on the nearer bank of al-Ṣarāh[640] on the first road. Then al-Muthannā and some of the Muslims came against the elephant by turns, for it had scattered the ranks and the squadrons, and they gained its slaughter, [2118] killing it. They then defeated the Persians. The Muslims pursued them, killing them until they had brought them beyond their frontier outposts. They remained in these, but the pursuers continued to follow the defeated remnants until they reached al-Madā'in.

ʿAbdah b. al-Ṭabīb al-Saʿdī[641] spoke [poetry] regarding that. ʿAbdah had migrated (hājar)[642] owing to the migration of a wife of his, so that he participated in the Battle of Bābil. When she had caused him to despair, he returned to the desert and declaimed:[643]

Is the rope of Khawlah after the parting still joined, or are you, living far away from her, [only] preoccupied?
Lovers have days that they remember, and the course of a journey, before the departure, had its imagined appearance.
Khuwaylah[644] has settled among a group with whom I am acquainted[645] before al-Madā'in; among them are the rooster and the elephant.
They strike the heads of the Persians in open daylight;
among them are horsemen who are neither weaponless nor sway in the saddle.

And so on. Al-Farazdaq,[646] when he was enumerating the noble

640. This is the Great Ṣarāh Canal, which branched off from the Euphrates just above Bābil and carried water due east as far as the Tigris. See Le Strange, Lands, 72–73, map II.

641. ʿAbdah b. Yazīd al-Ṭabīb al-ʿAbshamī, the poet. See Ṭabarī, I, 2292; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 78; II, 134; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 262; Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, XVIII, 163–64.

642. That is, he migrated from the Arabian peninsula to the conquered lands, here to Iraq.

643. Lines 1, 3, and 4 of this poem are also found in Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, XVIII, 163. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 75 (al-Madā'in), has all four lines plus one more. Both vary from Ṭabarī's text.

644. The diminutive for Khawlah.

645. Or, "I visited."

646. The famous Baṣran Tamīmī poet, he died in 110/728 or 112/730. See *EI*², s.v. al-Farazdaḳ.

[2119] houses of the Bakr b. Wā'il and mentioned al-Muthannā and his killing of the elephant, [said]:[647]

The house of al-Muthannā, who slew the elephant by force, is at Bābil, for the sovereignty of Bābil belongs to a horseman.

Shahrbarāz died at the time of the defeat of Hurmuz Jādhūyah. The Persians quarreled amongst themselves. The lands of the Sawād between the Tigris and Burs[648] remained in the hands of al-Muthannā and the Muslims. Then the Persians agreed after Shahrbarāz on Dukht-i Zabān,[649] the daughter of Kisrā, but no order of hers was carried out, she was deposed, and Sābūr b. Shahrbarāz[650] was made king.

When Sābūr b. Shahrbarāz became king, al-Farrukhzādh b. al-Bindawān took charge of his affairs. He asked Sābūr to marry him to Āzarmīdukht,[651] the daughter of Kisrā, and so he did, but she became angry at that and said, "O cousin, would you marry me to my slave?" He replied, "Be ashamed of such talk, and do not repeat it to me again, for he is your husband!" Therefore, she sent a message to Siyāwukhsh al-Rāzī,[652] who was one of the treacherous killers among the Persians, and complained to him about what she feared. He said to her, "If you dislike this, do not go back to him about it. Rather, send a message to Sābūr, telling him to have al-Farrukhzādh come to you. I will protect you from him." She did so, and Sābūr did so. Siyāwukhsh readied himself. When it was the night of the wedding, al-Farrukhzādh approached and went inside, where Siyāwukhsh unleashed himself on him, slaying him and those with him. Then he rushed out with her to Sābūr. She came into his presence, and they went in to him and killed him. Āzarmīdukht bt. Kisrā became queen, and the Persians were occupied with that.

---

647. A version of the complete poem is found in Farazdaq, Dīwān, II, 666–70.

648. Now called al-Biris, it was the ancient Borsippa and presently shows extensive ruins. It is located 21 km. southwest of Bābil between the two branches of the Euphrates. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 38 n. 30, 39, 245–46, 276, 278, and accompanying map of northern Arabia (h 20); Morony, Iraq, 148, 174.

649. Mentioned only in this place by Sayf.

650. Mentioned only by Sayf. See note 633.

651. She reigned a year and a half, or probably less, in about 630–32 C.E. See Ṭabarī, I, 1064–65; Christensen, L'Iran, 493; Frye, History, 337; CHI, III, 171.

652. Siyāwukhsh b. Mihrān b. Bahrām Shūbīn, he is allegedly the grandson of the usurper Bahrām VI (590–91 C.E.). He probably is yet another imaginary scion of a pre-Islamic house said to have been conquered by the Muslims in the early campaigns. Sayf improbably claims that he was the king of al-Rayy in 22/643. See Ṭabarī, I, 2447, 2653–54. His alleged father Mihrān is mentioned above, pp. 53–54. See note 289.

News about Abū Bakr was slow in reaching the Muslims. Al-Muthannā made Bashīr b. al-Khaṣāṣiyyah his deputy in charge of the Muslims and put Saʿīd b. Murrah al-ʿIjlī in his place in the forward outposts. Al-Muthannā set out to go to Abū Bakr [first] in order to tell him the news about the Muslims and the polytheists, [second] to ask his permission to seek the help of those whose had clearly shown their repentence and their regret from among the people of apostasy (ahl al-riddah) who had asked his permission to join campaigns, and [third] to inform him that he had not left behind anyone more able than they to fight the Persians, to wage war on them, and to help the immigrants (muhājirīn).[653] He arrived at Medina when Abū Bakr had fallen ill. [2120]

After Khālid had set out for Syria, Abū Bakr fell ill with the illness from which he was to die within months. Al-Muthannā arrived when he had become better. Abū Bakr entrusted [the succession] to ʿUmar. When al-Muthannā told him the news, he said, "I must consult ʿUmar." When ʿUmar came, he said to him, > Listen, O ʿUmar, to what I say to you, then act according to it. I hope to die on this day of mine. (That was a Monday.) If I die, do not by any means let the evening enter before you have summoned the men [to go] with al-Muthannā. If I delay until the night, do not by any means let the morning come before you summon the men [to go] with al-Muthannā. Do not let any catastrophe at all, even if it is great, keep you from the matter of your religion and your Lord's counsel. You saw what I did on the day the Messenger of God died, and the people were never stricken with the like of it. By God, if I were to weaken in the affair of God and the affair of His Messenger, He would abandon me and punish me, so that Medina would be consumed by fire.[654] If God grants victory to the commanders in Syria, return the troops of Khālid to Iraq, for they are its people, the governors of its affairs alone, and the people of violence and courage against the enemy.

---

653. Here this term seems clearly to mean the Muslims fighting in Iraq, rather than its better-known usage, referring to the Qurashīs who had migrated from Mecca to Medina.

654. This would appear to be an allusion to the Battle of al-Ḥarrah, called Ḥarrat al-Nār, "the Ḥarrah of the Fire," which was so disastrous to the Medinans. It took place in 63/683 and witnessed the slaughter of many of the descendants of noble Qurashī and Anṣārī lineages. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥarra; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 289–314.

[2121] Abū Bakr died at night. ʿUmar then buried him at night and said prayers over him in the mosque. He also summoned the men to [join] al-Muthannā after Abū Bakr had been interred. ʿUmar said, "Abū Bakr knew that it would annoy me to put Khālid in charge of warfare in Iraq when he ordered me to send back his troops but left aside mention of Khālid himself."

Abū Jaʿfar: The matter of Abū Bakr reached Āzarmīdukht when one half of al-Sawād was under his control. Then he died, and the Persians were diverted by internal affairs from removing the Muslims from al-Sawād in the time between the rule of Abū Bakr to the accession of ʿUmar and the return of al-Muthannā with Abū ʿUbayd[655] to Iraq. At that time, most of the troops of the people of Iraq were at al-Ḥīrah and the outposts on al-Sīb, whence raids brought them to the bank of the Tigris. The Tigris was a barrier between the Arabs and the Persians. This is the story of Iraq during the reign of Abū Bakr, from its beginning to its end.

Continuation of the Report of Ibn Isḥāq

Abū Bakr wrote to Khālid when the latter was at al-Ḥīrah, commanding him to reinforce the forces in Syria with the strong among those he had with him, and to lead them forth, leaving behind to be in charge of the weak a man from among them. When the letter of Abū Bakr came to Khālid with that [message], Khālid said, "This is the work of al-Uʿaysir, the son of Umm Shamlah[656] — meaning ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb — who has envied me that the conquest of Iraq should be at my hand." Khālid set out with the strong among his men and sent the weak and the women back to Medina, the city of [2122] the Messenger. He put in charge of them ʿUmayr b. Saʿd al-Anṣārī. Khālid left behind al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah al-Shaybānī in command of those of the Rabīʿah and other groups who had embraced Islam.

Then he went along until he stopped at ʿAyn al-Tamr and raided its people, making gains from them. He also took up positions before a fortress there in which Kisrā had stationed troops, until he got 655. Abū ʿUbayd b. Masʿūd al-Thaqafī, he is the father of al-Mukhtār, the famous Shīʿī rebel in al-Kūfah 65–67/685–87. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 118; II, 561; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 108–10; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 307–10; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 161–62; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 130–31; Donner, Conquests, 174, 191–94, 211, 223, 375.

656. That is, "the little left-handed one, the son of temporal joys."

them to come out and cut off their heads. He took many captives from ʿAyn al-Tamr and from among the sons of those garrison troops and sent them to Abū Bakr. Among those captives were Abū ʿAmrah, the mawlā of the Shaybān,[657] who was the father of ʿAbd al-Aʿlā b. Abī ʿAmrah;[658] Abū ʿUbayd, the mawlā of al-Muʿallā of the Anṣār, from the Banū Zurayq;[659] Abū ʿAbdallāh, the mawlā of the Zuhrah;[660] Khayr, the mawlā of Abū Dāwūd al-Anṣārī, who was also one of the Banū Māzin b. al-Najjār;[661] Yasār, who was the grandfather of Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, the mawlā of Qays b. Makhramah b. al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbd Manāf;[662] Aflaḥ,[663] the mawlā of Abū Ayyūb al-

657. Text: Shabbān; read: Shaybān.

658. Al-Shaybānī, he was born c. 30/651 in Medina, where he was part of the Umayyad circle, being a companion of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Marwān. Subsequently, he fled to Damascus with the Umayyads, in 64/684. He accompanied ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz to Egypt during the latter's governorship but returned to Damascus after his patron's death. He later became an important adviser to the caliph ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, representing him in an embassy to the Roman emperor Leo III in 100/719, after which no more is heard of him. He married a sister of Mūsā b. Nuṣayr, the conqueror of North Africa and Spain. He also was a poet. See ʿAṭwān, Sīrah, 75–77. See also notes 303–4 above.

659. A Medinan, he was also killed at the Battle of al-Ḥarrah in 63/683. His name is given by Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 87, as Abū ʿAbdallāh ʿUbayd, the mawlā of ʿUbayd b. al-Muʿallā. However, as ʿUbayd b. al-Muʿallā is said to have fallen at Uḥud in 3/625, it is impossible for a mawlā taken captive in 13/634 to have belonged to him. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 561; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 126; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 459–60; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 182; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 447. Probably the name of the mawlā, ʿUbayd, has been confused with that of the son of al-Muʿallā who was actually his master. Al-Muʿallā b. Lawdhān himself is only a name and thus probably was never a Muslim, except in Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 306, where he probably is mistakenly named among the slain at Uḥud. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 192; II, 410; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 447–48.

660. Text: Zahrah; read: the Zuhrah, referring to the Qurashī clan of the Zuhrah. This Abū ʿAbdallāh is unidentified.

661. Abū Dāwūd ʿUmayr b. ʿĀmir was a participant at the battle of Badr and Uḥud. See Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 24, 80, 95, 142, 149, 164; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 633, 705; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 518; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 88; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 58. Khayr is unidentified.

662. Qays b. Makhramah was a noble Qurashī who would appear to have already been a Muslim by 7/629, when he was given a share of the spoils of Khaybar. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 15; II, 461; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 694–95; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 351; Zubayrī, Nasab, 92; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 9, 102; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 302; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 259–60.

663. This Aflaḥ was one of the famous early traditionists of Medina, where he died, possibly in 63/683 at the Battle of al-Ḥarrah. However, some sources state that it was his son Kathīr who fell there, which would appear more probable. His master Abū Ayyūb is said to have freed him and bestowed on him a fortune of forty thousand dirhams. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 86–87, 298–99; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 313; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 368–69.

Anṣārī, who was also one of the Banū Mālik b. al-Najjār;[664] and Ḥumrān b. Abān, the mawlā of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān. Khālid b. al-Walīd also slew Hilāl b. ʿAqqah b. Bishr al-Namarī and hanged him on a tree at ʿAyn al-Tamr.

Then Khālid proposed to go into the desert from Qurāqir, which was a waterhole belonging to the Kalb, to Suwā, which was a waterhole belonging to the Bahrāʾ. Between them was five days' journey. Khālid was unfamiliar with the route, wherefore he sought a guide. He was introduced to Rāfiʿ b. ʿAmīrah al-Ṭāʾī. Khālid said to him, "Set off with the men." Rāfiʿ answered him, "You will not find that [route] bearable with the horses and the baggage. By God, even the lone rider fears for himself from it. No one travels along it without exposing himself to danger. It is five long nights, during which no water is to be obtained, while it is also easy to lose the way." Khālid [2123] said to him, "Woe to you! By God, I have no alternative to that. A strict order from the commander has come to me about that. Therefore, command as you see fit." He responded, "Take much water. Whoever of you can make the ears of his camel prick up from [want of] water, let him do it, for they are murderous wastes, except for what God prevents. Find me twenty huge, fat old camels for slaughter." Khālid brought them to him. Rāfiʿ busied himself with them, making them thirsty until he had exhausted them from thirst. Then he brought them to water so that they would drink, until, when they were full, he directed himself to them, cutting off their lips and then tying them up with bags, so that they could not ruminate. Then he left their backs free [of loads]. Then he said to Khālid, "Go."

Khālid set out in his company, making haste with his horses and baggage. Every time he stopped at a campsite, he pressed the water out of the stomachs of four of those old camels. He took what was in their paunches and gave it to the horses to drink. Then the men drank from what water they had carried with them. When Khālid grew fearful for his companions on the last day in the desert, he said to Rāfiʿ b. ʿAmīrah, who was bleary-eyed, "Woe to you, O Rāfiʿ!

664. Khālid b. Zayd, one of the most famous of the Anṣār, he was a supporter of ʿAlī, for whom he fought against the Khārijites in 38/658 and whom he served as governor of Medina. He is best known, however, for his death in a campaign against the Romans in 49–52/669–72 or, in one less probable report, 55/675. See *EI*², s.v. Abū Ayyūb; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 186; II, 343; Ibn Muzāḥim, Ṣiffīn, 93, 366, 368–69; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 484–85; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 77, 223, 232, 248; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, I, 403–5; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 405–6.

What [news] do you have?" Rāfiʿ answered, "You have reached a copious source, God willing." When they came near the two eminences, he said to the men, "Look. Do you see a bush of boxwood like the seat of a man?" They replied, "We do not see it." He said, "We belong to God and to him we return![665] Then you have perished, by God! And I have perished too, you bastards! Look!" When they searched again, they found it; it had been cut down, but a part of it remained. When the Muslims saw it, they shouted, "God is Greater!" Rāfiʿ b. ʿAmīrah also shouted, "God is Greater!" Then they dug at its root. They dug and uncovered a spring, from which they drank until they had quenched their thirst. After that, campsites [with water] were continuous. Rāfiʿ said, "By God, I never came to this waterhole but one time: I came to it with my father when I was a boy." A Muslim poet said:[666]

Rāfiʿ's eyes are God's; how was he guided? [2124]
He went into the desert from Qurāqir to Suwā
Not giving the camels drink for five days; when the army traversed it, it wept.
No human being was seen to traverse it before you.

When Khālid reached Suwā, he attacked its inhabitants, who were of the Bahrā', before morning. Some people among them were drinking wine, which they had in a vat. They were gathered around it, while their singer was singing:[667]

Will you two not give me another drink before the army of Abū Bakr?
Perhaps our deaths are near, though we do not know.
Will you two not give me another drink in the glass, again giving me reddish-colored, pure, flowing wine?
Will you two not give me another drink of the best dark wine, of the good-quality wine that diverts from the cares[668] of the soul?

665. Qur'ān 2: 156.

666. These lines are also cited without attribution in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 131, and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 271; IV, 318.

667. Five of these lines, with one slight variation, are found in Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 427; the first of them is cited in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 132. Both sources attribute them to Ḥurqūṣ.

668. Following Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIII.

I suspect that the Muslims' horses and Khālid will come upon you before morning from al-Bishr.[669]
Will you not go before they fight [you], and before the pubescent girls go forth from the tent?

They claim that that singer of theirs was slain in the attack, and that his blood flowed into that vat.

Thereafter, Khālid continued in the direction in which he was [2125] going until he attacked the Ghassān at Marj Rāhiṭ. Then he went on until he stopped at the canal of Buṣrā, which was being besieged by Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ, Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah, and Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān. They all came together against it and besieged it until Buṣrā made a peace agreement on terms of the jizyah. Thus God conquered for the Muslims. It was the first of the cities of Syria to be conquered in the caliphate of Abū Bakr. Then they went all together to Palestine to support ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣī. ʿAmr was encamped at al-ʿArabāt in al-Ghawr[670] of Palestine. The Romans heard about them and withdrew from Jilliq to Ajnādayn.[671] Theodore, the full brother of Herakleios, commanded them. Ajnādayn is a town between al-Ramlah[672] and Bayt Jibrīn[673] in the land of Palestine. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣī set out when he heard about Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ, Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah, and Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān, so that he met them and they gathered at Ajnādayn in order to mass against the Romans.

---

669. This line would support Caetani's contention that Khālid came via the region of Jabal Bishrī to the northeast rather than by the route suggested by Musil.

670. Al-Ghawr is the deep rift valley extending from the headwaters of the Jordan River through the Dead Sea to the head of the Gulf of ʿAqabah. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ghawr; Le Strange, Palestine, 15, 30–32, 52–53, 67–68; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 216–18.

671. Site of the first battle between the Muslims and Romans in the conquest of Palestine, its exact location is uncertain but somewhere on the plain of southwestern Palestine, perhaps about 25 km. west-southwest of Jerusalem, south of the present village of Bayt Jimāl. See *EI*², s.v. Ajnādayn; Le Strange, Palestine, 389; Donner, Conquests, 129, 315 n. 189. Ṭabarī, I, 2398–2402, and Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 103–4, give other versions of this battle. Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 143–48, has an exaggerated and distorted version putting Khālid b. al-Walīd in command even here.

672. A large town founded c. 86/705 by Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik and still extant, it was the administrative center of early Muslim Palestine. See *EI*¹, s.v. al-Ramla; Le Strange, Palestine, 15, 28, 39, 41, 303–8; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 69–70.

673. Also Bayt Jibrīl, ancient Betogabra-Baetogabris-Eleutheropolis, it lies 35 km. west-southwest of Jerusalem. It was populated by the Judhām. See *EI*², s.v. Bayt Djibrīn; Le Strange, Palestine, 15, 28–29, 39, 41, 64, 380, 412–13; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 519.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar b. al-Zubayr[674]—ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr: The Romans were commanded by one of their men called al-Qubiqulār,[675] whom Herakleios had made his deputy over the commanders in Syria when he had returned to Constantinople. It was to him that Theodore went with those Roman forces that were with him. But the scholars of Syria claim that the Romans were commanded by none other than Theodore. God knows best.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar b. al-Zubayr—ʿUrwah: When the two armies drew near to each other, al-Qubiqulār sent forth an Arab man. [I have been told that that man was one of the Quḍāʿah from the Tazīd b. Ḥaydān[676] called Ibn Hazārif.[677]] He said, "Go in among those people. Stay among them a day and a night, then bring me information about them." Thus, an Arab man went in among them unquestioned. He stayed among them a day and a night, then came back to al-Qubiqulār, who asked, "What did you find out?" He answered, "By night, [they are] monks, by day, horsemen. If a son steals their property, they cut off his hand; if he commits adultery, they stone him to establish the right among them." Al-Qubiqulār said, "If you have told me the truth, the interior of the earth is better than meeting these on its surface. I wish that my fortune from God will be that he will separate me from them, neither helping me against them, nor helping them against me." Then the troops marched against each other and fought. When al-Qubiqulār had seen what he saw of fighting the Muslims, he said to the Romans, "Wrap my head in a robe." They [2126]

674. Al-Asadī al-Qurashī, he was a Medinan scion of the famous Zubayrī house and a traditionist of good reputation. He died 110–20/728–38. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 184; Zubayrī, Nasab, 250; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 93.

675. Text: al-Qubuqlār; read: al-Qubiqulār, as suggested by Constantine Porphyrogenitus, De Administrando Imperio, 323. The Greek koubikoulários, Latin cubicularius, is a title rather than a name; it designated a chamberlain, who usually was nonmilitary and a eunuch. See Jones, Later Roman Empire, 566–70. But in the troubles of the seventh century, eunuchs could command troops as well, as attested in Theophanes, Chronicle, 43, for the year 27–28/648–49. This koubikoulários would seem to be identified with the Sergios of Theophanes, Chronicle, 37, and perhaps also with the eunuch on p. 36.

676. Closely related to the Maḥrah in the genealogical tree, but apparently from the Syrian Arabs. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 328; II, 545.

677. Unidentified and apparently not mentioned elsewhere.

asked him, "Why?" He said, "[It is] the day for the miserable that I do not want to see. I have not seen in this world a day worse than this." The Muslims cut off his head while he was wrapped up. Ajnādayn occured on 28 Jumādā al-Ūlā of the year 13 (30 July 634). A group of the Muslims were slain on that day, including Salamah b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah, Habbār b. al-Aswad b. ʿAbd al-Asad,[678] Naʿīm b. ʿAbdallāh al-Naḥḥām,[679] Hishām b. al-ʿĀṣī b. Wāʾil, and a group of others from the Quraysh. (We were not given the names of any of the Anṣār[680] who were killed in it.)

[2127] In this year, Abū Bakr died on 21 or 22 Jumādā al-Ākhirah (22–23 August 634).

Continuation of the Report of Abū Zayd

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, according to his isnād, which has been mentioned before: Khālid came to Damascus, and the governor of Buṣrā massed [his forces] against him. Khālid set out against him, he and ʿAbū ʿUbaydah. Adrunjār met them, and Khālid triumphed over them, defeating them so that they entered their fortress and sought a peace agreement. He made peace with them on condition that [they pay] a dīnār for each person every year, and a jarīb[681] of wheat. Then the enemy came back against the Muslims. The Muslims' troops came all together to Ajnādayn. The two sides met on Saturday, 28 Jumādā al-Ūlā 13 (30 July 634).[682] The Muslims were victo-

678. This is an apparent mistake for Habbār b. Sufyān b. ʿAbd al-Asad al-Makhzūmī al-Qurashī, whose martyrdom at Ajnādayn is corroborated by a number of sources, though Muʾtah also is mentioned. The better-known Habbār b. al-Aswad b. al-Muṭṭalib was a different individual. See note 555.

679. Al-ʿAdawī al-Qurashī, he is said to have been one of the earliest Muslims. Other versions put his death at Muʾtah or al-Yarmūk. Though an early Muslim, he did not leave Mecca for Medina until 6/628. He was said to have been employed collecting the tax of a part of the Khuzāʿah at the end of 8 or the beginning of 9/630. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 26; II, 448 (under Nuʿaym); Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 973–74; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 258–59, 343–44; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I, 293; IV, 72, 138–39; V, 170–71; Zubayrī, Nasab, 380; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 567–68.

680. The Medinan Arabs, who entirely embraced Islam in the Prophet's lifetime and formed the backbone of his forces. See *EI*², s.v. Anṣār; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 151–91.

681. A measure of area, 1592 square meters. See Morony, Iraq, 100, 103, 531. But it is also, as here, a dry measure equal to four aqfizah. See Fayrūzābādī, Muḥīṭ, s.v. j-r-b. A qafīz varies from 496 to 640 liters.

682. The day of the week matches with the date.

rious, and God defeated the polytheists. Herakleios's deputy was killed, and men from among the Muslims were martyred. Then Herakleios came back against the Muslims. They met at al-Wāqūṣah. The Muslims fought them, and the enemy fought the Muslims. [News of] Abū Bakr's death, and also Abū 'Ubaydah's appointment, came to them while they were arrayed in battle formation. This battle occurred in Rajab (31 August–29 September 634).

[Abū Bakr's Illness and Death]

Abū Zayd—'Alī b. Muḥammad, according to his isnād, which has been mentioned before: Abū Bakr died at the age of sixty-three years on Monday, 21 Jumādā al-Akhirah (22 August 634).[683] The cause of his death was that the Jews fed him poison in a grain of rice; it is also said in porridge (jadhīdhah). Al-Ḥārith b. Kaladah[684] took some with him, then held back. He said to Abū Bakr, "You have eaten food [2128] which has been poisoned, the poison of a year." Abū Bakr died after a year, having been sick for fifteen days. He was told, "If only you would send for the doctor." He responded, "He has already seen me." They said, "What did he say to you?" Abū Bakr answered, "That I should do what I want."

Abū Ja'far: 'Attāb b. Asīd[685] died at Mecca on the day on which Abū Bakr died. Both were poisoned together, then 'Attāb died at Mecca.

---

683. The day of the week matches with the date.

684. Al-Thaqafī. He is renowned as a famous doctor who had studied medicine at Jundisābūr and also was a Companion of the Prophet and especially of Abū Bakr. He may have embraced Islam at the fall of al-Ṭā'if in 8/630. Ibn Abī Ḥātim denied that he ever became a Muslim. See EI², Supplement, s.v. al-Ḥārith b. Kalada; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 118; II, 308; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 931–32, 1116; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 147, 198, 247; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 485; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 489–90; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 288–89.

685. Al-Umawī al-Qurashī, he was born after 600 C.E. He was appointed governor of Mecca by the Prophet in 8/630, even though he had only just become a Muslim. He held the post until his death. A variant version puts his death c. 23/644 rather than 13/634, as here. The English word tabby derives ultimately from his name. See EI², s.v. 'Attāb; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 8; II, 204; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 6, 889, 959; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 413, 440, 500, 605; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II, 145; III, 187; V, 446; VIII, 262; Zubayrī, Nasab, 187, 312, 418; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 56, 58, 63, 72, 99, 107; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 451–52.

Other authorities[686] on the cause of Abū Bakr's illness, which he died of, include al-Ḥārith[687]—Ibn Sa'd[688]—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Usāmah b. Zayd al-Laythī[689]—Muḥammad b. Ḥamzah[690]—'Amr[691]—his father;[692] Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh[693]—al-Zuhrī[694]—'Urwah—'Ā'ishah;[695] and 'Umar b. 'Imrān b.[696] 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥ-

686. Of these three isnāds, all go through Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī, the third transmitter in the first isnād.

687. Al-Ḥārith b. Abī Usāmah, he was a transmitter of Ibn Sa'd's traditions who died in 282/895. See *EI*², s.v. Ibn Sa'd.

688. Abū 'Abdallāh al-Baṣrī, he was a famous transmitter of the traditions of al-Wāqidī. His great work al-Ṭabaqāt al-kabīr is still extant and often cited in these pages. He lived c. 168–230/784–845. See *EI*², s.v. Ibn Sa'd.

689. Actually a mawlā of the Layth, he was an important Medinan transmitter whose authority was impugned by many scholars but nevertheless deemed trustworthy by Muslim in his Ṣaḥīḥ. He died at an age over seventy in 153/770. Al-Dhahabī and Ibn Ḥajar allege that he is different from Usāmah b. Zayd b. Aslam, the grandson of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb's mawlā Aslam, but it appears from their biographies that the two are either the same person or were two persons whose stories have become confused. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 413; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 662; Dhahabī, Mīzān, I, 174–75; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 207–10.

690. Muḥammad b. Ḥamzah b. 'Amr al-Aslamī, he was a Medinan transmitter with a mixed reputation. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 248; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 127.

691. Apparently this is 'Amr b. Shu'ayb b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ al-Sahmī al-Qurashī, a noble Ḥijāzī traditionist of mixed reputation who died at al-Ṭā'if in 118/736. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 25; II, 184; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 243; Zubayrī, Nasab, 411; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 516; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 48–55.

692. Shu'ayb b. Muḥammad, he was a resident of al-Ṭā'if and Medina. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 25; II, 530; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 243; Zubayrī, Nasab, 411; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 356–57, VIII, 51–55.

693. Ṭabarī, Index, 517, identifies this person as Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr b. 'Umar b. Dirham, the mawlā of the Asad, who died in 203/819 and hence was nearly contemporary with al-Wāqidī. Although al-Wāqidī did quote from him, he is not the Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh meant here, for there is no evidence he quoted from al-Zuhrī. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 254–55. Rather, the Muḥammad here is Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Muslim b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī, the nephew of the great al-Zuhrī and a Medinan traditionist of mixed reputation. This nephew was murdered in 152/769 or 157/774. He is the only Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh attested as transmitting both from al-Zuhrī and to al-Wāqidī. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 274; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 278–80.

694. Muḥammad b. Muslim b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. Shihāb al-Zuhrī al-Qurashī, c. 50–124/670–742, he was one of the most famous early Islamic scholars. He migrated from Medina to Damascus in 81/700, where he was on intimate terms with the Umayyads, especially the caliph Hishām, whose children he tutored. See *EI*¹, s.v. al-Zuhrī; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 20; II, 424; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II, 388–89; Zubayrī, Nasab, 274; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 445–51.

695. That is, 'Ā'ishah bt. Abī Bakr, daughter of the first caliph and wife of the Prophet. She was born in 614 C.E. (or earlier) and died in 58/678. See *EI*², s.v. 'Ā'isha bint Abī Bakr; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II, 374–78; also, note 766.

696. Text: 'an; read: b., as Ṭabarī, I, 2730, and Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIII.

mān b. Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddīq[697] — ʿUmar b. al-Ḥusayn, the mawlā of the family of Maẓʿūn[698] — Ṭalḥah b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr:[699] Abū Bakr first began to get sick when he bathed on Monday, 7 Jumādā al-Ākhirah (8 August 634),[700] which was a cold day. Thus, he contracted a fever for fifteen days, during which he did not go forth for congregational worship. He commanded ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb to lead the worship. The people would come in to visit him, though he grew worse each day. He was staying in his house, which God's Messenger had given him, which faces the house of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān today. ʿUthmān had compelled them to be constantly with Abū Bakr in his illness. Abū Bakr died on the eve of Tuesday,[701] 21 Jumādā al-Ākhirah of the year 13 of the hijrah (22 August 634). His caliphate lasted two years, three months, and ten days.

Abū Maʿshar: His caliphate was two years and four months less four days.

He died at the age of sixty-three years. That is agreed on by all the reports. He lived the lifespan of the Prophet. Abū Bakr was born three years after the elephant.

Ibn Ḥumayd — Jarīr[702] — Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd[703] — Saʿīd b. al-Musayyab:[704] Abū Bakr by his caliphate completed the lifespan of the [2129]

---

697. A great-great grandson of the caliph Abū Bakr. Zubayrī, Nasab, 278–79, describes his genealogy only down to his father ʿImrān, omitting this ʿUmar himself, who does not seem to be attested elsewhere.

698. Text: Maṭʿūn; read: Maẓʿūn. This ʿUmar was Abū Qudāmah al-Makkī, the mawlā of ʿĀ'ishah bt. Qudāmah b. Maẓʿūn of the famous Meccan family of the Jumaḥ clan of the Quraysh. He is said to have served as the judge of Medina and was renowned for his piety and trustworthiness as a traditionist. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 433–34. Wakīʿ, Quḍāh, I, 268, reports that he was judge of Mecca under al-Manṣūr or al-Mahdī.

699. A Medinan transmitter of tradition who is held to be reliable, he was a son of the famous ʿĀ'ishah bt. Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh and was named for his maternal grandfather. His sister married the caliph al-Walīd I. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 278–79; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 17–18.

700. The day of the week matches with the date.

701. The Islamic day begins at sunset, so that he actually died on a Monday, as on p. 129.

702. Jarīr b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Qurṭ al-Ḍabbī, 107–10/725–28 to 188/804, he was a traditionist with a fair reputation. He was born in a village near Iṣfahān, grew up in al-Kūfah, and then migrated to al-Rayy, where he became judge. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 75–77.

703. Al-Najjārī al-Anṣārī, he was a very famous Medinan traditionist and judge at Medina (in 126/744), al-Ḥīrah, and al-Hāshimiyyah near Baghdād (in 143/760 to his death in 143–46/760–63). See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 186; II, 589; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 554, 645; Wakīʿ, Quḍāh, I, 178–79; III, 241–45; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 63; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 221–24.

704. Al-Makhzūmī al-Qurashī, 15–19/636–40 to 93–94/712–13, he was a Medi-

Messenger of God. He died at the age of the Prophet.

Abū Kurayb[705] — Abū Naʿīm[706] — Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq — Abū al-Safar — ʿĀmir[707] — Jarīr:[708] I was with Muʿāwiyah when he said, "The Prophet died when he was sixty-three years old, Abū Bakr died when he was sixty-three years old, and ʿUmar was killed when he was sixty-three years old."

Abū al-Aḥwaṣ[709] — Abū Isḥāq[710] — ʿĀmir b. Saʿd[711] — Jarīr: Muʿāwiyah said, "God's Messenger was taken when he was sixty-three years old, ʿUmar was killed when he was sixty-three years old, and Abū Bakr died when he was sixty-three years old."

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, in the report from which I have drawn: Abū Bakr's rule lasted two years, three months, and twenty days, and it is also said ten days.

---

nan scholar of major importance in the transmission of tradition from the Companions. He often is considered the most important figure of the generation after the Companions. He is said to have been whipped by the governor of Medina for refusing to render allegiance to ʿAbd al-Malik's sons in 84/703, just as he is similarly reported to have been lashed for refusing to pay allegiance to Ibn al-Zubayr in 68/688. He married the daughter of Abū Hurayrah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 22; II, 501; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II, 379–84; Zubayrī, Nasab, 345–46; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 123, 335, 377, 407; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 84–88.

705. Muḥammad b. al-ʿĀlāʾ b. Kurayb al-Hamdānī, 170–248/786–862, he was an important Kūfan traditionist with a good reputation. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 414; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 385–86.

706. Text: Nuʿaym; read: Naʿīm, as is the common Arabic name today. He was al-Faḍl b. ʿAmr, nicknamed Dukayn, b. Ḥammād b. Zuhayr b. Dirham al-Mulāʾī, the mawlā of the family of Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Taymī, and an influential scholar of al-Kūfah. He lived 130–219/748–834. See *EI*², s.v. Abū Nuʿaym; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 400–1; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 783; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 270–76.

707. According to Ṭabarī, Indices, 305, he is ʿĀmir b. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ al-Zuhrī al-Qurashī, who indeed is attested as a transmitter of tradition in Medina. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 264; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 63–64. See also note 711, below. It is curious but not exceptional to find a Medinan transmitter like this in the middle of a Kūfan isnād.

708. That is, Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī, d. 51/671. See note 206, above.

709. Sallām b. Salīm, the mawlā of the Ḥanīfah, he was a Kūfan scholar of good reputation who died in 179/795. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 379; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 719; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 282–83.

710. ʿAmr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Sabīʿī al-Hamdānī, c. 33/654 to 126–29/744–47, he was a very important Kūfan traditionist with a fair reputation. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 228; II, 167; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 313–15; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 63–67.

711. Text: Saʿīd; read: Saʿd, as Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIII. He is ʿĀmir b. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ al-Zuhrī al-Qurashī. See above, note 707.

Who Washed Abū Bakr, His Shroud, Who Prayed over Him, the Time of His Funeral Prayer, and the Time at Which He Died

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Mālik b.[712] Abī al-Rijāl[713]—his father[714]—'Ā'ishah: Abū Bakr died between the worship of sunset and that of total darkness.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ[715]—Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh[716]—'Aṭā'[717] and Ibn Abī Mulaykah:[718] Asmā' bt. 'Umays[719] said, "Abū Bakr said to me, 'Wash me.' I said, 'I cannot bear that.' He said, "Abd

---

712. Text: 'an; read: b., as Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIII.

713. Text: al-Raḥḥāl; read: al-Rijāl. This Mālik was a Medinan transmitter who is identified only in the article on his father in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 295. See note 714, below.

714. Abū al-Rijāl Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥārithah al-Najjārī al-Anṣārī, he was a Medinan transmitter of tradition with a mixed reputation. He was called Abū al-Rijāl, "the father of the men," because he had ten sons. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 488; VIII, 480; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 60; Dhahabī, Mīzān, III, 627; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 295–96; XII, 94.

715. Abū Tumaylah, the mawlā of the Anṣār, he was a traditionist from Marw who was considered trustworthy. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 375; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 293–94.

716. It is hard to say which Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh this might be. Ṭabarī, Indices, 517, proposes al-Anṣārī, but even that does not narrow the field sufficiently. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 247–88.

717. The famous Meccan jurist 'Aṭā' b. Abī Rabāḥ, the mawlā of the Quraysh, 27/646 to 114–15/732–33. See *EI*², s.v. 'Aṭā' b. Abī Rabāḥ; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 467–70; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 510; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 199–203.

718. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. Zuhayr al-Taymī al-Qurashī, he was a famous Meccan traditionist of good reputation who served as judge of al-Ṭā'if for Ibn al-Zubayr. He died in 117–18/735–36. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 21; II, 119; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 472–73; Zubayrī, Nasab, 293; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 516; Wakī', Quḍāh, I, 261–62; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 306–7.

719. Al-Khath'amiyyah, she is possibly the most important woman of early Islam after Khadījah and 'A'ishah. She was successively the wife of a Hilālī, then 'Alī's brother Ja'far b. Abī Ṭālib, and then the two caliphs Abū Bakr and 'Alī. One of the earliest Muslims, she migrated with her husband Ja'far to Ethiopia, where they remained for about twelve years representing the Prophet's interests. Her sons Muḥammad b. Ja'far (See Ṭabarī, I, 3012, 3094, 3139) and Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, brought up in 'Alī's household, participated in the killing of the caliph 'Uthmān. She was also the center of a genealogical marriage nexus, being related through her sisters to the Prophet's uncles Ḥamzah and al-'Abbās, as well as to the early conqueror Khālid b. al-Walīd. She lived until at least 38/658. See *EI*², Supplement, s.v. Asmā'; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 226; II, 198; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 280–85; Zubayrī, Nasab, 44, 80–82, 277; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, IV, 234–36; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 231; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 322, 380–81.

al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr[720] will help you by pouring the water.'"

Al-Ḥārith — Muḥammad b. Sa'd — Mu'ādh b. Mu'ādh[721] and Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh al-Anṣārī[722] — al-Ash'ath[723] — 'Abd al-Wāḥid [2130] b. Ṣabirah[724] — al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad: Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq willed that his wife Asmā' wash him, and that if she could not, that his son Muḥammad[725] help her.

Ibn Sa'd — Muḥammad b. 'Umar: This report is weak, for Muḥammad was only three years old on the day Abū Bakr died.

Ibn Wakī'[726] — Ibn 'Uyaynah[727] — 'Amr b. Dīnār[728] — Ibn Abī Mu-

---

720. Abū Bakr's eldest son, who only embraced Islam about 8/630. Later, he fought for his sister 'Ā'ishah at the Battle of the Camel, after which he returned to Mecca, where he died 53–58/673–78. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 21; II, 128 (under b. 'Atīq); Zubayrī, Nasab, 276, 278; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Istī'āb, II, 399–402; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 407–8 (under b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Uthmān).

721. Al-'Anbarī, 117/735 or 119/737 to 195–96/811–12, he was a scholar of al-Baṣrah with a good reputation who also served twice as judge of that city, in 170/786 and from 181/797 to 191/807. His judgeship was stormy. He was the first follower of Abū Ḥanīfah to hold that position and opposed the Mu'tazilah. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 293; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 514, 708, 738, 749, 754; Wakī', Quḍāh, II, 137–42, 147–54; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 194–95.

722. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Muthannā b. 'Abdallāh b. Anas b. Mālik, 118/736 to 212–15/827–30, he was an important Baṣran traditionist with a good reputation. He served as judge of al-Baṣrah 191–92/807–8, then moved to Baghdād, where he was judge at 'Askar al-Mahdī, then took charge of the maẓālim court, then was judge of al-Baṣrah again 198–99/814–15. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 294–95; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 516, 738–39, 749, 758, 778; Wakī', Quḍāh, II, 154–55, 157–61; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 33; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 274–76.

723. Al-Ash'ath b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Ḥumrānī, the mawlā of Ḥumrān b. Abān, he was a Baṣran traditionist with a good reputation. He died in 142/759 or 146/763. He seems to have opposed the Qadariyyah. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 276; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 357–59.

724. Unidentified and mentioned only in this one place in al-Ṭabarī.

725. Infamous as one of the killers of the Caliph 'Uthmān, he lived 10–38/631–58. He was a strong partisan of his stepfather 'Alī, whom he served as governor of Egypt until he was executed by Mu'āwiyah's forces. See EI[1], s.v. Muḥammad (b. Abī Bakr); Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 21; II, 423; Zubayrī, Nasab, 277; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 189–90, 203, 213, 218, 232; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 472–73.

726. Sufyān b. Wakī' b. al-Jarrāḥ al-Rawāsī al-Kilābī, he was a Kūfan traditionist with a poor reputation who died in 247/861. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 394 (noticing only his father); Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 123–25.

727. Sufyān b. 'Uyaynah b. Abī 'Imrān, the mawlā of the Hilāl, he was a Kūfan traditionist of excellent reputation who moved to Mecca in 163/780, remaining there for the rest of his life. He lived 107–98/725–814. His father was a tax agent for Khālid al-Qasrī. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 497–98; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 493, 758; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 117–22.

728. The mawlā of Bādhān of the Abnā', who were apparently associated with the Jumaḥ of the Quraysh, he was a Meccan traditionist of excellent reputation who died in 125–26/743–44. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 479–80; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 556; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 28–30.

laykah—ʿĀʾishah: Abū Bakr asked her, "In how many [layers] was the Prophet shrouded?" She said, "In three robes." He said, "Wash these two robes of mine—they were worn out—and buy me another robe." I said, "O father, we are wealthy." He said, "O daughter, the living have more right to the new than the dying. Only these two are for the liquid pitch and pus."[729]

Al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd[730]—his father[731]—al-Awzāʿī[732]—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Qāsim:[733] Abū Bakr died in the evening, after the sun had set, on the eve of Tuesday,[734] and he was buried at night on the eve of Tuesday.

Abū Kurayb—ʿAththām[735]—Hishām—his father: Abū Bakr died on the eve of Tuesday and was buried at night.

Abū Zayd—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, according to his isnād, which has been mentioned before: Abū Bakr was carried on the litter on which God's Messenger had been carried. ʿUmar prayed over him in the Mosque of God's Messenger. ʿUmar, ʿUthmān, Ṭalḥah,[736] and 729. Ar. muhlah wa ṣadīd. This refers to torments of hell in Qurʾān 14: 16; 18: 29; 44: 45; 70: 8.

730. Al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd b. Mazyad al-ʿUdhrī, 169–70/786–87 to 269–71/882–84, a traditionist of Bayrūt with a good reputation who followed the school of al-Awzāʿī. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 131–33.

731. Al-Walīd b. Mazyad al-ʿUdhrī, c. 126/744 to 203/818–19, he was the great Bayrūtī transmitter of the juristic school and tradition of al-Awzāʿī. See *EI*², s.v. al-Awzāʿī; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 150–51.

732. Abū ʿAmr ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAmr, 88–157/707–74, though other death dates varying from 151/768 to 158/775 are given. He is the founder of the great Syrian school of Islamic jurisprudence associated with his name. Possibly descended from captives from Sind, or otherwise an authentic Arab from the Hamdān, he seems to have been born in Damascus. He is said to have been appointed judge of Damascus by the caliph Yazīd b. al-Walīd in 126/744. He settled in Bayrūt toward the end of his life. See *EI*², s.v. al-Awzāʿī; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 488; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 666; Wakīʿ, Quḍāh, III, 207; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 238–42.

733. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, the son of the famous Madanī faqīh. His mother was Quraybah bt. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr, his father's first cousin. Respected for his piety and well known as a traditionist, he may have caused the removal of Khālid b. ʿAbd al-Malik from the governorship of Medina when he complained to the caliph Hishām about him in 118/736. He died either in 126/744 or 131/749. By misreading the text of Wakīʿ, Caskel has wrongly made him judge of Medina in 150–55/767–72, a position actually held by his son. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 21; II, 130; Zubayrī, Nasab, 279–80; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 557; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 254–55.

734. That is, "on Monday night."

735. Text: Ghannām; read: ʿAththām. He is Abū ʿAlī ʿAththām b. ʿAlī al-Kilābī, d. 194–95/810–11, who was a Kūfan traditionist enjoying a sound reputation. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 392; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 754; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 105–6.

736. Ṭalḥah al-Khayr b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Taymī al-Qurashī, d. 36/656, he was one of the early Companions known chiefly for his later political roles in the shūrā council

ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr entered his tomb. ʿAbdallāh[737] also wanted to enter his tomb, but ʿUmar said to him, "Your duty has already been fulfilled."

Abū Jaʿfar: Abū Bakr made a last request according to [the following]:

Al-Ḥārith — Ibn Saʿd — Muḥammad b. ʿUmar — Abū Bakr b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Sabrah[738] — ʿUmar b. ʿAbdallāh, that is, Ibn ʿUrwah[739] — ʿUrwah and al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad: Abū Bakr commanded ʿĀʾi-[2131] shah that he be buried next to the Prophet. When he died, [a grave] was dug for him, and his head was placed by the shoulders of God's Messenger. The grave was joined with the grave of the Prophet. Thus, he was buried there.

Al-Ḥārith — Ibn Saʿd — Muḥammad b. ʿUmar — Ibn ʿUthmān[740] — ʿĀmir b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr:[741] Abū Bakr's head was placed at that elected the caliph ʿUthmān and his participation in the Battle of the Camel, where he was killed fighting against ʿAlī. See EI[1], s.v. Ṭalḥa; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 21; II, 556; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 214–25; Zubayrī, Nasab, 280–91; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 229–30.

---

737. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb al-ʿAdawī al-Qurashī, born c. 612 C.E., died 73–74/693–94, he was the son of the second caliph and a famous Medinan traditionist of outstanding reputation for scrupulousness and honesty. EI[2], s.v. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 26; II, 120; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, IV, 142–88; Zubayrī, Nasab, 348, 350–51, 356–57; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 347–50.

738. Actually, Abū Bakr b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Abī Sabrah b. Abī Ruhm al-ʿĀmirī al-Qurashī, 102–62/721–79. He was a Medinan traditionist with a rather poor reputation, perhaps because of his participation in politics. He was judge of Medina 133/751 or 136/753–54 to 141/758. He was a tax collector for the northern Arabian tribal districts of Ṭayyiʾ and Asad, whose money he turned over to the anti-ʿAbbāsid rebel Muḥammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyyah. For this he was imprisoned by al-Manṣūr, but later freed owing to his role in stopping a slave rebellion in Medina. Still later, he settled in Baghdād, where he served as judge for al-Mahdī. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 27; II, 222; Zubayrī, Nasab, 428–30; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 634, 681, 686; Wakiʿ, Quḍāh, I, 200–2, 224; III, 253–54; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 27–28.

739. Al-Asadī al-Qurashī, he was a rather obscure member of the great Zubayrī family of Medina and was a Zubayrī on both sides, his mother being Umm Ḥakīm bt. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 469–70.

740. Ṭabarī, Indices, 373, 409, suggests that this is ʿUmar b. ʿUthmān b. ʿUmar b. Mūsā b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar al-Taymī al-Qurashī, a blue-blooded Medinan traditionist who was judge of al-Baṣrah 169–70/785–87, but who died later in Medina. On him, see Zubayrī, Nasab, 290–91; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 698; Wakiʿ, Quḍāh, II, 133–37; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 482–83. However, al-Wāqidī is not said to have transmitted from him but is specifically said to have transmitted from ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān b. Hānīʾ, the mawlā of ʿUthmān, a rather obscure Medinan who was quoted by the Kūfans. This ʿAmr is also mentioned in the next khabar here. On him, see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 79.

741. Al-Asadī al-Qurashī, he was a pious member of the Zubayrī family who died in 121/739. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 243; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 524, 532; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 74.

the shoulders of God's Messenger and ʿUmar's head at Abū Bakr's loins.

ʿAlī b. Muslim al-Ṭūsī[742]—Ibn Abī Fudayk[743]—ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān b. Hāni'[744]—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad: I went into ʿĀ'ishah's presence and said, "O mother, reveal to me the tomb of the Prophet and his two companions." She then revealed to me three tombs, neither raised high nor cleaving to the ground, laid out in the basinlike depression inside of the red court. I saw that the tomb of the Prophet was put in front, Abū Bakr's tomb was at his head, and ʿUmar was at the leg of the Prophet.

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Abū Bakr b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Sabrah—ʿAmr b. Abī ʿAmr[745]—al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥanṭab:[746] The tomb of Abū Bakr was made flat like the tomb of the Prophet. Water was sprinkled on it. ʿĀ'ishah carried out the mourning for him.

Yūnus[747]—Ibn Wahb[748]—Yūnus b. Yazīd[749]—Ibn Shihāb—Saʿīd b. al-Musayyab: When Abū Bakr died, ʿĀ'ishah carried out the mourning for him. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb approached until he stood at the door. He forbade the women to weep for Abū Bakr, but they refused to stop. [2132]
ʿUmar said to Hishām b. al-Walīd, "Go inside and bring me the

---

742. He was a Khurāsānī who settled in Baghdād. He lived 160–253/777–867. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 382–83.

743. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl b. Abī Fudayk Dīnār, the mawlā of the Dīl, he was a Medinan traditionist with a fair reputation. He died in 199–200/815–16. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 437; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 762; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 61.

744. See note 740, above.

745. The mawlā of al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥanṭab, he was a Medinan traditionist with a mixed reputation. He died in 144/761. See Dhahabī, Mīzān, III, 281–82; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 82–84.

746. Actually, al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Muṭṭalib b. Ḥanṭab al-Makhzūmī, a blue-blooded Qurashī, he was a Medinan traditionist with a mixed reputation. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 22; II, 439; Zubayrī, Nasab, 339; Dhahabī, Mīzān, IV, 129; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 178–79.

747. Yūnus b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā b. Mūsā al-Ṣadafī 170–264/787–877. He was an Egyptian traditionist with a good reputation who was especially famed for his knowledge of the readings of the Qurʾān. He was wrongfully imprisoned by the ʿAbbāsid governor of Egypt 228–35/843–50. Kindī, Wulāh wa quḍāh, 454–56, 470–71, 475, 506; Dhahabī, Mīzān, IV, 481; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 440–41.

748. ʿAbdallāh b. Wahb b. Muslim, the mawlā of the Qurayṣh, 125–97/743–813. He was the greatest Egyptian traditionist of his generation, having a mostly favorable reputation. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 518; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 71–74.

749. Al-Aylī, the mawlā of Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān. He was one of the main transmitters of al-Zuhrī's traditions; however, his reputation as a traditionist is mixed. He died in upper Egypt in 159/776. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 520; Dhahabī, Mīzān, IV, 484; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 450–52.

daughter of Abū Quḥāfah, the sister of Abū Bakr."[750] When she heard that from ʿUmar, ʿĀ'ishah said to Hishām, "I forbid my house to you." But ʿUmar said to Hishām, "Go on in, for I have given you permission." Thus, Hishām entered and brought out Umm Farwah, the sister of Abū Bakr, to ʿUmar, who raised his whip over her and gave her a number of blows. The weeping women scattered when they heard that.

Abū Zayd—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, according to his isnād: When he was suffering the illness from which he died, he quoted:

Every owner of camels is succeeded by an heir, and every owner of spoil is despoiled.
Every owner of absence comes back, but the one absent because of death does not come back.

His last words were, "My Lord, take me as a Muslim and join me with the righteous."

Abū Bakr's Appearance

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Shuʿayb b.[751] Ṭalḥah b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddīq[752]—his father—ʿĀ'ishah: When she was in her howdah and saw a man from among the Arabs passing by, she said, "I have not seen a man more like Abū Bakr than this one." We said to her, "Describe Abū Bakr." She said, "A slight, white man, thin-bearded and bowed. His waist wrapper would not hold but would fall down around his loins. He had a lean face, sunken eyes, a bulging forehead, and trembling knuckles."

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, in his version whose isnād I have mentioned
[2133] before: He was white mixed with yellowness, of good build, slight, bowed, thin, tall like a male palm tree (ʿatīq), hook-nosed, lean-faced, sunken-eyed, thin-shanked, and strong-thighed. He used to

750. Umm Farwah, Abū Bakr's much younger half-sister, the wife of al-Ashʿath b. Qays al-Kindī and mother of his children, Muḥammad, Isḥāq, Ismāʿīl, Ḥubābah, and Quraybah. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 249; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 482–83; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, IV, 484–85.

751. Text: ʿan; read: b., as Ṭabarī, I, 2730, and Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIII.

752. He was a minor Medinan transmitter of mixed reputation. See Dhahabī, Mīzān, II, 277; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 17; also, note 699, above.

dye himself with henna and black dye (katam). When he died, Abū Quḥāfah was living at Mecca. On hearing the news of his death, he said, "A weighty misfortune!"

Abū Bakr's Genealogy, His Name, and What He Was Known by

Abū Zayd — ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, according to his isnād, which has already been mentioned: They agree that the personal name (ism) of Abū Bakr was ʿAbdallāh, and that he was called ʿAtīq only owing to his handsomeness. (But some say that he was called that because the Prophet told him, "You are liberated (ʿatīq) from the [hell]fire.")

Al-Ḥārith — Ibn Saʿd — Muḥammad b. ʿUmar — Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā b. Ṭalḥah[753] — Muʿāwiyah b. Isḥāq[754] — his father[755] — ʿĀʾishah: She was asked, "Why was Abū Bakr named ʿAtīq?" She answered, "The Prophet looked at him one day and said, "This is the man God has freed from the fire." The personal name of his father was ʿUthmān, his kunyah[756] being Abū Quḥāfah.[757] Abū Bakr is ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUthmān b. ʿĀmir b. ʿAmr b. Kaʿb b. Saʿd b. Taym b. Murrah b. Kaʿb b. Luʾayy b. Ghālib b. Fihr b. Mālik. His mother is Umm al-Khayr bt.

---

753. Al-Taymī al-Qurashī, died 164/781, he was a Medinan transmitter with a poor reputation and the grandson of the famous Ṭalḥah of the first civil war. He circulated an anti-ʿAlid tradition, which is not surprising in view of his ancestry. Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 164; Zubayrī, Nasab, 287; Dhahabī, Mīzān, I, 204; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 254–55.

754. Al-Taymī al-Qurashī, the first cousin of the preceding and also a grandson of Ṭalḥah, he enjoyed a fair reputation as a traditionist. Although he is called a Kūfan, as he may have settled in al-Kūfah, he was certainly of Medinan origin. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 166; VI, 339; Dhahabī, Mīzān, IV, 134; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 202.

755. Isḥāq b. Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Taymī al-Qurashī, he was a Medinan who was considered a reliable transmitter. By 51/671, he seems already to have moved to al-Kūfah, where he signed the document condemning Ḥujr b. ʿAdī. He also was appointed by the caliph Muʿāwiyah in 56/676 to supervise the collection of taxes in Khurāsān but died at al-Rayy on the way. See Ṭabarī, II, 132, 178; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 166; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 268 (where he is misnamed Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā b. Ṭalḥah); Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 238.

756. The kunyah is a special nickname used by Arabs to this day meaning "the father of so-and-so" or "the mother of so-and-so." (Ar. Abū for men and Umm for women). See *EI*², s.v. Kunya.

757. He is said to have survived as a pagan until the conquest of Mecca in 8/630, whereupon he became a Muslim. He is said to have died in 14/635 at the age of ninety-seven. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 21; II, 578; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 405–6; Zubayrī, Nasab, 275; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 460–61.

Ṣakhr b. ʿĀmir b. Kaʿb b. Saʿd b. Taym b. Murrah.[758]

Al-Wāqidī: His personal name is ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Quḥāfah, whose personal name is ʿUthmān b. ʿĀmir. His mother is Umm al-Khayr, whose personal name is Salmā bt. Ṣakhr b. ʿĀmir b. Kaʿb b. Saʿd b. Taym b. Murrah.

Hishām, according to what has been transmitted to me from him:
[2134] The personal name of Abū Bakr is ʿAtiq b. ʿUthmān b. ʿĀmir.

Yūnus — Ibn Wahb — Ibn Lahīʿah[759] — ʿUmārah b. Ghaziyyah:[760] I asked ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Qāsim about the personal name of Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq. He answered, "[It is] ʿAtīq. They were three brothers, the sons of Abū Quḥāfah, ʿAtīq, Muʿtaq, and ʿUtayq."[761]

The Names of Abū Bakr's Wives

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad — his informant and those of his authorities whom I have mentioned: In the Jāhiliyyah, Abū Bakr married Qutaylah.[762] [Al-Wāqidī and al-Kalbī agree with him in that. All three say:] She is Qutaylah bt. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā b. ʿAbd b. Asʿad b. Jābir b. Mālik b. Ḥisl b. ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy. She bore him ʿAbdallāh[763] and Asmāʾ[764]

---

758. Of the same Qurashī clan as Abū Quḥāfah, she is reputed to have embraced Islam early and to have died before her husband. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 294; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 447.

759. ʿAbdallāh b. Lahīʿah b. ʿUqbah al-Ḥaḍramī, 96–174/715–90. He was a most famous traditionist of Egypt with a mixed reputation. He served as the first chief judge of Egypt appointed by the caliph 155–64/771–80. *EI*², s.v. Ibn Lahīʿa; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 516–17; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 714; Wakīʿ, Quḍāh, III, 235–36; Kindī, Wulāh wa quḍāh, 368–70; Dhahabī, Mīzān, II, 475–83; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 373–79.

760. Al-Najjārī al-Anṣārī, d. 140/757, he was a Medinan traditionist with a fair reputation. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 641; Dhahabī, Mīzān, III, 178; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 422–23.

761. This collocation of three sons with similar names would appear to be a fictional genealogical motif. Abū Bakr's alleged brothers are not otherwise attested to and have no other role in the tradition. They are not mentioned in Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 21, nor Zubayrī, Nasab, 275.

762. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 169; VIII, 249; Zubayrī, Nasab, 276, where her genealogy differs somewhat from that given here. As she is scarcely mentioned in the sources and omitted by Ibn Ḥajar, it would appear that she never embraced Islam and thus perhaps died before 610 C.E.

763. He was famous for bringing supplies to the Prophet and Abū Bakr when they were hiding in the cave on the eve of the hijrah to Medina. He was injured at the siege of al-Ṭāʾif and died later, in 11/632–33. See Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 930–31, 938; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 485–86; II, 486; Zubayrī, Nasab, 275, 277; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 283–84. Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 21; II, 108, assigns him a completely different mother than Qutaylah al-ʿĀmiriyyah.

764. Nicknamed Dhāt al-Niṭāqayn, she was one of the most important early Mus-

He also married in the Jāhiliyyah Umm Rūmān bt. ʿĀmir b. ʿAmīrah b. Dhuhl b. Duhmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Ghanm b. Mālik b. Kinānah.[765] Certain authorities say that she is Umm Rūmān bt. ʿĀmir b. ʿUwaymir b. ʿAbd Shams b. ʿAttāb b. Udhaynah b. Subayʿ b. Duhmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Ghanm b. Mālik b. Kinānah. She bore him ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and ʿĀʾishah. All of these four of his children were born in al-Jāhiliyyah from his two wives whom we have named.[766]

Under Islam, he married Asmāʾ bt. ʿUmays, who had previously been the wife of Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib.[767] She is Asmāʾ bt. ʿUmays b. Maʿd b. Taym b. al-Ḥārith b. Kaʿb b. Mālik b. Quḥāfah b. ʿĀmir b. [2135] Rabīʿah b. ʿĀmir b. Mālik b. Nasr b. Wahb Allāh b. Shahrān b. ʿIfris b. Ḥalf b. Aftal, who is Khathʿam. She bore him Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr.

He also married under Islam Ḥabībah bt. Khārijah b. Zayd b. Abī Zuhayr of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. al-Khazraj.[768] Her pregnancy had just appeared when Abū Bakr died, and after his death she bore him a daughter, who was named Umm Kulthūm.[769] lim women, for she was not only the daughter of Abū Bakr and thus ʿĀʾishah's elder sister, but also the wife of al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām and the mother of several of his children, including ʿAbdallāh, the leader of the Zubayrīs in the second civil war. She died in 73/693. See *EI*², s.v. Asmāʾ; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 249–55; Zubayrī, Nasab, 236; 275–76; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, IV, 232–34; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 229–30.

---

765. Abū Bakr was her second husband. She embraced Islam early, then migrated to Medina, dying there in 6/628. Another genealogy also is offered for her. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 276–77; Zubayrī, Nasab, 276; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, IV, 448–52; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 450–52.

766. This statement appears to contradict the alleged age of ʿĀʾishah of nine years at the time of the consummation of her marriage to the Prophet in Shawwāl 1 (April–May 623), for which see al-Balādhurī, Ansab, I, 409–11; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 359–60. Even if she was born at the end of the Jāhiliyyah period, in 609 C.E., she would have been at least thirteen solar years old by the year 1/622–23.

767. Jaʿfar al-Ṭayyār, the brother of the caliph ʿAlī, c. 590 C.E.–8/629. He was one of the most important early Muslims, leading them in Ethiopia, where he headed the Muslim mission c. 615 C.E.–7/628, until he returned at the time of the Khaybar campaign. Shortly afterward, he was slain at Muʾtah. See *EI*², s.v. Djaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 5; II, 254; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, IV, 34–41; Zubayrī, Nasab, 39, 80–81; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, I, 210–13; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 237–38.

768. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 360; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 116, 134; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, IV, 272–74; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 269–70.

769. She was born after her father's death in 13/634. She married Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh, to whom she bore two sons and a daughter, the famous ʿĀʾishah bt. Ṭalḥah. Umm Kulthūm then married ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Makhzūmī, to whom she bore four children. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 462; Zubayrī, Nasab, 278, 283, 318; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 493.

The Names of His Judges, Secretaries, and Tax Officials

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Mukharrimī[770] — Abū al-Fatḥ Naṣr b. al-Mughīrah[771] — Sufyān — Misʿar:[772] When Abū Bakr took power, Abū ʿUbaydah said to him, "I will take care of finance — meaning taxes [jizā'] — for you." ʿUmar said, "I will take care of judicial matters for you." Though ʿUmar stayed [in office] for a year, not even two men came to him.

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad — those whom I have named — certain authorities: Abū Bakr made ʿUmar his judge during his caliphate. He stayed in office for a year, but no one brought any dispute to him.

[Certain authorities]: Zayd b. Thābit[773] served as his secretary. ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān provided him with information and reported to him who had come. They say that ʿAttāb b. Asīd was his governor of Mecca. ʿUthmān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣī[774] was in charge of al-Ṭā'if,[775] al-Mu-

---

770. Probably this is Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Mubārak al-Qurashī, died 254–60/868–74, a Baghdādī traditionist who was the judge of Ḥulwān. See Samʿānī, Ansāb, XII, 132, 134; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 272–74. But there is also another, slightly earlier, Mukharrimī, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmmār b. Sawādah al-Ghāmidī, 162–242/779–856, a Baghdādī traditionist who moved to al-Mawṣil, who is a possible candidate. On him, see Wakīʿ, Quḍāh, III, 185; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 265–66. In view of al-Ṭabarī's own birthdate of 224/839, the former is more likely for him to have quoted directly.

771. Unidentified and mentioned only in this place in al-Ṭabarī.

772. Misʿar b. Kidām b. Ẓahīr al-Hilālī, he was a Kūfan traditionist of excellent reputation who died in 152–56/769–73. He was one of the Murji'ah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 110; II, 409; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 364–65; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 662; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 113–15.

773. Al-Najjārī al-Khazrajī, he was among the most outstanding of the Anṣār and also served as the Prophet's secretary. He is most famous for his claimed role in redacting the ʿUthmānic text of the Qur'ān. Later, he was one of the few Anṣār to support the caliph ʿUthmān. He died between 42/662 and 56/676, possibly in 45/665. See EI[1], s.v. Zaid b. Thābit al-Najjārī; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 186; II, 603; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II, 358–62; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 71–73; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, I, 551–54; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 561–62.

774. Al-Thaqafī, he was the first of his tribe to rise to prominence in Islam. He held the governorship of al-Ṭā'if, his native city, 9–15/630–36, then was governor of al-Baḥrayn and ʿUmān 15–29/636–50, whence he campaigned in Iran. After this, he resided in al-Baṣrah until he died in 51/671 or 55/675. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 119; II, 579; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 508–9; VII, 40; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 72, 107, 123, 134–35, 145–46, 151, 154, 156, 163–64, 167, 171; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 529; Futūḥ, 70, 99–100, 387, 432; Yaʿqūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 82, 136, 151, 156, 190; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 460; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 104.

775. One of the largest cities in Saudi Arabia, about 90 km. by road east of Mecca on the top of the Ḥijāz escarpment. In early Islamic times, it was also an important town, the capital of the Thaqīf. See EI[1], s.v. Ṭā'if.

hājir b. Abī Umayyah[776] was in charge of Ṣanʿā',[777] Ziyād b. Labīd[778] was in charge of Ḥaḍramawt,[779] Yaʿlā b. Umayyah[780] was in charge of Khawlān,[781] Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī was in charge of Zabīd[782] and Rimaʿ,[783] Muʿādh b. Jabal[784] was in charge of al-Janad,[785] and al- [2136]

776. Al-Makhzūmī al-Qurashī, he was the first cousin of Khālid b. al-Walīd and half-brother of Umm Salamah, the Prophet's wife. The Prophet appointed him to be in charge of the Kindah and al-Ṣadif, but later he was transferred to Ṣanʿā'. See EI[1], s.v. Ṣanʿā'; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 23; II, 420; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 600; Zubayrī, Nasab, 316; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 72, 98, 107; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 456, 529; Futūḥ, 82–83, 121–23, 125, 127; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 465–66.

777. The capital of Yemen, then as now. See EI[1], s.v. Ṣanʿā'.

778. Al-Khazrajī al-Anṣārī, he was one of the Medinans who became Muslims before the hijrah and subsequently participated in all the Prophet's battles. Appointed governor of Ḥaḍramawt by the Prophet, he may have remained in charge of it until the end of ʿUmar's reign. Later he opposed the caliph ʿUthmān. He died after 40/661. See Ṭabarī, I, 2796; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 192; II, 607; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 600; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 598; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 72, 98, 107; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 83, 120–23, 125; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 81, 136, 148–49, 186; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, I, 564–65; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 176–77; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 558–59.

779. This extremely ancient term, which is even found in the Old Testament (Gen. 10:26), continues to this day to denote the region of eastern Yemen. See EI[2], Supplement, s.v. Ḥaḍramawt.

780. Al-ʿAdawī al-Tamīmī, he was a confederate of the Nawfal b. ʿAbd Manāf of the Quraysh and embraced Islam at the conquest of Mecca in 8/630. He was first sent by Abū Bakr to collect the taxes of the district of Khawlān, which had revolted. (Some sources wrongly give Ḥulwān.) He governed Ṣanʿā' for a long time, 14–35/635–56. At the Battle of the Camel, he sided with ʿĀ'ishah, but he is said to have been killed at Ṣiffīn in 38/658 fighting for ʿAlī. However, this reversal might be apocryphal, as it is omitted by many early sources. See EI[1], s.v. Ṣanʿā'; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 67; II, 590; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 1012; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 107, 196; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 119, 123; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 136, 181, 186, 205, 210; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, III, 661–64; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 668–69.

781. The name of a Yemenī tribe which also denotes two districts, one southeast of Ṣanʿā', the other northwest of Ṣaʿdah. The former, called Khawlān al-ʿĀliyah, appears to be the one meant here. It seems to have contained the city of Dhimār. See EI[2], s.v. Khawlān; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, II, 56–57, 345–46; Ibn Khurdādhbih, Masālik, 137–38, 142, 148, 192, 248; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 407; V, 69 (Mikhlāf Dhī Jurrah wa Khawlān).

782. This is the still-extant town bearing the same name in the coastal plain of Yemen between Taʿizz and al-Ḥudaydah. See EI[1], s.v. Zabīd; Abū al-Fidā', Taqwīm, 88–89.

783. This is a wadi north of Zabīd. See EI[1], s.v. Zabīd.

784. Al-Khazrajī, he was one of the most famous of the Anṣār, becoming a Muslim before the hijrah and subsequently taking part in all the Prophet's battles, until the Prophet sent him to Yemen in 9/631. He died of the plague at al-Uqḥuwānah in the jund of al-Urdunn in 18/639 at the age of thirty-eight. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 190; II, 409; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 583–90; VII, 387–89; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 24, 72–73, 130; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 83–88, 165, 179, 186, 278; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, III, 355–61; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 136–41; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 426–27.

785. A district and town of Yemen which lay some 48 *farsakh*s (under 300 km.)

ʿAlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī[786] was in charge of al-Baḥrayn. He sent Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh to Najrān.[787] He also sent ʿAbdallāh b. Thawr, one of the Banū Ghawth,[788] to the district of Jurash.[789] He sent ʿIyāḍ b. Ghanm al-Fihrī to Dūmat al-Jandal. In Syria were Abū ʿUbaydah, Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah, Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān, and ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣī, each of whom was in command of a division, with Khālid b. al-Walīd in overall command of them.

Abū Jaʿfar: He was generous, lenient, and knowledgeable about the genealogies of the Arabs. Khufāf b. Nadbah[790] (Nadbah is his mother, his father being ʿUmayr b. al-Ḥārith) said in his eulogy of Abū Bakr:[791] south of Ṣanʿāʾ, just north of Taʿizz, between Dhimār and Zabīd. It was inhabited by groups of the Kindah and Maʿāfir. See Ibn Khurdādhbih, Masālik, 140, 143–44; Muqaddasī, Taqāsīm, 53, 70, 87, 90, 105, 113; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 169–70; Abū al-Fidāʾ, Taqwīm, 90–91.

---

786. The confederate of the Umayyads, he embraced Islam early and was appointed by the Prophet c. 8/629 to al-Baḥrayn. ʿUmar then made him governor of al-Baṣrah, but he died on his way there in 14/635, or, less probably, in 21/642. See Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 576, 600, 607; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, IV, 359–63; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 97–98, 107, 110–11, 113, 154; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 95–104, 108; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 84, 136, 147, 151, 156–57; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, III, 146–48; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 497–98.

787. A district in the south of Saudi Arabia in the mountains of ʿAsīr on the border with Yemen. In early Islamic times, it contained inhabitants from the Madhḥij, Hamdān, and Azd. See EI[1], s.v. Nadjrān.

788. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 286, shows that this ʿAbdallāh was mentioned only by Sayf, which means that this important report on the governorships of Yemen may be derived from Sayf rather than from al-Madāʾinī's authorities. ʿAbdallāh's equally unknown brother ʿUkkāshah is said to have been the Prophet's governor for the Sakūn and Sakāsik in Yemen, but according to Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 494, this also is only from Sayf. For Sayf's reports on them, see Ṭabarī, I, 1852–53, 1997–2000.

789. Near Najrān, between Bīshah and Ṣaʿdah in ʿAsīr. See Ibn Khurdādhbih, Masālik, 133, 135, 188, 248; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 126–27; Abū al-Fidāʾ, Taqwīm, 83, 94–95. However, it might make more sense to identify it with the present Baljurashī in Bilād Ghāmid, halfway between al-Ṭāʾif and the Yemenī border. This is because otherwise there is no governorate between al-Ṭāʾif and Najrān, and because Jurash is mentioned as belonging to Mecca rather than to Ṣanʿāʾ, which would seem to place it north of Najrān.

790. Al-Sulamī, his mother was an Abyssinian slave, and he was one of the four famous black Arabs (aghribat al-ʿArab). An opponent of al-ʿAbbās b. Mirdās al-Sulamī, he also fought the Ghaṭafānī tribes of Fazārah and Murrah before Islam. He is said to have been the standard-bearer of the Sulaym at the conquest of Mecca in 8/630 and to have participated in the Battle of Ḥunayn. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 122; II, 348; Mubarrad, Kāmil, I, 247; III, 226–27; Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, XVI, 139–46; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, I, 434–37; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 452–53.

791. The last two lines are cited in a variant version in Mubarrad, Kāmil, I, 247, along with two other completely different lines. Seven lines are cited in Suyūṭī, Khulafāʾ, 86, also including the last two here.

Munificent, the possessor of favor and the possessor of the reprehended,[792] sharer of benefit, whose courtyard is spacious,
To [his] praise, [there exists] in his house clearly visible a fine basin whose incoming source does not betray it.[793]
By God, there will not overtake his days either a barefoot possessor of a waist-wrapper or the possessor of a cloak.[794] Whoever tries to overtake his days will be striving alone[795] on a great plain.

Al-Ḥārith — Ibn Sa'd — 'Amr b. al-Haytham Abū Qaṭan[796] — al-Rabī'[797] — Ḥayyān al-Ṣā'igh:[798] The inscription of Abū Bakr's signet ring was, "How excellent a possessor of power God is!" [2137]

[Certain authorities]: Abū Quḥāfah did not live after Abū Bakr but for six months and some days. He died in al-Muḥarram 14 [25 February–26 March 635] at Mecca at the age of ninety-seven years.

[His Appointment of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb as His Successor]

During the illness of which he died, Abū Bakr arranged for 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb to succeed him in the caliphate. It is reported that, when he wished to make the arrangement for him to succeed, he called in 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf.

---

792. This refers perhaps to his power to inflict punishment.

793. The basin refers to his store of beneficence. The incoming source (iẓā') not betraying the basin means that his beneficence is endless and does not dry up. For this difficult verse, see Fayrūzābādī, Muḥīṭ, s.v. '-z-y.

794. That is, either the poor or the rich.

795. Text: al-shadd; read: al-shadhdh, as Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIII.

796. Al-Zabīdī, c. 121–98/739–814, he was a Baṣran traditionist of good reputation who transmitted from Abū Ḥanīfah. He was also considered a Qadarī. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 114–15.

797. Probably al-Rabī' b. Ṣubayḥ, the mawlā of the Tamīm, a Baṣran traditionist who died in Sind in 160/777. He had a mixed reputation. As he transmitted from al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, this could owe to Qadarī tendencies. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 277; Dhahabī, Mīzān, II, 41–42; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 247–48.

798. Abū Jabalah Ḥayyān b. 'Abdallāh al-Dārimī, he was a Baṣran traditionist who was considered unreliable, probably because of his Qadarī tendencies. He probably was a student of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī. See Dhahabī, Mīzān, I, 622–23; Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, II, 369.

Ibn Sa'd — al-Wāqidī — Ibn Abī Sabrah — 'Abd al-Majīd b. Suhayl[799] — Abū Salamah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān:[800] When death descended on Abū Bakr, he summoned 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf and said, "Inform me about 'Umar." 'Abd al-Raḥmān said, "O successor (khalīfah) of God's Messenger, he is, by God, a better man than your opinion of him. But there is a roughness in him." Abū Bakr said, "That is because he sees me as weak. If I entrust him with the affair, he will leave behind much of his present behavior. O Abū Muḥammad, I have done it in haste. It appears to me, if I get angry at the man for something, he shows me his concurrence about it, but if I ease up toward him, he shows me vehemence over it. Do not mention, O Abū Muḥammad, anything of what I have said to you." 'Abd al-Raḥmān said, "Of course."

Then Abū Bakr summoned 'Uthmān b. 'Affān and said, "O Abū 'Abdallāh, inform me about 'Umar." 'Uthmān responded, "You are better informed about him." Abū Bakr said, "Let me decide that, O Abū 'Abdallāh." 'Uthmān said, "O God, my knowledge about him is that what he does in private is better than what he shows openly, and that there is no one like him among us." Abū Bakr said, "May God have mercy on you, O Abū 'Abdallāh. Do not mention anything that I have mentioned to you." 'Uthmān said, "I will do [as you said]." Abū Bakr said to him, "If I abandoned him, I would not neglect you. I do not know whether he would give it up. The choice is [2138] his whether [or] not to take charge of anything of your affairs. I wish I had been free of [being in charge of] your affairs and that I had been among those who have passed on of your predecessors, O Abū 'Abdallāh. Do not by any means mention anything of what I have said to you about the matter of 'Umar nor about what I have summoned you for."

Ibn Ḥumayd — Yaḥyā b. Wāḍiḥ — Yūnus b. 'Amr — Abū al-Safar: Abū Bakr looked out over the people from his enclosure while

---

799. 'Abd al-Majīd b. Suhayl b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf al-Zuhrī al-Qurashī, the son of a concubine, he was a Medinan traditionist with a good reputation. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 272; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 380–81.

800. Al-Zuhrī al-Qurashī, he is the son of the great Companion 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf and Tumāḍir bt. al-Aṣbagh al-Kalbiyyah, the princess from Dūmat al-Jandal. He was in charge of justice and security at Medina 49–54/669–74. An important Medinan traditionist, he died in 93–94/712–13 at the age of seventy-two. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 20; II, 106; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 155–57; Zubayrī, Nasab, 267; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 276, 407; Waki', Quḍāh, I, 116–18; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 115–18.

Asmāʾ bt. ʿUmays was steadying him with tatooed hands. He said, "Will you be satisfied with him whom I have left as [my] successor over you? For, by God, I do not shun the effort [to reach] the best opinion, nor have I appointed a relative. I have designated ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb as my successor; therefore, hear him and obey." They responded, "We hear and obey."

ʿUthmān b. Yaḥyā[801] — ʿUthmān al-Qarqasānī[802] — Sufyān b. ʿUyaynah — Ismāʿīl — Qays: I saw ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb while he was sitting with the people, a piece of writing in his hand, and saying, "O people, hear and obey the speech of the successor of God's Messenger when he said, 'I have not ceased to admonish you.'" He had with him a mawlā of Abū Bakr named Shadīd[803] who had a piece of writing on which was the appointment of ʿUmar as successor.

Abū Jaʿfar — al-Wāqidī — Ibrāhīm b. Abī al-Naḍr[804] — Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ḥārith:[805] Abū Bakr summoned ʿUthmān to him in private and said to him, "Write, 'In the name of God, the all-Compassionate, the Merciful. This is what Abū Bakr b. Abī Quḥāfah has enjoined on the Muslims. Now then. . . .'" At this point, he fainted, losing consciousness. ʿUthmān wrote, "Now then, I have appointed ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb as my successor over you. I have not neglected [2139] the best among you." Then Abū Bakr awoke and said, "Read [it] to me." When he read [it] to him, Abū Bakr said, "God is Greater," and then went on, "I see that you were afraid that the people would quarrel if I died suddenly in my coma." ʿUthmān said, "Yes." Abū Bakr said, "May God reward you kindly for the sake of Islam and its people!" Abū Bakr confirmed [the text] from this place.

Yūnus b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā — Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Bukayr[806] — al-

---

801. Unidentified, not otherwise mentioned, and possibly confused with the identical next name.

802. He is Abū ʿAmr ʿUthmān b. Yaḥyā b. ʿĪsā al-Ṣayyād, d. 258/872. Although he died fifty-eight solar years after Ibn ʿUyaynah, he is reported to have transmitted from him. See Samʿānī, Ansāb, X, 384.

803. Unidentified and not mentioned elsewhere.

804. He is Ibrāhīm b. Sālim b. Abī Umayyah, nicknamed Bardān, the mawlā of ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Taymī of the Quraysh. He was a Medinan traditionist with a fair reputation. He lived c. 79–80/698–99 to 153–54/770–71. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 120–21.

805. Al-Taymī al-Qurashī. A Medinan traditionist who was considered trustworthy, he died in 119–21/737–39. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 21; II, 423; Zubayrī, Nasab, 295; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 524, Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 5–7.

806. The mawlā of the Makhzūm of the Quraysh, 154–231/771–845. He was an Egyptian traditionist with a mostly good reputation. He was best known as a major

Layth b. Sa'd[807] — 'Ulwān[808] — Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān — 'Umar b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf[809] — his father: He went in to Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq during his sickness of which he died and found him worried. 'Abd al-Raḥmān said to him, "You have arisen, praise be to God, cured." Abū Bakr said, "Do you think so?" He answered, "Yes." At this, Abū Bakr said:

> I have entrusted your affairs to him who I feel is the best of you. Each of you is inflamed with anger by that, for each wants the succession to be his instead. You have seen that the world has opened up. When it opens up, it continues to come on until you adopt curtains of silk and pillows of silk brocade, and are pained to lie on Adharī[810] wool as any one of you [now] is pained to sleep on thorns. By God, that any one of you be brought forth to have his head chopped off, for > [2140] [something] other than the penalty for a mortal sin, would be better for him than plunging into the depths of this life. You will be the first to lead people astray tomorrow, so that you will turn them from the way to the right and left. O guide of the way, it is either the light of dawn or evil![811]

I said to him,

---

transmitter of al-Layth's traditions. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 518 (bare mention); Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 796; Dhahabī, Mīzān, IV, 391; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XI, 237–38.

807. Al-Fahmī, he lived 94–175/713–92. He was one of the great traditionists of Egypt, enjoying an outstanding reputation. His family orginally were Iranians from Iṣfahān. His father was a mawlā of the Quraysh who enrolled in the Fahmī regiment of the army in Egypt. Al-Layth himself was born at the village of Qarqashandah, about 25 km. from al-Fusṭāṭ. He visited Iraq in 161/778. In 167/784 his prestige was so great that he when he complained to the caliph about the judge in Egypt, the latter was removed from office. See *EI*², s.v. al-Layth b. Sa'd; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 517; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 715; Wakī', Quḍāh, III, 223, 236; Kindī, Wulāh wa Quḍāh, 89–90, 128, 132, 134, 365–66, 371–73, 384; Dhahabī, Mīzān, IV, 423; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 459–65.

808. 'Ulwān b. Dāwūd, the mawlā of Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Bajalī, d. 180/796, he was a traditionist whose transmissions were rejected by later scholars. The variant name 'Ulwān b. Ṣāliḥ, which is given for him, owes to a confusion with that of Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān, who follows him in this isnād. See Dhahabī, Mīzān, III, 108–10 (where the report mentioned here is criticized); Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, IV, 188–90.

809. Al-Zuhrī al-Qurashī, he was a minor Medinan traditionist of the great Zuhrī family. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 20; II, 571; Zubayrī, Nasab, 271; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 473.

810. That is, of Adharbayjān. See note in Cairo ed.

811. Text: al-baḥr; read: al-bujr. See note in Cairo ed., which has corrected it to al-bajr; but see Fayrūzābādī, Muḥīṭ, s.v. b-j-r for correct vocalization.

Calm down, may God have mercy on you, for this will only cause you a relapse in your condition. Regarding your matter, the people are [divided] between only two men, either a man who has viewed [things] as you have and is thus with you, or else a man has opposed you and thus is your adviser and companion as you like. We have not known you to desire other than the good. You have not ceased to be a righteous man and one who sets matters aright. You do not grieve for anything from this world.

Abū Bakr said,

Indeed, I do not grieve for anything from this world, except for three [things] which I did that I wish I had left aside, three that I left aside which I wish I had done, and three about which I wish I had asked God's Messenger. As for the three that I wish I had left aside, I wish that I had not thrown open the house of Fāṭimah[812] to reveal something, even though they had locked it with hostile intent. I wish that I had not burned al-Fujā'ah al-Sulamī[813] and that I had quickly killed him or forbearingly let him go. I wish, on the day of Saqīfat Banī Sā'idah,[814] that I had thrown the matter upon the neck of one of the two men [meaning 'Umar and Abū 'Ubaydah] so that one of them would have become the Commander [of the Faithful] and I would have been his minister (wazīr). As for those I left aside, I wish that on the day I was brought al-Ash'ath b. Qays[815] as a prisoner I had cut off 812. The daughter of the Prophet, c. 604 C.E.–11/632. On her, see *EI*², s.v. Fāṭima. The story in question here seems to refer to the attempt to compel 'Alī and Fāṭimah to swear allegiance to Abū Bakr as caliph. What they are hiding here is not clear, however. See Ṭabarī, I, 1822, 1825–26; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 585–87.

813. He is Bujayrah b. Iyās b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd Yālīl, who was burned for treason. See Ṭabarī, I, 1903–5; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 122; II, 228–29; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 117, 123.

814. The meeting hall of the Banū Sā'idah in Medina, where Abū Bakr was acknowledged as caliph upon the death of the Prophet. On it, see Ṭabarī, I, 1817–25, 1837–45; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 656–60; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 615–17; Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, V, 8; Balādhurī, Ansāb, I, 579–84, 589; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 136–38. This enormously important event led to the establishment of the caliphate, with all the political and other consequences that entailed. Abū Bakr here is expressing scruples about the responsibility of government that he has borne.

815. Al-Kindī, he was an important prince in Ḥaḍramawt who embraced Islam in the Prophet's lifetime. After the latter's death, however, he rebelled and had to be sub-his head, for I imagine that he does not see any evil but that he helps it along. I also wish, when I sent Khālid b. al-Walīd to fight the people of apostasy, that I had stayed at Dhū al-Qaṣṣah,[816] so that if the Muslims had triumphed, they [2141] would have triumphed, but if they had been defeated, I would have been engaged or [provided] reinforcement. Furthermore, I wish, when I sent Khālid b. al-Walīd to Syria, that I had sent ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb to Iraq; thereby, I would have stretched forth both of my hands in God's path. (He stretched forth both his hands.) I also wish that I had asked God's Messenger with whom the government rests, so that no one would contend about it. I wish I had asked him whether the Anṣār have a share in the government. I wish I had asked him about the inheritance of the brother's daughter and the paternal aunt, for I have some doubts in my mind about the two of them.[817]

Yūnus — Yaḥyā: Then ʿUlwān came to us after the death of al-Layth. I asked him about this report. He transmitted it to me just as al-Layth had transmitted [it], letter by letter. He informed me that he himself had transmitted it to al-Layth b. Saʿd. I asked him about his father's name. He informed me he was ʿUlwān b. Dāwūd.

Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl al-Murādī[818] — ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣāliḥ al-dued by force. After he was forgiven, he fought in Syria, then went to Iraq, where he became prominent in al-Kūfah. His tepid support for ʿAlī in the first civil war often was cited as the cause of the latter's defeat. He died in 40–41/661–62, but left behind a great progeny that continued to have influence in al-Kūfah. *EI*², s.v. al-Ashʿath; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 236; II, 381 (under Maʿdīkarib b. Qais); Ibn Muzāḥim, Ṣiffīn, passim; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 22–23; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 228; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 51–52; Crone, Slaves, 110.

---

816. A place about 38 km. from Medina on the way to al-Rabadhah. From there Abū Bakr had dispatched his armies in all directions to fight against the Riddah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 366.

817. The rights of the brother's daughter or the paternal aunt to inherit are not dealt with in the relevant Qur'ānic verses, Qur'ān 4: 11–12, 176. This problem considerably exercised the minds of early Muslim legal specialists and is treated in various books of fiqh. A very detailed treatment can be found in Ibn Qudāmah, Mughnī, VI, 317–26, 329–35.

818. Possibly this is Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl b. Yūsuf al-Tirmidhī, who is specifically reported to have transmitted from ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣāliḥ al-Miṣrī. This is despite the fact that this Tirmidhī has al-Sulamī rather than al-Murādī for his tribal nisbah, according to the rijāl books. He is considered reliable and died in 280/893, so that he could have transmitted to al-Ṭabarī. See Dhahabī, Mīzān, III, 484; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 256; IX, 62–63.

Miṣrī[819] — al-Layth — ʿUlwān b. Ṣāliḥ[820] — Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān — Ḥumayd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf[821] — Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq: Then he reported a similar version. Ḥumayd did not say about it that he got it from his father.

Abū Jaʿfar: Before he became occupied with the affairs of the Muslims, Abū Bakr was a merchant. His dwelling was at al-Sunḥ,[822] then he moved to Medina.

Al-Ḥārith — Ibn Saʿd — Muḥammad b. ʿUmar — Abū Bakr b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Sabrah — Marwān [b. ʿUthmān] b.[823] Abī Saʿīd b. al-Muʿallā[824] — Saʿīd b. al-Musayyab; Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm[825] — his father — ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣabīḥah al-Taymī[826] — his father;[827] ʿUbaydallāh[828] b. ʿUmar[829] — Nāfiʿ[830] — Ibn ʿUmar; Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh — al-Zuhrī — ʿUrwah — ʿĀʾishah; Abū Qudāmah ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad — Abū Wajzah — his father; and another as well, who had transmitted to me some of it (the reports of certain of them are mixed with the reports of others): ʿĀʾishah said: [2142]

819. The mawlā of the Juhaynah, d. 222–23/837–38, he was the secretary of al-Layth b. Saʿd and was an Egyptian traditionist with a mixed reputation. Though he is said to have been born in 173/789; that is impossible, as it precedes his patron's death by only two years. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 518; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 787; Dhahabī, Mīzān, II, 440–45; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 256–61.

820. A mistake for b. Dāwūd.

821. Al-Zuhrī al-Qurashī, yet another of the great Medinan family of traditionists. He died in 95/714 or, less probably, 105/723, at the age of seventy-three. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 153–55; Zubayrī, Nasab, 266; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 489; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 45–46.

822. A district in Medina less than 2 km. south from the Prophet's house and city center. At that time, it contained the dwellings of the Ḥārith of the Khazraj. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 265; Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 152 (map), 167.

823. Text: ʿan; read: b., as Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIII.

824. Al-Khazrajī al-Anṣārī, he was a minor Medinan transmitter with a mixed reputation. See Dhahabī, Mīzān, IV, 92; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 95.

825. Al-Taymī al-Qurashī, died 151/768, he was a Medinan traditionist with a poor reputation. See Dhahabī, Mīzān, IV, 218–19; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 368–69.

826. Unidentified and appears only here in al-Ṭabarī.

827. Unidentified.

828. Text: ʿAbdallāh; read: ʿUbaydallāh, as Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIII.

829. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ b. ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb al-ʿAdawī al-Qurashī, he was one of the seven great jurists of Medina. He died in 147/764. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 362; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 651; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VII, 38–40.

830. The mawlā of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar, he is the most famous transmitter of Ibn ʿUmar's traditions and was considered the exemplar of the highest reliability by al-Bukhārī. He died in 117–20/735–38. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 412–15.

My father's dwelling was at al-Sunḥ with his wife Ḥabībah bt. Khārijah b. Zayd b. Abī Zuhayr of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. al-Khazraj. He had built himself a room from palm leaves. He did not add to that up to the time he moved to his dwelling in Medina. He continued to reside there at al-Sunḥ for six months after he had received the oath of allegiance. He would go by foot to Medina. Occasionally, he would ride on a horse he had, wearing a waist wrapper and a worn-out cloak. He would come to Medina to lead the people in public worship. When he finished the evening worship ('ishā'), he would return to his family at al-Sunḥ. When he was present, he would lead the people in their worship; when he was not present, 'Umar would lead them in it.

He would spend Friday morning at al-Sunḥ dyeing his head and his beard, then he would go forth according to the time of the Friday worship, in which he would lead the people. He was a man of commerce. He would go forth early every day to the market, where he would sell and buy. He had a flock of sheep that would go home to him. Sometimes, he would go forth with it himself; sometimes, it would be taken care of, so that it was pastured for him. He also would milk the sheep for the community. When he was rendered the oath of allegiance as caliph, a girl from the community said to him, "Now the ewes of our house will not be milked for us." Abū Bakr [2143] heard her and said, "On the contrary. By my life I will most definitely milk them for you. I certainly hope that what I have entered into will not turn me away from my previous habit." When he would milk for them, he sometimes would say to a girl from the community, "O girl, would you like me to tend [your sheep] for you, or to leave them to pasture by themselves?" Sometimes she would say, "Tend [them]"; other times she would say, "Leave [them]." Whichever of those she said, he would do.

He remained like that at al-Sunḥ for six months, then he came down to Medina to reside in it and look after his responsibilities. He said, "No, by God, trading will not set right the affairs of the people. Only my devoting myself exclusively to them and looking after their business will set them aright. My dependents must have what will make them prosper." Thus, he abandoned trade and expended of the Muslims' money enough to make him prosper and make his dependents prosper day by day.

He would also make the greater and the lesser pilgrimages. That which they had allocated for him every year was six thousand dirhams. When death came to him, he said, "Give back what we have of the Muslims' money, for I will not acquire anything of this property. My land which is in such-and-such a place is given to the Muslims as compensation for what I have acquired of their property." He transferred that to ʿUmar, along with milch camels, a slave who was a blade whetter, and velvet worth five dirhams. ʿUmar said, "He has caused troubles for those after him."

Abū Zayd — ʿAlī b. Muḥammad — those whom I have mentioned his transmitting from them: Abū Bakr said, "Figure out how much I have spent from the treasury since I was put in charge and settle it for me." They found it amounted to eighty thousand dirhams during his rule.

Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq — al-Zuhrī — al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad — Asmāʾ bt. ʿUmays: Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh went in to [see] Abū Bakr and said, "Have you made ʿUmar your successor [as ruler] over the people, even though you have seen the way the people are treated by him [even] when you are with him? How then will he [2144] be if he is alone with them, after you have met your Lord and He asks you about those you were responsible for?" Abū Bakr, who was lying down, said, "Sit me up," and they sat him up. He then answered Ṭalḥah, "Is it with God that you frighten me [or is it with God that you scare me]? When I meet God my Lord, and He questions me, I will say, 'I have left the best of your people as a successor in charge of your people.'"

Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq — Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān [b. ʿAbdallāh] b. al-Ḥuṣayn:[831] The like of that.

---

831. Al-Tamīmī, he is an unidentified transmitter cited in Ṭabarī, I, 1205, 1237, 1454, 2182, and here. He also appears in Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 99, 424. In all cases, he transmits to Ibn Isḥāq, sometimes from ʿUrwah, and thus is probably a Medinan.

The Events of the Year

I 3 (cont'd)

(MARCH 7, 634–FEBRUARY 24, 635)

Abū Jaʿfar: We have already mentioned the time of Abū Bakr's appointment of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb [as his successor] in the caliphate, as well as the time of Abū Bakr's death, and [said] that ʿUmar led the prayer over him, and that he was buried on the night of his death before the people arose. When ʿUmar arose on the morning after that night, the first thing he did and said was [as follows]:

Abū Kurayb — Abū Bakr b. ʿAyyāsh[832] — al-Aʿmash[833] — Jāmiʿ b. Shaddād[834] — his father:[835] When ʿUmar was made caliph, he climbed the pulpit to say, "I am going to say words to which you must say 'Amen.'"

---

832. The mawlā of Wāṣil b. Ḥayyān al-Aḥdab al-Asadī, 95–100/714–19 to 192–94/808–10, he was a Kūfan traditionist with a good reputation. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 386; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 34–37.

833. Abū Muḥammad Sulaymān b. Mihrān, the mawlā of the Kāhil of the Asad, 60–61/680–81 to 148/765, he was a famous Kūfan traditionist of Iranian origin. See EI², s.v. al-Aʿmash; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 342–44; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 222–26.

834. Al-Muḥāribī, died 118–28/736–46, he was a Kūfan traditionist of good reputation. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 318; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 572; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 56–57.

835. Unidentified.

The first speech that ʿUmar uttered when he was made caliph was [as follows]:

Abū al-Ṣāʾib[836]—Ibn Fuḍayl[837]—ʿIyāḍ[838]—Ḍirār[839]—Ḥuṣayn al-Murrī:[840] ʿUmar said, "The likeness of the Arabs is only to a camel led by the nose following its leader; therefore, let its leader look where he leads. As for me, by the Lord of the Kaʿbah, I will indeed bring them along on the road."

ʿUmar—ʿAlī—ʿĪsā b. Yazīd[841]—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān: The first letter written by ʿUmar when he took charge was to ʿAbū ʿUbaydah, putting him in charge of Khālid's army and [saying],

[2145] I admonish you to fear God, Who lasts while what is other than Him perishes, Who has guided us from losing our way and brought us forth from the darkness to the light. I have put you in charge of the army of Khālid b. al-Walīd. Therefore, take on their work, which is a responsibility for you. Do not advance the Muslims to destruction hoping for spoil,

---

836. Salm b. Janādah b. Khālid al-Suwāʾī of the Suwāʾah b. ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah, 174–254/790–868, he was a Kūfan traditionist of good reputation. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 128–29.

837. Muḥammad b. Fuḍayl b. Ghazwān, the mawlā of the Ḍabbah, d. 194/810, he was a Kūfan traditionist of good reputation who was a Shīʿī supporter and even considered to be an extreme Shīʿī. He was said to be of Greek descent. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 389; Dhahabī, Mīzān, IV, 9–10; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 405–6.

838. Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIII, suggests this name should be omitted, as it is in the isnād in Ṭabarī, I, 2735, but the name also could have dropped out of the latter isnād. The sixty-year gap in the death dates of the Ibn Fuḍayl and the Ḍirār in this isnād might suggest a necessary intermediate link. On the other hand, Ibn Ḥajar's biographies of Ibn Fuḍayl and Ḍirār both state that Ḍirār transmitted directly to Ibn Fuḍayl, and no suitable ʿIyāḍ can be identified who fits between them. See the preceding and following notes.

839. Abū Sinān Ḍirār b. Murrah al-Shaybānī, d. 132/750, he was a Kūfan traditionist with a good reputation. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 338; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 457.

840. Ṭabarī, Indices, 141, proposes that this may be al-Ḥuṣayn b. al-Ḥumām al-Murrī the poet, but this identification is doubtful, as this al-Ḥuṣayn seems to have barely survived into the Islamic era, for his son sought largesse from Muʿāwiyah. Such a person certainly would not have been able to transmit to Ḍirār b. Murrah, and it also is unlikely that he would be a source for ʿUmar's sayings. Thus, Ḥuṣayn al-Murrī here must remain unidentified. On the poet, see Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, XII, 123–29.

841. Al-Laythī, d. before 179/795, he was a Medinan transmitter of history, but his ḥadīth was rejected. Under al-Mahdī, he was accused of Qadarī tendencies. Later, he was brought by the Caliph al-Hādī to Baghdād, where he entertained that ruler and was lavishly rewarded. See Ṭabarī, III, 534, 565–66, 589–90, 592–93; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 36; II, 358; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 171; Dhahabī, Mīzān, III, 327–28; Ibn Ḥajar, Lisān, IV, 408–10.

nor make them camp in a place before you [first] scout it out for them and learn from where it might be attacked. Do not send out a raiding party except in a company of men. Do not by any means expose the Muslims to destruction. God has tested you through me and has tested me through you. Therefore, shut off your sight from this world and divert your heart from it. Do not at all let it destroy you as it destroyed those before you, whose deaths you have seen.

[The Expedition of Fiḥl[842] and the Conquest of Damascus]

ʿUmar—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—those whom I have mentioned their transmitting from them where I began the section on Abū Bakr: Shaddād b. Aws b. Thābit al-Anṣārī,[843] Maḥmiyah b. Jazʾ,[844] and Yarfaʾ[845] brought [the news of] Abū Bakr's death to Syria. They hid the news from the people until the Muslims had won, when they were at al-Yāqūṣah[846] fighting their Roman enemies. That was in Rajab [31 August–29 September 634]. They informed Abū ʿUbaydah about the death of Abū Bakr, his appointment to take charge of the war in Syria, and ʿUmar's subordinating the [other] commanders to him and removing Khālid b. al-Walīd.

---

842. Now Ṭabaqat Fiḥl in Jordan, it lies east of the Jordan River, about 12 km. southeast of Baysān. Fiḥl was the ancient Pella of the Dekapolis and had remained one of the more important towns in the area. Extensive ruins exist and are being excavated. See *EI*², s.v. Fiḥl. For the battle, see Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 104; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 189–95.

843. Al-Najjārī al-Khazrajī. The nephew of the Prophet's poet Ḥassān b. Thābit, he was a Companion of the Prophet, then went forth to participate in the conquest of Syria. In 41/662 or 58–59/678–79, he died at the age of seventy-five [or ninety-five] and was buried in Jerusalem, where his family remained prominent and where his tomb later became an object of veneration. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 186; II, 522; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 401; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 274; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 182; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, II, 135; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 54; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 139–40; Mujīr al-Dīn, al-Uns al-jalīl, II, 63.

844. Al-Zabīdī, the confederate of the Jumaḥ of the Quraysh, he was an early Muslim, migrated to Ethiopia, fought at Badr, and is doubtfully said to have participated in the conquest of Egypt. He often was responsible for dividing the booty. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 270; II, 383; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 410, 524, 697, 780; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 328; II, 361; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II, 64, 75, 133; IV, 59, 198–99, 261; VIII, 277; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, III, 495; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 388.

845. The mawlā of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and his chamberlain. See Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 158; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 672–73.

846. A variant of al-Wāqūṣah.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: When the Muslims had finished with Ajnādayn, they went on toward Fiḥl in the land of al-Urdunn, where the Roman rejectionists (rāfiḍah)[847] had gathered. The Muslims were under their commanders, Khālid b. al-Walīd being in charge of the army's vanguard. When the Romans had descended on Baysān,[848] they broke the dams of its streams so that they would [2146] overflow. Because it was a ground having a seasonal marsh, it became mud. After that, they encamped at Fiḥl, Baysān being between Palestine and al-Urdunn. When the Muslims swept over it, not knowing what the Romans had done, their horses became mired in the mud, so that they met with difficulty in it, but then God delivered them. Baysān was named "the place of thick mud" (dhāt al-radaghah) owing to what the Muslims encountered in it. Then they rushed upon the Romans, who were at Fiḥl. They fought, and the Romans were defeated. The Muslims entered Fiḥl, while the Roman rejectionists fled to Damascus. [The Battle of] Fiḥl was in Dhū al-Qaʿdah of the year 13 (27 December 634 – 25 January 635), six months into the caliphate of ʿUmar.

ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf led the people in that pilgrimage.

Then the Muslims went on to Damascus, Khālid b. al-Walīd being in charge of the vanguard of the troops. The Romans had gathered at Damascus under a man called Bāhān. ʿUmar had removed Khālid b. al-Walīd and appointed Abū ʿUbaydah to command all the troops. The Muslims and the Romans met in the environs of Damascus and fought a severe battle. Then God defeated the Romans, so that the Muslims made gains at their expense. The Romans went inside Damascus and shut its gates. The Muslims settled down before it, besieging it, until Damascus was conquered and its inhabitants payed the jizyah. Meanwhile, the letter had come to Abū ʿUbaydah appointing him and removing Khālid. Abū ʿUbaydah was too embarrassed to read the letter to Khālid until Damascus had been taken and the peace agreement made by Khālid, the document being written in his name. When Damascus made peace on terms, Bāhān, the Roman commander who had fought the Muslims, withdrew to Her-

847. That is, those who rejected paying the jizyah, preferring to fight.

848. An important town in Palestine, the ancient Skythopolis, the only one of the Dekapolis cities to be located west of the Jordan, it lay some 30 km. south of Lake Tiberias. Like Fiḥl, it remained one of the important towns of the region. See *EI*², s.v. Baysān.

akleios. The fall of Damascus was in the year 14 in Rajab (21 August – 19 September 635). Abū ʿUbaydah publicly revealed his appointment as commander and Khālid's dismissal when the Muslims had met, they and the Romans, at a town called ʿAyn Fiḥl between Palestine and al-Urdunn and fought a hard battle at it. Then [2147] the Romans withdrew to Damascus.

As for Sayf, according to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Abū ʿUthmān — Khālid and ʿUbādah: He mentions in his report that the post came to the Muslims from Medina with [the news of] the death of Abū Bakr and the appointment of Abū ʿUbaydah as commander while they were at al-Yarmūk, the fighting having started between them and the Romans. He told a different story of al-Yarmūk and Damascus from what Ibn Isḥāq told. I am going to mention some of what he has related about that.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad — Abū ʿUthmān — Abū Saʿīd: When ʿUmar took office, he was pleased to let Khālid b. Saʿīd and al-Walīd b. ʿUqbah enter Medina, although Abū Bakr had forbidden them [to do so] owing to the flight they had made. ʿUmar also sent them back to Syria, saying, "Let [word of your] sufficiency[849] reach me about you; I am putting you to the test. Join whichever of our commanders you like." They joined the troops, with whom they were tried and showed their adequacy.

The Report about Damascus According to Sayf

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Abū ʿUthmān — Khālid and ʿUbādah: When God had defeated the army of al-Yarmūk and the forces of al-Wāqūṣah had fallen to pieces, when the dividing of the spoils had been completed, the fifths sent off, and the delegations dispatched, Abū ʿUbaydah appointed Bashīr b. Kaʿb b. Ubayy al-Ḥimyarī as his [2148] deputy in charge of al-Yarmūk, so that he would not be taken unawares by a countermaneuver, nor would the Romans cut him off from reinforcements.[850] Abū ʿUbaydah went along until he came to al-Ṣuffar, wishing to pursue the defeated remnants and not knowing whether they were massing together or splitting up. The information came to him that they had recoiled to Fiḥl. The news also came to him that reinforcements had come to the forces at Damascus from Ḥimṣ. Because he did not know whether to start with Damascus or with Fiḥl in the country of al-Urdunn, he wrote to ʿUmar about that and waited for the answer, staying at al-Ṣuffar. When [news of] the victory of al-Yarmūk came to ʿUmar, he confirmed the commanders in the offices to which Abū Bakr had appointed them, except for what happened with ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣī and Khālid b. al-Walīd. He put Khālid under Abū ʿUbaydah's command and ordered ʿAmr to aid the people by bringing the warfare to Palestine and taking charge of the campaign in it.

849. Text: ʿanā'; read: ghanā', as Cairo ed. and Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIII.

850. Or, "supplies."

As for Ibn Isḥāq, he states regarding the subject of Khālid and ʿUmar's dismissal of him [the following].

Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq: ʿUmar dismissed Khālid only owing to words that Khālid had spoken — according to what they claim. ʿUmar did not cease being wroth with him and disliking his behavior during the whole time of Abū Bakr, owing to his battle with Ibn Nuwayrah and what he had done in fighting against him. When ʿUmar succeeded to the caliphate, the first words he spoke were [those of] Khālid's dismissal. He said, "He will never govern any province for me." ʿUmar wrote to Abū ʿUbaydah, "If Khālid admits that he is a liar, then he remains commander over what he has charge of. But if he does not admit that he is a liar, then you are commander of what he had charge of. Then pull his turban off his head and confiscate half of his property."

[2149] When Abū ʿUbaydah mentioned that to Khālid, he said, "Grant me a delay so that I may consult with my sister regarding my affair." Abū ʿUbaydah did so. Khālid went in to his sister Fāṭimah bt. al-Walīd,[851] who was the wife of al-Ḥārith b. Hishām, and mentioned that to her. She commented, "By God, ʿUmar does not like you at all. He only wants you to admit that you are a liar in order to remove you." At this, he kissed her head, saying, "You have spoken the truth, by God." Thus, Khālid continued as he had before, refusing to call himself a liar. Bilāl, the mawlā of Abū Bakr,[852] went to Abū ʿUbay-

851. She had embraced Islam in 8/630. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 261; Zubayrī, Nasab, 303, 322; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 385.

852. Bilāl b. Rabāḥ, the famous Ethiopian freedman of Abū Bakr, he is best known as the first muʾadhdhin in Islam. He was one of the early Muslims of the Meccan period. Later, he migrated to Syria, where he died at Dārayyā in 18/639 or 20–21/641–42. See *EI*², s.v. Bilāl b. Rabāḥ; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, passim; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 317–18, 506–7, 509, 588–89, 632, 682; II, 207, 336, 340, 413, 632; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 385–86; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, I, 141–44; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 165.

dah to ask, "What have you been commanded regarding Khālid?" Abū ʿUbaydah replied, "I have been commanded to pull of his turban and to divide his property with him." He then split his property with him until there remained only his two sandals [to be divided]. Abū ʿUbaydah said, "This one is useless without the other one." Khālid said, "Certainly. I am not one to disobey the Commander of the Faithful; therefore, do what seems appropriate to you." Thus, he took one sandal and gave him the other sandal. Then Khālid came to ʿUmar at Medina after his dismissal.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Muḥammad b. Isḥāq—Muḥammad b. ʿAmr[853] b. ʿAṭā'[854]—Sulaymān b. Yasār:[855] Whenever ʿUmar passed by Khālid, he would say, "O Khālid, bring forth the property of God from under your buttocks!" Khālid would say, "By God, I have no property." When ʿUmar persisted, Khālid said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, what is the value of what I have gained under your authority? Forty thousand dirhams." ʿUmar said, "I hereby take that from you for forty thousand dirhams." Khālid said, "It is yours." ʿUmar said, "I accept it." Khālid did not have property other than military equipment and slaves. An account of that was made, and its value reached eighty thousand dirhams. ʿUmar took half of that, giving him forty thousand dirhams. He took the money. ʿUmar was told, "O Commander of the Faithful, if only you would return [2150] Khālid's property to him." ʿUmar said, "I am only a trader for the Muslims. By God, I will never return it to him." ʿUmar felt that he had avenged himself on Khālid when he did that to him.

The continuation of the report of Sayf—Abū ʿUthmān—Khālid and ʿUbādah: When ʿUmar received the letter from Abū ʿUbaydah [asking] about how he should begin, he wrote to him:

> Now then, begin with Damascus and march against it, for it is the fortress of Syria and the capital of their kingdom. Divert the forces at Fiḥl with cavalry that will be before them at their throats, and [likewise divert] the forces of Palestine and Ḥimṣ. If God conquers Fiḥl before Damascus, then that is what we would like. If its conquest is delayed until God conquers Damascus, then put enough forces in Damascus to secure it and then leave it, going, you and the rest of the commanders, until you attack Fiḥl. If God grants you victory, then go away, you and Khālid, to Ḥimṣ. Leave behind Shuraḥbīl and ʿAmr, charging them with al-Urdunn and Palestine. The commander of each district and army is to be in charge of the troops until they exit from his province.

853. Text: ʿUmar; read: ʿAmr.

854. Al-ʿĀmirī al-Qurashī. It also is said, less probably, that he was a mawlā of the ʿĀmir. He was said to be a reputable transmitter. He died in Medina in 125/743 at the age of eighty-three. He is said to have been a Qadarī. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 425; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 546; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IX, 373–75.

855. The mawlā of Maymūnah al-Hilāliyyah, the Prophet's wife, he was one of the seven famous jurists of Medina. He lived 24–27/645–48 to 94–109/713–27. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 174–75; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 479, 499; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 228–30.

Abū ʿUbaydah sent off to Fiḥl ten commanders: Abū al-Aʿwar al-Sulamī, ʿAbd ʿAmr b. Yazīd b. ʿĀmir al-Ḥurashī,[856] ʿĀmir b. Ḥathmah,[857] ʿAmr b. Kulayb of the Yaḥṣub,[858] ʿUmārah b. al-Ṣaʿiq b. [2151] Kaʿb,[859] Ṣayfī b. ʿUlbah[860] b. Shāmil,[861] ʿAmr b. Ḥabīb b. ʿAmr,[862] Libdah b. ʿĀmir b. Khathʿamah,[863] Bishr b. ʿIṣmah,[864] and ʿUmārah b. Makhshī,[865] the troops' leader. With each man were five [subordinate] commanders. The leaders were made up of the Companions, so that they would not find anyone who would take that [post] away from them. They went from al-Ṣuffar until they encamped near Fiḥl. When the Romans saw that the troops were making for them, they unleashed the waters around Fiḥl, so that the ground became muddy and then thick with mud. The Muslims were perplexed by that. Eighty thousand horsemen were shut up in it by the Muslims. The 856. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf and only in this one place. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 430.

857. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf and only in this one place. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 249 (under b. Khaythamah).

858. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf and only in this one place. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 12.

859. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf and only in this one place.

860. Or, ʿUlyah.

861. Muʿāwiyah appointed him governor of Qinnasrīn, according to Ibn Muzāḥim, Ṣiffīn, 128. However, it is doubtful whether Qinnasrīn was separated from Ḥimṣ until late in Yazīd I's reign. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 156; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 197.

862. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf and only in this one place.

863. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf and only in this one place. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 325.

864. Al-Muzanī. A Companion of the Prophet, he was a Kūfan who joined Muʿāwiyah and fought for him at Ṣiffīn. See Ṭabarī, I, 3305–6; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 88; II, 227; Ibn Muzāḥim, Ṣiffīn, 269–70, 278; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, I, 147–48; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 153; Lisān, II, 26–27.

865. Text: Mukhashshiʰ; read: Makhshī, as on p. 91, above.

first besieged forces in Syria were the troops of Fiḥl, then the troops of Damascus.

Abū ʿUbaydah sent out Dhū al-Kalāʿ until he was [positioned] between Damascus and Ḥimṣ as a covering force. He also sent out ʿAlqamah b. Ḥakīm[866] and Masrūq, who were [positioned] between Damascus and Palestine. [Their] overall commander was Yazīd, who set out. Abū ʿUbaydah also departed from al-Marj. He sent Khālid b. al-Walīd forward. In command of his two wings were ʿAmr and Abū ʿUbaydah [himself]. ʿIyāḍ commanded the cavalry, and Shuraḥbīl was in charge of the infantry. They advanced on Damascus, whose defenders were commanded by Nasṭās b. Nasṭūrus.[867] They besieged the forces of Damascus, camping in its environs. Abū ʿUbaydah was in charge of one side, ʿAmr another, and Yazīd yet another.

Herakleios at that time was at Ḥimṣ, the city of Ḥimṣ being between him and them. The Muslims besieged the forces of Damascus for about seventy days, putting them under a hard siege, with [2152] marches, exchanges of fire, and ballistas, while the defenders held the city hoping for aid. Herakleios was near them, and they had asked him for reinforcements, although Dhū al-Kalāʿ was between the Muslims and Ḥimṣ, one night's journey from Damascus, as if he was heading for Ḥimṣ. The cavalry of Herakleios came to aid the forces of Damascus, but the cavalry that was with Dhū al-Kalāʿ caused them grief and distracted them from the [main] Muslim force, so that they drew back and encamped before him. Meanwhile, the forces in Damascus were still in the same condition. When the forces of Damascus were certain that the reinforcements would not reach them, they became cowardly, weak, and disheartened. On the other hand, the Muslims became more desirous of [conquering] them. Before that, the Muslims had viewed their campaigns as raids: if cold set in, the men went back.

The Pleiades settled [in the west][868] while the enemy were persisting [in resistance]. At that point, their hope was cut off, and they re-

866. Al-Firāsī al-Kinānī. He later settled at al-Ramlah in Palestine and supported Muʿāwiyah at Ṣiffīn. See Ṭabarī, I, 2399–2400, 2407, 2501, 3058; Ibn Muzāḥim, Ṣiffīn, 507; Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, II, 199; Donner, Conquests, 136, 139, 349.

867. Text: Nusṭūs; read: Nasṭūrus, as Cairo ed., but with first vowel changed from u to a. This man is mentioned only by Sayf.

868. Ar. saqaṭ al-najm. For this meaning, see Fayrūzābādī, Muḥīṭ, s.v. n-j-m. This yields a date of about Jumādā I 14/June–July 634 for the siege being at least started gretted having entered Damascus. A child was born to the patrikios who was in charge of the troops in Damascus. He held a celebration for it, so that the people ate and drank, neglecting their posts. None of the Muslims noticed that, except for what came from Khālid, for he did not sleep nor allow [his men] to sleep. Nothing of the affairs of the enemy was concealed from him; his spies were intelligent, and he was interested in what was around him. He had equipped himself with ropes in the form of ladders and lassoes.

When it was the evening of that day, he rushed forth with troops he had of those whom he had brought against the enemy. He led them at the start of his day, he and al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr, Madhʿūr b. ʿAdī, and those of his companions who were like him. They said, "When you hear our cry of 'God is Greater' on the wall, climb up to us and rush the gate." When he came to the gate that was near him, he and his advancing companions, they threw the ropes at the battlements. On their backs were waterskins on which they crossed their trench. When two lassoes of theirs were secured, al-Qaʿqāʿ and Madhʿūr [2153] climbed them. Then they did not leave any rope but that they secured it and the lassoes to the battlements. The place from which they stormed in was the most impregnable place around Damascus, as most of it was water, and it was the hardest to enter. They came all together for that, so that none of those who had joined Khālid remained but that he had climbed [the wall] or drawn near the gate, until, when they had sat upon the wall, he sent down almost all his companions and also went down himself, leaving behind a force to defend that spot for those ascending. He then ordered them to shout "God is Greater."

When those on top of the wall shouted, the Muslims rushed at the gate, while many men turned to the ropes, leaping onto them. Khālid reached the first of those before him and slew them. After that, he went down to the gate and killed the gatekeepers. The forces of the city were aroused and the rest of the people terrified. They took to their posts, not knowing what was the matter. The forces on and in progress. Such a date would appear to contradict Donner's conclusion about the "reconstruction" of Abū ʿUthmān transmitted by Sayf giving Shawwāl/November–December as the date of Damascus's fall after a siege of about seventy days, for that would be impossibly late. See Donner, Conquests, 137, 317 n. 224. Rather, the settling of the Pleiades in the west would seem to support the more usual dating of Rajab/August–September as the date of Damascus's fall, as given by Ibn Isḥāq below, p. 169, and al-Wāqidī in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 146.

---

each side were occupied with those before them. Khālid b. al-Walīd and those with him cut the locks on the gates with swords to open [them] for the Muslims. The entering Muslims advanced on the enemy until not a[n enemy] fighter remained of those at Khālid's gate that had not been killed. When Khālid had pressed the attack against those before him and obtained by force what he wanted from them, those who escaped retreated to the forces at the gates before the other Muslim commanders.

The Muslims had called on them to divide the city into halves, but they refused and banished [the offer]. Therefore the Muslims were simply astonished when the enemy openly professed to them [a desire] for peace. The Muslims responded favorably to them and accepted [it] from them. The enemy opened the gates for them, saying, "Enter, and protect us from the troops at that gate." Thus the forces before each gate entered under a peace agreement for what adjoined them, and Khālid entered into what adjoined him by force. Khālid and the [other] commanders met in the middle of the city; this one slaying indiscriminately and plundering, and this [other] in peace and seeking to quiet. They considered Khālid's section as if it was under a peace agreement, so that is was treated as territory taken [2154] peacefully.[869]

The peace agreement with Damascus was conditioned on the division of the money and the real estate, and [the payment of] a dīnār for each person. The Muslims divided the booty, Khālid's troops being treated on an equal footing with the troops of the rest of the commanders. Each household and those who remained in the peace agreement had to pay a jarīb [of grain] for every jarīb of land. What had belonged to the kings and those who went away with them was held in trust as the common property of the conquerors [fay'].[870]

---

869. Territory taken peacefully enjoyed far more rights than that taken by force. The implication here is that the Iraqis were cheated out of their rightful spoils in Syria. On the difference between territory taken peacefully and that taken by force, see Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 29; Hall, Termination of Hostilities, 3–4 and passim.

870. This means that the government did not allow the conquering troops to divide the land as booty among themselves and then scatter throughout the countryside as proprietors, which would have destroyed their cohesion and military effectiveness. Instead, the government held the land in trust and paid the troops only fixed stipends as their share of the income. This enabled the government to maintain control over the land and the troops, the latter being kept in the military cities (amṣār) where they could be mobilized quickly. See *EI*², s.v. Fay'; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 29–31, 43–44; Shaban, History, I, 46–50.

They gave a share to Dhū al-Kalāʿ and those with him, to Abū al-Aʿwar and those with him, and to Bashīr and those with him.

They also sent the good news to ʿUmar. ʿUmar's reply came to Abū ʿUbaydah, [saying,] "Send the Iraqi troops to Iraq, and command them to hurry to Saʿd b. Mālik." Thus, he put Hāshim b. ʿUtbah in command of the Iraqi troops, al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr in charge of the vanguard, and ʿAmr b. Mālik al-Zuhrī[871] and Ribʿī b. ʿĀmir[872] in charge of the two wings. After Damascus, they made the journey to Saʿd. Hāshim set out for Iraq with the Iraqi forces. The commanders set off toward Fiḥl. Hāshim's troops were ten thousand, except for those who had been lost, so that they made up their total from others who had not been of them [originally], among them Qays and al-Ashtar. ʿAlqamah and Masrūq set out for Jerusalem,[873] encamping on the way to it. At Damascus, a number of the leaders of the Yemenīs remained with Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān, including ʿAmr b. Shimr b. Ghaziyyah,[874] Sahm b. al-Musāfir b. Hazmah,[875] and Mushāfiʿ b. ʿAbdallāh b. Shāfiʿ.[876] After Damascus had been captured, Yazīd sent Ḍihyah b. Khalīfah al-Kalbī with cavalry to Tadmur and Abū al-Zahrāʾ al-Qushayrī[877]

871. ʿAmr b. Mālik b. ʿUtbah b. Nawfal b. Uhayb, a cousin Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, he later fought at Jalūlāʾ in 16/637. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 20; II, 179; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 325; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 82, has ʿAmr b. ʿUtbah b. Nawfal as his name.

872. Al-Usayyidī al-Tamīmī, he fought at al-Qādisiyyah and in Persia. See Ṭabarī, I, 2269–70, 2294, 2479, 2554, 2569, 2610, 2619, 2649, 2683–84; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 83; II, 486; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 503; Donner, Conquests, 195, 384, 392, 430–31.

873. Here called Īliyāʾ = Aelia Capitolina, the Latin name given to it by the Emperor Hadrian.

874. According to Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 115, he does not seem to have an existence outside of Sayf's traditions, unless he is to be identified with the ʿAmr b. Shimr present at Ṣiffīn in Ibn Muzāḥim, Ṣiffīn, passim. On the other hand, he could be a mistake for ʿAmr b. Ghaziyyah al-Khazrajī, although this latter is not described elsewhere as being in Syria. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 10.

875. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf and only in this one place. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 117.

876. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf and only in this one place.

877. A like-named person elsewhere is a direct informant of Sayf for events connected with Ḥimṣ, as befits his tribal nisbah. Because Sayf died after 170/786, this informant would either have to be a different person than the one mentioned in the text here, or else, more probably, Sayf has retrojected the name of his informant back to the early conquests. He also is mentioned as a poet celebrating the conquests, but with no indication as to his date. No Abū al-Zahrāʾ al-Qushayrī is known outside the transmissions of Sayf. See Ṭabarī, I, 2391, 2395–96, 2573; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 77, 81.

to al-Bathaniyyah[878] and Ḥawrān.[879] The inhabitants made peace agreements with both of them according to the peace agreement of Damascus. The two of them took charge of conquering the lands to which they were sent. [2155]

Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: The capture of Damascus occurred in the year 14 in Rajab (21 August–19 September 635). Also, the Battle of Fiḥl happened before [the capture of] Damascus, for only the rejectionists of Fiḥl went to Damascus, to which the Muslims pursued them. (He claims that) the Battle of Fiḥl occurred in the year 13, in Dhū al-Qaʿdah (27 December 634–25 January 635) of it.

Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: Thus.

As for al-Wāqidī, he claims that the capture of Damascus occurred in the year 14, as Ibn Isḥāq stated. He also claims that the Muslims' siege of it lasted six months. He further claims that the Battle of the Yarmūk happened in the year 15. He claims that Herakleios pulled back in this year after the Battle of the Yarmūk, in Shaʿbān (8 September–6 October 636), from Antioch to Constantinople, and that there was no battle after al-Yarmūk.

Abū Jaʿfar: I have previously noted what has been related from Sayf from those he transmitted from, that the Battle of al-Yarmūk fell in the year 13, that the post came to the Muslims at al-Yarmūk with [the news of] Abū Bakr's death on the very day on which, late in it, the Romans were defeated, and that ʿUmar commanded them, after they were finished with al-Yarmūk, to go to Damascus. He claims that Fiḥl was after Damascus and that there were battles after that between the Muslims and the Romans besides that [one], before Herakleios went away to Constantinople. I will relate them, God willing, in their [appropriate] places.

In this year, I mean the year 13, ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb dispatched Abū ʿUbayd b. Masʿūd al-Thaqafī to Iraq, where he perished, according to al-Wāqidī. [2156]

But according to Ibn Isḥāq: The Day of the Bridge, the Bridge of Abū ʿUbayd b. Masʿūd al-Thaqafī, occurred in the year 14.

---

878. Ancient Batanaea, it is a large district in the extreme south of modern Syria. Its capital was Adhriʿāt, now Darʿah. Al-Bathaniyyah lay mostly to the north of Adhriʿāt. See *EI*², s.v. al-Bathaniyya.

879. This today is taken to be the whole southern area of modern Syria from Damascus to the Jordanian border, but anciently the term was more restricted in usage, indicating mainly the region east and northeast of Adhriʿāt. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥawrān.

The Affair of Fiḥl According to Sayf

Abū Jaʿfar: At this point, we will relate the matter of Fiḥl, though the report that relates it contains the differences of opinion that I have mentioned regarding the conquests of the army of Syria. In fact, among the disagreeable aspects [of this study] is the occurrence of such a difference as the one I have noted about the date of this battle, [a difference that arose] because of the nearness [in time] of some of those [battles] to others. As for what Ibn Isḥāq has related about that and told its story, it has already been mentioned. But as for [Sayf, see as follows].

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū ʿUthmān Yazīd b. Asīd al-Ghassānī and Abū Ḥārithah al-ʿAbshamī: After the capture of Damascus, the army left Yazīd b. Abī Sufyān behind with cavalry in Damascus while they went on toward Fiḥl under the command of Shuraḥbīl b. Ḥasanah. He sent forth Khālid in command of his vanguard, Abū ʿUbaydah[880] and ʿAmr in charge of his two wings, Ḍirār b. al-Azwar in charge of the cavalry, and ʿIyāḍ in command of the infantry. They did not like going against Herakleios while eighty thousand [of the enemy] were behind them. They knew that those before Fiḥl were the shield of the Romans, who were looking to [2157] them, and that Syria would [surrender] peacefully after they [were defeated]. When they reached Abū al-Aʿwar, they sent him forward to Tiberias,[881] so that he besieged its forces, which then went to Fiḥl in al-Urdunn. When Abū al-Aʿwar had descended on the forces of Fiḥl, they withdrew to Baysān.

After this, Shuraḥbīl encamped at Fiḥl, while the Romans were at Baysān. Between them and the Muslims lay those waters and mires. They wrote to ʿUmar with the news while telling themselves to stay, for they did not want to depart from Fiḥl until the reply to their letter came back to them from ʿUmar. Nor could they advance against their enemy [from] where they were because of the mires that lay between them. The Arabs named that campaign Fiḥl, Dhāt al-Rada-

880. In this version, because they are in the district of al-Urdunn, which is Shuraḥbīl's province, Abū ʿUbaydah is demoted to a mere subordinate while Shuraḥbīl commands, perhaps reflecting local tradition.

881. Ar. Ṭabariyyah, it was founded and named in honor of the Roman emperor Tiberius. Since that time it has enjoyed a continuous existence. At the time of the conquest, it appears to have been the capital of the Roman province of Palaestina Secunda, on which the Islamic jund of al-Urdunn was based. See EI[1], s.v. Ṭabarīya.

ghah, and Baysān. The Muslims found in the countryside better than that which the polytheists enjoyed. Their supplies were continuous and their pasturage luxuriant, which made them negligent of the enemy. Saqallār b. Mikhrāq[882] commanded the enemy. Hoping that the Muslims would be caught unawares, they came against them, but the Muslims had not felt secure from [the possibility of] their attacking, which put them in a state of alert. Shuraḥbīl neither went to sleep for the night nor awoke in the morning except that he was in battle formation.

When the Romans made for the Muslims, they came on them unexpectedly and were not equal to them. At Fiḥl, the Romans fought the like of the hardest battle they had ever fought at night and at day until the [second] night. When the night brought darkness upon them, as they had lost their way, they were defeated while they were lost. Their chief, Saqallār b. Mikhrāq, was struck down. The one who was next to him [in command] among them was Nasṭūrus.[883] The Muslims won the best and most beneficial triumph. They then rode after the Romans, believing that the enemy had a direction and a hard, even ground [through which to escape]. But they found the Romans to be lost, not knowing what direction to take. Their defeat [2158] and their being lost delivered them to the mud, which they rode into. When the first of the Muslims caught up with them, they had become mired; thus, the Muslims bore down on them. No imploring hand restrained them as they ran them through with spears. This was the [real] defeat at Fiḥl: their deaths were in the heavy mud. Eighty thousand were struck down; none escaped except the [occasional] fugitive. God was acting for the Muslims even though they disliked it: they disliked the flooding, but it turned out to be a help to them against their enemy and an overwhelming burden[884] [on them] from God, so that they might increase in insight and earnest purpose. They divided among themselves the spoils that God had given to them. Abū ʿUbaydah went off with Khālid from Fiḥl to 882. He is the same as the eunuch Theodore the Sakellarios whom Theophanes, Chronicle, 37–38, makes the Roman commander at al-Yarmūk. See note 568, above. Only Sayf gives him a role at Fiḥl.

883. Mentioned only in this place, the name possibly is an abridgement of Nasṭās b. Nasṭūrus, found on p. 165, above.

884. Text: anāh; read: inā'ah, as suggested in the notes to the Leiden ed.

Ḥimṣ. They also took Samīr[885] b. Kaʿb[886] away with them and departed with Dhū al-Kalāʿ and those with him, leaving behind Shuraḥbīl and his forces.

Baysān

When Shuraḥbīl was finished with Fiḥl, he marched with his forces, including ʿAmr, against the forces at Baysān, descending on them while Abū al-Aʿwar and the commanders with him were besieging Tiberias. The news had reached the various regions of al-Urdunn about the [fate] Damascus had met and what Saqallār and the Romans had met at Fiḥl and in the heavy mud, as well as the march of Shuraḥbīl against them, along with ʿAmr, al-Ḥārith b. Hishām, and Suhayl b. ʿAmr, heading for Baysān. The Romans fortified themselves in every place. Shuraḥbīl led the troops against the forces at Baysān. They besieged them for some days, then the Romans came out against them. The Muslims fought them, killing those who had come out against them, and then made a peace agreement with the rest of the forces there. That was accepted according to the Damascus peace agreement.

Tiberias

[2159] When the news reached the people of Tiberias, they made a peace agreement with Abū al-Aʿwar on the condition that he take them to Shuraḥbīl. He did so, so that the Muslims made peace with them and the people of Baysān according to the Damascus peace agreement. By this they would share their dwellings in the cities and those surrounding areas belonging to them with the Muslims, leaving half to the latter whereas they would collect in the other half. A dīnār had to be paid for every person annually. For every jarīb of land a jarīb of wheat or barley had to be paid, whichever of those had been planted. There were [other] items in that [agreement], which they stipulated as conditions for peace. While the leaders and their horse settled in, as the peace terms for al-Urdunn were carried out, the re-

885. Text: Sumayr; read: Samīr, as the modern name. Although Sumayr is also conceivable, the simple form should be used where it is elsewhere attested.

886. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf and only in this one place. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 81.

inforcements scattered in the cities of al-Urdunn and its villages. A letter about the conquest was dispatched to ʿUmar.

Al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah and Abū ʿUbayd b. Masʿūd

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf b. ʿUmar—Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Sawād, Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam, and Ziyād b. Sarjis, according to their isnād: The first thing ʿUmar did was to summon the men with al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah al-Shaybānī to fight the Persians before the dawn worship on the night on which Abū Bakr died. Then, when he arose, the people rendered the oath of allegiance, whereupon he repeated his call to the men to fight Persia. The people came in succession to give the oath of allegiance. They finished in three days; every day, he would summon them, but no one would heed the call to go against Persia. The Persian front was among the most disliked and difficult of the warfronts for them, because of the strength of the Persians' sovereignty, their military force, their might, and their subjection of the nations.

When it was the fourth day, ʿUmar repeated his summons to the men to [go to] Iraq. The first to respond to the summons were Abū ʿUbayd b. Masʿūd and Saʿd b. ʿUbayd al-Anṣārī, the confederate of the Banū Fazārah,[887] who had fled on the Day of the Bridge. After that, [various] fronts were offered to him, but he refused [any] but Iraq, saying, "God, be He Exalted and Mighty, has counted [my] flight there against me, but it may be that He will bring me back to the attack in it." After this, the people came one after another [to volunteer]. [2160]

Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl b. Yūsuf—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad: Al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah spoke, saying, "O people, this front is not at all too great for you, for we have gone through the middle of the countryside of Persia and wrested the best two parts of the Sawād from them, dividing it equally with them and attaining [our goal] at their expense. Those who went before us took risks

887. Al-Awsī, he was famous for collecting the Qur'ān. He fought at Badr and was slain at al-Qādisiyyah. His relationship with the Fazārah is not mentioned in any other source, nor is his participation in the conquest of Syria. However, his son ʿUmayr later governed part of Syria for the caliph ʿUmar. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 178; II, 497; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 159; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 688; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 458; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 121; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 321; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 280–81; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 31; Donner, Conquests, 376, 401, 410.

against them, and it will have, God willing, what comes after it."[888] ʿUmar also stood up among the people to say,

> The Ḥijāz is not a home for you except for foraging; its inhabitants do not survive in it except by that. Where are the impulsive migrants for the sake of God's promise? Travel in the land that God has promised you in the Book to make you heirs to, for He has said, "That he may make it [Islam] triumph over all religion."[889] God is the One who grants victory to His religion, strengthens His helper, and commits to His people of the inheritances of the nations. Where are the righteous worshippers of God?

The first to answer the call was Abū ʿUbayd b. Masʿūd. Then the second was Saʿd b. ʿUbayd or Salīṭ b. Qays.[890] When that expedition had gathered, it was suggested to ʿUmar, "Put a man from among the early Muslims of the Muhājirūn and the Anṣār in command of them." ʿUmar answered,

> No, by God, I will not do so. God has exalted you only owing to your priority [in Islam] and your hastening against the enemy. But if you become fainthearted and dislike encountering [the enemy in battle], then those who preceded you in repelling [the enemy] and answered the summons are more deserving of the leadership. By God, I will not give command of you to anyone but the first of you to answer the summons.

[2161]

Thereupon, he called Abū ʿUbayd, Salīṭ, and Saʿd, saying [to the latter two], "As for the two of you, had you preceded him, I would have put you in charge and you would thereby have obtained what is yours by seniority." He made Abū ʿUbayd the commander of the army. He said to Abū ʿUbayd, "Listen to the Companions of the Prophet, making them partners in the matter. Do not launch an of-

---

888. That is, "This setback will, God willing, be followed by a victory." This may refer to the Muslim defeat at the Battle of the Bridge, or some other setback.

889. Qurʾān 9: 33; 48: 28; 61: 9.

890. Al-Najjārī al-Khazrajī, he fought at Badr and the Prophet's later battles. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 185; II, 508; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 24, 141, 163, 514, 700, 896; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 495, 704; II, 244; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 512; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 107; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 105, 307–8, 310; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 43–44; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 72; Donner, Conquests, 376–77 [wrongly calls him Salāṭ].

fensive campaign hastily until you have ascertained the facts and [see] it is war, for only a coolheaded man who knows opportunity and restraint will do well in war."

A man from the Anṣār: ʿUmar said to Abū ʿUbayd, "Nothing has kept me from making Salīṭ the commander except for his hastening to war, for whoever hastens to war is lost, unless with clear reason. By God, if not for his haste, I would have made him the commander, but only the coolheaded does well for war."

Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā — Shuʿayb b. Ibrāhīm — Sayf b. ʿUmar — al-Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī: Al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah came to Abū Bakr in the year 13. He sent him off with troops whom he summoned three times without anyone heeding his call until Abū ʿUbayd answered it, then Saʿd b. ʿUbayd. When he answered the call, Abū ʿUbayd said, "I am for it." Saʿd then said, "I am for it," because of a deed he had done. Salīṭ also spoke. It was suggested to ʿUmar, "Make their commander a man from among the Companions." ʿUmar replied, "The Companions excel [others] only in their hastening against the enemy and their fulfilling the responsibilities of those who are slow.[891] If a group did as they have done and found it too burdensome [to campaign], then those who heed the summons [to war], whether lightly or heavily armed, are more deserving of the command than they. By God, I am going to send out only the first to heed the call to be in charge of them." Thus, he put Abū ʿUbayd in command and gave him instructions for his army. [2162]

Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā — Shuʿayb b. Ibrāhīm — Sayf b. ʿUmar — Sahl — al-Qāsim; and al-Mubashshir — Sālim: The first expedition sent out by ʿUmar was the expedition of Abū ʿUbayd. Then he sent out Yaʿlā b. Umayyah to Yemen, commanding him to evacuate the people of Najrān, according to the instructions of the Prophet in his [last] illness regarding that, and according to the instructions of Abū Bakr regarding that in his [last] illness. He said:

> Come to them, do not tempt them away from their religion, then remove those among them who keep to their religion. But confirm the Muslims [in their residence]. Survey the land of each of them whom you remove, then offer them a choice of countries [to which to emigrate], informing them that we are removing them according to the injunction of God and His Messenger, "Two religions ought not to be left in the Arabian peninsula."[892] Therefore let them depart, whoever among them keeps to his religion. Then give them land equivalent to their land, in recognition of their right against ourselves and in fulfillment of [our] guarantee of security to them, according to what God has commanded regarding that, in exchange between them and their Yemenī and other neighbors for that which has gone to their neighbors in the countryside.

891. Text: abā; read: anā, as Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, CDLV, DCXIV.

Al-Namāriq[893]

Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Sahl and Mubashshir, according to their isnād; and Mujālid—al-Shaʿbī: Abū ʿUbayd went forth, having with him Saʿd b. ʿUbayd, Salīṭ b. Qays, one of the Banū ʿAdī b. al-Najjār, and al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah, one of the Banū Shaybān, then one of the Banū Hind.

[2163] Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mujālid and ʿAmr — Al-Shaʿbī and Abū Rawq: As often as the people would quarrel among themselves at al-Madā'in, Būrān bt. Kisrā[894] would act as an honest arbiter among them until they composed their differences. When al-Farrukhzādh b. al-Bindawān was slain and Rustam[895] came forward to kill Āzarmīdukht, she acted as an arbiter until she brought forth Yazdigird.[896] Abū ʿUbayd arrived when Būrān was the arbiter and Rustam was in charge of warfare. Būrān had presented the Prophet 892. A very similar, though not identical, text of this ḥadīth is reported in Mālik, Muwaṭṭaʾ, 556. Variants of the same idea are found in Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, IV, 120–21; IX, 26, and Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, II, 15, 87. See also Wensinck, Handbook, 118 (under Jews).

893. A place near al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 304.

894. Or, Būrāndukht. She was queen of Persia after the overthrow of the usurper Shahrbarāz, c. 629–30 C.E. As she actually preceded her sister Azarmīdukht, her mention here is out of place. See Ṭabarī, I, 1039, 1061, 1063–64; Christensen, L'Iran, 492; Frye, History, 337, 361.

895. He was an army commander who became the real ruler on deposing Azarmīdukht in 632 C.E. He presided over the Sāsānian disintegration and was killed at al-Qādisiyyah in 16/637. See Christensen, L'Iran, 493–94, 496.

896. This is Yazdigird III, the last Sāsānian monarch of Iran. He was quite young at his accession to the throne. He reigned 632–51 C.E., when he was killed outside of Marw after losing the last corner of his empire. See Christensen, L'Iran, 493–503; Frye, History, 337–38, 361.

with a gift that he accepted. She was an opponent of Shīrā for a year, then she followed him, and they came together on the condition that he would be the chief but would make her arbiter.

Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād, according to their isnād: When Siyāwukhsh killed Farrukhzādh b. al-Bindawān and Āzarmīdukht became queen, the Persians disputed among themselves and were diverted from the Muslims, during the whole absence of al-Muthannā, until he came back from Medina. Būrān sent the news to Rustam and urged him to set out. He was in charge of the Khurāsān frontier and advanced until he stopped at al-Madāʾin. He defeated every army of Āzarmīdukht that he met. Then they fought at al-Madāʾin, where Siyāwukhsh was defeated and besieged, and Āzarmīdukht was besieged as well. Then Rustam captured it, killing Siyāwukhsh, putting out the eye of Āzarmīdukht, and establishing Būrān.

She invited him to manage the affairs of the Persians, whose weakness and decline she complained about to him, on condition that she would entrust him with the rule for ten years, then sovereignty would belong to the family of Kisrā, if they found any of their male offspring, and if not, then to their women. Rustam said, "As for me, I hear and obey, seeking neither recompense nor reward. If you honor me by doing something for me, you are the masters of what you do. I am naught but your arrow and the willing [instrument] of your hands." Būrān replied, "Come to me in the morning." When he came to her in the morning, she summoned the governors (marāzibah) of Persia and wrote for him, "You are in charge of the armed forces of Persia. There is no one above you save God, be He Mighty and Majestic, according to our pleasure and in submission to your judgment. Your judgment is applicable to them as long as it leads to the protection of their land and their being united rather than divided." At this, she crowned him and commanded the Persians to hear and obey him. Persia submitted to him after the coming of Abū ʿUbayd. [2164]

The first thing that ʿUmar did the night of the death of Abū Bakr was to announce [extraordinary] congregational worship, then summon the men [for service], but they dispersed without anyone responding. Then he summoned them on the fourth day, and Abū ʿUbayd was the first of the men to respond favorably on the fourth day. After that, the men followed in succession. ʿUmar selected a thousand men from the inhabitants of Medina and its environs and made Abū ʿUbayd their commander. It was suggested to ʿUmar that he put one of the Companions of the Prophet in charge of them, but he said, "No, by God, O Companions of the Prophet, I will not summon you [for service], so that you may rely on others who heed the call to do it, while I put you in command of them. You are preferred only owing to your hastening to [serve in] a like case, but if you rely on others, then they surpass you. Rather, I am going to make the first of you who heeds the call your commander." He then hurried al-Mu-[2165] thannā on his way, saying, "Go on ahead until your troops arrive."

The first thing ʿUmar did in his caliphate along with his receiving the oath of allegiance was to dispatch Abū ʿUbayd, then to dispatch the people of Najrān, then to call on the people who had apostatized [to serve]. These last came in haste from every direction. ʿUmar threw them into Syria and Iraq. He also wrote to the forces at al-Yarmūk, "Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ is in charge of you." He wrote to Abū ʿUbaydah, "You are in command of the men. If God grants you victory, send away the forces of Iraq to Iraq, along with whoever would like [to go] among your reinforcements, for they [latterly] joined you." The first victory [news of] which came to him was al-Yarmūk, twenty days after the death of Abū Bakr. Among the reinforcements to al-Yarmūk in the time of ʿUmar was Qays b. Hubayrah,[897] who returned with the forces of Iraq, although he was not of them, having only gone forth to campaign when ʿUmar allowed former apostates to campaign.

Meanwhile, Persia's attention was diverted from the Muslims by the death of Shahrbarāz. Shāh-i Zanān[898] held the sovereign power until they agreed on Sābūr b. Shahrbarāz b. Ardashīr b. Shahriyār. But then Āzarmīdukht rebelled against him, killing him and al-Farrukhzādh, and became queen, while Rustam b. al-Farrukhzādh was

---

897. Al-Murādī, he is also known as Qays b. al-Makshūḥ and said really to have been a Bajalī who was a confederate of the Murād. He was a very important tribal leader who participated in the Riddah but later gained the distinction of fighting both in Syria and in Iraq. Probably the Qays b. al-Makshūḥ al-Bajalī who was killed fighting for ʿAlī at Ṣiffīn was the same man, whose nisbah has become confused. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 223, 271; II, 459, 461; Ibn Muzāḥim, Ṣiffīn, 258–59; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 583; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 99, 120; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 126–27, 160, 314–15, 317, 320; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 414; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, III, 244–47; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 260, 274–75; Donner, Conquests, 119, 207, 211, 262–63, 339 nn. 193–94, 363, 394–95, 409, 433.

898. This title, which appears to mean "ruler of women," must refer to Queen Būrāndukht.

in Khurāsān in charge of its frontier. The news came to him from Būrān.

Al-Muthannā arrived in al-Ḥīrah with ten [men]. Abū ʿUbayd caught up with him after a month. Al-Muthannā stayed in al-Ḥīrah for fifteen nights. Rustam wrote to the *dihqān*s of al-Sawād that they rebel against the Muslims. He insinuated into every district [rustāq] a man to stir up its inhabitants. Thus he sent Jābān to al-Bihqubādh al-Asfal, and he sent Narsī[899] to Kaskar. He also appointed a day for them and sent troops to strike at al-Muthannā. When [news of] that reached him, al-Muthannā drew back his forward posts to himself and put himself on his guard. Acting with [2166] haste, Jābān, who was staying at al-Namāriq, rebelled. As the districts rebelled one after another, Narsī, who was staying at Zandaward,[900] also revolted. The inhabitants of the districts from the uppermost Euphrates to its lowest part rebelled. Al-Muthannā went forth with a force until he stopped at Khaffān, so that he might not be approached from the rear by something he would dislike. He remained there until Abū ʿUbayd came to him.

Abū ʿUbayd was then in command of the troops. He stayed at Khaffān for some days so that his men could recuperate. Meanwhile, many men had joined Jābān. Abū ʿUbayd went forth after the men had massed with their backing. He set them in battle formation, putting al-Muthannā in charge of the cavalry, Wāliq b. Jaydārah[901] in charge of his right flank, and ʿAmr b. al-Haytham b. al-Ṣalt b. Ḥabīb al-Sulamī[902] in charge of his left flank. Jābān's two wings were com-

899. He is supposed to be the son of Khusraw II's maternal aunt, which would make him a relation of the discredited Bisṭām family that led the revolt of 591–601 C.E., but this connection of his with the royal family is found only in Sayf's report here. On him and his alleged family connections, see Morony, Iraq, 185–86. Although his existence is guaranteed by Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 318, 560, and Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 176, both of which report his son Bisṭām b. Narsī, he is still alive only in Sayf's version. Probably Narsī and his alleged royal connection are a fictional reconstruction of Sayf.

900. A district and town of south central Iraq. According to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 154, and Donner, Conquests, 158–59, it lay near Kaskar, and the city of Wāsiṭ was built from it, but Morony, Iraq, 157–58, places it between Kaskar and Hurmuzjird in the district of Bihqubādh.

901. Apparently mentioned only by Sayf. The name is very strange, as neither of its components seems to be found elsewhere either. See Donner, Conquests, 378.

902. He is mentioned only by Sayf and in this one place. This ʿAmr is apparently meant to be the brother of Qays b. al-Haytham b. Qays b. al-Ṣalt b. Ḥabīb al-Sulamī, an early governor of Khurāsān from a preeminent family of al-Baṣrah. As this Qays died after 64/684, it is unlikely that he could have had a brother in the early conquests. Therefore, ʿAmr here may be another of Sayf's embellishments. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 123; II, 459; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 22.

manded by Jushnas Māh[903] and Mardānshāh.[904] The Muslims descended on Jābān at al-Namāriq. The two sides fought a hard battle. God defeated the Persians. Jābān was captured by Maṭar b. Fiḍḍah al-Taymī,[905] and Mardānshāh was captured by Aktal b. Shammākh al-ʿUklī.[906] As for Aktal, he beheaded Mardānshāh, but as for Maṭar [2167] b. Fiḍḍah, Jābān tricked him so that he escaped from him, by [paying] something so that he let him go. But the Muslims took him and brought him to Abū ʿUbayd, telling him Jābān was the king (malik)[907] and advising him to kill him. He replied, "I am afraid to kill him when a Muslim man has guaranteed his safety. The Muslims in their mutual affection and support are like a body: what applies to a part of them applies to them all."[908] They said, "But he is the king." He replied, "Even if he is, I will not act treacherously." Therefore, they let him go.

Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Ṣalt b. Bahrām[909] — Abū ʿImrān al-Juʿfī:[910] Persia gave Rustam command of her armed forces for ten years. It also gave him the sovereign power.[911] He was an astrologer who understood the stars. When someone asked him,

---

903. That is, the Gushnasp (Stallion) of Media = al-Jibāl. He occurs only in one other place, in Ṭabarī, I, 2253, also in a report from Sayf, except that, as Jushnasmā, he also is attested as the father of Anūshajān and the brother of Narsī in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 418. Because only Sayf gives him a role in the conquest period, and because his son's activity is attested in al-Balādhurī, he may already have been dead, so that his appearance here at this late date is perhaps apocryphal. See also Morony, Iraq, 186 n. 27.

904. This Mardānshāh is found only in the reports of Sayf in this volume, as he is killed here. He is confused with another Mardānshāh, called Dhū al-Ḥājib, however. See Ṭabarī, Indices, 540; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 308, 314, 372.

905. He seems later to have fought at al-Qādisiyyah, though he is not attested in the best early sources. See Donner, Conquests, 378, 383, 398.

906. He allegedly was cited by the caliph ʿAlī as an example of correct Arabic. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Gamharat, I, 86; II, 151; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, I, 123; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 110.

907. This title normally means "king," but in some of Sayf's reports here, it seems rather to have the sense of "general."

908. This closely parallels a famous canonical ḥadīth. See Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, II, 431–32.

909. Abū Hāshim al-Taymī, he was a minor Kūfan traditionist who had a generally good reputation although he was considered one of the Murjiʾah. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 354; Dhahabī, Mīzān, II, 317; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 432–33.

910. Unidentified.

911. Or, "made him king," but none of the sources suggest that Rustam himself was actually king. See note 907.

"What has called you to this task when you see what you see?" he replied, "Greed and the love of honor." He corresponded with the inhabitants of al-Sawād and insinuated among them leaders, who led them in rebellion against the Muslims, after he had promised them that the commander in charge of them would be the first one who rebelled. Thus, when Jābān rebelled in Furāt Bādaqlā, the people revolted after him. The Muslims fell back upon al-Muthannā at al-Ḥīrah, whence he headed for Khaffān. He remained at Khaffān until Abū ʿUbayd, who was the commander of al-Muthannā and the others, came to him, while Jābān encamped at al-Namāriq. Abū ʿUbayd set out toward him from Khaffān. The armies met at al-Namāriq, and God defeated the Persians, the Muslims getting from them what they wanted.

Maṭar b. Fiḍḍah, who was attributed to his mother [in his filiation], and Ubayy,[912] on seeing a man who was wearing ornaments, attacked him and took him captive. They found him to be an old man. Ubayy considered him to be worth little, but Maṭar desired his ransom. Thus they agreed that the spoils of his equipment should belong to Ubayy, but the capture of his person belonged to Maṭar. When Maṭar had possession of him free and clear, he said [to Maṭar], "You, O Arabs, are a people of good faith. Will you not guarantee my safety, and I will give you two beardless, nimble boys for your deed, [2168] as well as such-and-such." Maṭar answered, "Yes." The Persian went on, "Bring me into the presence of your king so that he may witness to that." He did so, bringing him before Abū ʿUbayd, and it was done for him in that way, Abū ʿUbayd confirming [it]. Then Ubayy stood up among men from the Rabīʿah. As for Ubayy, he said, "I captured him! He is without a guarantee of safe-conduct." As for the others, they recognized him and said, "This is the king, Jābān. It is he who has met us with this army." Abū ʿUbayd responded, "What do you think I should do, O men of Rabīʿah? Should your compatriot guarantee his safety and then I kill him? I take refuge with God from that."

Abū ʿUbayd divided the spoils, among which was much perfume. After handing out the booty, he sent the fifths off with the man who had divided the portions.

912. Unidentified.

Al-Saqāṭiyyah[913] in Kaskar

Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā — Shuʿayb b. Ibrāhīm — Sayf b. ʿUmar — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād — Abū ʿUbayd:[914] When they were defeated, they took the way to Kaskar to take refuge with Narsī — Narsī was the son of Kisrā's maternal aunt, and Kaskar was an estate of his. Al-Nirsiyān[915] was also his. He would protect it: neither did humanity eat [of] it, nor did anyone plant it besides them or the king of Persia, except for those whom they honored with something from it. That among their acts was remembered among the people, for this property of theirs was a protected reserve (ḥimā). Rustam and Būrān said to him, "Go off to your estate to protect it from your enemy and our enemy. Be a man." — Thus when the Persians were defeated on the Day of al-Namāriq and the defeated remnants were headed toward Narsī, who was in his camp, Abū ʿUbayd called for breaking camp, saying to the light horse[men], "Pursue them so that you make them [2169] enter Narsī's camp or else annihilate them in the land from al-Namāriq to Bāriq[916] to Durtā."[917] ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr said regarding that:

By my life, and my life is not easy for me [to offer], the folk of al-Namāriq were indeed greeted in the morning with humiliation
At the hands of men who migrated in their Lord's direction, searching for them between Durtā and Bāriq.

---

913. An unindentified place supposed to be in the district of Kaskar. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 226; Donner, Conquests, 192, 334 n. 127.

914. This reference to Abū ʿUbayd in the isnād would appear misplaced, but Sayf sometimes does trace his traditions back to eyewitnesses without an intervening link.

915. An estate in the district of Kaskar. See Morony, Iraq, 186.

916. A watering place in Iraq described roughly in Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 319, as between al-Qādisiyyah and al-Baṣrah, but belonging to al-Kūfah. Therefore, it was on the desert road between al-Qādisiyyah and al-Baṣrah, nearer to the former. See Musil, Middle Euphrates, 359–60.

917. A place near Qaṭrabbul by Baghdād. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 449. From Bāriq to Durtā thus means from west of the Euphrates up to the Tigris, hence, across all Mesopotamia. Because Durtā lies far to the north of Bāriq, however, it is somewhat odd that it is referred to even metaphorically regarding a campaign fought in the Kaskar district to the southeast. Probably the following lines of poetry did not originally refer to this campaign.

We slew them in what is between Marj Musalliḥ[918] and al-Hawāfī[919] on the road of al-Badhāriq.[920]

Abū ʿUbayd went along after leaving al-Namāriq until he descended on Narsī in Kaskar. At that time, Narsī was in the lowest part of Kaskar. Al-Muthannā was in the battle formation with which he fought Jābān. Narsī's two flanks were commanded by the two sons of his maternal uncle, who were the two sons of the uncle of Kisrā, Bindūyah[921] and Tīrūyah,[922] the two sons of Bisṭām.[923] The people of Bārūsmā, Nahr Jawbar,[924] and al-Zawābī[925] were with Narsī, having joined his army. When the news of Jābān's defeat came to Būrān and Rustam, they sent a messenger to al-Jālinūs.[926] [News of] that reached Narsī and the people of Kaskar, Bārūsmā, Nahr Jawbar, and al-Zāb,[927] who hoped that he would get to them before the battle.

But Abū ʿUbayd rushed them, so that they met below Kaskar at a place called al-Saqāṭiyyah, where they fought a fierce battle in barren

---

918. Its location is unknown and it appears not to be mentioned except here. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 129, where these lines are also cited.

919. Another place whose location is unknown and appears cited only in these lines. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 419.

920. No reference to this place appears to exist elsewhere.

921. Text: Bindawayh; read: Bindūyah, to approximate the reconstructed Middle Persian pronunciation.

922. Text: Tīrawayh; read: Tīrūyah.

923. Bisṭām's sister was Khusraw II's mother, so that these persons, Narsī, Bindūyah, and Tīrūyah, are alleged by the passage to be connected with the Sāsānian house. But as this Bisṭām fought against Khusraw II for ten years (c. 591–601 C.E.) in a devastating civil war for the Persian crown, it is not likely that any of Bisṭām's relatives would enjoy later prominence, least of all his own sons, especially as there is no mention of this family after c. 601 C.E. except in the reports of Sayf b. ʿUmar. Probably this is another instance of Sayf adorning his reports with claimed descendants of defunct pre-Islamic noble houses. See Ṭabarī, I, 993–94, 996; Sebeos, History, 60–61, 63, 65–66; Theophylact, History, 153 n. 77, etc.; Christensen, L'Iran, 439–41.

924. A subdistrict of Veh-Artakhshatr along the Nahr Malik and Kūthā canals between al-Madāʾin and Bihqubādh. Nahr Jawbar probably lay below the Kūthā canal. See Le Strange, Lands, 80, map II; Donner, Conquests, 163; Morony, Iraq, 127, 144.

925. The Zāb canal system parallel to the Tigris below Baghdād and also below Nahr Jawbar. See Le Strange, Lands, 37–38, 73, 80, map II; Morony, Iraq, 127, 146.

926. A general with a Greek name, probably indicating a Christian, but not necessarily a Greek, background, who was killed at al-Qādisiyyah. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 109, 119, 121; Morony, Iraq, 187.

927. The same as al-Zawābī.

deserts. Then God defeated Persia. Narsī fled, losing his camp and land. Abū ʿUbayd devastated what was around their camp in Kaskar [2170] and gathered up the spoils. He saw a great amount of foodstuffs; therefore, he sent a messenger among those Arabs who were near him so that they might carry away what they wished. Thus the storerooms of Narsī were taken. They were not happier with anything that was stored up than they were with what was at al-Nirsiyān, for Narsī had kept it [for his own use], and their kings had helped him in it as well. Thus they divided it up and began to feed the peasants from it. They sent the fifth to ʿUmar, writing to him, "God has fed us with food that the Kisrās kept as their private stock. We wanted you to see it, in order that you may remember God's blessing and his favor."

Abū ʿUbayd remained fixed, but he sent al-Muthannā away to Bārūsmā, while sending Wāliq to al-Zawābī and ʿĀṣim to Nahr Jawbar.[928] They defeated those who had massed and ravaged [the land], taking captives as well. Among that which al-Muthannā ravaged and took captives [from] was the people of Zandaward and Basrīsā.[929] Abū Zaʿbal[930] was among the captives of Zandaward. That army fled to al-Jālinūs. Among those whom ʿĀṣim took captive were the inhabitants of Bītīq[931] in Nahr Jawbar. Among those whom Wāliq took captive was Abū al-Ṣalt.[932] Farrūkh and Farwandādh[933] went forth to al-Muthannā, seeking [to pay] the jizyah and a guarantee of protection for their land, and he brought them to Abū ʿUbayd. One of them was [from] Bārūsmā and the other Nahr Jawbar. They paid him four [dirhams] for each person, Farrūkh for Bārūsmā, Farwandādh for Nahr Jawbar, and likewise al-Zawābī and Kaskar. We guaranteed [the safety of] their men to them on condition that they hurried [pay-

928. This last expedition is specifically confirmed by Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 108–9, in a report from Ibn Isḥāq that must have been already in circulation before Sayf's work. But he says it was ʿAmr b. Zayd al-Khayl who took al-Zawābī.

929. Possibility a corruption of Basūsiyā. See pp. 198, 204, below and Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIV.

930. Unidentified and mentioned only here by Sayf. Donner, Conquests, 379, incorrectly states that he took captives at Zandaward.

931. Unidentified and mentioned only here by Sayf.

932. Although Ṭabarī, Indices, 288, claims he is the father of the al-Ṣalt b. Bahrām mentioned on p. 180, above, such an identification is chronologically implausible. Otherwise, he is an unknown person.

933. These two persons are mentioned only here by Sayf. See Morony, Iraq, 108, 148, 200.

ment]. They did so and thus were at peace [with the Muslims]. Farrūkh and Farwandādh brought Abū ʿUbayd a vessel containing the varieties of the foods of Persia, including [sundry] dishes, sweets [2171] made from dates, cream, and starch, and other things. They said, "This is hospitality with which we are honoring you and a meal for you." He asked, "Have you also offered hospitality to the troops and given them a meal like it?" They replied, "It would not be easy, but we will do it." They were waiting only for them to face the arrival of al-Jālinūs and what he would do. Therefore Abū ʿUbayd said, "We do not need that which the troops cannot do," and returned it. Abū ʿUbayd then went forth until he stopped at Bārūsmā, where [the news of] the march of al-Jālinūs reached him.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Naḍr b. al-Sarī al-Ḍabbī:[934] Al-Andarzaghar b. al-Kharukbadh[935] brought him the like of what Farrūkh and Farwandādh had brought. He asked, "Have you also offered hospitality to the troops and given them a meal like it?" They replied, "No." He said, "We do not need it. Abū ʿUbayd would be the worst man if he accompanied people from their homeland to spill their blood for him, or not to spill [it], then gave himself preference in something he [alone] would obtain. No, by God, he should only eat from what God has given as booty to the Muslims the like of what their average person eats."

Abū Jaʿfar—Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: The like of this report that Sayf has transmitted from his authorities regarding ʿUmar's dispatch of al-Muthannā and Abū ʿUbayd b. Masʿūd to Iraq to wage war on those of the unbelievers who were in it and [regarding] their wars and those who fought against them. However, he said [the following differently.

Ibn Isḥāq:] When Jālinūs and his troops were defeated and Abū ʿUbayd entered Bārūsmā, he camped, he and his men, at one of its villages that was able to hold them. Food was prepared for Abū ʿUbayd and brought to him. When he saw it, he said, "I am not one to eat this [alone] without the Muslims." They said to him, "Eat, for [2172] there is none of your men but that he will be brought the like of this or better where he is staying." Thus he ate. When they came back to

934. Another of the sources frequently quoted by Sayf who is otherwise wholly unknown.

935. Text: al-Khūkabadh; read: al-Kharukbadh, as Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIV.

him, he asked them about their food, and they told him about the food that had come to them.[936]

Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb b. Ibrāhīm—Sayf b. ʿUmar—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād, according to their isnād: Jābān and Narsī had sought reinforcements from Būrān, who then supplied the two of them with al-Jālinūs leading the army of Jābān. He was commanded to begin with Narsī, then to fight Abū ʿUbayd afterward. But Abū ʿUbayd hastened against him, leading his army off before al-Jālinūs had drawn near. When he was near, Abū ʿUbayd confronted him. Al-Jālinūs stopped at Bāqusyāthā[937] in Bārūsmā. Abū ʿUbayd rushed upon him with the Muslims, his forces in battle formation. They met at Bāqusyāthā. The Muslims defeated them, al-Jālinūs fled, and Abū ʿUbayd remained [where he was], having won that land.

Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, Mujālid, Ziyād, and al-Naḍr, according to their isnād: Those dihqāns, who had been expecting [al-Jālinūs] and were terrified and afraid for themselves, all together brought him [word of] what the army had been able to do.

As for al-Naḍr and Mujālid: Abū ʿUbayd said, "Did I not tell you [2173] that I would not eat except what those with me could from those whom you have conquered?" They said, "No one is left who has not been brought enough of this in their saddles to satiate him or better." When the people had gone home, he asked them about the hospitality of the inhabitants of the land, and they told him. They had been remiss only at first [because they were] expecting [al-Jālinūs] and were afraid that the Persians would punish [them].

As for Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: When he had learned, he accepted [it] from them and ate. He also sent a message to a group who would eat with him as his guests to invite them to the food, for the Muslims had obtained food that the Persians served to guests. Those invited did not realize that the inhabitants had brought Abū

936. Although this report seems to differ little from the report of Sayf on this point, in fact Sayf's version probably shows a tendentious secondary development, for Sayf has Abū ʿUbayd haughtily refusing the Persians' hospitality, which was described as only a deceitful trick to buy time in any case. This reconstruction owes to Sayf's pro-Arab and anti-Shuʿūbī tendencies, which caused him always to portray the Persians in the worst possible light.

937. The same as Quss al-Nāṭif. See note 219, above.

ʿUbayd anything, but rather supposed that they were being invited to Abū ʿUbayd's kind of rough living to which they used to be invited. However, they disliked leaving aside what had been brought to them of that [Persian spoils] and said to the messenger, "Tell the commander that we do not desire anything besides what the *dihqān*s have brought to us." But he sent a message to them, "It is much food from the foods of the Persians, in order for you to see how it compares with what you have been brought. It includes thin cakes (qarw),[938] herbs, young pigeons, roast meat, and mustard." ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr said regarding that and the guests he had with him:

If you have thin cakes, herbs, and young pigeons,
Ibn Farrūkh has roast meat and mustard.
And pastry thin like sheets rolled up on bits of meat in which are herbs and young pigeon.

He also said:

We visited the people of Kisrā at al-Baqāyis[939] in the morning with a morning draught not from the wine of al-Sawād.
We visited them in the morning with every iron-clad youth [2174] and lightly equipped swift runner among the charging horses.

Then Abū ʿUbayd departed, sending al-Muthannā ahead and marching in battle formation until he arrived in al-Ḥīrah.

Al-Naḍr, Mujālid, Muḥammad, and his companions: ʿUmar came to Abū ʿUbayd to say,

> You will come to the land of cunning, deceit, treachery, and insolence. You will come to a people who have ventured upon evil, which they have learned, whereas they have pretended to forget good, of which they are ignorant. Therefore, see how you will be. Keep your tongue and by no means give away your secret, for the possessor of the secret, as long as he keeps it, is fortified: he will not be approached from a direction he does not like, whereas if he causes it to be lost, then he is lost.

---

938. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, CCLXVII–CCLXVIII, CDXXIII.

939. That is, Bāqusyāthā, altered by poetic license to fit the meter.

The Battle of al-Qarqus, Which Is Also Called al-Quss, Quss al-Nāṭif, the Bridge, and al-Marwaḥah[940]

Abū Jaʿfar al-Ṭabarī—al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād, according to their isnād: When al-Jālinūs returned to Rustam, along with those of his troops who had escaped, Rustam asked, "Which of the Persians is the strongest in fighting the Arabs in your opinion?" They answered, "Bahman Jādhūyah." Therefore he dispatched him along with elephants. He also sent back al-Jālinūs with him and said to him, "Send al-Jālinūs ahead. If he returns to the like of his defeat, then cut off his head." Bahman Jādhūyah advanced, having with him the Great Standard (dirafsh [2175] kābiyān),[941] the standard of Kisrā, which was made of tiger skins to a length of eighty cubits by a width[942] of twelve cubits. Abū ʿUbayd advanced to stop at al-Marwaḥah, where the tower and the bend in the river are. Bahman Jādhūyah sent a message to him, "Either you cross over to us, and we will allow you to cross, or else you let us cross over to you." The men said, "Do not cross, O Abū ʿUbayd! We will prevent you from crossing." They also told him, "Say to them that they should cross over." Among the harshest of the people against him regarding that was Salīṭ. But Abū ʿUbayd was unyielding and left aside the [wise] opinion, saying, "They will not risk death more than we. Rather, we will cross over to them." Thus, they crossed over to the enemy, who were in a narrow site with regard to both pursuit and flight.

They fought for a day, Abū ʿUbayd having with him between six and ten [thousand men], until, when it was the day's end and a man from among the Thaqīf[943] considered the victory to be slow [in coming], he drew the men [closer] together. The two sides struck each other with swords. Abū ʿUbayd struck the elephant, while the elephant hit Abū ʿUbayd. The swords had worked quickly among the

---

940. This place, which is on the west bank of the Euphrates opposite Quss al-Nāṭif, is referred to only in Sayf's reports. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 111–12. For the Battle of the Bridge, see Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 109–10. Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 168–71, has absurdly turned this battle into a Muslim victory.

941. Also mentioned independently in Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 109.

942. The words for width and length in the text have been reversed to correspond to English idiom.

943. A famous Arab tribe whose homeland was centered at al-Ṭāʾif, they were second in rank to none but their early allies, the Quraysh, whom they continued to serve in Umayyad times. See EI[1], s.v. Thaḳīf; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 92; II, 16–17, 553.

Persians, of whom six thousand were struck down in the melee. Only defeat remained and was expected [by them]. But when Abū ʿUbayd was hit and the elephant stood upon him, the Muslims fled and then continued in flight. The Persians rode down on them. A man from the Thaqīf, getting to the bridge first, cut it. The troops then reached it, while the swords were taking them from behind, and fell into the Euphrates. They struck down four thousand of the Muslims on that day between those drowned and killed. Al-Muthannā protected the troops, as did ʿĀṣim, al-Kalaj al-Ḍabbī,[944] and Madhʿūr, until they repaired the bridge and brought the men across. Then they [themselves] crossed in their traces. They stayed at al- [2176]
Marwaḥah, while al-Muthannā lay wounded, and also al-Kalaj, Madhʿūr, and ʿĀṣim, who were the protectors of the troops along with al-Muthannā. Many of the men fled, taking their own way, and so disgraced themselves and felt ashamed of what had happened to them. [News of] it reached ʿUmar from certain of those who had sought refuge in Medina. He said, "Worshippers of God! O God, every Muslim is absolved of his oath to me. I am the party of every Muslim. May God have mercy on Abū ʿUbayd; if he had crossed and then taken refuge on the riverside or had he retreated to us, not trying to defy death, we would have been his party [of supporters]."

Meanwhile, as the Persians were trying to cross, the news came to them that the people of al-Madāʾin had revolted against Rustam, breaking that which was between them and him. They became two parties, al-Fahlūj[945] against Rustam and the Persians against al-Fayruzān.[946]

Forty nights intervened between the Battle of al-Yarmūk and the Bridge. The one who brought the news of al-Yarmūk was Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥimyarī. The one who brought the news of the Bridge was 944. The ancestor of Hubayrah b. al-Ashʿath, he is mentioned by Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 110, as well as Ṭabarī, I, 2343, 2433, 2446. This could be the Hubayrah b. al-Ashʿath al-Ḍabbī mentioned in Ibn al-Kalbī, Gamharat, I, 89; II, 285, but no ancestor named al-Kalaj is found in his genealogy. There is an al-Kalaḥ b. al-Ḥārith, found in the Dhuhl, however, in Ibn al-Kalbī, Gamharat, I, 154; II, 368. Hubayrah's ancestry also goes back to a Dhuhl clan of the Ḍabbah. It thus appears possible that a part of the Dhuhl may have joined the Ḍabbah at some early date.

945. Defined in Ṭabarī, I, 2608, as the people from between al-Bāb (Darband ?) and Ḥulwān in the region of al-Jibāl in western Iran.

946. He is mentioned plentifully in Sayf's reports but very little elsewhere and not at all in al-Balādhurī. See Ṭabarī, Indices, 453; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 121; Morony, Iraq, 192–93.

ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd[947] al-Anṣārī,[948] who was not the one who saw the vision.[949] When he reached ʿUmar, ʿUmar was on the pulpit. ʿUmar called out for the news, "O ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd!" He responded, "The sure news has come to you," then he ascended the pulpit to ʿUmar and gave it to him secretly. Al-Yarmūk was in the days of Jumādā al-Ākhirah (2–30 August 634), and the Bridge was in Shaʿbān (30 September–28 October 634).

Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Mujālid and Saʿīd b. al-Marzubān:[950] Rustam charged Bahman Jādhūyah, who was Dhū al-Ḥājib,[951] with fighting Abū ʿUbayd. He sent back with him al-Jālinūs, who had with him the elephants, among them a white elephant on which was a palm tree [emblem]. He advanced leading the large [2177] army. Abū ʿUbayd had confronted him until he reached Bābil. When he reached it, Abū ʿUbayd retreated until he put the Euphrates between the two of them and camped at al-Marwaḥah. Then, Abū ʿUbayd had cause for regret when the enemy descended on him to say, "Either you cross over to us, or else we cross over." At this he swore that he would definitely cross the Euphrates to them and that he would indeed rectify what he had done. Salīṭ b. Qays and other important men adjured him, "The Arabs have not met the like of these Persian troops since they have been in existence, for they have concentrated against us and confronted us in numbers and equipment with which no one among them has met us [before]. You have brought us to a site from which we can retreat, take refuge, and

947. Text: Zayd; read: Yazīd, as most references.

948. ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd b. al-Ḥusayn (or Ḥiṣn) al-Khaṭamī al-Awsī, he was a Companion of the Prophet who subsequently migrated to al-Kūfah. He is said to have supported ʿAlī but nevertheless was later made governor of al-Kūfah by Ibn al-Zubayr in 64–66/684–86, after which he died. He is also said to have briefly governed Mecca for him. He was born c. 613 C.E. See Ṭabarī, II, 467, 509–10, 512–13, 535, 537, 542–44, 548–49, 570, 592, 600–2; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 182; II, 121; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 18; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 110, 325; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, II, 391; Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 269; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 382–83; Donner, Conquests, 377.

949. This is ʿAbdallāh b. Zayd b. ʿAbd Rabbih al-Ḥārithī al-Khazrajī. Some variations exist as to his exact name. He fought at Badr and other early battles and died in Medina in 32/653 at the age of sixty-four. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III, 536–37; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, II, 311–12; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 312; III, 132–33.

950. Abū Saʿd al-Aʿwar, the mawlā of Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān al-ʿAbsī, he was a famous Kūfan traditionist with a poor reputation who died 141–49/758–67. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 354; Dhahabī, Mīzān, II, 157–58; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 79–80.

951. Lit., "the possessor of the eyebrow." The title is elsewhere assigned to Mardānshāh, who was probably not the same person. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 119–20; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 308, 314.

[later] come back from flight to counterattack." Abū ʿUbayd replied, "I will not do so. You have become cowardly, by God." The messenger for what was between Dhū al-Ḥājib and Abū ʿUbayd was Mardānshāh al-Khaṣī.[952] He told them that the Persians were reproaching them [for their weakness]. At this, Abū ʿUbayd became more cantankerous. He rebutted his advisers and called Salīṭ a coward. Salīṭ said, "By God, I am bolder than you in spirit. We have given you our view, and you will come to know."

Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Naḍr b. al-Sarī—al-Agharr al-ʿIjlī:[953] While Abū ʿUbayd was encamped on the bank of the Euphrates at al-Marwaḥah, Dhū al-Ḥājib advanced until he stood on the bank of the Euphrates at Quss al-Nāṭif and said, "Either you cross over to us, or else we will cross over to you." Abū ʿUbayd replied, "Rather we will cross over to you." Ibn Ṣalūbā secured the bridge for the two sides together. Before that, Dawmah,[954] the wife of [2178]
Abū ʿUbayd, had seen a vision when she was at al-Marwaḥah. [In it,] a man came down from heaven with a vessel containing a drink that Abū ʿUbayd and Jabr,[955] along with men from his family, drank. She told Abū ʿUbayd about it, and he said, "This is martyrdom!" Abū ʿUbayd expressed his will to the people, saying, "If I am killed, Jabr is in command of the troops. If he is slain, so-and-so is in command of you." [He went on] until he had made commanders out of those who had drunk from the vessel according to the order that he spoke. Finally, he said, "If Abū al-Qāsim is killed, then al-Muthannā is in charge of you." Then he led the troops forward, so that both he and they crossed over to the enemy.

The ground could scarcely hold the people on it as the troops joined battle. When the horsemen beheld the elephants upon which was the palm tree [emblem], the horses wearing coats of mail, and the horsemen wearing distinctive emblems (shuʿur), they saw something unknown, the like of which they had not seen. Thus, when the Muslims charged against them, their horses would not advance, whereas when the enemy charged the Muslims with the elephants

952. That is, "the Eunuch."

953. Possibly Abū Muslim, the Kūfan traditionist who transmitted from Abū Hurayrah, who also may be the same as al-Agharr b. Salīk (or Ḥanẓalah), another Kūfan who also transmitted from Abū Hurayrah. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 364–66.

954. Unidentified and apparently reported only by Sayf.

955. Jabr b. Abī ʿUbayd al-Thaqafī, he was his father's second-in-command. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 109.

and bells hung around the horses' necks, they split the Muslims' squadrons; the horses would not stand up to them but rather shied away. The Persians also shot them through with arrows. Pain bit the Muslims, and they became unable to reach the enemy. Abū ʿUbayd dismounted, as did the troops, then they marched to them and struck them with swords. Whenever the elephants charged a company, they would push them back, so that Abū ʿUbayd called out, "Encompass the elephants, rip open their stomachs, and dump off those riding them." He leaped upon the white elephant, attached himself to its underside, and ripped it open, whereupon those on it fell. The troops did likewise. They did not leave an elephant but they pulled off its saddle and slew its company. The elephant lunged at Abū ʿUbayd, who struck its trunk (mishfar)[956] slightly with his sword, but the elephant held him back with its foot,[957] while Abū ʿUbayd tried to get at it. Then it struck him with its foot so that he fell down. After that, the elephant hit him and stood on him.

[2179] When the troops saw Abū ʿUbayd under the elephant, the hearts of some of them became faint. The one who had been designated commander after him took up the standard and fought the elephant until it moved aside from Abū ʿUbayd, whom he dragged to the Muslims, who carefully protected his corpse. The commander tried to get at the elephant, but it held him off with its foot as it had done with Abū ʿUbayd. The elephant then hit him and stood on him. Seven [men] from the Thaqīf followed one another in succession, each one taking up the standard and fighting until he died. Then al-Muthannā took up the standard. The troops fled.

When ʿAbdallāh b. Marthad al-Thaqafī[958] saw what Abū ʿUbayd and his successors met and what the troops did, he preceded them to the bridge, which he cut, saying, "O people, die as your commanders have died, or else win!" The polytheists drove the Muslims back onto the bridge. The troops grew fainthearted and jumped into the Euphrates, where those who did not persevere [in fighting] drowned, while the enemy hurried [to smite] those who persevered. Al-Muthannā and some of the Muslims' horsemen gave the troops cover. He called out, "O people, we will protect you; therefore, cross at your ease. Do not be taken aback, for we will not move from here

956. Though the Arabic clearly means "lip," perhaps "trunk" better fits the context.

957. Lit., "hand."

958. Unidentified and mentioned only by Sayf in this place.

until we see you on that side, and do not drown yourselves." They found the bridge, with ʿAbdallāh b. Marthad standing on it, preventing the men from crossing. They took him and brought him to al-Muthannā, who beat him and asked, "What led you to do what you did?" He answered, "So that they would fight." Those who had crossed summoned some peasants [to help]. They joined the vessel that had been cut away to its other vessels, whereupon the people crossed. The last one killed at the bridge was Salīṭ b. Qays. Al-Muthannā crossed and protected his side, but his troops were in disarray. Dhū al-Ḥājib eagerly desired them, but he was unable to get to [2180] them. When al-Muthannā crossed, the people of Medina dispersed from him until they reached Medina, though some of them avoided it, remaining in the deserts. Al-Muthannā remained with a few [men].

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — a man — Abū ʿUthmān al-Nahdī:[959] On that day, four thousand perished either killed or drowned, and two thousand fled, leaving three thousand. When Dhū al-Ḥājib heard about the outbreak of civil violence in Persia, he turned back with his army. That was a cause of their dispersing from him. Al-Muthannā was wounded, links from his chain mail having become embedded in him where the spear had torn them.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mujālid and ʿAṭiyyah: The like of it.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mujālid, ʿAṭiyyah, and al-Naḍr: The troops of Medina, when they made their way to Medina, told about those who went about in the land out of shame for the defeat. That was hard for ʿUmar to bear, and thus he was merciful to them.

Al-Shaʿbī: ʿUmar said, "O God, every Muslim has a right to my help. I am the party of every Muslim. Whosoever meets the enemy and reckons something in the matter to be hard, I will be a party [of supporters] for him. May God have mercy on Abū ʿUbayd; if he had retreated to me, I would have been a party [of supporters] for him." Al-Muthannā sent the news to ʿUmar with ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd, who was the first to come to ʿUmar.

Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq: The like of Sayf's report about the matter of Abū ʿUbayd, Dhū al-Ḥājib, and their war. However, he said [the following differently.

---

959. This transmitter, though having a name similar to the often-quoted Abū ʿUthmān Yazīd b. Asīd al-Ghassānī, must be different from him. However, both are unattested in works other than those of Sayf.

Ibn Isḥāq:] Dawmah, the mother of al-Mukhtār b. Abī ʿUbayd saw [2181] [in a vision] that a man descended from heaven. He had a vessel in which was a drink from paradise such a sleeper sees, and Abū ʿUbayd, Jabr b. Abī ʿUbayd, and men from his family drank from it.

[Ibn Isḥāq] also: When Abū ʿUbayd saw what the elephant was doing, he asked, "Is there any way to kill this beast?" They answered, "Yes, if its trunk is cut off, it will die." Therefore, he attacked it, striking its trunk and cutting it off, but the elephant knelt on him, killing him.

[Ibn Isḥāq] also: When the Persians turned back, al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah camped at Ullays. The troops scattered, making their way to Medina. The first to reach Medina with news of the troops was ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd b. al-Ḥuṣayn al-Khaṭamī, who told the people.

Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq — ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr — ʿAmrah bt. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān[960] — ʿĀ'ishah, the Prophet's wife: I heard ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb when ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd arrived calling for the news, "O ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd!" He was inside of the mosque and passing by my door when he asked, "What do you have [to report], O ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd?" He replied, "The news has come to you, O Commander of the Faithful." When he reached him, he told him the news about the troops. I have not heard of a man who witnessed something and then reported it who was more reliable in his report than he. When the defeated remnants of the troops arrived and ʿUmar saw the grief of the Muslims of the Muhājirūn and the Anṣār on account of the flight, he said, "Do not grieve, O Muslims.
[2182] I am your party. You have only retreated to me."

Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq — Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān [b. ʿAbdallāh] b. al-Ḥuṣayn and others: Muʿādh al-Qāriʾ, one of the Banū al-Najjār,[961] was among those who participated in it and fled on that day. When he read this verse, "And whoever turns his back to them on that day, except if maneuvering for battle or turning aside to join a company, has brought God's anger on himself.

---

960. She is ʿAmrah bt. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saʿd (or Asʿad) b. Zurārah al-Najjāriyyah al-Khazrajiyyah of the Anṣār, a Medinan traditionist of excellent reputation who specialized in transmitting from ʿĀ'ishah. She died in 98–106/717–24 at the age of seventy-seven. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VIII, 480–81; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 438–39.

961. Abū Ḥalīmah Muʿādh b. al-Ḥārith, he was a Companion who was said to have fought first at al-Khandaq in 5/627. He is said to have been killed at the Battle of al-Ḥarrah in 63/683 at the age of sixty-nine, but is not mentioned in Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 307–10. See Maqdisī, Istibṣār, 75; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 427–28.

His final refuge is hell, which is the worst fate,"[962] he wept, whereupon ʿUmar said to him, "Do not weep, O Muʿādh. I am your company, and you have only retreated to me."

Lesser Ullays

Abū Jaʿfar — al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā — Shuʿayb b. Ibrāhīm — Sayf b. ʿUmar — Muḥammad b. Nuwayrah, Ṭalḥah, Ziyād, and ʿAṭiyyah: Jābān and Mardānshāh went forth until they took to the road, thinking that the Muslims would have scattered. They did not know what had reached Dhū al-Ḥājib about the discord among the Persians. When the Persians had scattered and Dhū al-Ḥājib had gone forth after them, al-Muthannā, having heard of the action of Jābān and Mardānshāh, left behind ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr as his deputy and went forth with light cavalry, heading toward the two of them. They supposed that he was in flight, wherefore they opposed him, but he took them both prisoner. The people of Ullays rebelled against the troops of the two commanders and brought those troops as prisoners [to al-Muthannā], who gave the Ullaysīs a treaty of protection. He brought forward the two commanders to say, "You two deceived our commander, lying to him and inciting him!" Then he beheaded them and beheaded the prisoners, whereupon he went back to his [2183] camp.

Abū Miḥjan[963] fled from Ullays and did not return with al-Muthannā.

Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh, Ḥanẓalah b. al-Rabīʿ, and a group [of others] asked Khālid for permission [to go] while at Suwā. He permitted them, so that they came to Abū Bakr. Jarīr mentioned his request to him, whereat he said, "In our condition?" and delayed [responding to] him about it. When ʿUmar became the ruler, he summoned him to show proof, which Jarīr then demonstrated. Then ʿUmar wrote for him to his taxgathering agents among all of the Arabs, "Whoever has in his district anyone who belonged to the Bajīlah[964] in the Jāhiliyyah and has remained in it in Islam, that being recognized, send him to Jarīr." Jarīr appointed a place for them [to meet] between Iraq and Medina. When Jarīr was granted his request to bring forth the Bajīlah from among the people, he collected them together. When they were brought forth to him, he ordered them to an appointed meeting in the land between Mecca, Medina, and Iraq. Their gathering completed, ʿUmar said to Jarīr, "Go forth until you join al-Muthannā." Jarīr said, "Rather, Syria." ʿUmar said, "Rather, Iraq, for the forces in Syria have become strong against their foe." But he refused until ʿUmar compelled him. When they had gone forth to [join] Jarīr and he had ordered them to meet at the appointed time, ʿUmar gave him compensation for having compelled him and to benefit him, making over to him a quarter of the fifth of what God had bestowed on them as spoils in their campaigns. This was for him, those who gathered to him, and those who had been brought forth to him from among the tribes. He said [to them], "Come to us on your way." Thus, they came to Medina, then they departed from it for Iraq, as reinforcements for al-Muthannā. He also sent forth ʿIṣmah b. ʿAbdallāh of the Banū ʿAbd b. al-Ḥārith al-Ḍabbī with those of the Banū Ḍabbah[965] who followed him. He had also written to the former apostates (ahl al-riddah), but none came in Shaʿbān (30 September–28 October 634) except those whom he dispatched to al-Muthannā.

962. Qurʾān, 8: 16.

963. Abū Miḥjan ʿAmr b. Ḥabīb b. ʿAmr b. ʿUmayr al-Thaqafī, he embraced Islam in 9/631. He was a celebrated poet who is the hero of a small epic in which he is punished by the caliph ʿUmar for drinking wine but redeems himself by fighting bravely at al-Qādisiyyah. He later died in Ādharbayjān or Jurjān. See *EI*², s.v. Abū Miḥdjan; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 118; II, 174; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 926, 930–32, 935, 955; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 515; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 109; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 308–9, 316–17, 319; Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, XXI, 137–43; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, IV, 182–87; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 173–76 (criticizing Sayf); Donner, Conquests, 376, 385, 400.

[2184] Al-Buwayb[966]

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād, according to their isnād: Al-Muthannā sent [a summons] to those rein-

964. They were a Yemenī tribe scattered in the mountains of al-Sarāh, in what is now southern Saudi Arabia. They played a role in the conquest of Iraq and were active there subsequently, especially at al-Kūfah. See *EI*², s.v. Badjīla; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 221; II, 45–46, 219.

965. They were an important tribal grouping of northeastern Arabia originating in the area southwest of modern al-Kuwayt. They were a part of the Ribāb confederacy, but later became a tribal regiment at both al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah, where they were included in the Tamīm tribal division though they were not originally a part of the Tamīm. See *EI*², s.v. Ḍabba b. Udd; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 59; II, 11, 240.

966. This battle is reported only by Sayf, who either has elaborated it out of Ibn Isḥāq's tradition given below, pp. 213–15, or has further embroidered an already-elaborated tribal tradition emanating from the Rabīʿah, as is perhaps more likely. Even forcements who were near him, so that they came to him all together in a huge mass. [News of] that reached Rustam and al-Fayruzān, as the spies brought it to them, as well as bringing [information about] what [further] reinforcement the Muslims were expecting. At this, the two of them agreed to send forth Mihrān al-Hamadhānī,[967] until the two of them considered their view [of matters further]. Thus, Mihrān set out with the cavalry, his two superiors having ordered him to attack al-Ḥīrah.

The news reached al-Muthannā while he was encamped at Marj al-Sibākh[968] between al-Qādisiyyah and Khaffān with those Arabs who had reinforced him because of the news of Bashīr and Kinānah.[969] Bashīr was at that time in al-Ḥīrah. Al-Muthannā thoroughly probed Furāt Bādaqlā and sent a message to Jarīr and those with him, [saying,] "Something has come to us that we cannot stand against until you reach us, so therefore hurry to catch up with us. Your appointed meeting [place] is al-Buwayb." Jarīr was reinforcing him. He also wrote to ʿIṣmah and those with him—ʿIṣmah was likewise reinforcing him — and to every leader who had provided him with the like of that, "Take the way of al-Jawf,"[970] so that they followed the route of al-Qādisiyyah and al-Jawf, while al-Muthannā followed the route through the middle of al-Sawād, coming out in al-Nahrayn, then going on to al-Khawarnaq. ʿIṣmah came out at al-Najaf, along with those following his route with him. Jarīr came out in al-Jawf, along with those following his route with him. Then they came to al-Muthannā, who was at al-Buwayb, while Mihrān was across the Euphrates in front of him.

Thus, the Muslims' troops gathered at al-Buwayb, which is near the present location of al-Kūfah. Al-Muthannā was in command. They faced Mihrān and his troops. Al-Muthannā asked a man from Donner, Conquests, 198–200, who is reticent about attacking Sayf's traditions elsewhere, doubts that the battle took place at all. Ibn Khayyāṭ makes no mention of it.

---

967. His father was Mihribundādh or Bādhān. He was killed in 14/635. He is mentioned twice in poetry quoted by Abū Mikhnaf. See Ṭabarī, I, 2378; II, 152, 1038; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 311, 419. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 162, says he was killed at al-Nukhaylah by al-Mundhir b. Ḥassān al-Ḍabbī and Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī.

968. Unidentified.

969. The referent of this name is unknown. It could be an error, for Ms. IH[1] reads kitābihi, which would mean "his letter." But see Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIV.

970. Evidently it is a place in the desert west of al-Ḥīrah, certainly not the well-known modern al-Jawf in northern Arabia.

[2185] the inhabitants of al-Sawād, "What is the piece of land that Mihrān and his troops are on called?" The Sawādī replied, "Basūsiyā."[971] Al-Muthannā went on, "Mihrān's [efforts] have not availed and he has perished!" Al-Muthannā camped at a site that is al-Basūs and remained in his place until Mihrān wrote to him, "Either you cross over to us, or we cross over to you." Al-Muthannā answered, "Cross over." Thus, Mihrān crossed over and descended on the shore of the [same] side of the river as the Muslims. Al-Muthannā asked that man, "What is this piece of land that Mihrān and his troops descended on called?" The man replied, "Shūmiyā."[972] That was in Ramaḍān [29 October–27 November 634].

Al-Muthannā called out to the troops, "Rush upon your enemy," whereupon the two sides attacked one another. Al-Muthannā had put his troops in battle formation, giving command of his two flanks to Madhʿūr and al-Nusayr.[973] ʿĀṣim was in charge of the light cavalry, and ʿIṣmah was in charge of the skirmishers. When the two sides were arranged for battle, al-Muthannā stood up among the troops to speak, saying, "You are fasting. As fasting makes [one] weak and feeble, I believe it would be wise for you to break your fast. Then, with food, you will be strong enough to fight your enemy." They said, "Certainly," and broke their fast.

Al-Muthannā noticed a man ready for his chance to spring forth from the line. He asked, "What is the matter with this [man]?" They answered, "He was among those who fled from the advance on the Day of the Bridge and [now] intends to seek death in battle." Al-Muthannā thereupon hit him with his lance, saying, "You bastard, stick to your place! If your equal comes against you, then save your companion from him, but do not seek death in battle." The man replied, "I am indeed deserving of that," and settled down, sticking to the line.

---

971. A place near al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 423.

972. A place beside al-Kūfah on the Euphrates where the dār al-rizq, which was storehouse, armory, and treasury, was located at a later date. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 374; Morony, Iraq, 63. The element shūm might also imply "ill-omened," which may have inspired its inclusion in the story.

973. Al-Nusayr b. Daysam b. Thawr al-ʿIjlī. He participated in the conquests of Iraq and Iran as far as Nihāwand, then is last reported by Sayf to have been governor of Hamadhān in 34–35/655–56. See Ṭabarī, I, 2484, 2616, 2628, 2648, 2928, 3058; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 160; II, 453; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 304–5; Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 133–34; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 584; Donner, Conquests, 373, 386, 434–35.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū Isḥāq al-Shaybānī: The like of it.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAṭiyyah, and Sufyān al-Aḥmarī—al-Mujālid—al-Shaʿbī: When the army of the Bajīlah was collected, ʿUmar said, "Come to us on your way." Thus, the leaders of the Bajīlah and their delegation set out to [go to] him, leaving the mass [of troops] behind. ʿUmar asked them, "To which of the fronts would you prefer to go?" They replied, "Syria, for our brethren by marriage are in it." He then said, "Rather Iraq, for Syria has enough [forces already]." He did not cease insisting to them and they refusing him until that was decided on and he assigned them a quarter of the fifth of what God had bestowed on the Muslims as booty, in addition to their [proper] share of the booty. He appointed ʿArfajah[974] to be in charge of those of the Bajīlah who had been residing among the Jadīlah,[975] and Jarīr[976] to be in charge of those who were living among[977] the Banū ʿĀmir[978] and others. Abū Bakr had put him in charge of fighting the people of ʿUmān, along with several others, and then brought him back when he campaigned by sea. Then ʿUmar gave him charge of the main part of the Bajīlah. He said, "Heed this one,"[979] and said to the others, "Heed Jarīr." [2186]

Jarīr said to the Bajīlah, "Do you acknowledge this one, even though he has brought in among us what he has brought?" For the Bajīlah were wroth with ʿArfajah on account of a woman from

974. ʿArfajah b. Harthamah b. ʿAbd al-ʿUzzā al-Bāriqī al-Azdī, he was probably born in al-Sarāh, as he commanded the Bajīlah although he himself was of the Azd. After helping to suppress the Riddah in ʿUmān, he campaigned in southern Iraq, then fought at al-Qādisiyyah, and later was the first Muslim governor of al-Mawṣil. See Ṭabarī, I, 1881, 1929, 1977–80, 2269, 2382, 2472, 2477, 2481, 2548, 2552; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 202; II, 192; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 407–10, 419, 476 (under Harthamah b. ʿArfajah); Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 162, 164; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 481; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 474–75; Donner, Conquests, 86–87, 196–97, 216, 382, 399, 417, 425.

975. A smaller tribal grouping consisting of the ʿAdwān and the Fahm, and associated in the genealogy with the Bāhilah and the Ghanī. Their original homeland was at al-Barām northeast of Mecca and east of Medina about 120 km. on the road to Najd. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 92; II, 22, 252; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 243–44; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 366–67 (under al-Barām).

976. Text: Jarīrun; read: Jarīran, as Cairo ed.

977. Text: min; read: fī, as Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXIV.

978. A great tribal grouping of nomadic tribes located between al-Ḥijāz and Najd in west central Arabia extending as far as 44° E. See *EI*², s.v. Banū ʿĀmir (b. Ṣaʿṣaʿa); Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 92; II, 13–16, 163–64.

979. That is, ʿArfajah.

among them. Therefore, they met and came to ʿUmar to say, "Relieve us of ʿArfajah." He replied, "I will not relieve you of the earliest of you in migration and Islam and the greatest of you in bravery and doing good." They went on, "Put in charge of us a man from among us. Do not put us under an interloper among us." ʿUmar, thinking that they were rejecting ʿArfajah's [true] genealogy, said, "Look at what you are saying!" They said, "We are saying what you will hear."

ʿUmar sent a message to ʿArfajah saying, "These have asked me to relieve them from you. They have claimed that you are not from them. What do you have [to say]?" He answered, "They have spoken the truth, nor would it please me to be from them. I am a man of the Azd, then of the Bāriq,[980] of a house whose number is countless and of a noble lineage that is unmixed." ʿUmar said, "What an excellent group the Azd are! They take their share of the good and the evil." ʿArfajah said, "It befell me that the evil increased dangerously [2187] among us, although our house is one. Thus, as we had shed blood, so that some among us needed to take revenge from others, I separated myself from them because I was afraid of them. Then I [came to] be among these [Bajalīs], ruling them and leading them. They are resentful of me because of a matter that occurred between me and their *dihqān*s. They have envied me and treated me ungratefully." ʿUmar said, "It will not harm you to separate from them when they do not like you." He then appointed Jarīr in his place, bringing together the Bajīlah under him. He also revealed to Jarīr and the Bajīlah that he would send ʿArfajah to Syria; that made Jarīr like Iraq.

Jarīr led his people forth as reinforcements for al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah until he stopped at Dhū Qār. Then he went up until, when he was at al-Jull[981] and al-Muthannā was at Marj al-Sibākh, the news came to al-Muthannā about the report of Bashīr, who was at al-Ḥīrah, that the Persians had sent forth Mihrān, who had set out from al-Madāʾin heading toward al-Ḥīrah. Al-Muthannā sent messages to Jarīr and ʿIṣmah urging [them to come] with haste. ʿUmar had exacted a promise from them not to cross any body of water nor any bridge except after a victory. They gathered at al-Buwayb. The two 980. A subtribe of the Azd al-Sarāh from southwestern Arabia. Part of this group migrated to al-Kūfah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 202, II, 224.

981. A place deep in the desert some 170 km. south of al-Kūfah on the road from al-Qādisiyyah to Mecca, it still has the same name. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 155–56; Musil, Northern Neǧd, 236 and accompanying map of northern Arabia (k 19).

armies gathered on the east shore of al-Buwayb. Al-Buwayb had been a sink [for overflow from] the Euphrates on days of flooding in Persian times; it flowed into al-Jawf. The polytheists were at the site of Dār al-Rizq,[982] and the Muslims were at the location of the Sakūn.[983]

Al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb b. Ibrāhīm—Sayf b. ʿUmar—ʿAṭiyyah and al-Mujālid, according to their isnād: The warriors of the Banū Kinānah and the Azd came to ʿUmar seven hundred strong altogether. He asked them, "Which front is preferable to you?" They answered, "Syria, our brethren by marriage, our brethren by marriage!" He said, "That [front] you have already taken care of. Iraq, Iraq! Leave aside a country that God has reduced in power and number. Turn your faces to fighting a people who possess various kinds [2188] of livelihood, for it may be that God will give them to you as an inheritance along with your share of that, so you will live with whoever of the people is living." Then Ghālib b. so-and-so al-Laythī[984] and ʿArfajah al-Bāriqī said, each to his own people, among whom he had stood up, "O brethren, heed the Commander of the Faithful in what he deems [necessary] and put into effect for him that [mission] that he has lodged in you." They responded, "We obey you and heed the Commander of the Faithful in what he deems [necessary] and desires." Then ʿUmar prayed for good for them, saying it to them. He made Ghālib b. ʿAbdallāh the commander of the Banū Kinānah and dispatched him. He made ʿArfajah b. Harthamah the commander of the Azd, most of whom were from the Bāriq. They rejoiced at the return of ʿArfajah to them. Each of them set forth leading his people until they both came to al-Muthannā.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and ʿAmr, according to their isnād: Hilāl b. ʿUllafah al-Taymī[985] went forth with those of 982. Identified with Shūmiyā on p. 198, above.

---

983. Presumably the later location of the quarter of al-Kūfah that contained the dwellings of the Sakūn branch of the Kindah.

984. Ghālib b. ʿAbdallāh, he led several campaigns for the Prophet. Although Sayf alone mentions him later, Ibn al-Kalbī says that he fell at Fadak in the Prophet's lifetime. However, Ibn Ḥajar considers this a mistake. See Ṭabarī, I, 1364, 1592–93, 1597–98, 1600, 1758, 1762, 2233; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 37; II, 271; Wāqidī, Maghāzī, 5–6, 723–24, 726–27, 750, 752; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 622; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 45, 72; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 76, 78; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, III, 183; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 183–84; Donner, Conquests, 385, 388–89, 402.

985. Of the Taym al-Ribāb, he is one of those claiming to have killed Rustam, the Persian commander, at al-Qādisiyyah. Though he is found mainly in traditions that definitely or probably have come through Sayf, Ibn Khayyāṭ attests his existence by the Ribāb[986] who had gathered to him until he came to ʿUmar, who put him in command of them and sent him off, so that he reached al-Muthannā. Ibn al-Muthannā al-Jushamī[987] — the Jusham of the Saʿd[988] — also went forth until he came to ʿUmar, who sent him out, appointing him commander of the Banū Saʿd. He also came to al-Muthannā.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī; and ʿAṭiyyah, according to their isnād: ʿAbdallāh b. Dhī al-Sahmayn[989] came with men from the Khathʿam.[990] ʿUmar made him their commander and sent him to al-Muthannā. He went out in his direction until he reached him.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad and ʿAmr, according to their isnād: Ribʿī[991] brought men from the Banū Ḥanẓalah.[992] ʿUmar an independent isnād once. Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 85; II, 418, 437, omits him, though he includes two other sons of ʿUllafah, both of whom fought as Khārijites against ʿAlī. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 120, 123; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 317; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 165; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 186; Donner, Conquests, 385, 397, 408.

---

986. A confederacy of Muḍar tribes from northeastern Arabia that included the Taym, ʿAdī, and Thawr b. ʿAbd Manāh b. Udd, as well as the ʿUkl and the Ḍabbah b. Udd. This confederacy was then in alliance with the Saʿd Tamīm. See *EI*², s.v. Ḍabba b. Udd; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 85–87, 89–91; II, 10, 486.

987. Unidentified and not mentioned elsewhere.

988. A small subtribe of the Saʿd Tamīm that combined with other small Saʿdī groups to form the Abnāʾ. Because the Jusham's members evidently were scattered among several larger groups, they have differing genealogies: Jusham b. Saʿd, Jusham b. ʿAbshams b. Saʿd, Jusham b. ʿAmr b. ʿAbshams b. Saʿd, Jusham b. Kaʿb b. Saʿd, Jusham b. al-Ḥārith al-Aʿraj b. Kaʿb b. Saʿd, and Jusham b. Rabīʿah al-Ḥibāq b. Kaʿb b. Saʿd, of which only the first appears to represent the Jusham as an independent unit within the Saʿd. The extremely large number of other Jushams, mostly clans rather than individuals, points to an earlier larger grouping having been scattered among many tribes. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 75, 78; II, 267–69. Samʿānī, Ansāb, III, 278–81, and Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, I, 227–28, do not even mention any Jusham of the Tamīm, as these were probably early absorbed into other Tamīmī groups.

989. Apparently mentioned only in Sayf's traditions in al-Ṭabarī. See Ṭabarī, I, 2225, 2329, 2335, 2552, 2633; Donner, Conquests, 196, 385, 402, 435.

990. A large tribe located in ʿAsīr. One of its branches, the Shahrān, still resides in its original homeland. See *EI*², s.v. Khathʿam; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 221, 224–26; II, 45–46, 345.

991. Ribʿī b. Ḥuṣayn al-Riyāḥī of the Ḥanẓalah Tamīm, he is wrongly identified in Ṭabarī, Indices, 189, as Ribʿī b. ʿĀmir al-Usayyidī of the ʿAmr Tamīm. Crone, Slaves, 118, has also mixed up the two Ribʿīs. Actually, Ribʿī al-Riyāḥī seems to appear only in this one place in the tradition. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 68; II, 487; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 525, and next two notes.

992. One of the three great branches of the Tamīm, the Ḥanẓalah included the two large subdivisions of the Dārim and the Yarbūʿ, each of which contained a number of clans that became tribal regiments under the Islamic state. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥanẓala b. Mālik; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 59; II, 8–9, 298.

made him their commander and dispatched them. They went along until he brought them to al-Muthannā. His son Shabath b. Rib'ī[993] led them after him. Men from the Banū 'Amr[994] came to him as well. He made Rib'ī b. 'Āmir b. Khālid al-'Anūd their commander and sent him to join al-Muthannā. When men from the Banū Ḍabbah came to him, he arranged them in two divisions, putting Ibn Hawbar[995] in command of one of the two divisions and al-Mundhir b. Ḥassān[996] in command of the other. Qurṭ b. Jammāḥ[997] came to him leading the 'Abd al-Qays,[998] and 'Umar sent him forward. [2189]

All: Al-Fayruzān and Rustam agreed to send forth Mihrān to fight al-Muthannā. The two of them sought permission from Būrān. When they needed something, they would approach her chamberlains so that they might speak with her about it. They said what they thought, informing her of the size of the army. The Persians

---

993. Al-Riyāḥī al-Tamīmī, he had a spectacular career. Doubtfully said to have started as a mu'adhdhin of the false prophetess Sajāḥ, he became a Muslim and migrated to al-Kūfah, where he became an important leader. Later, he enthusiastically supported 'Alī against 'Uthmān, but after Ṣiffīn became a Khārijite and fought against 'Alī at al-Nahrawān. Still later, he was among those who urged al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī to come to al-Kūfah, but then deserted him and actually fought against him. He remained a leader, surviving until at least 68/687–88, after which he seems to have died peacefully. In this case, we once again see Sayf emphasizing the role of a prominent anti-'Alid in the early conquests. In view of Shabath's role in the second civil war, any significant role for him in the conquests over fifty years earlier is improbable. See Ṭabarī, I, 1919, 3148, 3265, 3270–72, 3274–76, 3349, 3380, 3387–88; II, 27, 104, 133, 234, 256–57, 272, 329–30, 343–44, 347, 535, 614, 619, 621–24, 626, 629–32, 649–50, 652, 654–55, 657, 703–4, 716, 718, 759, 761; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 68; II, 521; Ibn Muzāḥim, Ṣiffīn, 97–98, 187–88, 195, 197, 199, 205, 294; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 216; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 216–17, 221; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 119; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 223; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 223; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 163; Crone, Slaves, 118; Donner, Conquests, 385.

994. The 'Amr b. Tamīm, they constituted the third and smallest of the major branches of the Tamīm tribal grouping. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 59; II, 10, 184–85.

995. Presumably a Ḍabbī, he is further unidentified and found only in Sayf's transmissions. See also Ṭabarī, I, 2619; Donner, Conquests, 195, 383, 434.

996. Al-Ḍabbī, he was slain by al-Mukhtār's followers in al-Kūfah in 66/686. He is yet another anti-'Alid leader whose role in the conquests is displayed prominently in Sayf's transmissions. See Ṭabarī, II, 633, 750; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 89; II, 429; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 311, 389; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 162; Donner, Conquests, 195, 384, 397, 410.

997. Al-'Abdī. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 170; II, 472; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 311, 317; Donner, Conquests, 195, 385, 403.

998. A great tribal group of the Rabī'ah in eastern Arabia in al-Aḥsā', they formed the smallest of the five later army divisions (akhmās) in al-Baṣrah and Khurāsān. See EI², s.v. 'Abd al-Ḳays; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 141; II, 28–29, 127.

used not to send out many expeditions until the matter of the Arabs came up. When the two of them told her of the great size of the army's numbers, she asked, "Why will the Persians not go forth against the Arabs as they used to go forth before today? Why do you two not send forth [expeditions] as the kings used to send forth before today?" They replied, "Fear was with our enemy at that time but is among us today." She supported them, knowing what they had brought her [was true].

[2190] Thus, Mihrān went along with his army until he encamped on the nearer side of the Euphrates, while al-Muthannā and his army were on the [opposite shore] of the Euphrates, the Euphrates being between them. Anas b. Hilāl al-Namarī[999] came to reinforce al-Muthannā with men from the Namir who were Christians and traders (jullāb) who brought horses. Ibn Mirdā al-Fihr al-Taghlibī, who is ʿAbdallāh b. Kulayb b. Khālid,[1000] came leading men from the Banū Taghlib who were Christians and traders who brought horses. When they saw the Arabs camping beside the Persians, they said, "We will fight with our people." Mihrān said, "Either you cross over to us, or else we will cross over to you." The Muslims responded, "Cross over to us." They then departed from Basūsiyā for Shūmiyā, which is the site of Dār al-Rizq.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥaffiz — his father:[1001] When they were permitted to cross, the Persians descended on Shūmiyā, the site of Dār al-Rizq and put themselves into battle formation there. Then they advanced against the Muslims in three lines. Each line had an elephant, with their infantry before their elephant. They came on shouting. Al-Muthannā declared, "What you hear is cowardice. Therefore, remain silent and consult 999. He is apparently mentioned only in Sayf's transmissions. See Donner, Conquests, 336 nn. 158 and 163, 385.

---

1000. Despite his generous nomenclature, he appears only in Sayf's report in this place. See Donner, Conquests, 336 nn. 158 and 163, 384.

1001. Muḥaffiz (or Muḥaffir) b. Thaʿlabah b. Murrah al-ʿĀʾidhī, a Kūfan, he signed the document approving the execution of Ḥujr b. ʿAdī and his companions in 51/671. Later, he was infamous for bringing the head of al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī to Damascus in 61/680. See Ṭabarī, II, 133, 375–76, 380; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 30; II, 421; Zubayrī, Nasab, 441; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 174. It is extremely interesting that Sayf quotes such a person as a source. Not only is this yet another indication of Sayf's anti-ʿAlid tendency, but it also is a sign of the anti-ʿAlid countercurrent that continued to exist in the mainly pro-ʿAlid city of al-Kūfah.

by whispering." They approached the Muslims, coming at them from the direction of Nahr Banī Sulaym,[1002] approximately the site [2191] of the present Nahr Banī Sulaym. When they drew near, they marched slowly, while the Muslims' line was between the present Nahr Banī Sulaym and what is behind it.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Al-Muthannā's two flanks were commanded by Bashīr and Busr b. Abī Ruhm, while the light horse was commanded by al-Muʿannā. Masʿūd had charge of the infantry. Before that day, al-Nusayr commanded the skirmishers. Madhʿūr was in charge of the covering force. Mihrān's two flanks were commanded by Ibn al-Āzādhbih the governor of al-Ḥīrah and Mardānshāh. When al-Muthannā went forth, he went about among the ranks, charging them with obligation to himself while on his horse, al-Shamūs. It was called al-Shamūs owing to its mild temper and cleanness. When he mounted it, he would fight, for he would not ride it except to fight, keeping it in reserve as long as there was no battle. He reviewed the battle standards one by one, spurring them on, giving them his command, and setting them in good spirits by [reminding them of] the best of their qualities as an incentive to them. To each of them he would say, "I earnestly hope that the Arabs will not be ruined because of you today. By God, nothing will please me on my own account today except what pleases me on account of all of you." They responded similarly. Al-Muthannā was judicious in [both] word and deed. He would mix with the people in both hard and fair circumstances. No one among them could criticize him in either word or deed. Then he said, "I am going to shout 'God is Greater' three times. Therefore, prepare yourselves; then attack on the fourth [shout]."

But when he shouted the first "God is Greater" the Persians anticipated them, attacking them in haste and falling upon them with the first "God is Greater." When the battle slowed down for a while, al-Muthannā noticed gaps in certain of his lines. At this, he sent a man to them to say, "The commander greets you in peace and says, 'Do not put the Muslims to shame today.'" They said, "Of course," [2192] and redistributed themselves in a balanced way. Before that, they had been looking at him while he was pulling at his beard because of what he beheld from them. Thus they paid attention to a matter that no one of the Muslims had brought [before them] on that day. Then they cast a glance at him and saw him laughing in joy. The people [concerned] were the Banū ʿIjl.

1002. An unidentified canal probably located in the Sulaym quarter of the later, expanded al-Kūfah.

When the battle became prolonged and severe, al-Muthannā directed himself to Anas b. Hilāl to say, "O Anas, you are an Arab man even if you do not follow our religion. When you see me attack Mihrān, attack with me." He also told Ibn Mirdā al-Fihr the like of that. Both of them[1003] responded. Al-Muthannā then charged Mihrān, pushing him back until he went into his right wing. Then the Muslims fell upon them, so that the two centers joined [in combat] and dust rose up, while the wings fought as well. Neither the polytheists nor the Muslims were able to break free to aid their commander. Masʿūd was brought out of the battle wounded on that day, along with other Muslim commanders. He had said to them, "If you see us struck down, do not leave off what you are doing, for the army will retreat and then turn away. Stick to your battle formation. Add your help to the strength of those near you." The Muslims' center wreaked pain in the polytheists' center. A boy from the Taghlibīs who was a Christian slew Mihrān and mounted his horse. Al-Muthannā assigned his spoils to the commander of his horsemen. Likewise, if a polytheist was leading the horses of a man and was then killed and despoiled, the spoils went to the commander of the one who did the killing. He had two commanders, one of whom was Jarīr and the other was Ibn al-Hawbar. The two of them divided his arms.

[2193] Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥaffiz—his father Muḥaffiz b. Thaʿlabah: Young men from the Banū Taghlib brought horses [to sell]. When they saw the two armies meet on the Day of al-Buwayb, they said, "We will fight the Persians with the Arabs." One of them struck down Mihrān on that day, while Mihrān was astride a reddish bay horse of his armored with a yellow coat of mail, with a crescent between its eyes and crescents of brass on its tail. The boy mounted Mihrān's horse and then, tracing his origin, [said,] "I am the Taghlibī boy; I have slain the governor!" Jarīr and Ibn al-Hawbar came to him with their people and, taking his leg, made him descend.

1003. Text: ajābahu; read: ajābāhu, as Ms. IH and note to the Leiden ed.

Al-Sarī — Shu'ayb — Sayf — Sa'īd b. al-Marzubān: Jarīr and al-Mundhir participated in it and disputed over his arms, bringing their contention to al-Muthannā for a decision. He assigned his arms [to be divided] between them, and his belt and two bracelets [to be divided] between them. Then the Muslims annihilated the polytheists' center.

Al-Sarī — Shu'ayb — Sayf — Abū Rawq: By God, whenever we would come to al-Buwayb, we would see in the area between the site of al-Sakūn and the Banū Sulaym[1004] heaps of white bones, including heads and limbs, from which a warning would be taken. Certain of those who participated in it told me that they guessed them to be one hundred thousand. They were not effaced until they were buried by the rubble[1005] of houses.

Al-Sarī — Shu'ayb — Sayf — Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Al-Muthannā stood his ground when the dust rose up until the dust cleared away. The polytheists' center had been annihilated. Meanwhile, the flanks had dashed against each other. When they saw that [2194]
he had removed the center and annihilated its troops, the flanks — the Muslims' flanks — were strengthened against the polytheists and began to make the Persians turn their backs [in flight]. Meanwhile, al-Muthannā and the Muslims in the center were praying for victory for them. He also sent them someone to incite them, saying, "Al-Muthannā says, 'Your customs are [preserved] in the likes of you. If you support God, he will support you,' "[1006] until they defeated the enemy. Al-Muthannā raced them to the bridge, preceding them, and took the Persians, who scattered on the shore of the Euphrates, [some] going upstream and [some] going downstream. The Muslims' cavalry took them by turns until they killed them, then piled them in heaps. No battle between the Arabs and Persians left more enduring remains than this. When Mas'ūd b. Ḥārithah was carried wounded from the battlefield on that day, having been struck before the rout, those with him were weakened. Seeing that, he said, in spite of his serious wounds, "O tribe of the Bakr b. Wā'il! Raise up your standard, may God raise you up! Do not by any means let 1004. The Sulaym b. Manṣūr were a major nomadic Muḍarī tribe whose lands originally were located east of Medina. Later, they played a prominent role in Iraq and Khurāsān. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 92; II, 18–19, 517.

1005. See Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, CCXLII, DCXV.

1006. Qur'ān 47: 7.

my prostration frighten you." Anas b. Hilāl al-Namarī fought on that day until he was carried wounded from the battlefield. Al-Muthannā carried him from it, joining him and joining Masʿūd to himself. Qurṭ b. Jammāḥ al-ʿAbdī fought so [hard] on that day that he broke spears and cut swords. He also killed Shahrbarāz,[1007] one of the Persian dihqāns who was the commander of Mihrān's light cavalry.

When they were done, al-Muthannā sat down before the people, after finishing, so that he might speak to them and they to him. Whenever a man would come to speak, he said to him, "Tell me about yourself." Qurṭ b. al-Jammāḥ told him, "I slew a man and [2195] found the smell of musk [coming] from him. I said, 'Mihrān!' hoping that it would be he, but it turned out to be the Master of the Horse Shahrbarāz. By God, I did not think him anything, for he was not Mihrān." Al-Muthannā said,

> I have fought the Arabs and the Persians in both the Jāhiliyyah and Islam. By God, one hundred of the Persians in the Jāhiliyyah were indeed stronger to me than one thousand of the Arabs. But today one hundred of the Arabs are indeed stronger to me than one thousand of the Persians. God has taken away their credibility and rendered their trickery weak. Therefore by no means let a [large] number that you see, nor a great multitude, nor tightly drawn bows, nor long arrows scare you, for, if they are attacked quickly so that they cannot use them, or if they lose them, they are like dumb beasts: wherever you direct them, they go.

Speaking to al-Muthannā, Ribʿī said, "When I saw the fighting and its heat slowing down, I said, 'Protect yourselves with your shields as hiding places, for they are going to attack you. Persevere for two assaults, and I promise you victory in the third.' They answered my [wish], by God, so that God fulfilled my promise." Ibn Dhī al-Sahmayn said in his speech, "I said to my companions, 'I heard the commander reciting and mentioning terror in his recita-1007. This alleged person appears only in this one place in Sayf's traditions. He probably is an invention imitating the name of Khusraw II's general and the later ill-fated usurper of 629 or 630 C.E., for the name does not appear to have been a common one, but rather was an exceptional title.

tion. He did not mention it except for the excellence that he possesses. Follow your standard. Let your horse protect your foot, then attack. There is no breach of promise in God's word.' God carried through his promise to them, and it was as I had hoped." ʿArfajah said in his speech,

> We drove a regiment of them to the Euphrates. I hoped that God would permit them to drown and thereby console us for the disaster of the Bridge. When they had begun to be in difficult straits, they counterattacked against us. We [2196] > fought them hard until certain of my people said, "If only you were to hold back your standard." I responded, "The responsibility for advancing it is mine." I charged with it against their rear guard [commander], killing him. Then they turned toward the Euphrates in flight, but none of them reached it alive.

Ribʿī b. ʿĀmir b. Khālid said, "I was with my father on the Day of al-Buwayb."

Al-Buwayb was named the Day of the Tens. One hundred men were enumerated, each of whom had killed ten in the battle on that day. ʿUrwah b. Zayd al-Khayl[1008] was among those who killed nine. Ghālib, leading the Banū Kināna, was also of those who killed nine. ʿArfajah, leading the Azd, was among those who killed nine. The polytheists were slain in the area between the present al-Sakūn and the shore of the Euphrates, the east bank of al-Buwayb. That was because of al-Muthannā, at the time of the rout, beat them to the bridge, taking it against them, so that they scattered to the right and the left. The Muslims pursued them into the night and the next day into the [second] night.

Al-Muthannā regretted having taken the bridge. He said, "I indeed made a mistake, whose evil was averted by God, when I raced them to the bridge and cut it so that they were put in hard straits. I will not repeat it, nor do you repeat it or imitate my example, O people, for it was a slip from me. One ought not to put anyone in hard straits unless it is someone who cannot defend himself." Some of the Muslims' outstanding men who were among the wounded died, including Khālid b. Hilāl[1009] and Masʿūd b. Ḥārithah. Al-Muthannā prayed over them, giving them precedence over the spear blades and swords and saying, "By God, it indeed makes my sadness easier that they took part in al-Buwayb and fought boldly and patiently, neither [2197] becoming anxious nor shrinking [from the fight], and that there is in martyrdom an atonement that allows their sins to pass."

---

1008. Al-Ṭā'ī, he fought at al-Qādisiyyah, participated in further conquests in Iran, and later fell in Daylam. He is also said to have survived until ʿAlī's reign and to have fought on his side at Ṣiffīn, but there is no mention of this in Ibn Muzāḥim. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ğamharat, I, 257; II, 575; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 108–10; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 307–8, 389–90; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 476; Donner Conquests, 378, 385, 431, 438.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: Al-Muthannā, ʿIṣmah, and Jarīr gained on the way (ʿalā ẓahr)[1010] the stores of Mihrān as spoils, including sheep, flour, and cattle. They sent these to the families of those who had come from the people of Medina whom they had left behind at al-Qawādis,[1011] and to the families of those who had fought in the earliest battles (ahl al-ayyām) before them. They were at al-Ḥīrah. ʿAmr b. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ b. Buqaylah was the guide for those who had gone with the portion [of the stores] belonging to the families who were at al-Qawādis. When the women saw them from afar and saw the horses, they screamed, supposing it to be an attack, and stood up to defend the children with stones and poles. ʿAmr declared, "Such is fitting for the women of this army." They gave them the good news of the victory, saying, "This is [just] the beginning." Al-Nusayr was in charge of the horsemen who brought them the stores. He stayed with his horses in order to protect them, while ʿAmr b. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ returned to spend the night at al-Ḥīrah.

On that day, al-Muthannā said, "Who will lead the men in pursuit until he reaches al-Sīb?" Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh stood up in the midst of his men to say,

> O people of the Bajīlah! You and all those who participated in this battle are equal in priority, excellence, and gallantry. But no one among them will obtain tomorrow the like of what you will obtain from this booty, for yours is a quarter of the fifth, by [the order of] the Commander of the 1009. Unidentified and mentioned only in this place by Sayf. Donner, Conquests, 385, speculates that he might be the brother of the Anas b. Hilāl al-Namarī mentioned on pp. 204, 206, 208, above.

1010. This phrase is obscure. It might also mean "through the victory."

1011. Probably it is meant to be the same as al-Qādisiyyah.

> Faithful. Therefore, do not let anyone be faster against this enemy nor fiercer against him than yourselves, for [the sake of] that which is yours from him, and [to show] a good intention toward that which you hope for. For you are only waiting for one of the two best things: either martyrdom and paradise, or else spoils and paradise. [2198]

Al-Muthannā was hard on those who, having been defeated on the Day of the Bridge, wanted to seek death in battle. Then he said, "Where is the one who was so ready [to fight] yesterday and his companions? Heed the call [to follow] the tracks of these people to al-Sīb! Get at your enemy with what will enrage him, for, 'it will be better for you and greater in reward. And ask God's forgiveness, for God is the Forgiving, the Merciful.' "[1012]

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ḥamzah b. ʿAlī b. Muḥaffiz—a man from the Bakr b. Wāʾil: The first man to heed al-Muthannā's call on that day and follow their tracks was the one who had been ready to fight and his companions. He had wanted to go forth from the Muslims' battle line to [fight] the enemy the day before, waiting for his chance and being ready. Al-Muthannā commanded the bridge to be tied in place for them. Then he sent them forth in pursuit of the enemy. The Bajīlah followed them, while the Muslims' cavalry spurred on every horse. Thus they dashed along in pursuit of them until they reached al-Sīb. There did not remain in the Muslim army any participant in the Battle of the Bridge but that he went forth with the cavalry. They took a great amount of cattle, captives, and other goods as spoils, which al-Muthannā divided among them, giving preference to the gallant ones from all the tribes. He allotted to the Bajīlah on that day the fourth of the fifth, [dividing it] among them equally. He sent the [other] three-quarters of it off with ʿIkrimah.[1013] God cast terror into the hearts of the Persians. The leaders who had led the men in the pursuit wrote to al-Muthannā. ʿĀṣim, ʿIṣmah, and Jarīr wrote, "God has delivered, protected, and turned over to us what you have seen. There is nothing near the people (qawm);[1014] [2199]

1012. Qurʾān 73: 20, with the addition of "for you."

1013. There is no clue to who this might be. Despite Ṭabarī, Indices, 390, it can hardly be ʿIkrimah b. Abī Jahl, whom Sayf has killed on the Syrian front and who is never reported elsewhere in any source on the Iraqī front.

1014. This probably means that the enemy could expect no support, for qawm is more commonly used for hostile forces than for friendly ones. Alternatively it could therefore you may permit us to advance." When he gave them permission, they raided until they reached Sābāṭ. The forces in Sābāṭ fortified themselves against them. They raided the villages near it. The men in the fortress at Sābāṭ rained arrows down on them from their fortifications. The first to enter their fortress were three leaders: ʿIṣmah, ʿĀṣim, and Jarīr. Parties from among all the men followed them. Then they turned away, going back to al-Muthannā.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAṭiyyah b. al-Ḥārith: When God caused Mihrān to perish, the Muslims were able to attack the area of al-Sawād between them and the Tigris. Therefore they plowed into[1015] it, not fearing any trick nor meeting any opposition in it. The Persians' garrisons mutinied and, retreating to their [lines], sought refuge in Sābāṭ. It pleased them to abandon what was beyond the Tigris. The Battle of al-Buwayb was in Ramaḍān 13 (29 October – 27 November 634). God slew Mihrān and his army in it. The Muslims crammed the two sides of al-Buwayb with bones so that it became level. Nothing has effaced them save the dust in the times of the civil war, nor is anything stirred up there but that they discover something of them. It is between al-Sakūn, Murhibah,[1016] and Banū Sulaym. In the times of the Sāsānians, it used to be a backwater of the Euphrates that flowed into al-Jawf. Al-Aʿwar al-ʿAbdī al-Shannī[1017] said:

[2200] The home[land] of the tribe is aroused with sorrows for Aʿwar, and has taken Khaffān as a substitute after ʿAbd al-Qays.[1018]
He has shown us there, the whole affair being complete, for at al-Nukhaylah[1019] are the slain ones of Mihrān's army, mean that the Muslims' were facing no resistance, which would seem better to fit the context.

---

1015. Or, "took the best part of."

1016. A quarter of the later al-Kūfah.

1017. Not further identified, he appears only here in Sayf's traditions in al-Ṭabarī.

1018. Here ʿAbd al-Qays seems to refer to the tribe's homeland in eastern Arabia.

1019. The al-Nukhaylah meant here, according to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 278–79, is a waterhole on the right side of the road near al-Mughīthah and al-ʿAqabah, 11 km. from Juwayy, west of Wāqiṣah, and 5 km. from al-Ḥufayr. Judging by the locations of Wāqiṣah and al-ʿAqabah, which still have the same names, this puts it more than 155 km. south-southwest of al-Kūfah on the pilgrimage road to Mecca. However, Sayf's al-Nukhaylah appears to be right at al-Kūfah and on the Euphrates. This latter al-Nukhaylah by a river is also described in the report of Ibn Isḥāq on p. 214, below. See also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 299, 310–11, 314, 389; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrikh, II, 162; Ibn al-Faqīh, Bul-

The times when al-Muthannā went against them with the horses, so that the army of the Persians and Jīlān[1020] was slaughtered.
He rose up against Mihrān and the army that was with him, until he annihilated them in pairs and singly.

Abū Jaʿfar: Ibn Isḥāq has said on the subject of Jarīr, ʿArfajah, and al-Muthannā, and al-Muthannā's fighting Mihrān other than was Sayf has related of reports about them. He has reported on them [the following].

Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd—Salamah—Ibn Isḥāq: When [news of] the disaster of the men at the bridge reached ʿUmar and their defeated remnants had reached him, Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī came to him from Yemen with a party of the Bajīlah and ʿArfajah b. Harthamah. ʿArfajah, who was the lord of the Bajīlah at that time, was a confederate of theirs from the Azd. ʿUmar spoke to them saying, "You have learned of what catastrophe befell your brothers in Iraq. Go to them. I will send out to you whoever is from among you in the Arab tribes, thereby bringing them together for you." They said, "We will do so, O Commander of the Faithful. Send out to us the Qays Kubbah,[1021] Suḥmah,[1022] and ʿUraynah."[1023] They were tribes of the Banū ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah. ʿUmar made ʿArfajah b. Harthamah their commander, but Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī became angry because of that. He said to the Bajīlah, "Speak to the Commander of the Faithful." Thus, they said to ʿUmar, "You have put in charge of us a man who is not of us." He then sent a message to ʿArfajah to ask, "What are these [men] saying?" He answered, "They have told the truth, O Commander of the Faithful. I am not of them, but rather I am a man of the Azd. In the Jāhiliyyah, we shed blood among our own people [2201] dān, 162–63; Musil, Northern Neǧd, 234, and accompanying map of northern Arabia (k 19, l 19); Donner, Conquests, 198.

---

1020. Persian Gīlān, it is the Iranian district lying at the southwest corner of the Caspian Sea around the city of Rasht. See *EI*², s.v. Gīlān; Le Strange, Lands, 5, 172–75, maps I and V.

1021. The Qays Kubbah b. al-Ghawth, they lived among the Kilāb of the ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah, but they are accounted a part of the Bajīlah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 223; II, 460.

1022. The Suḥmah b. Saʿd b. ʿAbdallāh b. Qudād b. Thaʿlabah b. Muʿāwiyah b. Zayd, they were a subbranch of the Bajīlah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 223; II, 516; Samʿānī, Ansāb, VII, 89–91; Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, I, 534.

1023. The ʿUraynah b. Nadhīr, they mostly lived among the Kilāb of the ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah, but they are accounted part of the Bajīlah, being a subdivision of the Qasr. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 222; II, 574.

and therefore joined the Bajīlah, among whom we reached the [degree of] authority you have heard about." ʿUmar said to him, "Stay firm in your position and repel them as they repel you." ʿArfajah replied, "I will not do so, nor will I go with them." ʿArfajah went to al-Baṣrah after it was settled, abandoning the Bajīlah. ʿUmar appointed Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh as commander of the Bajīlah. His appointment brought them to al-Kūfah. ʿUmar joined his people from the Bajīlah to him.

Jarīr advanced until, when he passed near to al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah, al-Muthannā wrote to him, "Come to me, for you are only a reinforcement for me." Jarīr wrote back to him, "I will not do so unless the Commander of the Faithful orders me to do that. You are a commander, and I am a commander." Then Jarīr headed toward the bridge. Mihrān b. Bādhān, who was one of Persia's great men, met him at al-Nukhaylah, having crossed the bridge to him. They fought a hard battle. Al-Mundhir b. Ḥassān b. Ḍirār al-Ḍabbī attacked Mihrān, stabbing him so that he fell from his horse. Then Jarīr rushed upon him to cut off his head. After that, they quarreled over his spoils, finally coming to an agreement about it. Jarīr took his arms, while al-Mundhir b. Ḥassān took his belt.

[Abū Jaʿfar]: I have been told that Mihrān, when he met Jarīr, said:

If you ask about me, I am Mihrān;
for those who do not recognize me, I am the son of Bādhān.[1024]

I rejected that [report] until one of the knowledgeable scholars whom I do not accuse [of weakness] told me that he was an Arab who had grown up with his father in Yemen when the latter was governor for [2202] Kisrā. I no longer rejected that [report] when [this latter information] reached me.

Al-Muthannā[1025] wrote to ʿUmar to denounce Jarīr. ʿUmar wrote back to al-Muthannā, "I would not put you in charge of a man from the Companions of Muḥammad," meaning Jarīr. ʿUmar sent Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ to Iraq with six thousand [men] whom he had appointed him to command. He also wrote to al-Muthannā and Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh that the two of them join Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ. He made Saʿd the 1024. This Bādhān is meant to represent the last Persian governor of Yemen, who is said already to have embraced Islam in 10/631. For Bādhān of Yemen, see *EI*², Supplement, s.v. Bādhām, Bādhān.

1025. Ibn Isḥāq's report probably resumes here.

commander of the two of them. Sa'd went along until he stopped at Sharāf,[1026] and al-Muthannā and Jarīr went along until they joined his camp. Sa'd wintered there, while troops gathered to him. Al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah died.

The text reverts to the report of Sayf.

Al-Khanāfis

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād, according to their isnād: Al-Muthannā penetrated deeply into al-Sawād, leaving Bashīr b. al-Khaṣāṣiyyah behind at al-Ḥīrah. He sent Jarīr to Maysān and Hilāl b. 'Ullafah al-Taymī to Dast-i Maysān.[1027] He strengthened the frontier posts with 'Iṣmah b. so-and-so al-Ḍabbī, al-Kalaj al-Ḍabbī, 'Arfajah al-Bāriqī, and the likes of them among the Muslims' leaders. He began by stopping at Ullays, which was one of the villages of al-Anbār.[1028] This expedition is called "the latter expedition of al-Anbār" and "the latter expedition of Ullays." Two men importuned al-Muthannā, one of them from al-Anbār, the other from al-Ḥīrah, each one pointing out to him a market. As for the Anbārī, he directed him to al-Khanāfis, while the Ḥīrī directed him to Baghdādh. Al-Muthannā said, "Which of the two is before the other?" They answered, "Between them are some days." He went on, "Which of them is more immediate?" They replied, "The market of al-Khanāfis is a market to which the people come all together. The Rabī'ah meet at it while the Quḍā'ah protect them." [2203]

Thus, al-Muthannā prepared himself for it, so that when he reckoned that he would reach it on its market day, he rode toward them, attacking al-Khanāfis on its market day. In it, there were two groups of horsemen from the Rabī'ah and the Quḍā'ah, the Quḍā'ah under 1026. A place in the desert some 155 km. to the south-southwest of al-Kūfah on the pilgrimage route, it still retains the same name. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 331; Musil, Middle Euphrates, 109 n. 60, 289, 358; Northern Neǧd, 193–95, 212, 232–33, 236, and accompanying map of northern Arabia (k 19); Donner, Conquests, 203, 298 n. 83.

---

1027. This was a district of Iraq not identical with Maysān. It was above Maysān and al-Madhār and constituted the most northerly of Maysān's four districts. Its capital was Basāmatā. See EI[1], s.v. Maisān; Morony, Iraq, 160–61.

1028. This can hardly be the same Ullays as mentioned before, for al-Anbār is far to the northwest of al-Ḥīrah. Most likely, there is a confusion in Sayf's sources about where Ullays actually was.

Rūmānis b. Wabarah[1029] and the Rabīʿah under al-Salīl b. Qays.[1030] They were the guards. Al-Muthannā tore down the market and what was in it and despoiled the guards [of their weapons]. Then he went back toward where he started, until he came suddenly to the *dihqān*s of al-Anbār in the early light of that day (yawmahu).[1031] They fortified themselves against him, but when they recognized him, they came down to him, bringing him fodder and supplies and also bringing him guides to show him Baghdādh, for his objective was the Baghdādh market. He came against them in the morning.

The Muslims were penetrating deeply into al-Sawād while al-Muthannā was at al-Anbār, as they launched attacks in the area between lower Kaskar, the lower Euphrates, and the bridges of Mithqab[1032] as far as ʿAyn al-Tamr and the region belonging to it in the land of al-Falālīj and al-ʿĀl.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥaffiz—his father: A man from the inhabitants of al-Ḥīrah said to al-Muthannā, > Shall I not show you a village to which the merchants of Madā'in Kisrā[1033] and al-Sawād come? They gather there > [2204] once a year and have with them valuables like the public treasury. These are the days of their market. If you are able to attack them without their noticing [your approach], you will obtain there wealth that will be riches for the Muslims and by which they will be strengthened against their enemy for as long as they live.

Al-Muthannā asked, "How far is it from Madā'in Kisrā?" The man answered, "Part of a day or most of a day." Al-Muthannā went on, "How can I get to it?" They said,

> We bid you, if you set out for it, to take the land route until you get to al-Khanāfis, for the people of al-Anbār will make their way to it, giving information about you so that the people of the market will feel secure. Then you turn to stop at 1029. Or, "Ibn Wabarah b. Rūmānis," as Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXV. See above, p. 58.

---

1030. Al-Dhuhlī, he traveled from Iraq to al-Yamāmah to join the retinue of the false prophetess Sajāḥ. See Ṭabarī, I, 1911; Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 144; II, 507.

1031. This would appear to mean "on the same day," but that does not seem to fit the context.

1032. Apparently an unidentified place in al-Sawād and not the same as the desert place named on p. 69.

1033. The same as al-Madā'in.

> al-Anbār, in order to take guides from the *dihqān*s. Then you go along in the dark of the night from al-Anbār so that you come against them in the morning, greeting them with an early morning attack.

Therefore, he went forth from Ullays until he came to al-Khanāfis. Then he turned aside until he came back upon al-Anbār. When its ruler became aware of him, he withdrew inside his fortress, as he did not know who he was, that being at night. When he recognized him, he came down to him. Al-Muthannā offered him food, intimidated him, and told him to keep his secret, saying, "I intend to raid. Therefore, send with me guides [to show me the way] to Baghdādh, so that I may raid from it as far as al-Madā'in." The ruler said, "I will come with you." Al-Muthannā said, "I do not want you to come with me. Rather, send with me one who is a better guide than you." The ruler suppled them with food and fodder and sent guides with them. They traveled until, when they were at the midpoint [of their journey], al-Muthannā asked them, "How far is this village from me?" They answered, "Four or five *farsakh*s." He then asked his men who would volunteer for guard duty, and a group volunteered. He said to them, "Keep your wits sharp as guards."

When he stopped to camp, he said, "O people, stay, eat, make ablutions, and prepare yourselves." He sent out reconnaissance parties, which held up the people [in the vicinity] so that the Muslims would precede the news [about them]. When they were done, he sent [forces] toward the enemy in the latter part of the night. Then he crossed over to them and greeted them in the morning in their markets. He put them to the sword, killing, while the Muslims took what they wanted. Al-Muthannā said, "Take only the gold and the silver. Do not take more goods than one of your men can carry on his mount." The people of the markets fled. The Muslims filled their hands with the yellow, the white,[1034] and the free[1035] of everything. Then he went out to fight again until he stopped on Nahr al-Saylaḥīn[1036] by al-Anbār. On making camp, he addressed the people, saying, "O people, camp, take care of your wants, and be prepared to [2205]

1034. That is, the gold and the silver.

1035. That is, captives.

1036. The modern Ṣāliḥiyyīn, it is a canal that lies about 26 km. west of Baghdād and 36 km. east of al-Anbār. Not to be confused with the other al-Saylaḥūn near al-Ḥīrah. See Ibn Khurdādhbih, Masālik, 72, 216; Muqaddasī, Taqāsīm, 134; Musil, Middle Euphrates, 134 n. 70, 248, 253–55.

march, praising God and asking Him for safety. Then, retreat in a hurry." They did so, but he heard a whispering among them saying, "How fast the enemy are in pursuing us!" At this, he said,

> Give each other counsel of goodness and obedience to duty, and do not counsel each other to crime and rebelliousness.[1037] Look into matters and weigh them carefully, then speak, for the alarm has not yet reached their city. Should it reach them, terror would prevent them from pursuing you, for raids create fears that spread outward from them for a day into the night. Should the guards pursue you upon actually seeing you, they would not overtake you, because you are on full-blooded Arabian horses, until you have reached your camp and your army. If they were to overtake you, I would fight them for the sake of two [purposes]: the seeking of reward and the hope of victory. Therefore have confidence in God and keep a good opinion of him, for God has supported you in many situations, even though they be more numerous than you. I will keep you informed about myself, as well as about my [feigned] shrinking back and what I intend thereby. The caliph of God's Messenger, Abū Bakr, bade us to shorten our halting, to hasten our turning again to the at-[2206] tack during raids, and to speed ourselves in another direction.

He advanced with them — they had their guides to convey them across the deserts and the canals — until he brought them to al-Anbār. The *dihqān*s of al-Anbār received them with hospitality and rejoiced at his safe return, for he had promised to treat them well if their affairs remained in good order for them according to what the Muslims liked.

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: When al-Muthannā returned from Baghdādh to al-Anbār, he sent al-Muḍārib al-ʿIjlī[1038] and Zayd[1039] off to al-Kabāth,[1040] where Fāris al-1037. The wording recalls Qurʾān 58:9.

1038. Al-Muḍārib b. Yazīd, he appears only in Sayf's reports here and in Ṭabarī, I, 2269, 2478, 2655–56. His mention in Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, 164, probably derives from Sayf. See also Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 422; Donner, Conquests, 383, 398, 438.

1039. Unidentified.

1040. A marketplace in Mesopotamia belonging to the Taghlib, according to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 433, whose notice is probably drawn from Sayf's report.

ʿUnāb al-Taghlibī[1041] was ruling, and then set out in their tracks. The two men reached al-Kabāth. The people had scattered, emptying al-Kabāth, whose whole population were of the Banū Taghlib. The Muslims rode in their tracks, sending out forces in pursuit of them that overtook their rear, while Fāris al-ʿUnāb protected them, keeping them safe for an hour, then fleeing. At this, the Muslims slew their rear, making much [slaughter]. Al-Muthannā returned to his camp at al-Anbār. The deputy [left] in charge of the Muslims was Furāt b. Ḥayyān. When al-Muthannā returned to al-Anbār, he sent off Furāt b. Ḥayyān and ʿUtaybah b. al-Nahhās, commanding them both to attack groups of the Taghlib and the Namir at Ṣiffīn.[1042] Then he followed them [himself], leaving ʿAmr b. Abī Sulmā al-Hujaymī[1043] behind in charge of the troops. When they drew near Ṣiffīn, al-Muthannā, Furāt, and ʿUtaybah split up. The inhabitants of Ṣiffīn fled, crossing the Euphrates to al-Jazīrah,[1044] where they fortified themselves. Al-Muthannā and his troops exhausted their provisions, so that they resorted to their mounts, except for those that were needed, and ate them, even their feet, their bones, and their skins. They they overtook a caravan of the people of Diyāf[1045] and Ḥawrān. They killed the non-Muslims and, striking three persons [2207] from the Banū Taghlib who were guards, took the caravan. It was an excellent showing.

Al-Muthannā said to them, "Guide me." One of them responded, "Give me a guarantee of security for my family and my property and I will show you a band of the Taghlib from whom I set out today." Al-Muthannā gave him the guarantee and went with him for the day, until, when it was evening, he assaulted the [Taghlibī] group. Just then, their livestock were returning from the watering place, while the people were sitting in the courtyards of their dwellings. At this point, he unleashed his attackers, who killed the warriors, took the 1041. Unidentified and found only in this place in al-Ṭabarī.

1042. The site of the famous later battle of 37/658 between ʿAlī and Muʿāwiyah, it is located on the right bank of the Euphrates between al-Raqqah and Bālis. See EI[1], s.v. Ṣiffīn. The appearance of the name here is probably retrospective, given Sayf's preoccupation with this battle and the justification of its participants.

1043. Al-Tamīmī, he is not further identified and apparently mentioned only here in al-Ṭabarī. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 114; Donner, Conquests, 384.

1044. That is, to the north bank.

1045. Text Dabā; read: Diyāf, as Cairo ed. and Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXV. Diyāf was a place in al-Jazīrah or Syria. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 494–95.

dependents captive, and drove off their property. They turned out to be the Banū Dhī al-Ruwayḥalah.[1046] Those of the Rabīʿah who were among the Muslims bought the captives with their share of the spoils and freed their captives. The Rabīʿah were not used to taking captives, whereas the Arabs took captives from each other in their Jāhiliyyah.

Al-Muthannā was informed that most of those going about in the country had gone to seek pasturage on the shore of the Tigris. Thus, al-Muthannā set forth. Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan al-Ghalafānī[1047] was in charge of his vanguard in all of these campaigns of his after al-Buwayb. Al-Nuʿmān b. ʿAwf b. al-Nuʿmān and Maṭar,[1048] the two Shaybānīs, were in command of his two wings. He sent Ḥudhayfah after the fleeing enemy and followed him. They overtook them at Tikrīt,[1049] a little before it, whence they pursued them while they were fording the water. They obtained the amount of livestock they wanted, to the extent that each man received five animals and five captives. Al-Muthannā took a fifth of the property, carrying it until he came to the people at al-Anbār.

Furāt and ʿUtaybah had gone off in their own directions until they attacked Ṣiffīn, where the Namir and the Taghlib were under their various standards. They attacked them, throwing a band of them [2208] into the water. These pleaded with them, but they did not leave off

1046. These are perhaps the ʿĀmir Dhū al-Rujaylah b. Mālik b. Jusham b. Bakr of the Taghlib, as no Dhū al-Ruwayḥilah are known, whereas the Arabic written form of Dhū al-Rujaylah differs only by a single letter. In fact, one ms. of IH has al-Ruwayjilah. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Ǧamharat, I, 164; II, 161.

1047. This nisbah also variously is given as al-ʿAlqāʾī, al-ʿAlaqānī, or al-Qalʿānī. None of these names is found in Ibn al-Athīr's Lubāb, despite Ibn Ḥajar's preference for al-ʿAlqāʾī based on an alleged reading from Ibn al-Athīr. Whatever Sayf may have meant, al-Balādhurī describes this Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan as an Azdī from the al-Bāriq clan. He is famous chiefly for having subdued ʿUmān during the Riddah and having subsequently governed it, possibly until 17/638. If he did remain in ʿUmān while the conquest of Iraq was taking place, it is unlikely he could have played the great role in the latter that Sayf attributes to him. See Ṭabarī, I, 1880, 1929, 1977–80, 2269, 2273, 2292, 2389, 2426, 2481, 2548, 2552, 2565, 2570; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 107; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 92–93; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 148, 156, 164; Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, I, 278–79; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 317; Donner, Conquests, 86, 386, 403, 426.

1048. Probably the same as Maṭar b. Fiḍḍah al-Taymī introduced on p. 180–81, above.

1049. This is still a large town in Iraq, located on the Tigris about 155 km. north of Baghdād. See EI[1], s.v. Tikrīt. That the Muslims should pursue the Persians so far north even before the Battle of al-Qādisiyyah had taken place is hardly possible.

from [attacking] them. They started calling out to them, "Drowning, drowning!"[1050] ʿUtaybah and Furāt began to instigate the men, calling out to them, "A drowning for a burning!" reminding them of one of their battles in the Jāhiliyyah in which they had burned up a group of the Bakr b. Wāʾil in a certain swampy thicket. Then, having drowned them, they turned away, going back to al-Muthannā. When the men had returned to their camp at al-Anbār, and the expeditions and raiding parties had come together there, al-Muthannā led them down to al-Ḥīrah[1051] and camped in it.

ʿUmar used to have spies in every army. As ʿUmar was informed by writing of what took place on those expeditions, he heard what ʿUtaybah and Furāt had said at the battle of the Banū Taghlib and the water. He sent a message to the two of them, asking them [about it]. They informed him that they had said that because it was a proverbial saying and that they had not said it to seek revenge for the Jāhiliyyah. He asked them to swear an oath, and they swore that they had meant by that only [to use] a proverbial saying and to strengthen Islam. He believed them and sent them back, so that they came to al-Muthannā.

What Stirred Up the Matter of al-Qādisiyyah

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Sawād b. Nuwayrah — ʿAzīz b. Miknaf al-Tamīmī, then al-Usayyidī;[1052] Ṭalḥah b. al-Aʿlam al-Ḥanafī — al-Mughīrah b. ʿUtaybah b. al-Nahhās al-ʿIjlī; and Ziyād b. Sarjis al-Aḥmarī — ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Sābāṭ al-Aḥmarī:[1053] The Persians said to Rustam and al-Fayruzān, who were in charge of the Persians, [2209]

1050. That is, "We are going to drown."

1051. Text: al-Jazīrah; read: al-Ḥīrah, as Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXV.

1052. Text: Usaydī; read: Usayyidī.

1053. An otherwise unknown name that occurs only here. Probably the name is an invention, as the element "b. Sābāṭ" suggests "a son of the town of Sābāṭ." This town was part of the Madāʾin complex of cities and in fact is mentioned in this report. It also is possible that the name was suggested by that of the attested Meccan traditionist ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Sābiṭ, who died in 118/736 and therefore was of the same generation as the name proposed here. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 180–81. Elsewhere Sayf has not been above inserting bogus but reasonable-sounding names.

> To where are you being carried? Dispute has not left you alone, so that you have weakened the Persians and made their enemies greedy for them. The two of you have not reached such rank that Persia will concur with you in this opinion and that you expose it to perdition. After Baghdādh, Sābāṭ, and Tikrīt, there is only al-Madāʾin. By God, either you two truly unite, or else we will indeed begin with you before any malicious gloater rejoices at our misfortune.

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿUbaydallāh b. Muḥaffiz—his father: When the Muslims were plunging deeply into al-Sawād, the Persians said to Rustam,

> What are you waiting for, by God, unless it is for us to be beset [by misfortune] and destroyed? By God, none but you brought this weakness upon us, O leaders! You have divided the Persians and held them back from [dealing with] their enemy. By God, if killing you would not lead to our own annihilation, we would have hastened to kill you this hour. If you do not cease, we will most certainly destroy you and then perish ourselves having been cured of you [at least].

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: Al-Fayruzān and Rustam said to Būrān bt. Kisrā, "Write down for us the women of Kisrā and his concubines, and the women of the family of Kisrā and their concubines." She did so, and then forwarded that to them in a written document. Thereupon they sent forth [troops] to seek them, until not a woman remained among them but that they brought her. They took them in place of the men, putting them under torture to ask them to point out any male from the descendants of [2210] Kisrā, but no one of them was found among these women. They said — or someone among them said, "There remains only this boy called Yazdigird, who is of the sons of Shahriyār b. Kisrā[1054] and whose mother is from the people of Bādūrayā."[1055] They sent [troops] to her, who arrested her on account of him. She had lodged him in the days of Shīrā, when the latter gathered the females in al-Qaṣr al-

---

1054. The son and father of Persian kings, but never king himself and hardly more than a link in the Sāsānian family tree. See Ṭabarī, I, 1044, 2883.

1055. A district just west of Baghdād extending from the ʿĪsā and Ṣarāh canals in the north to the Ṣarṣar canal in the south. See *EI*², s.v. Bādūrayā; Le Strange, Lands, 31, 66–67, 80, map II; Morony, Iraq, 145–46.

Abyaḍ and killed the males. She arranged an appointed time with the boy's maternal uncles, then lowered him to them in a basket. Thus, they [now] asked her about him and arrested her on his account until she showed them where he was. They sent [men] to him, who brought him forth, then, having agreed upon him, they made him king when he was twenty-one years old. Persia felt secure [once more]. As they flocked in, the chiefs competed with one another in [offering] him obedience and aid. He named divisions for every outpost that Kisrā had held, or every frontier position. Thus, he named the divisions of al-Ḥīrah, al-Anbār, the outposts, and al-Ubullah.

That [news] about them and their agreeing on Yazdigird reached al-Muthannā and the Muslims. They wrote to ʿUmar about what they were expecting from those in their midst. The letter did not reach ʿUmar before the people of al-Sawād had rebelled (kafar), both those of them who had an agreement [with the Muslims] and those of them who had no agreement. Al-Muthannā led forth his own garrison until he stopped at Dhū Qār. The [other] troops came gradually to [gather] in a single camp in al-Ṭaff,[1056] until ʿUmar's letter came to them:

> Now then, go out from the midst of the Persians and scatter in the waters which lie next to the Persians on the borders of your land and their land. Do not leave among the Rabīʿah anyone, nor among the Muḍar nor their confederates anyone of the courageous, nor any horseman, but that you bring him with you. If they come willingly, [fine,] if not, draft them. Bring the Arabs around to earnestness, for the Persians are in earnest. Meet their earnestness with your earnestness. [2211]

Al-Muthannā encamped at Dhū Qār, and [other] troops camped at al-Jull and Sharāf as far as Ghuḍayy.[1057] (Ghuḍayy is before al-Baṣrah.) Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh was at Ghuḍayy, and Sabrah b. ʿAmr al-ʿAnbarī[1058] and those who had followed his example of those he had 1056. This was the desert plateau west of al-Kūfah, elevated above the flood plain of Iraq. See EI[1], s.v. al-Ṭaff; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 35–36.

---

1057. A watering place in the desert near al-Baṣrah belonging to the ʿĀmir b. Rabīʿah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 207.

1058. He is attested by Ibn Isḥāq as a member of a Tamīmī delegation to the Prophet. In 36/656, he is reported to have been governor of al-Yamāmah, perhaps for ʿAlī. See Ṭabarī, I, 1762, 1798, 1909–10, 1912, 3132; Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, II, 621; Ibn charge of [were spread] as far as Salmān.[1059] They formed [a line of] fortified posts in the waters of al-Ṭaff[1060] from their beginning to their end. These were able to see each other and could support each other if something occurred. That was in Dhū al-Qaʿdah of the year 13 [27 December 634–25 January 635].

Al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād, according to their isnād: The first act that ʿUmar undertook when he heard that the Persians had made Yazdigird king was to write to the Arab officials in charge [of taxation] of the [settled] districts and the [nomadic] tribes. That was in Dhū al-Ḥijjah of the year 13 [25 January 635–24 February 635], when he went forth to the pilgrimage. He made the pilgrimage during all the years of his [reign]. [He wrote,] "Do not leave anyone who has a weapon, a horse, courage, or sound counsel but that you select him and then send him to me. Hurry, hurry!" The messengers went to those to whom he had sent them at the time when he went forth to the pilgrimage. First, those tribes that lived near to Mecca and Medina came to him. As for those who resided from Medina as far as the midpoint between him and Iraq, they came to him at Medina after he had returned from the pilgrimage. As for those who were farther away than that, they joined al-Muthannā [directly]. As for those who came to ʿUmar, they urgently informed him about those behind him.[1061]

Al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Abū Maʿshar; and Ibn Ḥumayd—Salamah
[2212] —Ibn Isḥāq: ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf led the pilgrimage in the year 13.

Al-Muqaddamī[1062]—Isḥāq al-Farwī[1063]—ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿUmar—Nāfiʿ—Ibn ʿUmar: ʿUmar put ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf in charge of ʿAbd al-Barr, Istiʿāb, II, 76–77; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 13. According to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, I, 311, a Sabrah b. ʿAmr b. Ahnān b. Dithār b. Faqʿas was accounted one of the poets of the Arabs.

---

1059. This is yet another waterhole near Wāqiṣah and Sharāf. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 239; Musil, Northern Neǧd, 186 n. 100, 230, 236.

1060. Text: al-ʿIrāq; read: al-Ṭaff, as Cairo ed. and Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXV.

1061. This sentence would seem to refer to those who brought the alarm to ʿUmar from Iraq in the first place.

1062. Text: al-Maqaddī; read: al-Muqaddamī, as Ṭabarī, Introductio, Glossarium, Addenda et Emendanda, DCXV. He is Abū ʿUthmān Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr b. ʿAlī b. ʿAṭāʾ b. Muqaddam, the mawlā of the Thaqīf, d. 264/878, who came from a Baṣran family of traditionists but moved to Baghdād. See Samʿānī, Ansāb, XII, 393.

1063. Abū Yaʿqūb Isḥāq b. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Farwah, the mawlā of the family of the Caliph ʿUthmān, d. 226/841, he was a Medinan tradition-the pilgrimage in the year in which he began to rule; thus, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān led the pilgrimage. Then ʿUmar led the pilgrimage himself during all the years of his [reign] after that.

In this year—according to what has been reported—ʿUmar's governor of Mecca was ʿAttāb b. Asīd. ʿUthmān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣī was in charge of al-Ṭāʾif, Yaʿlā b. Munyah was in charge of Yemen, Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan was in charge of ʿUmān and al-Yamāmah, al-ʿAlāʾ b. al-Ḥaḍramī was in charge of al-Baḥrayn, Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ was in charge of Syria, and al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah was in charge of the frontier of al-Kūfah and that part of its land which had been conquered. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib—according to what has been reported—was in charge of the judiciary. It has also been said that during his reign ʿUmar had no judge.

---

ist with a fair reputation. His traditions from ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿUmar, who predeceased him by at least seventy-seven years, are criticized in Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 248. See also Samʿānī, Ansāb, X, 202; Dhahabī, Mīzān, I, 198–99.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XII

The Battle of al-Qādisiyyah and the Conquest of Syria and Palestine

TRANSLATED BY YOHANAN FRIEDMANN

The Events of the Year [2212]

14

(FEBRUARY 25, 635–FEBRUARY 13, 636)

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: ʿUmar set out on the first day of the month of Muḥarram of the year 14 (635) and halted near a spring called Ṣirār.[1] He established a camp there as the people did not know whether he wanted to go farther or to stay.

(When they wanted to ask ʿUmar something, they sent to him ʿUthmān or ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf. During ʿUmar's reign, ʿUthmān was called a radīf. They[2] have said: In the language of the Bedouins the radīf is a man (who rides) behind another man (on the back of the same mount); and the Arabs use the word for a [2213] person whom they want (to rule them) after (the death of) their ruler.[3] And, if ʿUthmān and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf[4] could not get the in-

1. A place situated three miles from Medina, on the way to Iraq. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 377.

2. The pronoun stands for either the Arab philologists or the Bedouins; both groups were renowned for their knowledge of classical Arabic.

3. For ridf (a variant of radīf) as a deputy and aid to the kings of al-Ḥīrah, see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. r-d-f; Jawharī, Tāj al-lugha, IV, 1363–64; Azharī, Tahdhīb, XIV, 96–98.

4. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf was one of the earliest converts to Islam and an influformation that they wanted, they directed the question for the third time to al-ʿAbbās.)[5]

ʿUthmān said to ʿUmar: "What has come to your knowledge? What is it that you want to do?" ʿUmar gave the call for a congregational prayer, the people gathered around him, and he passed the information to them. Then he considered what the people had to say. The troops (al-ʿāmmah) said: "Set out and take us with you." [Outwardly] he agreed with their view and did not want to dissociate himself from them without gently changing their opinion [first], and he said: "Prepare yourself and prepare your provisions and equipment, for I am about to set out unless an idea better than that comes up." Then he sent for the men of sound judgment (ahl al-raʾy). Prominent companions of the Prophet and Arab notables gathered around him. He said: "Let me have your opinion, for I am about to set out." All of them assembled and unanimously decided that he should stay, send out a man from the companions of the Prophet, and provide him with troops. If the desired victory should be attained, then this is what all of them wanted; if not, he would recall the man and recruit another army. This would enrage the enemy; the Muslims would regain their strength,[6] and God's victory would come through the fulfillment of God's promises.

ʿUmar called for congregational prayer, and the people gathered around him. He sent for ʿAlī, whom he had appointed to be his deputy in Medina, and ʿAlī came to him; and he also sent for Ṭalḥah, whom he had sent to command the vanguard, and he returned to him [as well]. On the two wings of the army he appointed al-Zubayr[7] and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf. ʿUmar stood up [to address] the people and said:

> Almighty God has united the people of Islam, reconciled their hearts, and made them brethren. In all matters con-ential personality in early Islamic history. See *EI*², s.v. "ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf" (M. Th. Houtsma and W. M. Watt), and the sources quoted there.

---

5. This parenthetical passage explains why it was ʿUthmān who asked ʿUmar about his plans.

6. Irʿawā means "he returned to the proper condition." The classical dictionaries do not mention the sense in which the word is used here, but de Goeje seems to have been correct in his suggestion, which I have followed. See Glossary, CCLXV.

7. Al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām was one of the earliest converts to Islam and a trusted Companion of the Prophet. See *EI*¹, s.v. "Al-Zubayr b. al-ʿAwwām" (A. J. Wensinck), and the sources quoted there.

cerning them, the Muslims are like on body; no part of it remains unaffected by something that afflicts another part.[8] Furthermore, it behoves the Muslims that their matters be decided in consultation among them,[9] or, rather, among the wise men among them (dhawū al-raʾy). The people are subordinate to those who undertake this command. What the latter agree upon and are satisfied with is incumbent upon the people, and the people are subordinate to them in it. And those who undertake this command are subordinate to the wise men: Whatever the latter deem appropriate and are satisfied with concerning battle strategy, the commanders are subordinate to them. O people! I am like one of you, so that the wise men from among you prevented me from setting out, and I saw fit to stay and to send another person [instead of me]. I have summoned for consultation on this matter the commander of the vanguard and the person whom I have left as my deputy in Medina. [2214] [ʿAlī was ʿUmar's deputy in Medina, and Ṭalḥah commanded the vanguard of the army in al-Aʿwaṣ.[10] ʿUmar called both of them [for consultation]].

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq — Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān — ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz: When ʿUmar came to know that Abū ʿUbayd b. Masʿūd[11] had been killed and that the people of Persia had rallied around someone from the family of Kisrā,[12] he called the Emigrants and the Helpers and set out for Ṣirār. He ordered Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh to move forward to Aʿwaṣ. He appointed ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf to command his right wing and al-

8. For a famous ḥadīth expressing the idea of Muslim solidarity in a similar way, see Muslim, Saḥīḥ, IV, 2000 (kitāb al-birr wa al-ṣilah wa al-adab, bāb 17): "The Muslims are like one person: If his eye has a reason for complaint, his entire body complains . . . (al-muslimūn ka-rajulin wāḥid: idhā ishtakā ʿaynuhu, ishtakā kulluhu . . .).

9. Cf. Qurʾān 42:38.

10. A place situated a few miles from Medina; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 317.

11. Abū ʿUbayd b. Masʿūd al-Thaqafī, the father of the famous al-Mukhtār b. Abī ʿUbayd, embraced Islam during the lifetime of the Prophet. He was killed in Iraq in the battle of the Bridge, which preceded the battle of al-Qādisiyyah. See (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 248–49; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VII, 267–68.

12. Kisrā is the Arabic form of Khusraw and was used by the Arabs as a title for all Sasanian kings. See *EI*², s.v. "Kisrā" (M. Morony).

Zubayr b. ʿAwwām the left wing, and he appointed ʿAlī to be his deputy in charge of Medina. He consulted the troops, and all of them advised him to set out for Persia. He had not engaged in consultation about what happened until he reached Ṣirār and Ṭalḥah returned, so he then consulted the people of sound judgment. Ṭalḥah was one of those who followed the view of the troops, and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was among those who advised ʿUmar against it. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān said:

> I have never said, and I shall never say, to anyone after the Prophet: "May my father and mother be your ransom!" [Still] I say: "May my father and mother be your ransom!"[13] Let me bear the responsibility for the outcome of this matter.[14] Stay and send an army. In the past, you have seen God's > [2215] decree concerning you in your soldiers, and you will see it also in the future. If your army is defeated, it is not the same as if you [yourself] were defeated. If you are killed or defeated at the outset, I am afraid that no Muslims will remain in existence."[15]

While ʿUmar was in search of a man [to command an expedition against the Persians], a letter from Saʿd [b. Abī Waqqāṣ], who was in charge of collecting alms in Najd, arrived in the wake of their consultations. ʿUmar said: "Suggest a man." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān said: "You have found him." ʿUmar said: "Who is he?" ʿAbd al-Raḥmān said: "Saʿd b. Mālik[16] [b. Abī Waqqāṣ], whose claws are like a lion's." The men of judgment went along with this suggestion.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Khulayd b. Zufar — his

---

13. Meaning: "I do not hold anyone in such a high regard as I hold you."

14. The expression ijʿal ʿajuzahā bī is difficult. For ʿajuz (pl. aʿjāz) in the sense of "outcome, result" (ʿawāqib), see (M.) Ibn al-Athīr, Gharīb al-ḥadīth, III, 185. Pace de Goeje, who, Addenda et Emendanda, (DCXV), vocalizes ʿajz and suggests understanding it as "impotentia."

15. The text reads: "I am afraid that Muslims will not say 'God is the greatest' and 'There is no god except Allāh.'" Cf. Masʿūdī, Murūj, IV, 203: "... if you are defeated or killed, the Muslims will apostatize and will never attest that there is no god except Allāh ..." (... innaka in tuḥzam aw tuqtal yakfur al-muslimūn wa lā yashhadūna an lā ilāh illā Allāh abadan ...).

16. Mālik and Abū Waqqāṣ are one and the same person. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ was one of the first converts and supporters of the Prophet. He played an important role in the battles of nascent Islam. He considered himself "the first person to shoot an arrow in the way of God." See EI[1], s.v. "Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ" (K. V. Zetterstéen); Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III/i, 97ff.

father: Al-Muthannā[17] wrote to ʿUmar that the Persians had rallied around Yazdagird, and he informed him about their military expeditions and about the situation of the ahl al-dhimmah. ʿUmar wrote to him: "Move to the desert, call upon (the tribes) adjacent to you, and stay close to the Persians on the border between your land and their land until you receive my orders." The Persians attacked the Muslims first, their troops fought them, and the ahl al-dhimmah rose against them. Al-Muthannā set out with his men, went to Iraq, and dispersed them all over the country. They established garrisons between Ghudayy[18] and Quṭquṭānah;[19] the garrisons of Kisrā and his forward outposts withdrew, and the situation in Persia settled down. The Persians were stricken with awe and fear. The Muslims set out against them in large numbers and attacked them fiercely, like a lion who struggles with his prey and attacks time and again. The Arab commanders had to hold them back, so that they might wait for ʿUmar's instructions and reinforcements.

According to al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā — Shuʿayb b. Ibrāhīm — Sayf b. ʿUmar — Sahl b. Yūsuf — al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad: Abū Bakr had appointed Saʿd (b. Abī Waqqāṣ) to collect the alms of Hawāzin[20] in Najd, and ʿUmar confirmed his appointment. When ʿUmar was recruiting the people, he wrote to Saʿd [as he did to the other governors] and asked him to choose horsemen and [other] armed fighting men, people with sound judgment and valor. Saʿd replied by letter, in which he listed the men whom he was able to gather, with God's help. Saʿd's letter reached ʿUmar after he had consulted the people [in an attempt to select] a man [to command the expedition], and, when Saʿd's name came up, they suggested appointing him. [2216]

17. Al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah al-Shaybānī embraced Islam in the year 9 or 10/630–2 and fought in Iraq under Abū Bakr and ʿUmar. Because of the initiatives that he took in the Iraq campaigns, ʿUmar used to say that al-Muthannā "made himself an amīr." He is said to have encouraged the Muslims to wage war against Persia and predicted that it would be an easy one. See (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 299–300; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 766–67.

18. For Ghudayy, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 806–7. Ṭabarī, I, 2211, locates it "opposite al-Baṣrah" (ḥiyāl al-Baṣrah).

19. Al-Quṭquṭānah was a spring situated west of the site where al-Kūfah was later founded. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 137; III, 539, s.v. "Ṭaff"; Morony, Iraq, 151; Ṣ. A. ʿAlī, "Minṭaqat al-Kūfah" 246–47.

20. Hawāzin was a large northern Arabian tribe, subdued by the Prophet in the battle of Ḥunayn (Shawwāl 8/January – February 630). See *EI*², s.v. "Hawāzin" (W. M. Watt), "Ḥunayn" (H. Lammens).

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ was in charge of collecting the alms of Hawāzin. ʿUmar instructed him, as he instructed others, to choose men of sound judgment and valor, possessing weapons or horses. He received Saʿd's reply, saying: "I have chosen for you one thousand armed horsemen. All are distinguished by valor, sound judgment, and prudence; they are [well known for] protecting the families and the inviolable property of their tribes. They epitomize their people's virtues, and their views are highly respected. They are at your disposal." Saʿd's letter arrived when ʿUmar was consulting the people. They said: "You have found the man." He asked: "Who is he?" They said: "A charging lion." He asked [again]: "Who is he?" They said: "Saʿd." ʿUmar accepted their advice and sent for Saʿd. When Saʿd came, ʿUmar put him in charge of the war in Iraq and admonished him, saying:

> O Saʿd, Saʿd of Banū Wuhayb![21] You must not allow yourself to be deluded into deviation from [the way of] God if it is said: [This is] the uncle of the Messenger of God [and that is] one of his Companions.[22] God will not eradicate one bad thing by means of another but will rather eradicate a bad thing with a good one. For there is no relationship between God and any human being except obedience. In the eyes of God[23] people are equal, regardless of rank; God is their Master, and they are His servants. They differ from each other in their well-being, and they achieve God's favor by observing [His commandments]. Ponder the way in which the Prophet behaved since the beginning of his mission and until his death; stick to it, because this is the proper behavior. This is my admonition to you! If you disregard it and turn away from it, your endeavor will fail, and you will be one of the losers.[24]

[2217]

When ʿUmar was about to send Saʿd off, he called him back once again and said:

---

21. Wuhayb was Saʿd's grandfather; see Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III/i, 97 l. 8.

22. That is to say, do not grant favors to anyone, regardless of his kinship or companionship with the Prophet and his consequent standing in Islam.

23. The original reads: fī dhāt Allāh.

24. Alluding to Qurʾān 5:7.

I have appointed you to wage war in Iraq. Remember my admonition because you are about to engage in a difficult and hateful matter. None but God will keep [you] safe from [the dangers involved in] it. Make virtue the habit of yourself and of your associates, and seek divine help by means of it. Know that every habit has its requisites, and the requisite of virtue is endurance. You must therefore endure what afflicts you, or afflicts you repeatedly, and fear God. Know that fear of God consists of two things: being obedient to Him and avoiding rebellion against Him. One obeys Him by hating this world and loving the hereafter; one hates Him by loving this world and hating the hereafter. In people's hearts there are realities (ḥaqā'iq), which God creates. Two of these are what is secret (sirr) and what is publicly proclaimed ('alaniyyah). The latter means that [in the eyes of an upright person][25] people who praise him and people who blame him are equal when he acts for the sake of the truth (an yakūna ḥāmiduhu wa dhāmmuhu fī al-ḥaqq sawā').[26] As for what is secret, it becomes known by the appearance of wisdom from his heart on his tongue and by the love of the people. Therefore do not refrain from making yourself loved, for the prophets sought people's love. When God loves someone, He makes him loved; if He hates someone, He makes him hated. Regard your standing in the eyes of the people who joined you in this affair as an indication of your standing in the eyes of God.[27]

---

25. De Goeje suggests in a note to this passage that the person intended here is the amīr.

26. Equanimity with regard to people's blame or praise is a frequently mentioned characteristic of the ideal Muslim and particularly of the zāhid. See, e.g., Ibn Ḥanbal, Zuhd, 158; Ibn al-Mubārak, Zuhd, 52 (separate pagination at the end of the book). A similar idea is expressed in the oath of allegiance taken by the early Muslims. They promised to the Prophet "... to speak the truth wherever we are and not to fear anyone's blame, [when acting] for the sake of God (... an naqūla bi-'l-ḥaqq haythu-mā kunnā wa-lā nakhāfa fī Allāh lawmata lā'imin). See Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, IV, 401–2 (kitāb al-aḥkām, 43). For further occurrences of this tradition, see Wensinck et al., Concordance, s.v. lawmah. The same attitude of disregarding blame should be taken by those who apply the punishments prescribed in the Qur'ān (ḥudūd); see Ibn Mājah, Sunan, II, 849 (kitāb al-ḥudūd, bāb 3). See also Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 233.

27. Muslim tradition maintains that, if God loves someone, He instructs Gabriel and the people of heaven to love him as well; such a person also gains acceptance on

Then ʿUmar sent him out with the warriors who had joined him in Medina. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ set out from Medina in the direction [2218] of Iraq with four thousand men. Three thousand came from the Yemen and al-Sarāt.[28] The people of the Sarawāt were led by Ḥumayḍah b. al-Nuʿmān b. Ḥumayḍah al-Bāriqī,[29] and they [belonged to the clans of] Bāriq, Almaʿ, Ghāmid, and the rest of their brethren. The people of al-Sarāt were seven hundred, and the people of Yemen were two thousand and three hundred [fighting men]. Among them was al-Nakhaʿ b. ʿAmr. All of them numbered [in total] four thousand people, including the fighting men, their children, and their wives. ʿUmar came to see them in their camp and wanted all of them to proceed to Iraq, but they insisted on going to Syria. ʿUmar insisted on Iraq; eventually half of the people complied, and he sent them to Iraq, and he sent the other half to Syria.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ḥanash al-Nakhaʿī—his father and others: ʿUmar came to see them in their camp and said: "Honor is abundant among you, O people of Nakhaʿ. Proceed with Saʿd." They wanted to go to Syria. He insisted on Iraq, and they insisted on Syria. So he sent half of them to Syria and the other half to Iraq.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Munstanīr, and Ḥanash: Six hundred of the fighters were from Ḥaḍramawt and al-Ṣadif,[30] commanded by Shaddād b. Ḍamʿaj. One thousand and three hundred were from Madhḥij,[31] commanded by [2219] three chieftains: Banū Munabbih under ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib;[32] the earth. Accordingly, ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz is said to have been loved by God, in view of the affection that the people displayed toward him. See Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, IV, 2030–31 (kitāb al-birr wa-al-ṣilah wa-al-adab, bāb 48).

---

28. A mountain range parallel to the southwestern coast of the Arabian peninsula. See *EI*², s.vv. "al-ʿArab, Djazīrat" (G. Rentz), 536a, "ʿAsīr" (R. Headley et al.), 707b; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 65.

29. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 130 no. 1850.

30. A region in the Yemen. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 375.

31. For this tribe of Yemeni extraction, see *EI*², s.v. "Madhḥidj" (G. R. Smith—C. E. Bosworth).

32. ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib was a famous warrior and mukhaḍram poet of Yemeni extraction. He converted to Islam in 10/631 but after the Prophet's death took part in the riddah of al-Aswad al-ʿAnsī, the Yemeni claimant to prophethood. After the suppression of the rebellion he joined the Muslims again and distinguished himself in the battles of al-Qādisiyyah and al-Yarmūk. His poetry and other materials concerning him have been collected in Ṭaʿʿān, Dīwān; and in Tarābīshī, Shiʿr ʿAmr. Some of ʿAmr's poems reflect his displeasure at the treatment he received from Saʿd

Ju'fī, the brothers of Jaz' allied with the Ju'fī, the Zubayd, the Anas Allāh, and those connected with them under Abū Sabra b. Dhu'ayb; and three hundred men from Ṣudā', Janb, and Musliyah under Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith al-Ṣudā'ī. These are the people of Madhḥij who participated in [the battle of] al-Qādisiyyah, together with those who set out from Medina with Sa'd. One thousand men from Qays 'Aylān [also] set out with him, commanded by Bishr b. 'Abdallāh al-Hilālī.[33]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Ubaydah—Ibrāhīm: The people [who were about to participate in the battle] of al-Qādisiyyah[34] set out from Medina and were four thousand: three thousand from the people of Yemen and one thousand from the rest [of the Arabs].

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Sahl—al-Qāsim: 'Umar accompanied the troops from Ṣirār to al-A'waṣ. Then he stood up to address them and said:

> God has made for you similitudes and clarified for you the words in order to infuse new life into the hearts, because the hearts are dead in their chests until God revives them. Whoever knows something, let him benefit from it. Justice has its signs (amārāt) and indications (tabāshīr), and these signs are diffidence, generosity, and gentleness. The indication of justice is mercy. God has provided for everything a door and for every door a key; the door of justice is reflection, and its key is piety (zuhd). Reflection is remembering death [2220] > by keeping in mind those who have died and preparing oneself for it by performing the commandments. Piety is taking what is due from everybody who owes it and giving what is due to everybody who has a right to it.[35] Do not grant favor

b. Abī Waqqāṣ; see Ṭa''ān, 99, 108. See also Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 686–93; *EI*², s.v. "'Amr b. Ma'dīkarib" (Ch. Pellat).

33. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 299–300 no. 655.

34. For a description of the battle of al-Qādisiyyah and for an analysis of the historiographical and other problems connected with it, see *EI*², s.v. "al-Ḳādisiyya" (L. Veccia Vaglieri), and the sources mentioned there. See also Yusuf, "Qadisiyya."

35. Recent studies have shown that zuhd encompasses not only asceticism but also upright behavior, piety, and integrity in the more general sense. The zuhd of a ruler is, according to this passage, upholding justice in society. For a somewhat similar definition of zuhd, see Makkī, Qūt al-qulūb, II, 199: "... taking a thing from where it is and putting it where it should be" (... al-zuhd fī al-dunyā huwa ... akh-

to anyone in this matter. Do not give more than bare livelihood; a person who is not satisfied with this, nothing will make him content. I am between you and God, and nobody is between me and Him. God has obliged me to prevent [your] petitions from reaching Him; bring your complaints therefore to us.[36] Whoever is not able to do this, let him hand the complaint over to someone who can bring it to us; we shall willingly take whatever is due to him on his behalf [and hand it over to him].

Then he ordered Saʿd to begin the march and said: "When you reach Zarūd[37] halt in it, and spread your men in the area around it. Call upon the local people and choose from them men who possess courage, judgment, power, and weapons."

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad b. Sūqah — a man: Four hundred Sakūnīs passed by with the vanguard of the tribe of Kindah, with Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr al-Sakūnī[38] and Muʿāwiyah b. Ḥudayj, and ʿUmar encountered them. Among them, with Muʿāwiyah b. Ḥudayj,[39] were young men of black complexion and straight hair. ʿUmar turned his face away from them several times until it was said to him: "Do you have anything against these people?" He said: "I am perplexed with regard to them. No Arab tribe more hateful to me than these has ever passed by me." He then let them go, but he frequently mentioned them with hatred, and people were puzzled by ʿUmar's view. Among the Sakūnīs was a per-[2221] son called Sūdān b. Ḥumrān, who killed ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān.[40]

---

dhu al-shay'i min wajhihi wa-waḍ'uhu fī ḥaqqihi]. Returning things to their rightful owners is mentioned also in descriptions of the Last Judgment, and the language is similar. See, e.g., Ibn al-Mubārak, Zuhd, 497–98 no. 1416. On zuhd in general, see also Ibn Abī al-Dunyā, Dhamm al-dunyā, 20–22; Kinberg, "Zuhd." For a translation and discussion of this passage, see Noth, Studien, 83–84.

36. The plural pronoun here and in the next two sentences refers to ʿUmar himself.

37. Zarūd was located on the pilgrims' road leading from al-Kūfah to the Ḥijāz. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 928; Thilo, Ortsnamen, 116.

38. Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr al-Sakūnī became governor of Ḥimṣ under the Umayyad caliph Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah and participated in the war against ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr in Mecca. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, index; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 392 no. 683; *EI*², s.v. "al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr" (H. Lammens—[V. Cremonesi]); Crone, Slaves, 97.

39. Muʿāwiyah b. Ḥudayj al-Sakūnī later participated in the conquest of North Afrika and acquired a position of influence in Egypt. See [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 383–84. See also note 42, below.

40. See Ṭabarī, I, 3001, 3018, 3021; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III/i, 51.

One of their confederates was Khālid b. Muljam,[41] who killed ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. One of them was Muʿāwiyah b. Ḥudayj,[42] who, together with others, pursued the assassins of ʿUthmān, in order to kill them. Among them were also people who provided shelter and hospitality to the assassins of ʿUthmān.[43]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah—Māhān and Ziyād: ʿUmar reinforced Saʿd, after he had left Medina, with two thousand Yemenis and two thousand armed Najdīs from Ghaṭafān[44] and other tribes of Qays.[45] Saʿd reached Zarūd at the onset of winter and halted there, and the soldiers spread out around the place, in the watering places (amwāh) of Tamīm and Asad. He waited for the [fighting] men to gather there and for the instructions of ʿUmar. He chose four thousand warriors from Tamīm and al-Ribāb: three thousand from Tamīm and one thousand from al-Ribāb. He [also] chose three thousand from Asad and ordered them to camp on the border of their land, between al-Ḥazn[46] and al-Basīṭah.[47] They stayed there, between the armies of Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ and al-Muthannā b. al-Ḥārithah. Al-Muthannā's army consisted of eight thousand men from Rabīʿah: six thousand from Bakr b. Wāʾil and two thousand from the rest of Rabīʿah. He chose four thousand of them after the departure of Khālid (b. al-Walīd); the other four thousand were those who survived the battle of the Bridge. Also with him were two thousand Yemenis of Bajīlah and two thousand from Quḍāʿah and Ṭayyiʾ. These were chosen in addition to 41. See *EI*², s.v. "Ibn Muldjam" (L. Veccia Vaglieri). The name of ʿAlī's assassin is usually given as ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAmr; see Ṭabarī, I, 3468, and cited article for the various nisbahs of Ibn Muljam, including Sakūnī.

42. See Ṭabarī, I, 3392.

43. These details are given in order to explain ʿUmar's negative attitude toward the Sakūnīs: He had a premonition of their future misdeeds.

44. Ghaṭafān is a northern Arabian tribe, belonging to the Qays ʿAylān. See *EI*², "Ghaṭafān" (J. M. Fück).

45. Qays ʿAylān is a large northern Arabian tribe, represented in the genealogies as one of the two subdivisions of Muḍar. See *EI*², s.v. "Ḳays ʿAylān" (W. M. Watt).

46. Several areas in Iraq and the Arabian peninsula were known as al-Ḥazn, or "rough terrain" (al-ghalīẓ min al-arḍ). The one intended here is probably Ḥazn Yarbūʿ, in the vicinity of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 260–62.

47. Yāqūt defines basīṭah as "flat land, covered with well-formed pebbles, without water or pasture, land of God most remote from population" (arḍ mustawiyah fīhā ḥaṣan manqūsh aḥsan mā yakūn wa-laysa bihā māʾun wa-lā marʿan abʿadu arḍ Allāh min sukkān). The place intended here lies between al-Kūfah and Ḥazn Yarbūʿ. See Yāqūt Muʿjam, I, 626–27.

those who had been with him before. The Ṭayyiʾ were commanded by ʿAdī b. Ḥātim;[48] the Quḍāʿah by ʿAmr b. Wabarah;[49] and the Bajīlah by Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh.[50] This being the situation, Saʿd wanted al-Muthannā to come to him, and al-Muthannā wanted Saʿd to come [2222] to him. Al-Muthannā died from injuries that he had suffered in the battle of the Bridge and that had failed to heal. He had appointed Bashīr b. al-Khaṣāṣiyyah[51] to take over his command. Saʿd was at that time in Zarūd. Some notables of Iraq were [at the time] with Bashīr. With Saʿd were a few people from Iraq who had gone as a delegation to ʿUmar. Among them were Furāt b. Ḥayyān al-ʿIjlī[52] and ʿUtaybah, whom ʿUmar had sent [back to Iraq] with Saʿd.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad and Ziyād—Māhān: This is the reason why opinions differ regarding the number of people [who fought in the battle] of al-Qādisiyyah. Whoever says that they were four thousand means [only] those who had been with Saʿd when he set out from Medina. Whoever says that they were eight thousand means those who gathered at Zarūd. Whoever says that they were nine thousand means [also] the Qaysīs [who joined the army]. Whoever says that they were twelve thousand includes also the three thousand Asadīs from the upper part of al-Ḥazn.

ʿUmar then ordered Saʿd to march forward. He headed in the direction of Iraq while the army concentrated in Sharāf.[53] When ʿUmar

---

48. See EP, s.v. "ʿAdī b. Ḥātim" [A. Schaade].

49. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 156 no. 6523.

50. Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh, a chieftain of the tribe of Bajīlah, embraced Islam in Ramaḍān 10/December 631 in Medina, together with 150 members of his tribe. ʿUmar entrusted him with keeping together the disunited factions of his tribe. He is said to have been a handsome man and to have received the nickname "the Joseph of this community" (Yūsuf hādhihi al-ummah). See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/ii, 77–8; Ṭabarī, I, 1763; [Ṭ.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 279–80; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 475–76 no. 1138; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, V, 77–79; Crone, Slaves, 114–15.

51. See [Ṭ.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 193–94; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 311 no. 691, 314–15 no. 705; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 463 no. 854, 467–68 no. 866.

52. Furāt b. Ḥayyān al-ʿIjlī was a member of the tribe of Quraysh who served as spy and scout in Abū Sufyān's wars. He was taken prisoner in one of the early skirmishes between the Muslims and the Meccans (or in the battle of the Ditch). The Prophet spared his life after he embraced Islam. Later he participated in the suppression of the riddah in Baḥrayn and settled in al-Kūfah. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, II/i, 25; IV/ii, 78; VI, 25; and index. See also [Ṭ.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 175–6; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 258 no. 478; Ibn Ḥabīb, Muḥabbar, 329–30.

53. Sharāf is an oasis situated 8 miles from al-Aḥsāʾ, in the northeastern part of the Arabian peninsula. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 270.

reached Sharāf, al-Ashʿath b. Qays[54] joined him with one thousand and seven hundred Yemenis.

The number of those who participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah was thirty odd thousand. The number of those who received shares from the spoils of al-Qādisiyyah was approximately thirty thousand.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿUmayr—Ziyād—Jarīr: The Yemenis had inclinations toward Syria and the Muḍarīs toward Iraq. ʿUmar said to the Yemenis: "Are your family relationships moore deeply rooted than ours? Why do the Muḍarīs not remember their Syrian ancestors?"

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Abū Saʿd b. al-Marzubān — a person who informed him — Muḥammad b. Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān: No Arab tribe was more courageous in the war against the Persians than Rabīʿah; the Muslims used to call them "Rabīʿah of the Lion" in addition to the epithet "Rabīʿah of the Horse."[55] The Arabs in the pre-Islamic period used to call the Persians and the Byzantines "Lion."[56] [2223]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah—Māhān: ʿUmar said: "By God, I shall indeed defeat the kings of the Persians by the kings of the Arabs!" He did not fail to send against them any chieftain, any man of judgment, any nobleman, any man of rank, any orator, or any poet—and sent against them the most noble and illustrious people.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAmr—al-Shaʿbī: ʿUmar wrote to Saʿd when he was about to leave Zarūd: "Send someone you trust to [al-Ubullah, known as] 'the opening for India' (farj al-Hind).[57] He will stay in front of it and protect you from any [danger]

54. See EI², s.v. "al-Ashʿath" (H. Reckendorf); Ibn Al-Athīr, Usd, I, 97–99; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 87–89 no. 205; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 359.

55. The tribe of Rabīʿah had been given the epithet "Rabīʿah of the Horse" because, when Nizār, the father of Muḍar and Rabīʿah, distributed their inheritance, he gave the gold to Muḍar and the horses to Rabīʿah. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/i, 30 l. 17; Ṭabarī, I, 1109, 1110; Jawharī, Tāj al-lughah, s.vv. "Muḍar," "Rabīʿah"; Ibn Munabbih, Tījān, 212–13; Caskel and Strenziok, Ǧamharat, II, 481a. Because of their bravery in the wars against the Persians, Rabīʿah acquired the additional epithet "Rabīʿah of the Lion."

56. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2046.

57. Farj means literally "an opening." It is used for an area that gives access to a country or a city. It also came to mean a frontier from which Muslims could stage commercial or military expeditions to areas beyond their control. Thus Sind and that may emerge from there." Saʿd sent al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah[58] with five hundred men. He was opposite al-Ubullah, in Arab land; he then went to Ghuḍayy and camped with Jarīr (b. ʿAbd Allāh al-Bajalī), who was there at the time.[59]

When Saʿd established his camp at Sharāf he informed ʿUmar of his location and of the locations of his men between Ghuḍayy and al-Jabbānah.[60] ʿUmar wrote to him:

> When you receive this letter of mine, organize the people in groups of ten, and appoint a leader for each group; appoint amīrs for the military units, and arrange them in battle or-> [2224] der.[61] Order the Muslim chieftains to come to you, evaluate them in their presence, and then send them to their men, and instruct them to meet at al-Qādisiyyah; and take with you al-Mughīrah b. al-Shuʿbah, together with his horsemen. Then inform me in writing about the situation of the troops.

Saʿd sent for al-Mughīrah and the tribal chieftains. They came to him, and he evaluated the troops and arranged them in battle order in Sharāf. He appointed commanders for the military units and appointed group leaders for every group of ten, as was the custom during the lifetime of the Prophet. These units remained in existence until the military payment system (ʿaṭāʾ) was introduced.[62]

Khurāsān, or Sijistān and Khurāsān, came to be known as al-farjāni, "the two openings" (see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. farj). The city of Multān in Sind came to be known as farj bayt al-dhahab, "the opening for the house of gold," i.e., the place where Muslims gained access to the rich temple of Multān (see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 440). Farj al-Hind means, therefore, an area from which an expedition to India may be staged. Al-Ubullah, situated on the Tigris near the head of the Persian Gulf, was known by this and similar epithets; see Ṭabarī, I, 2016, 2021, 2380. See also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 341, where al-Ubullah is described as furḍat al-Baḥrayn wa-ʿUmān wa-al-Hind wa-al-Ṣīn, i.e., a harbor from which ships sail to the places mentioned. See also EI[1], s.v. "al-Obolla" (J. H. Kramers); Glossary, s.v. farj.

58. See EI[1], s.v. "al-Mughīra b. Shuʿba" (H. Lammens).

59. See Ṭabarī, I, 2211.

60. A number of places in the vicinity of al-Kūfah were known by this name. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, ii, 16–17.

61. For an explanation of the term taʿbiyah, "battle order," see Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, 272 (tr. F. Rosenthal, II, 76); Fries, Heereswesen, 69ff. Because of its traditional division into five parts, the army was also called al-khamīs; see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. kh-m-s. For a description of the battle order in various armies, see Mubārak Shāh, Ādāb al-ḥarb, 322–27 and passim.

62. See EI[2], s. vv. "ʿAṭāʾ" (Cl. Cahen), "Dīwān. i" (A. A. Duri).

Sa'd entrusted the banners to people who were the first to embrace Islam. He divided the people into groups of ten and appointed people of standing in Islam to lead them. He appointed men to be leaders in war and commanders for the vanguard, for the wings, for the rear guard, for the light cavalry (mujarradāt),[63] for the scouts, for the footmen and the horsemen. He always moved in battle order and did not deviate from it, except in accordance with 'Umar's written orders and his permission.

As for the commanders of the flanks (umarā' al-ta'biyah), he appointed Zuhrah b. 'Abdallāh b. Qatādah b. al-Ḥawiyyah b. Marthad b. Mu'āwiyah b. Ma'n b. Mālik b. Irthim b. Jusham b. al-Ḥārith al-A'raj[64] to command the vanguard. In the pre-Islamic period the king of Hajar[65] had made him a tribal chieftain (sayyid) and sent him to the Prophet. Having received permission, Zuhrah marched with the vanguard from Sharāf and arrived at al-'Udhayb.[66]

Sa'd appointed 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm[67] to command the right wing. 'Abdallāh was a Companion of the Prophet and was one of [2225] nine persons who came to the Prophet; Ṭalhah b. 'Ubaydallāh completed their group, which was then numbered at ten persons. They constituted an 'irāfah.[68] He appointed Shuraḥbīl b. al-Simṭ b. Shuraḥbīl al-Kindī[69] to command the left wing. Shuraḥbīl was a young man who had fought the people of the riddah, acquitted himself

63. The cavalry mentioned here seems to be "light" in the sense that it is unarmored. See Fries, Heereswesen, 42–3, 71. One should also consider the possibility of another meaning: a unit of cavalry that travels without heavy luggage and is not accompanied (and encumbered) by foot soldiers. For this meaning, jarīdah or jarīdat al-khayl is used. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. jarīdah; Dozy, Supplément, s.v.; de Goeje's Glossary to the text; Ṭabarī, I, 2060, ll. 13–14.

64. See ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 206; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 571–72.

65. Hajar was a town in Baḥrayn. See EI[1], s.v. "Hadjar" (Fr. Buhl); EI[2], s.v. "al-Ḥasā" (F. S. Vidal).

66. See note 92, below.

67. In addition to his participation in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah and in the conquest of al-Madā'in, 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'tamm fought in al-Mawṣil and Takrīt. He belonged to the tribe of 'Abs. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 240–41 no. 4969.

68. 'Irāfah was a group of ten to fifteen persons; see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 187; Fries, Heereswesen, 17–18. For the story of the 'irāfah of nine people that was completed by Ṭalḥah, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III/i, 156 ll. 6–10.

69. Shuraḥbīl b. al-Simṭ participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah and in the conquest of Ḥimṣ. He then became governor of Ḥimṣ on behalf of Mu'āwiyah and died there between 36/656–57 and 42/662–63. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII/i, 155; ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 391; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 329–30 no. 3874; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 322–23 no. 554.

well, and received recognition for it. In honor he surpassed al-Ash'ath (b. Qays al-Kindī) in Medina, until al-Kūfah was established (qad ghalaba al-Ash'ath 'alā al-sharaf fīmā bayna al-Madīnah ilā an ukhtuṭṭat al-Kūfah).[70] His father had gone to Syria with Abū 'Ubaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ.

Sa'd appointed Khālid b. 'Urfuṭah[71] as his deputy. 'Āṣim b. 'Amr al-Tamīmī al-'Amrī[72] was put in command of the rearguard, and Sawād b. Mālik al-Tamīmī commanded the scouts, Salmān b. Rabī'ah al-Bāhilī[73] the light cavalry, Ḥammāl b. Mālik al-Asadī[74] the infantrymen, and 'Abdallāh b. Dhī al-Sahmayn al-Khath'amī the horsemen. The commanders of the flanks (umarā' al-ta'biyah) were subordinate to the amīr, the group commanders (umarā' al-a'shār) to the commanders of the flanks; those entrusted with the flags (aṣḥāb al-rāyāt) to the group commanders, the tribal chiefs (ru'ūs al-qabā'il) to the commanders (quwwād)[75] and to those entrusted with the flags.

All [transmitters of these traditions] have said: Abū Bakr did not seek help from the apostates in the wars of the riddah or in the wars against the Persians.[76] 'Umar [on the other hand], recruited them but did not appoint any of them to a position of authority.[77]

---

70. The text of this passage is dubious, and the translation far from certain. In particular, the phrase fīmā bayna al-Madīnah ilā an ukhtuṭṭat al-Kūfah is problematic and could not be translated literally. Balādhurī (Futūḥ, 138) says that Shuraḥbīl vied with al-Ash'ath for supremacy in al-Kūfah; then he was transferred to Ḥimṣ at the request of his father. In ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr (Usd, II, 392) we read: wa-qad taqaddama nasabuhu fī (?) al-Ash'ath b. Qays al-Kindī. Ibn Ḥajar (Iṣābah, III, 330) has only ghalaba al-Ash'ath 'alā al-sharq (read al-sharaf). We can say, however, in general, that the passage reflects the rivalry between the former apostates—to whom al-Ash'ath belonged—and the Muslims who had not taken part in the riddah rebellion.

71. Khālid b. 'Urfuṭah, a member of Quḍā'ah and an ally of the Banū Zuhrah in Mecca, settled in al-Kūfah and later participated in the wars against the Khawārij. He died in 60/679–80, 61/680–81, or "after 64/683–84." See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 12; ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 95–96; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 244–5 no. 184; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 106–7 no. 198.

72. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 574 no. 4359.

73. Salmān b. Rabī'ah al-Bāhilī was a Companion of the Prophet and participated in the conquest of Syria and Iraq. He was known as "Salmān of the horses" (Salmān al-khayl) because he was responsible for the cavalry during the time of 'Umar. Later he became judge in al-Kūfah. See ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 327; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 136–37 no. 229; Ibn Abī Ḥātim, Jarḥ, II, 297.

74. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 119 no. 1818.

75. This rank of command has not been mentioned before.

76. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 1984.

77. But see Ṭabarī, I, 2457; according to a tradition mentioned there, 'Umar was willing to appoint former apostates to command small units of the army, not exceed-

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mujālid and ʿAmr and Saʿīd b. al-Marzubān: ʿUmar dispatched the physicians [with the army]. He appointed ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rabīʿah al-Bāhilī, known as Dhū al-Nūr ("the man of light"),[78] to be the judge and entrusted him also with supervising the spoils and dividing them. He made [2226]
Salmān al-Fārisī[79] responsible for the call to prayers and also ordered him to be the scout.[80]

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Abū ʿAmr — Abū ʿUthmān al-Nahdī: The translator [of the army] was Hilāl al-Hajarī and the secretary Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān.[81] When Saʿd completed the organization of the army and appointed reliable and responsible commanders to take care of every matter, he sent a letter to ʿUmar describing what he had done.

Al-Muʿannā b. Ḥārithah[82] and Salmā bint Khaṣafah al-Taymiyyah (of the clan of Taym al-Lāt)[83] came to Saʿd after he had written to ʿUmar about the way in which he organized his troops but before he received ʿUmar's reply and left Sharāf, heading for al-Qādisiyyah. They brought to him the last will (waṣiyyah) of al-Muthannā (b. Ḥārithah); he ordered them to rush it to Saʿd while he was still in Zarūd, but they were not able to accomplish this in time because they had been preoccupied by [the affair] of Qābūs b. Qābūs b. al-Mundhir.

The reason for this was that Āzādmard b. Āzādbih[84] sent Qābūs to al-Qādisiyyah, saying to him: "Call upon the Arabs and you will rule those who respond to you, in the tradition of your forefathers."

---

ing ten men (nafar) each. On the difference between Abū Bakr and ʿUmar in their attitudes to the former apostates, see Shaban, History, I, 26ff.

78. See (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 292.

79. Salmān al-Fārisī was a Companion of the Prophet who embraced Islam in Medina after the hijrah. As a prototype of the converted Persians, he occupies a prominent place in the Islamic tradition. See EI[1], "Salmān al-Fārisī" (G. Levi della Vida).

80. Al-rāʾid is the person who marches ahead of the tribe, or the troops, in search of water, good halting places, etc. A classical Arabic proverb says, "The scout does not mislead his people" (al-rāʾid lā yakdhibu qawmahu). See Maydānī, Amthāl, III, 188.

81. For Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān, also known as Ziyād b. Abīhi, see EI[1], s.v. "Ziyād b. Abīhi" (H. Lammens).

82. Al-Muʿannā b. Ḥārithah was the brother of al-Muthannā, for whom see note 17, above.

83. Salmā was the widow of al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah. See note 17, above; and 2227, below.

84. Āzādbih was the Persian governor of al-Ḥīrah. See Ṭabarī, I, 2037, 2191; Morony, Iraq, 187; Donner, Conquests, 180.

Qābūs went to al-Qādisiyyah and wrote to [the tribe of] Bakr b. Wā'il in the manner of al-Nuʿmān [b. Mundhir Abū Qābūs],[85] cajoling and threatening them. When this came to al-Muʿannā's knowledge, he set out from Dhū Qār,[86] attacked Qābūs at night, and killed him, together with his associates.[87] Then he returned to Dhū Qār, went together with Salmā to Saʿd, and brought to him the will, which included the views of al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah. They reached Saʿd while he was at Sharāf.

In his last will al-Muthannā advised Saʿd not to fight his enemy, and the enemy of the Persians who embraced Islam deep in their land, when their full force was gathered; he should rather fight them [2227] on their border, the border between the desert of the Arabs and the cultivated land of the Persians. If God should give victory to the Muslims, the land behind the enemy would be theirs. Should the outcome be different, they would fall back to a rear echelon[88] and would find their way more easily; their spirits would be higher in their own land, until God should give them another opportunity to attack.

When the will including the advice of al-Muthannā reached Saʿd, he invoked God's mercy upon him, appointed al-Muʿannā to al-Mu-

---

85. Al-Nuʿmān b. Mundhir Abū Qābūs was the last king of al-Ḥīrah, who died at the hands of Khusraw II in, or around, 602. See EI[1], s.v. "al-Nuʿmān b. al-Mundhir" (A. Moberg); CHI, IV, 3.

86. Dhū Qār was situated near the place where al-Kūfah was later founded. It became famous because it had been the site of a battle in which pre-Islamic Arabs had for the first time gained the upper hand against the Persians. See EI[2], s.v. "Dhū Ḳār" (L. Veccia Vaglieri); Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 10–12.

87. Al-Muʿannā's decisive action seems to have been caused by his apprehension that Qābūs was making an attempt to revive the power of the kingdom of al-Ḥīrah. Qābūs b. Qābūs b. al-Mundhir was the grandson of the last king of al-Ḥīrah and thus a natural candidate to revive its erstwhile power.

88. For fiʾah in this sense, see Lane, Lexicon, s.v.; Rowson, Marwānid Restoration, 9 (= Ṭabarī, II, 861). See also Ṭabarī, I, 2176, 2180, where ʿUmar describes himself as fiʾatu kulli muslimin, i.e., the safe place behind the front to which every Muslim can repair when in danger; and Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 192.

In the preceding sentence, Wellhausen (Skizzen, 152) suggested emending fa-lahum mā warāʾahum to lahā mā warāʾahā, with the translation "this victory will be decisive." As this passage explains why the Muslims should fight near their border rather than deep in the Persian territory, I tend to agree with de Goeje, who rejected Wellhausen's emendation (Addenda et Emendanda, DCXVI). Al-Muthannā seems to be saying that, if the Muslims win, the Persian territory will be theirs in any case; if they lose, they will be in a better situation militarily if the battle has taken place near their own land.

thannā's position, and bade his people well. He asked for Salmā's hand, married her, and consummated the marriage.

In the units of the army there were seventy odd men who had participated in the battle of Badr, around three hundred and ten men who were the Prophet's Companions since the Pledge of Good Pleasure (bayʿat al-riḍwān),[89] three hundred men who participated in the conquest of Mecca (fatḥ), and seven hundred sons of Companions, from all the Arab tribes.

While Saʿd was in Sharāf, he received ʿUmar's letter, expressing an opinion similar to that of al-Muthannā. At the same time ʿUmar wrote also to Abū ʿUbaydah (b. al-Jarrāḥ), and the letters were transmitted to both of them. In the letter to Abū ʿUbaydah ʿUmar ordered him to send six thousand Iraqis and all those who desired to go with them [to join Saʿd's army]. The text of his letter to Saʿd was as follows:

> After the preliminaries (ammā baʿdu): Set out from Sharāf in the direction of Persia, together with all the Muslims who are with you. Put your reliance in God and seek His help in all your affairs. Concerning the task in front of you, be aware that you are about to take on a nation that has great numbers and superior equipment. Their courage is great, and they live in a well-defended country. Though it is flat, it is hard of access because of its crevices, flood plains, and torrents,[90] except if you happen to arrive when the water is low. When you encounter the Persians or one of them, attack them first, and beware of waiting until their armies gather. Let them not deceive you, because they are deceitful and crafty, unlike you; you must exert full effort in the struggle against them. [2228]
>
> Al-Qādisiyyah was in the pre-Islamic period a gateway to Persia, in which they kept most of their provisions and essential [supplies] that they desired.[91] It is a spacious, fertile,

89. See Watt, Muḥammad at Medina, 50.

90. Daʾdaʾah, pl. daʾādiʾ, means "sound of stones falling into a stream" (ṣawtu waqʿi al-ḥijārah fī al-masīl). See Azharī, Tahdhīb, XIV, 237.

91. Li-mā yurīdūna min tilka al-āṣul is difficult. De Goeje suggests (Glossary, s.v. a-ṣ-l) that āṣul is to be understood as "war materials." Although this may not be far from the intended meaning, the word aṣl does not carry this connotation.

and fortified place, and in front of it are bridges and canals that are difficult to ford. When you arrive there, let your garrisons be near the points of entry. Let your people be on the border between the desert and the cultivated land, on the sandy tracks in between; then stay in your place, and do not move from it. When they find out that you are there, they will be perturbed. They will send against you their infantrymen, horsemen, and all. If you stand firm against your enemy, seek God's reward for fighting him, and intend to be faithful to your trust, then I hope that you will be granted victory and never again will enemies like these assemble against you. And, even if they do, they will do it in disheartened state.

If you lose the battle, the desert will be behind you. You will retreat from the edge of their cultivated land to the edge of your desert; there you will have more courage and will know the terrain better. Your enemies, on the other hand, will be fearful and ignorant of the terrain. Eventually, God will grant you victory over them and provide you with another opportunity to attack.

ʿUmar also wrote to Saʿd a letter stating the date on which he should move from Sharāf: "On such-and-such a day, move out with [2229] your men and halt between ʿUdhayb al-Hijānāt and ʿUdhayb al-Qawādis.[92] Spread the people eastwards and westwards." Then he received a response from ʿUmar, saying:

Now renew your commitment,[93] admonish your soldiers, and speak to them about [the necessity to have the right] intention and about seeking God's reward. Whoever becomes heedless about these two matters, let him revive them [in his heart]. Stand firm! Help will come from God according to the [purity of] intention, and reward will come according to what you sought.[94] Be cautious with those who are under your command and with the mission entrusted to you. Ask God to grant you well-being, and say frequently "There is no power and no strength except in God!" (lā ḥawla wa-lā quwwata illā bi-Allāh). Inform me in writing about the place where their army confronted you and who is the commander in charge of fighting you. The fact that I do not know what are you up against and what is the situation of your enemy has prevented me from writing to you certain things which I wanted to write, so describe for me the positions of the Muslims and the area between you and al-Madā'in, and let the description be as [precise as] if I were looking at the place myself. Keep me well informed of your affairs! Fear God, hope for Him, and do not be haughty! Know that God has made a promise to you, has taken this matter upon Himself, and will not break His promise. Be careful not to turn Him away from you, lest He put someone else in your place.

92. ʿUdhayb was a spring situated 4 miles from al-Qādisiyyah. Yāqūt [Muʿjam, III, 626] mentions this letter from ʿUmar as a proof that there were two places bearing this name. For an attempt to identify the exact location of these two places, see Musil, Middle Euphrates, 111 n. 62. See also Qudāmah b. Jaʿfar, Kharāj, 185–86, where ʿUdhayb is described as a garrison (maslaḥah) on the border of the desert between the land of the Arabs and the land of the Persians, 6 miles from al-Qādisiyyah. It was a port of entry into the Persian empire for travelers from the Ḥijāz. See Christensen, Sassanides, 415; Ibn Khurradādhbih, Masālik, 173.

93. Literally: "renew the pledge to your heart."

Sa'd wrote to 'Umar describing the area:

Al-Qādisiyyah is situated between the moat-canal (al-khandaq)[95] and al-'Atīq.[96] In the area to the left of it there is a dark body of water in a deep valley with entangled vegetation. It extends as far as al-Ḥīrah and runs between two roads. One is on high ground; the other is on the bank of a canal called al-Ḥuḍūḍ. Whoever follows it is able to see the [2230]

94. The idea is that a Muslim will receive from God reward for his deeds if he has performed them with a pure intention and with the desire to be rewarded. This desire is called ḥisbah or iḥtisāb. See Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, I, 22–23 (Kitāb al-īmān, 41) "... the deeds are judged by the intention and the reward sought; every man will be rewarded according to what he intended" (... inna al-a'māl bi-al-niyyah wa-al-ḥisbah wa-li-kulli 'mri'in mā nawā). A tradition attributed to 'Umar and expressing an idea similar to that in our text reads: "O people, seek reward for your deeds. Whoever seeks reward for his deed will be rewarded for [both] his deed and his desire" (ayyuhā al-nās iḥtasibū a'mālakum fa-inna man iḥtasaba 'amalahu kutiba lahu ajru 'amalihi wa-ajru ḥisbatihi). See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-'Arab, s.v. ḥ-s-b.

95. This canal, or system of canals, ran on the edge of the desert from Hīt on the Euphrates to the head of the Persian Gulf. Its construction is attributed to the Sasanian king Shāpūr II in the fourth century. See Le Strange, Lands, 65; Morony, Iraq, 152–53; and the sources mentioned there.

96. For an attempt to identify the exact location of this canal, see Musil, Middle Euphrates, p. 111 n. 62.

area between al-Khawarnaq[97] and al-Ḥīrah. To the left of al-Qādisiyyah, as far as al-Walajah,[98] there is a flood plain.

All the ahl al-sawād who had concluded peace with the Muslims before me now support the Persians, are obedient to them, and are ready to fight us. The person whom they designated to fight against us is Rustam, and other Persians like him. They try to make us act heedlessly and to throw us off balance, and we try to do the same and [also] try to draw them into the open field. God's command will soon be put into effect; His decree will deliver us to the fate that He determines, whether it be for good or for evil. We ask God to decree in our favor and keep us well.

ʿUmar wrote to Saʿd: "I have received your letter and have understood it. Stay where you are until God throws your enemy off balance, and know that other [battles] will follow.[99] If God grants you victory over them, do not stop the pursuit until you force your way into al-Madāʾin. God willing, this will be the destruction of the city." ʿUmar started to pray especially for Saʿd. Others prayed with him for Saʿd and for the Muslims in general.

Saʿd sent Zuhrah (b. al-Ḥawiyyah) forward to camp at ʿUdhayb al-Hijānāt. Then he followed on his tracks and stayed with him there.

---

97. Al-Khawarnaq was a castle situated 1 mile east of al-Najaf. According to the Arab tradition, it was built for al-Nuʿmān b. Imriʾ al-Qays, the king of al-Ḥīrah (A.D. 405–33), on the orders of the Sasanian king. The castle became famous in Arab lore because al-Nuʿmān killed Sinnimār, the architect of the castle, in order to prevent the construction of a similarly sumptuous building for someone else. The story gave rise to the proverbial "reward of Sinnimār" jazāʾ Sinnimār). See Maydānī, Amthāl, I, 283. See also *EI*² s.v. "al-Khawarnaḳ" (L. Massignon), Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 490–94. For a description of the ruins of al-Khawarnaq, see Musil, Middle Euphrates, 104–6.

98. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 939; Donner, Conquests, 329 and index.

99. This translation of iʿlam anna lahā mā baʿdahā is tentative. It seems to be supported by similar passages, such as inna hādha yawmun lahu mā baʿdahu min al-ayyām (Ṭabarī, I, 2611 l. 15, 2613, l. 2). See also I, 2092, ll. 11–12: "This is a day [of battle], which will be followed [by other days]; if we throw them back to their trenches today, we shall keep on throwing them back. But, if they defeat us, we shall not succeed in the future" (wa hādha yawmun lahu mā baʿdahu. in radadnāhum ilā khandaqihim al-yawm, lam nazal narudduhum: wa-in hazamūnā, lam nuflih baʿdahā).

A. Noth, who has collected and analyzed these passages (Studien, 118), agrees with Wellhausen (cf. note 88, above) in suggesting that these expressions indicate the decisiveness of the battle. Although this meaning is implied here, it does not seem to be the primary meaning of the expressions quoted above.

Later he sent him on farther to camp in al-Qādisiyyah, between al-ʿAtīq and the moat-canal, opposite the bridge. Qudays was at that time one mile downstream from the bridge.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Qaʿqāʿ: ʿUmar wrote to Saʿd:

> I have been given the feeling that you will defeat the enemy when you encounter him. Therefore cast your doubts away and choose firm faith[100] instead. Should any one of you joke with a Persian about safe-conduct (amān) or approach him with a hint, or say to him a word that the Persian will not understand and will construe as a safe-conduct, then act as if he had been given one. Beware of frivolity. Be faithful, because mistaken faithfulness is virtue,[101] but mistaken betrayal [entails] perdition; it will be a source of your weakness and of your enemies' strength. You will lose your predominance, and they will gain ascendance.[102] I am warning you not to be a disgrace to the Muslims and a cause of their humiliation. [2231]

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAbdallāh b. Muslim al-ʿUklī and al-Miqdām b. Abī al-Miqdām — his father — Karib b. Abī Karib al-ʿUklī, who was in the vanguard in the battle days of al-Qādisiyyah: Saʿd sent us forward from Sharāf, and we camped in ʿUdhayb al-Hijānāt. Then he went forth. When he was with us at ʿUdhayb al-Hijānāt, that being at dawn, Zuhrah b. al-Ḥawiyyah set out with the vanguard. When we were able to see ʿUdhayb, which was one of the Persian garrisons, we perceived people on its towers. Wherever we looked, on a tower or between two battlements, we saw a man. We were with the advance horsemen, so we halted until [more of] the troops joined us. We thought that [Persian] horsemen were in ʿUdhayb. We then set out in the direction of ʿUdhayb, and, when we drew near, a man rushed out, running in the direction of al-Qādisiyyah. We finally reached ʿUdhayb, entered it, and found that it had been abandoned. That was the man who appeared to us on the [2232]

---

100. Translating al-yaqīn, a variant mentioned in the notes, rather than taqiyyah of the text.

101. For baqiyyah in this sense, see Spitaler, "Baqīja."

102. For dhahāb rīḥihim, see Qurʾān 8:46.

towers and between the battlements as a ruse and then hurried to inform the Persians of our arrival. We went out in pursuit but failed to seize him. Zuhrah heard about it and rushed out himself, pursuing him,[103] saying: "If the scout escapes, they will receive the information!" He caught up with him at the moat, stabbed him, and threw him into the moat. The people who participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah admired the courage of this man and his military knowledge; there has never been a spy, in any nation, who stood his ground better or was more resolute than this Persian. If he had not had to run such a great distance, Zuhrah would not have caught up with him and would not have killed him.

The Muslims found in ʿUdhayb spears, arrows, leather baskets (asfāṭ), and other useful things.

[Saʿd][104] then dispatched raiding parties and ordered them to attack al-Ḥīrah at night. He placed them under the command of Bukayr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Laythī. Among the warriors was the Qaysī poet al-Shammākh[105] with thirty men well known for bravery and courage. They marched at night, passed Saylaḥūn,[106] and crossed a nearby bridge in the direction of al-Ḥīrah. [There] they heard a loud noise, halted their advance, and lay in ambush to examine the situation. They lay there until a group of horsemen who went ahead of that noise passed by on their way to al-Ṣinnīn.[107] The horsemen did
[2233] not perceive the Muslims; they were merely expecting the [above-mentioned] spy, did not look for the Muslims, and did not pay any attention to them. Their sole aim was to reach Ṣinnīn. The sister of Āzādmard b. Āzādbih, the governor of al-Ḥīrah, was being married to the ruler of Ṣinnīn, a Persian nobleman. The bride was accompanied by an escort, fearful of a lesser [danger] than that which they

103. The text reads: "... Zuhrah heard about it, followed us, reached us, left us behind, and pursued him."

104. The text is silent with regard to the commander intended.

105. Al-Shammākh, also known as Maʿqil b. Ḍirār, was a mukhaḍram poet who belonged to the tribe of Ghaṭafān and is said to have excelled in his descriptions of the bow and the wild ass. See Ibn Qutaybah, Shiʿr, 177–79; Jumaḥī, Ṭabaqāt, 29; GAL, I, 37.

106. A considerable part of Yāqūt's entry on Saylaḥūn discusses the morphology of the word. There are also some verses in which the place is mentioned, and it is clear from them that it was in the neighborhood of al-Qādisiyyah. No other significant details can be ascertained from this material. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 218–19; cf. Musil, Middle Euphrates, 108, note and index.

107. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 430; Morony, Iraq, index. For a modern attempt to identify Sinnīn, see Musil, Middle Euphrates, 117–18.

actually encountered.[108] The Muslims were lying in ambush between the palm trees. When a gap opened between the horsemen and the women who accompanied the bride, and the luggage of the party passed by, Bukayr fell upon Shīrzād b. Āzādbih [who was between the luggage and the horses] and broke his back. The horses panicked and dispersed; the Muslims captured the luggage, the daughter of Āzādbih with thirty women of the Persian landowners (dahāqīn), and one hundred attendants. The Persians had with them property of unknown value, as well as ivory, all of which Bukayr carried away. In the morning he brought the booty that God had given to the Muslims to Sa'd in 'Udhayb al-Hijānāt. The Muslims proclaimed loudly: "God is most great!" Sa'd said: "By God, you have exclaimed 'God is most great' like people in whom I perceive glory and strength." Then he distributed the booty among the Muslims, liberally distributing the fifth[109] and giving all the rest to the warriors. They were extremely pleased. Sa'd stationed in 'Udhayb some horsemen to guard the women, and the guardians of all the womenfolk joined them. He appointed Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh al-Laythī as their commander.[110]

Sa'd halted in al-Qādisiyyah and camped at al-Qudays.[111] Zuhrah camped opposite the bridge of al-'Atīq, which is the present location of al-Qādisiyyah. Sa'd informed ['Umar] of Bukayr's expedition and of his camping in al-Qudays. He stayed there for a month. Then he wrote to 'Umar: [2234]

> The Persians[112] did not send anyone to confront us and did not entrust anyone we know with waging war against us. As

---

108. This is to say that the escort was not strong enough to take on the Muslim raiding party.

109. For the commander's right to receive one-fifth of the booty, based on Qur'ān 8:41 ("Know that whatever booty you take, the fifth is God's and the Messenger's . . ."), see *EI*², s.v. "Fay'" (F. Løkkegaard). Sa'd's decision to distribute the fifth, which he was entitled to retain, is an indication of his selfless generosity. See also Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-'arab, s.v. n-f-l [XI, 671b].

110. Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh al-Laythī led several expeditions against Bedouin tribes during the lifetime of the Prophet. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, II/i, 86, 87–91; Ibn Ḥabīb, Muḥabbar, 117, 119, 120; Ṭabarī, index.

111. Yāqūt's entry (Mu'jam, IV, 42–43) says only that Qudays is situated in the vicinity of al-Qādisiyyah, quoting the passage from our text together with a verse in which Qudays is mentioned in connection with the battle of al-Qādisiyyah. See also Musil, Middle Euphrates, 110–11.

112. The text has al-qawm. It is noteworthy that in numerous passages translated in this volume qawm is used for the enemies, while nās is used for the group to soon as we receive this information, we shall write to you. I am asking God's help. We are near a low-lying stream, wide and winding, beyond which a fearful fight [awaits us]. That we shall be summoned [to engage in this fight] has already been said: "You shall be called against a people possessed of great might."[113]

During his stay in [al-Qudays] Saʿd sent ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr to the lower Euphrates. He went to Maysān,[114] looking for sheep and cattle, but was not able to obtain any. The people in the castles [al-afdān][115] kept themselves protected from him and went deep into the thicket. He followed them, encountered a man on the edge of the thicket, and asked him where the cattle and the sheep were, but the man swore that he did not know. It became clear, however, that he himself was the shepherd of the flock in that thicket. A bull exclaimed: "By God, he is lying! Here we are." ʿĀṣim went in, led the bulls away, and brought them to the camp. Saʿd distributed them among the people, and they had ample provisions for a period of time.

This episode came to the knowledge of al-Ḥajjāj during his lifetime, and he sent for a few people who had witnessed it. Nadhīr b. ʿAmr, al-Walīd b. ʿAbd Shams, and Zāhir were among them.[116] Al-Ḥajjāj asked them about it. They said: "Yes, we heard it, saw it, and led the bulls away." He said: "You are lying." They said: "We would react similarly if you had been a witness to it and we had been absent." Al-Ḥajjāj said: "You have spoken the truth. And what did the which the speaker or the traditionist belong. In most cases, therefore, qawm denotes the Persians or the Byzantines, while nās is used for the Muslims. The following passages contain the best examples of this usage: pp. 2314, ll. 1–4; 2327 ll. 10–11, 17; 2339 ll. 4, 10; 2344 ll. 7, 14; 2345 l. 11; 2348 l. 13; 2351 ll. 7–10; 2389 l. 13; 2391 l. 8. See also p. 2395 l. 10, where Heraclius uses qawm in speaking about the Muslims; so does Arṭabūn on p. 2399 l. 15. Not all instances collected so far fall into this pattern (e.g., p. 2283 l. 12), and I do not claim general validity for this observation. Nevertheless, if used with due circumspection it can be helpful in understanding the exact meaning of nās and qawm, which can at times be crucial to the interpretation of a whole passage.

---

113. Qurʾān 48:16 (Arberry's translation).

114. A city and district on the lower Tigris. See Le Strange, Lands, 43, 80; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 714–15; Morony, Iraq, 162 and index.

115. The reference is probably to the watchtowers and barracks that the Persians built as garrisons along the khandaq on the border between the desert and the cultivated land of Iraq. See Morony, Iraq, 153.

116. The grammar is irregular here; the text reads aḥaduhum, which is followed by the three names.

people say about it?" They said: ["The people considered it] a good sign, indicating that God was satisfied [with us] and that we shall defeat our enemy." Al-Ḥajjāj said: "By God, such things do not happen except when the people are pious and God-fearing." They said: "By God, we do not know what was hidden in their hearts. As for what we saw, we have never seen people who shunned this world and [2235] despised it more than these. None of them was noted[117] on that day for cowardice, betrayal, or plunder."[118] This was "the Day of the Bulls" (yawm al-abāqir).

Saʿd then dispatched raiding parties to the region between Kaskar[119] and al-Anbār.[120] They obtained provisions sufficient for a period of time. He also sent spies to the people of al-Ḥīrah and to Ṣalūba,[121] in order to obtain information about the affairs of the Persians. The spies returned with a report that the king had appointed Rustam b. Farrukhzād al-Armanī to lead the fight against Saʿd and had ordered him to organize an army. Saʿd wrote about it to ʿUmar. ʿUmar replied:

> Do not be perturbed by the information that you receive about them nor by [the army] that they will muster against you. Ask God's help and put your reliance on Him. Send [to the Persian king] people of [impressive] appearance, sound judgment, and endurance, in order to invite him to embrace Islam. God will render this invitation a cause of weakness and defeat for them. Write to me daily!

When Rustam camped in Sābāṭ,[122] they wrote to ʿUmar about it.

---

117. For uʿtudda ʿalā in a sense close to this, see Dozy, Supplément, s.v. ʿ-d-d.

118. Ghulūl is understood as a reference to someone who appropriates spoils that are not lawfully his. See Qurʾān 3:161: "... whoever defrauds, will bring the fruits of his fraud on the Day of Resurrection." Expanding on the verse, tradition maintains that the plunder will hang on the plunderer's neck on the Day of Judgment as a concrete evidence of his transgression. See Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, IV, 104–7.

119. Kaskar was a district on the Tigris, in the region of Fam al-Ṣilḥ and, later, of al-Wāsiṭ. See Morony, Iraq, 155–8; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 274–75.

120. Al-Anbār is a city on the Euphrates, to the west of Baghdad. See *EI*², s.v. "al-Anbār" (M. Streck [A. A. Duri]); Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 367–69; Morony, Iraq, 145 and index.

121. The text is phrased as if this were a place name, but it is not to be found in the standard geographical literature as such. In an earlier passage, Ṭabarī (Taʾrīkh, I, 2061) speaks of Banū Ṣalūbā and identifies them as "the people of al-Ḥīrah." Cf. Morony, Iraq, 174 n. 30.

122. Sābāṭ was one of the seven cities that together constituted al-Madāʾin ("the

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Abū Ḍamrah — Ibn Sīrīn and Ismāʿīl b. Abī Khālid — Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim: When Saʿd learned of Rustam's departure for Sābāṭ, he stayed in his camp waiting for his army to assemble. Ismāʿīl said: Saʿd wrote to ʿUmar: Rustam has established his camp at Sābāṭ, near al-Madāʾin, and has marched toward us.

Abū Ḍamrah said: Saʿd wrote to ʿUmar:

> Rustam has established his campt at Sābāṭ and has marched toward us with horses, elephants, and a large number of Persians. Nothing is more important to me, nor do I remember anything more often than the way in which you wanted me to behave; we ask God's help and put our reliance on Him. I have sent so-and-so [to the king]; they have the qualities that you described.

[2236] According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAmr, al-Mujālid, and Saʿīd b. al-Marzubān: When Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ received ʿUmar's command with regard to the Persians, he assembled a group of men of pure lineage and sound judgment and another group who had [impressive] appearance, were awe-inspiring, and had sound judgment. The persons of pure lineage, sound judgment, and power of reasoning (ijtihād) were al-Nuʿmān b. Muqarrin,[123] Busr b. Abī Ruhm, Ḥamalah b. Juwayyah al-Kinānī,[124] Ḥanẓalah b. al-Rabīʿ al-Tamīmī,[125] Furāt b. Ḥayyān al-ʿIjlī, ʿAdī b. Suhayl, and al-Mughīrah b. Zurārah b. al-Nabbāsh b. Ḥabīb. Those who had [impressive] bodily Cities"). It was situated on the west bank of the Tigris, south of Veh-Ardashir. See *EI*², s.v. "al-Madāʾin" [M. Streck [M. Morony]], with extensive bibliography; Le Strange, Lands, 34–35; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 3; Christensen, Sassanides, 388; Ş. A. ʿAlī, "Madāʾin," 61–62; Oppenheimer et al., Babylonia, index.

---

123. Al-Nuʿmān b. Muqarrin was a member of the tribe of Muzaynah and embraced Islam in the year 5/626–27. In addition to the battle of al-Qādisiyyah, he participated in the conquest of Persia and was killed in the battle of Nihāwand in 21/641–42. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/ii, 38; ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 30–31; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 456 no. 826.

124. For Ḥamalah b. Juwayyah, see Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 181 no. 2003, where he is listed as Ḥamalah b. Abī Muʿāwiyah al-Kinānī.

125. Ḥanẓalah b. al-Rabīʿ al-Tamīmī is said to have been one of the scribes who recorded the revelations of the Prophet and was therefore known as al-kātib. He settled in al-Kūfah and moved later to Qarqīsiyā. He died during the reign of Muʿāwiyah. See ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 66–67; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 134–35 no. 1861; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 60 no. 109.

appearance, were awe-inspiring, and had sound judgment were ʿUṭārid b. Ḥājib,[126] al-Ashʿath b. Qays, al-Ḥārith b. Ḥassān, ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr, ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib, al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah, and al-Muʿannā b. Ḥārithah. Saʿd sent them to invite the king to embrace Islam.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣafwān al-Thaqafī — Umayyah b. Khālid — Abū ʿAwānah — Ḥuṣayn b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān — Abū Wāʾil: Saʿd came to camp at al-Qādisiyyah with the army. He said:

> I do not know, perhaps we are not more than seven thousand men, roughly, and the polytheists are approximately thirty thousand. They said to us: "You have no might or power or weapons. What has brought you here? Turn back!" We replied: "We shall not turn back. We are not the kind of people who turn back." They were laughing at our arrows, saying dūk dūk[127] and comparing them with spindles. When we refused to turn back, they said: "Send to us a wise man who will explain to us what brought you here." Al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah said: "I am the man."

He crossed over to them and sat with Rustam on the throne. They were snorting and shouting. Al-Mughīrah said: "This will not increase my honor, nor will it detract from that of your leader." Rustam [2237] said: "You are right. What has brought you here?" Al-Mughīrah said:

> We were a people living in gross error. God sent to us a prophet, guided us through him to the straight path, and gave us sustenance. Among the things He gave us was a seed that grows, so it was claimed, in this country.[128] When we ate it and gave it to our families to eat, they said, "We cannot

126. ʿUṭārid b. Ḥājib was a chieftain of the tribe of Tamīm. Having embraced Islam in the year 9/630–31 (or 10/631–32), he was entrusted with collecting the poor tax (ṣadaqah) of his tribe. After the death of the Prophet he joined the rebellion of Sajāḥ, the Tamīmī woman who claimed prophethood. Like numerous other apostates, he reverted to Islam after the suppression of the riddah. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/ii, 40; II/i, 116; (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 411; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 507–9.

127. Meaning "spindle" in Persian. The Persians ridiculed the Arab arrows because theirs must have been much thicker. Cf. Schwarzlose, Waffen, 281.

128. Persia.

endure without having this seed. Let us live in this country, so that we can eat from it."

Rustam said: "This being so, we shall kill you!" Al-Mughīrah said: "If you kill us, we shall enter Paradise; if we kill you, you shall enter the Fire; or (alternatively) hand over the poll tax." When al-Mughīrah said: "or hand over the poll tax," they snorted and shouted and said: "There will be no peace between us." Al-Mughīrah said: "Will you cross over to us, or shall we cross over to you [in order to fight]?" Rustam said: "Nay, we shall cross over to you!" The Muslims waited until some Persians crossed over, attacked them, and defeated them.

Ḥuṣayn[129] said: A person from our tribe, named ʿUbayd b. Jaḥsh al-Sulamī, said:

> I observed that we have trampled upon the backs of men who were not touched by weapons but killed by each other.[130] [Then]—as I observed—we found a bag of camphor and thought that it was salt. We had no doubt about it, so we cooked some meat and sprinkled the camphor into the pot. A Christian (ʿibādī)[131] who had a shirt with him passed near by and said: "O Arabs, do not spoil your food! The salt of this country is worthless. Would you like to take this shirt in exchange for it?"

We took the shirt from him and gave it to one of our people to wear. We started to walk around him and to admire him, but, when we became acquainted with the clothing [of this country], it became clear that the shirt was worth [only] two dirhams."[132] [ʿUbayd b. Jaḥsh] said: "I found myself coming close to a man who

---

129. Identified by de Goeje as Ḥusayn b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-rāwī, on whom see Bukhārī, Taʾrīkh, II, 8 no. 25.

130. The sentence describes the confusion of battle, in which men kill each other by trampling or in a similar way.

131. For al-ʿibād, the Nestorian Christian community of al-Ḥīrah, see Bosworth, "Iran and the Arabs," 598–99.

132. The Muslims felt that they had been deceived when they eventually found out that camphor was an extremely expensive substance, while the shirt was of minimal value. For camphor and its price, see *EI*², s.v. "Kāfūr" (A. Dietrich); Heyd, Commerce, II, 594; Ashtor, Prix et salaires, 140, 337, 421–22 (no data for Iraq at the time of the Muslim conquest).

had two golden bracelets in addition to his weapon. He came at me; without saying a word to him, I broke his neck." (Then he said:)

> The Persians were defeated and retreated to al-Ṣarāt;[133] we pursued them and they retreated to al-Madā'in. The Muslims were at Kūthā,[134] and the polytheists had a garrison in [2238]
> Dayr al-Mislākh.[135] The Muslims marched toward them, the polytheists were defeated in the ensuing battle and retreated to the bank of the Tigris. Some of them crossed [the Tigris] at Kalwādhā,[136] others below al-Madā'in. The Muslims besieged them so that they did not have anything to eat except their dogs and cats. They slipped out at night and reached Jalūlā'. The Muslims, with Hāshim b. 'Utbah[137] commanding Sa'd's vanguard, caught up with them. The place at which the battle was joined was at some distance from Jalūlā'.[138]

Abū Wā'il said: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb sent Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān to lead the people of al-Kūfah and Mujāshi' b. Mas'ūd to lead the people of al-Baṣrah.

According to al-Sarī — Shu'ayb — Sayf — 'Amr b. Muḥammad — al-Sha'bī and Ṭalḥah — al-Mughīrah: They[139] went out of the Muslim camp and went to al-Madā'in in order to engage Yazdagird in debate and invite him to embrace Islam. They passed by Rustam and 133. Al-Ṣarāt was one of the canals connecting the Euphrates and the Tigris, flowing east of al-Anbār. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 377–78; Le Strange, Lands, 66; Morony, Iraq, 145.

---

134. An important city in the sawād, to the southwest of al-Madā'in. See Le Strange, Lands, 68–69; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 317–18; Morony, Iraq, index; Oppenheimer et al., Babylonia, 175–78.

135. I was not able to identify this locality. Ş. A. 'Alī ("Madā'in," 63) places it between Kūthā and Sābāṭ, evidently on the strength of this passage.

136. A city on the eastern bank of the Tigris, not far from the site where Baghdad was later built. See Le Strange, Lands, 32.

137. Hāshim b. 'Utbah b. Abī Waqqāṣ of Quraysh embraced Islam after the conquest of Mecca. He lost an eye in the battle of Yarmūk, participated in the battles against the Persians, and was killed in the battle of Ṣiffīn in 37/657–58. See Ibn Ḥabīb, Muḥabbar, 261, 269; [Ī.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 49–50.

138. Jalūlā' is situated to the northeast of Baghdad. Ṭabarī gives a much more detailed description of this battle in I, 2456ff. See also Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 107.

139. Apparently the members of the Muslim delegation appointed by Sa'd to invite Yazdagird to embrace Islam; see p. 2236, above.

reached the gate of Yazdagird ['s residence]. Riding on noble horses, they halted. They had with them horses without riders (janāʾib),[140] and all were neighing.[141] They asked permission to enter but had to wait. Yazdagird [meanwhile] consulted his ministers and the nobles of his country as to what to do with the Muslims and what to tell them. The Persians heard about their coming and came to look at them. The Muslims wore short garments (muqaṭṭaʿāt) and cloaks (burūd, sg. burd). They held thin whips in their hands and wore sandals (niʿāl, sg. naʿl) on their feet.[142] When the Persians made up their minds, the Muslims were allowed to enter into the king's presence.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ṭalḥah—Bint Kaysān al-Ḍabbiyyah — a person who was taken prisoner at the battle of al-Qādisiyyah, became a virtuous Muslim, and was present when the [2239] Muslim delegation came: The Persians gathered around the Muslims and looked at them. I have never seen ten men who equaled, in their appearance, a thousand others;[143] their horses were striking [the ground with their feet] and made threatening noises at each other. The Persians were vexed by the condition of the Muslims and of their horses.

When they entered into the presence of Yazdagird, he ordered them to sit down. He was a man of bad manners. The first thing that occurred between the king and the Muslims was as follows: The king ordered the translator to take his place between the king and the Muslims. Then he said: "Ask them what they call these garments." The translator asked al-Nuʿmān (b. Muqarrin), who was heading the delegation: "What is the name of your garment?" Al-

140. The purpose of bringing along additional horses seems to have been to increase the pomp of the delegation and to create the impression of power and abundance. See Dozy, Supplément, s.v. j-n-b.

141. Neighing of horses carries special significance in Islamic tradition. When God created the horse, He said: "I gave you my blessing. I shall frighten the polytheists by your neighing ..." (bāraktu fīka bi-ṣahīlika urhib al-mushrikīn). See Ibn Juzayy, Khayl, 32. Satan is also said to be vexed by neighing of horses; see Ibn Juzayy, Khayl, 37. These traditions may well explain why the neighing of horses is mentioned in our context. The description of the Persians' reaction to the behavior of the horses (p. 2239, above) points in the same direction. See also Ṭabarī, I, 2435 l. 9; and Sarakhsī, Sharḥ al-siyar, I, 83.

142. See *EI*², s.v. "Libās" (Y. K. Stillman and N. A. Stillmann); and Dozy, Vêtements, 59–64 (burd); 421–24 (naʿl); Suyūṭī, Aḥādīth, 6 (section 15).

143. Cf. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 163, who also stresses the impressive attire of the delegation (dakhalū ʿalayhi fī aḥsani ziyyin wa ʿalayhim al-burūd wa-al-naʿl).

Nu'mān answered: "It is a cloak (burd)." The king saw an evil omen in this and said: "He has carried off the world (burd jahān)."[144] The Persians became pale and distressed. Then the king said: "Ask them about their footwear." The translator asked: "What is the name of these shoes?" Al-Nu'mān said: "Sandals (ni'āl)." The king reacted as before and said: "Alas, alas (nāla nāla) for our country!" Then he asked al-Nu'mān what he had in his hand. Al-Nu'mān said: "A whip (sawṭ)." (Sawṭ means in Persian "burning.") The king said: "They have burned Persia. May God burn them!"[145] The king's augury[146] lay heavy upon the Persians, and they were full of sorrow because of his words.

Al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—'Amr—al-Sha'bī related the same tradition and then added: The king then said: "Ask them: 'Why did you come here? What induced you to attack us and covet our country? Did you muster courage against us because we left you alone and were busy with other matters?'" Al-Nu'mān b. Muqarrin said to the members of his delegation: "If you wish, I shall answer on your behalf. If anybody else desires [to speak], I shall prefer him to do so." They said to him: "Speak," and they said to the king: "This man speaks on behalf of us all."

Al-Nu'mān said:

> God has had mercy upon us and has sent to us a messenger who showed us what is good and ordered us to practice it; he made evil known to us and ordered us to abstain from it. If we should respond to him, he promised us the goodness of this world and of the next. All tribes whom he invited to join him became divided: One group drew near him, and an-

144. In Tha'ālibī, Ghurar, 739, the discussion is not with the king but with Rustam, who says: bādshāhī burd "he carried away the kingdom." See also Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 197.

145. The king's play on words is made possible by the different meanings of words that sound similar in Arabic and Persian: burd "cloak" (Arabic), "carried" (Persian); ni'āl "sandals" (Arabic), nālah "lament" (Persian); sawṭ "whip" (Arabic), sūkht "burned" (Persian).

It is noteworthy that according to the account of Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, VII, 41), which is also attributed to Sayf b. 'Umar, Yazdagird saw in the Arabs' replies to his questions a good omen, but God transformed it into a bad one (tafā'ala fa-radda Allāh fa'lahu 'alā ra'sihi).

146. Reading taṭayyuruhu with Wellhausen, Skizzen, 152, and the Egyptian edition, rather than naẓīruhu of the Leiden edition.

other remained aloof. Only the elect embraced his religion.
[2240] He acted in this manner as long as God wanted him to act. Then he was ordered to dissociate himself from the Arabs who opposed him, and he began to act [against them]. Willingly or unwillingly, all of them joined him. Those who joined him unwillingly, [eventually] became content, while those who joined him willingly grew more and more satisfied. We all came to understand the superiority of his message over our former condition, which was replete with enmity and destitution. Then he ordered us to start with the nations adjacent to us and invite them to justice. We are therefore inviting you to embrace our religion. This is a religion which approves of all that is good and rejects all that is evil. If you refuse our invitation, you must pay the poll tax. This is a bad thing, but not as bad as the alternative; if you refuse [to pay], it will be war. If you respond and embrace our religion, we shall leave with you the Book of God and teach you its contents,[147] provided that you will govern according to the laws included in it. We shall leave your country and let you deal with its affairs as you please. If you protect yourself against us by paying the poll tax, we shall accept it from you and ensure your safety. Otherwise we shall fight you!

Then Yazdagird spoke, saying:

I know of no other nation on earth that was more miserable, smaller in numbers, and more rancorous than you. We used to entrust the outlying villages with our defense against you, and they were sufficient for the task. The Persians did not attack you, and you had no hope to hold your ground against them. If [your] numbers are now at par [with ours], let it not delude you [into attacking] us. If it is hardship that has caused you [to move against us], we shall allocate provisions for you in order to increase your prosperity. We shall honor your nobles, we shall provide you with clothing, and [2241] we shall appoint for you a king who will treat you gently.

147. For aqāma ʿalā in this sense, see Glossary to Balādhurī, Futūḥ; and Dozy, Supplément, s.v. q-w-m.

The Arabs remained silent. Al-Mughīrah b. Zurārah b. al-Nabbāsh al-Usaydī stood up and said:

> O king, these are Arab chieftains of high rank. They are noblemen, diffident in their relationship with other noblemen. Only noblemen can honor other noblemen; only noblemen can enhance the rights of other noblemen, and only noblemen can treat other noblemen with respect. They therefore did not tell you all they had been sent with, and they did not reply to everything you had said. They did the right thing and did nothing except that which would befit people of their kind. Speak, therefore, with me; I shall give you the information, and they shall witness to it.[148] In your description of us, you said things of which you had no knowledge.[149] As for the destitution that you mentioned, there was nobody more destitute that we were. As for our hunger, it was not hunger in the usual sense. We used to eat beetles of various sorts (khanāfis, jiʿlān),[150] scorpions, and snakes, and we considered this our food. Nothing but the bare earth was our dwelling. We wore only what we spun from the hair of camels and sheep. Our religion was to kill one another and to raid one another. And if there was among us such as would bury his daughter alive, recoiling from her eating from our food[151] — the our condition in the past had, indeed, been what I mentioned to you.
>
> But then God sent to us a well-known man. We knew his lineage, his face, and his birthplace. His land is the choice part of our land. His glory and the glory of his ancestors are

148. Al-Mughīrah implies that he will not be as reserved and inhibited in his speech as were the other members of the delegation.

149. Meaning that the conditions in which the Arabs lived in the pre-Islamic period were worse than would appear from the king's description.

150. The inferior food of the Arabs was one of the arguments frequently used by the Shuʿūbiyyah in order to deprecate them. Cf. Goldziher, Muslim Studies, I, 152 n. 1. Here it is used to describe the conditions in which the Arabs lived in the Jāhiliyyah and to demonstrate the fundamental transformation that they experienced as a result of the emergence of Islam.

151. The reference is to female infanticide (waʾd al-banāt), which was practiced in pre-Islamic Arabia. As in this passage, poverty is usually given as its cause. See, for instance, Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XXX, 8519–20. For Qurʾānic criticism of the custom, see Qurʾān 6:137, 140, 151; 16:58, 59; 17:33. For a novel interpretation, see Lichtenstaedter, "Gharānīq."

the most memorable among us. His family is the greatest of our families, and his tribe is the best of our tribes. He himself was the best among us and at the same time the most truthful and the most forbearing. He invited us to embrace his religion. Nobody responded to his call before [Abū Bakr], who was a person of his age[152] and became his successor after his death. He spoke, and we spoke; he spoke the truth, [2242] and we lied. He grew in stature, and we became deficient. Everything he said came to pass. God instilled in our hearts belief in him and [caused us] to follow him. He stood between us and the Lord of the Worlds. Whatever he said to us was the word of God, and whatever he commanded us to do was the commandment of God. He said: "Your Master says, I am God,[153] alone. I have no partner. I existed when there was nothing. Everything perishes except My face;[154] I created everything and to Me will everything return. My mercy has reached you, and I have sent to you this man in order to show you the way by means of which I shall save you from My punishment after death and cause you to dwell in My Abode, the Abode of Peace."[155]

We witnessed that he brought the truth from God. He[156] said: "Whoever follows you in this [religion] has the same rights and the same obligations as you have, but whoever refuses, offer him (payment of) the poll tax. If he agrees, protect him from everything that you protect yourself from, but whoever refuses [to pay], fight him, and I shall be the judge between you. I shall admit those who are killed to My garden, and to those who survive I shall give victory over their opponents." [Al-Mughīrah continued, addressing the king]:

---

152. According to a tradition, Abū Bakr was born three years after "the year of the elephant" and died at the same age as the Prophet: sixty-three years. He was thus three years younger than the Prophet. See Ṭabarī, I, 2128–9. The tradition according to which Abū Bakr was the first person to have embraced Islam is not the only one on this topic; see Ṭabarī, Ta'rīkh, I, 1165ff. for traditions according to which he had been preceded by others.

153. Qur'ān 28:30.

154. Qur'ān 28:88: "Everything perishes except His face."

155. Qur'ān 6:127.

156. The following paragraph is al-Mughīrah b. Zurārah's restatement of ideas from the Qur'ān and the ḥadīth. Although the pronoun refers to God, these are not exact quotations from the Qur'ān.

"If you wish, choose to pay the poll tax out of hand and in humilation.[157] If you wish (to reject this offer), it is the sword, unless you embrace Islam and save your soul."

[The king] said: "Do you [dare to] face me with such things?" [Al-Mughīrah b. Zurārah] said: "I faced only the one who spoke to me. Had somebody else spoken to me, I would not have faced you with this." The king said: "But for the custom not to kill envoys, I would have killed you. I have nothing for you."

Then the king said: "Bring me a load of soil,." And he said: "Load it on the most noble of them and drive him out of the gate of al-Madā'in." [And to the Arabs he said]: "Return to your chief and tell him that I am sending to you Rustam to finish you and your chief off in [2243] the moat of al-Qādisiyyah. He will punish you severely as an example for others. Then I shall send him to your country and make you mind your own affairs in a manner more harsh than that which you suffered at the hands of Sābūr."[158] Then he asked: "Who is the most noble among you?" The Arabs remained silent. ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr, who had decided to take the load without consulting anyone, said: "I am the most noble. I am their chief. Load it on me." The king asked: "Is it so?" The Arabs said: "Yes." The king loaded the soil on his neck and drove him out of the hall and out of the building. ʿĀṣim went to his camel, loaded it with the burden, and quickly rode away. All of them traveled to Saʿd. ʿĀṣim overtook them, and, passing near the gate of Qudays, he said: "Bring the tidings of victory to the amīr. God willing, we have won." He went to put the soil in a safe place, then returned, entered to Saʿd, and informed him about the matter. Saʿd said: "By God, rejoice, because God gave us the keys to their kingdom!" ʿĀṣim's companions returned. The strength of the Muslims began to increase day by day, and their enemy grew weaker day by day.

---

157. Paraphrasing Qur'ān 9:29. For an exhaustive discussion of the meaning attached in Qur'ānic exegesis to the expression "out of hand" (ʿan yadin), see Kister, "'An yadin."

158. The king refers to Shāhpūr b. Hurmuz, who ruled the Sasanid kingdom between A.D. 310 and 379. He is known in the Arab tradition for his military exploits against the Arabs and for his cruel treatment of Arab prisoners of war, whose shoulders he is said to have dislocated. On the strength of this tradition he was dubbed "the man of the shoulders" (dhū al-aktāf). See Ṭabarī, I, 838–89, 843–44; Thaʿālibī, Ghurar, 517–21; and Ibn Qutaybah, Maʿārif, 656–67; for a discussion of this and other interpretations of dhū al-aktāf, see Christensen, Sassanides, 235 n. 2.

The action of the king and the acceptance of the soil by the Muslims lay heavily on the king's associates. Rustam came from Sābāṭ in order to see the king. He asked him what had come to pass between him and the Muslims and what was his opinion of them. The king said: "I did not think that there were among the Arabs men like those whom I saw in my presence. You are not wiser than they are, nor do you have a better presence of mind and ability to reply." He informed Rustam of what the Muslim spokesman had said and added:

> These people spoke to me truthfully. They promised a thing, and they will either achieve it or die for its sake. But I found that the most noble among them was also the biggest fool. When they mentioned the poll tax, I gave him [a load] of soil. He carried it on his head and went out. If he had wanted, he could have guarded himself against it by loading it on somebody else, and I would never have known [who is the most noble among them].

Rustam said: "O king, he is the wisest among them. He saw a good [2244] omen in this[159] and perceived the matter, while his companions did not."

Rustam left the king's presence dejected and angry. Being an astrologer and a priest, he sent someone to follow the delegation and said to a confidant of his: "If the messenger catches up with them, we have put things right and saved our country. If they outstrip him, God will deprive you of your country and of your sons." The messenger returned from al-Ḥīrah, reporting that they had already gone. Rustam said: "These people have carried your country away without any doubt. Kingship is not an affair for the son of a woman cupper.[160] They have taken the keys to our kingdom."

This was one of the ways in which God infuriated the Persians.

After the delegation set out to meet Yazdagird, the Muslims sent out a raiding party. The party apprehended some fishermen with their catch. Sawād b. Mālik al-Tamīmī went to al-Nijāf.[161] Al-

---

159. Taṭayyara bi- usually means "he regarded something as a bad omen." Here we have taṭayyara ilā in the opposite sense, which does not seem to be listed in the classical dictionaries but was noted by de Goeje in Glossary, s.v. ṭ-y-r.

160. For the tradition about the birth of Yazdagird to Shahriyār and a cupper slave girl, see Ṭabarī, I, 1044.

161. I am not able to identify this place.

Firāḍ[162] was close to it. He led away three hundred animals, comprising mules, donkeys, and bulls. They loaded the fish upon them, drove them away, and reached the camp in the morning. Saʿd distributed the fish and the animals among the people, liberally distributing the fifth, except for what was given of it to the warriors, and dividing up the captives (wa-ashama ʿalā al-saby). This was "the Day of the Fish" (yawm al-ḥītān).

Āzādmard b. Āzādbih[163] went in pursuit [of Sawād's raiding party]. Sawād and the horsemen who were with him attacked him and fought him at the bridge of Ṣaylaḥūn.[164] When they were satisfied that the [animals taken as] booty were safe, they followed them and brought them to the Muslims.

The Muslims longed for meat; as for wheat, barley, dates, and other grains, they got hold of quantities sufficient even for a long stay. The objective of the forays was therefore to obtain meat, and the Muslims named their battles accordingly. Among the "meat battles" (ayyām al-laḥm) were "the Day of the Bulls" and "the Day of the Fish."

Mālik b. Rabīʿah b. Khālid al-Taymī (from Taym al-Ribāb) al-Wāthilī[165] and Musāwir b. al-Nuʿmān al-Taymī al-Rubayyiʿī were sent with another raiding party. They attacked al-Fayyūm[166] and seized camels belonging to Banū Taghlib and Banū al-Namir. They drove the camels and the people of the village out and brought them in the morning to Saʿd. The camels were slaughtered, providing the Muslims with abundant food. [2245]

ʿAmr b. al-Ḥārith raided al-Nahrayn.[167] They found a great many cattle at Bāb Thawrā';[168] took them across the area of Shīlā,[169] known today as Nahr Ziyād;[170] and brought them to the Muslim

162. Al-Firāḍ is described by Ṭabarī (I, 2073) as "the border area between Syria, Iraq, and the Jazīrah."

163. See note 84, above.

164. See p. 2232 n. 106, above.

165. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 724 no. 7635.

166. A village in the vicinity of Ḥīt on the Euphrates. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 933.

167. Probably a subdistrict of which the main city was Karbalā', but not all the references in the sources point in this direction. See Ṣ. A. ʿAlī, "Minṭaqat al-Kūfah," 234–36; Morony, Iraq, 151 and index.

168. I am unable to identify this locality; cf. Ṣ. A. ʿAlī, "Minṭaqat al-Kūfah," 235.

169. According to Yāqūt (Muʿjam, III, 358), Shīlā was an area near al-Kūfah.

170. An ancient canal in the vicinity of al-Kūfah, named in the Islamic period after Ziyād b. Abīhi, who is said to have reopened it. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 358 and IV, 840–41.

camp. ʿAmr said: "At that time there were only two canals in the area."

More than two years passed between the coming of Khālid (b. al-Walīd) to Iraq and the camping of Saʿd in al-Qādisiyyah. Saʿd stayed there for more than two months, until he achieved victory.

According to the previous chain of transmission:[171] The following events took place between the Persians and the Arabs after the battle of Buwayb. Al-Anūshajān b. al-Hirbidh set out from the rural area of al-Baṣrah in the direction of the people of Ghuḍayy.[172] Four men who were leading various clans of Tamīm confronted him in front of the people of Ghuḍayy. These were al-Mustawrid and ʿAbdallāh b. Zayd, alternately commanding[173] al-Ribāb; Jaz' b. Muʿāwiyah[174] and Ibn al-Nābighah, alternately commanding Saʿd; al-Ḥasan b. Niyār and al-Aʿwar b. Bashāmah, alternately commanding ʿAmr; and al-Ḥusayn b. Maʿbad and al-Shabah, alternately commanding Ḥanẓalah. They killed al-Anūshajān in defense of the people of Ghuḍayy. When Saʿd (b. Abī Waqqāṣ) came, they joined him together with the people of Ghuḍayy and all the clans mentioned above.

[2247][175] According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah and ʿAmr: The people of the sawād appealed to Yazdagird b. Shahriyār for help. They sent him a message, saying:

> The Arabs are camping at al-Qādisiyyah in a warlike manner. Nothing can endure their actions since they have camped at al-Qādisiyyah and remain intact. They have ruined everything that was between them and the Euphrates. Nobody remains in this area except in the forts. Animals and food that could not be contained in the forts have been destroyed. The thing that will come next is that they will demand that we come down from the forts. Should help be 171. See p. 2239, above.

---

172. See note 18, above.

173. For this meaning of sānada, see de Goeje's Glossary and Dozy, Supplément, s.v. The alternating pattern of command explains why Anūshajān was confronted by four commanders only, though eight names are mentioned in the text. See also Ṭabarī, I, 821 ll. 8–10: fa-qātalāhu mutasānidayni yuqātiluhu hādha yawman wahādha yawman. See now also M. Lecker, The Banū Sulaym, 152 n. 65.

174. Jaz' (or Jazy) b. Muʿāwiyah b. al-Ḥusayn later became a governor of Ahwāz on behalf of ʿUmar. See (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 282–83; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 474 no. 1151.

175. There is no p. 2246 in the Leiden edition.

slow in coming, we shall surrender [everything] with our own hands.

The chieftains (al-mulūk) who had estates in the border area (al-ṭaff)[176] [also] wrote to Yazdagird about it and assisted the people of the sawād in this matter. They urged him to dispatch Rustam [against the Arabs].

When Yazdagird made up his mind to dispatch Rustam, he sent for him. Rustam entered into his presence, and Yazdagird said to him: "I wish to entrust you with this mission.[177] One must make preparations for an affair according to its magnitude. Today you are the [most prominent] man among the Persians. You see that the people of Persia have not faced a situation like this since the family of Ardashīr[178] assumed power."

It seems that Rustam agreed and praised the king. The king said: "I wish to consider [the information that] you have and to find out what you think. Describe to me the Arabs and their exploits since they have camped in al-Qādisiyyah and describe to me what the Persians have suffered at their hands." Rustam said: "I would describe them as a pack of wolves, falling upon unsuspecting shepherds and annihilating them."

Yazdagird said:

> It is not like that. I put the question to you in the expectation that you would describe them clearly and that then I would be able to reinforce you so that you might act according to the [real situation]. But you did not say the right thing. You must therefore understand what I have to say. The Arabs [2248] > and the Persians are comparable to an eagle who looked upon a mountain where birds take shelter at night and stay in their nests at the foot of it. When morning came, the birds looked around and saw that he was watching them. Whenever a bird became separated from the rest, the eagle

176. Al-ṭaff was used for the part of the Arabian desert that was closest to the cultivated land of Iraq. From there the word acquired the meaning of border area in general; more specifically, al-Ṭaff is also used for the environs of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 539–40; cf. Morony, Iraq, 187 and index.

177. Literally: "I wish to send you in this direction."

178. Ardashīr (Artaxerxes) I was the founder of the Sasanian dynasty, which ruled Persia from A.D. the third century until the Muslim conquest. See CHI, III, index s.v.

> snatched him. When the birds saw him [doing this], they did not take off out of fear. Whenever a bird became separated from the rest, the eagle snatched him. If they had taken off all at once, they would have repelled him. The worst thing that could happen to them would be that all would escape save one. But if each group acts in turn and takes off separately, they all perish. This is the similarity between them and the Persians. Act according to this.[179]

Rustam said to him: "O king, let me [act in my own way]. The Arabs still dread the Persians, as long as you do not rouse them against me. It is to be hoped that my good fortune will last and that God will save us the trouble. We shall employ the right ruse and follow the right idea in war, because the right idea and ruse are more beneficial than some victories." The king refused and said: "What is it, them, that remains [for us to do]?" Rustam said: "In war, patience is superior to haste, and the order of the day is now patience. To fight one army after another is better than a single [and total] defeat and is also harder on our enemy." But the king was obdurate and refused [to accept Rustam's view]. Hence Rustam set out to establish his camp at Sābāṭ.

Envoys began coming to the king, one after the other, asking him to consider the dismissal of Rustam and the dispatch of somebody [2249] else around whom the people would rally. Also, spies from al-Ḥīrah and from Banū Ṣalūbā[180] reported these matters to Saʿd, and he wrote about them to ʿUmar.

The cries for help brought to Yazdagird by al-Āzādmard b. al-Āzādbih on behalf of the ahl al-sawād grew in number. The king's soul became frightened, and he wanted to protect himself from the war by [dispatching] Rustam. He abandoned all prudence, became impatient and obstinate, and urged Rustam on. Rustam repeated what he had told him before and said:

> O king, abandonment of prudence has forced me to step out of bounds and to vindicate my soul. If I had an alternative, I would not speak these words. I implore you by God, for your 179. Cf. Thaʿālibī, Ghurar, 738–39.

180. Banū Ṣalūbā are identified as "people of al-Ḥīrah, Kalwādhā, and villages on the Euphrates." See Ṭabarī, I, 2061.

sake, for the sake of your people, and for the sake of your kingdom, let me stay in my camp and send al-Jālnūs. If victory will be ours, then all is well; if not, I shall be alert and ready[181] to send someone else.[182] Then, when there is no alternative and we have made them weak and tired, we shall hold our ground against them while we are rested [and in full strength].

But the king insisted on Rustam's departure.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Naḍr b. al-Sarī al-Ḍabbī — Ibn al-Rufayl — his father: Having established camp at Sābāṭ and collected the military equipment, Rustam sent al-Jālnūs commanding the vanguard, with forty thousand men. He said: "Move forward, and do not rush [into battle] without my instructions." He appointed al-Hurmuzān to command his right wing, Mihrān b. Bahrām al-Rāzī his left wing, and al-Bayruzān his rear guard.

Rustam said, in order to raise the morale of the king: "If God gives us victory over them, we shall turn to their kingdom in their land, and we shall keep them busy in their place of origin until they agree to reconciliation or become again satisfied with their erstwhile condition." [2250]

When the delegation of Saʿd returned from their meeting with the king, Rustam had a dream that he disliked and perceived as a bad omen. He did not want to set out and to encounter the Arabs because of it. He lost his equanimity and became confused. He asked the king to send al-Jālnūs and to let him stay so that he might consider what [the Arabs] were doing. He said:

The ability of al-Jālnūs is similar to mine, though they dread my name more than his. If he is victorious, this is what we want; if not, I shall send out someone like him, and we shall ward these people off for some time. The people of Persia still look up to me. As long as I am not defeated, they will act eagerly [on my command]. I am also all this time

181. For the expression anā ʿalā rijlin see Lane, Lexicon, s.v.; al-Azharī, Tahdhīb, XI, 30; Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. rijl.

182. Compare similar considerations in the Muslim camp, with regard to the question whether ʿUmar himself should lead the expedition against Persia. See Ṭabarī, I, 2213–15.

> dreaded by the Arabs; they dread to move forward as long as I do not confront them. But once I do confront them, they will, at last, take heart, and the people of Persia will, in the end, be defeated.

Rustam sent out his vanguard with forty thousand men and himself set out with sixty thousand. His rear guard set out with twenty thousand.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, Ziyād, and ʿAmr: Rustam set out with one hundred and twenty thousand men, all of them accompanied by dependents. Together with the dependents they numbered more than two hundred thousand. He set out from al-Madāʾin with sixty thousand men, accompanied by dependents.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Hishām b. ʿUrwah — ʿĀʾishah: Rustam moved against Saʿd in al-Qādisiyyah with sixty thousand men, accompanied by dependents.

[2251] According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, Ziyād, and ʿAmr: When the king insisted on [Rustam's] going [into battle], Rustam wrote to his brother and to the chiefs of the people of his country:

> From Rustam to al-Binduwān, the Marzubān of al-Bāb[183] and the arrow of the people of Persia, who is equal to every event, by means of whom God will break up every powerful army and conquer every impregnable fort, and [from Rustam] to those who follow him. Strengthen your forts, prepare [for war], and be ready, as if the Arabs have already arrived in your country to fight for your land and for your sons. I suggested that we should ward them off and thus gain time until their auspicious stars become unlucky, but the king refused.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ṣalt b. Bahrām—a certain man: When Yazdagird ordered Rustam to set out from Sābāṭ, 183. Al-Bāb (or Bāb al-Abwāb) is the old name for the city of Darband, on the western shore of the Caspian Sea. It served as a fortification against invasions from the north and as a point of entry for visitors from that direction into the Persian empire. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 437–42; Christensen, Sassanides, 369, 415; *EI*², s.vv. "Bāb al-Abwāb" (D. M. Dunlop); "al-Ḳabḳ" (C. E. Bosworth).

---

Rustam wrote to his brother a letter similar to the previous one and added:

> Pisces rendered the water turbid; Pegasus (al-Naʿāʾim) is in beautiful form, and so is Venus; Libra is balanced, and Mars has disappeared.[184] I think that these people are going to overcome us and to take possession of what belongs to us. The gravest matter that I have seen is that the king has said: "Either you go to [fight] them, or I am going myself." Therefore I am going.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Naḍr b. al-Sarī — Ibn al-Rufayl — his father: The person who encouraged Yazdagird to [2252] send Rustam was the servant of Jābān, the king's astrologer, who was from the people of Furāt Bādaqlā.[185] Yazdagird sent to him [a message], saying: "What is your view of Rustam's departure and of the war against the Arabs today?" The servant was, however, afraid to speak the truth and lied to the king.

Rustam knew astrology and was unwilling to go forth because of what he knew. For the king it was an easy matter, because [the astrologer] deceived him. The king said to Jābān's servant: "I want you to tell me something that will reassure me with regard to your view." The servant said to Zurnā the Indian: "Tell him." Zurnā said to the king: "Ask me." The king asked him, and Zurnā said: "O king, a bird will draw near and will alight at your palace, and something will drop from his beak on this spot," and he drew a circle. The servant said: "He spoke the truth. The bird is a crow (ghurāb), and the thing in his beak is a dirham."

Jābān[186] was informed that the king had been looking for him, so he came and entered into the king's presence. The king asked him about what the servant had said. After some reflection, Jābān said: "He spoke the truth, but he was not accurate. The bird is a magpie (ʿaqʿaq), and the thing in his beak is a dirham. It will fall on this

---

184. Rustam is described as an astrologer (Ṭabarī, I, 2167). See also Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 164, where another letter of astrological content, also addressed to Rustam's brother, is quoted.

185. Furāt Bādaqlā was a subdistrict (ṭassūj) in the vicinity of al-Ḥīrah. See Morony, Iraq, 150; Oppenheimer et al., Babylonia, 32–33 n. 15, 336 n. 4.

186. In addition to his position at the court, Jābān was the ruler of Ullays. For Ullays, see Donner, Conquests, 329 and index.

spot, but Zurnā has lied. The dirham will bounce and come to rest on that spot," and he drew another circle. Before they could get up, a magpie landed on the battlements; a dirham fell from its beak on the first line, bounced, and came to rest on the second line.

The Indian became hostile to Jābān for having exposed his error. A pregnant cow was brought to them. The Indian said: "Its lamb will be black, with a white spot on its forehead (gharrā')." Jābān said: "You are lying. It will rather be black with a white spot on its [2253] tail (ṣabghā')." The cow was slaughtered and the lamb extracted. Its tail was between its eyes. Jābān said: "By this Zurnā was deluded."[187] Both[188] encouraged the king to dispatch Rustam, and the king ordered him to go forth.[189]

Jābān wrote to Jushnasmāh[190] saying: "The affair of the Persians is over, and their enemy has prevailed over them. The Zoroastrian kingdom has passed away, the kingdom of the Arabs has emerged victorious, and their religion has gained the ascendancy. Make a contract of protection with them, and do not allow yourself to be deceived. Hurry, hurry before you are taken captive." When he received the letter, Jushnasmāh went out to the Arabs and came to al-Muʿannā. Al-Muʿannā was at al-ʿAtīq with his horsemen. He sent him to Saʿd. Jushnasmāh made a contract [of protection] for himself, for his family, and for those who followed him.[191] Saʿd instructed

187. For this meaning of the passive form utiya, see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. a-t-y (XIV, 16); and Lane, Lexicon, s.v. a-t-y.

188. Jābān and Zurnā, or Jābān and his servant, who increased their credibility by winning the magicians' contest with Zurnā.

189. Fearful of disclosing what the stars had in store for the Persians, the astrologers encouraged the king to send Rustam into battle and presumably made favorable predictions about its outcome. It seems, however, that the choice of the birds in the story by the Muslim traditionist is intended as a hint that their predictions were false and that the Persian empire was doomed. In Arab ornithomancy the crow is considered the worst of all omens. One of the reasons is that the crow did not return to Noah's ark after he had been sent out to report on the situation of the flood. See Jāḥiẓ, Ḥayawān, II, 316; III, 443, 457 (an evil omen if he cries once and a good omen if he cries twice). See also Damīrī, Ḥayawān, II, 172–81 (especially 173 last line–174 l. 1). Cf. Fahd. Divination, 506–10; Fahd, "Présages." The magpie (ʿaqʿaq) was considered evil because popular etymology derived its name from ʿuqūq "filial disobedience." The intensity of popular feelings about the magpie can be gauged from the legal controversy over whether a person who set out on a journey, heard the sound of the magpie, and therefore returned should be considered an infidel for believing in ornithomancy or not. See Damīrī, Ḥayawān, II, 148–49.

190. Jushnasmāh was one of Jābān's military commanders. See Ṭabarī, I, 2168.

191. Apparently those who surrendered to the Arabs with him.

Jushnasmāh to return [to his place], and he became a spy for the Muslims.

Jushnasmāh presented al-Muʿannā with some fālūdhaq.[192] Al-Muʿannā said to his wife: "What is this?" She said: "I think that his miserable wife tried to prepare ʿaṣīdah[193] but failed." Al-Muʿannā said: "May misery befall her!"

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, Ziyād, and ʿAmr: When Rustam left Sābāṭ, Jābān met him on the bridge and said to him in complaint: "Do you not see what I see?" Rustam said: "I am being led by the nose and can see no alternative except submission."[194] Rustam ordered al-Jālnūs to proceed to al-Ḥīrah. He set out and established his camp in al-Najaf. Rustam set out for Kūthā and wrote to al-Jālnūs and al-Āzādmard: "Capture for me an Arab from the army of Saʿd." Each rode forward by himself, [2254] captured a prisoner, and sent him to Rustam in Kūthā; Rustam interrogated him and then killed him.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Naḍr b. al-Sarī—Ibn al-Rufayl—his father: When Rustam went forth and ordered al-Jālnūs to move in the direction of al-Ḥīrah, he also ordered him to capture an Arab for him. He and al-Āzādmard went out with a raiding party of one hundred men, reached al-Qādisiyyah, captured a man before the Qādisiyyah bridge, and took him away. The Muslims rallied to his rescue but were not able to catch up with the Persians. They managed only to hit some of those who lagged behind. When the Persians reached al-Najaf, they sent the man to Rustam, who was in Kūthā. Rustam said to him: "What brought you here? What

192. Originally a Persian dessert, falūdhaq [or falūdhaj] was made of crushed almonds and sugar; cf. modern Persian palūda; Jawālīqī, Muʿarrab, 295; Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. f-l-dh. Arab tradition speaks of ʿAbdallāh b. Judʿān as the first person who introduced the Arabs to this dish after his visit to the Persian king. Our anecdote seems to indicate that it was still not very well known among the Arabs in the first decades of Islam. In later periods it is said to have been considered one of the most exquisite dishes [min ashraf mā ʿarafūhu min ṭaʿām]. See Jāḥiẓ, Bukhalāʾ, 253. Muslim tradition considers the adoption of falūdhaq as a sign of the great prosperity that the Arabs came to enjoy as a result of the conquests [see Ibn Mājah, Sunan, II, 1108–9, Kitāb al-aṭʿimah, bāb 46]. For the recipe, see Baghdādī, Ṭabīkh, quoted in Rodinson, "Recherches," 149 [with ample bibliography and discussion]; *EI*², s.v. "Ghidhāʾ" [M. Rodinson], II, 1067a.

193. ʿAṣīdah is porridge made with flour and oil. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. ʿa-ṣ-d; Rodinson, "Recherches," 141 [with ample bibliography].

194. Both Rustam and Jābān are astrologers and know in advance what the outcome of the conflict will be.

is it that you want?" The man said: "We came to seek what God promised to us." Rustam said: "And what is that?" The man said: "Your land, your sons, and your blood, if you refuse to embrace Islam." Rustam said: "And if you are killed before you accomplish this?" The man said: "God has promised us that He will give those of us who are killed before then a place in Paradise. For those who survive, He will fulfill [the promise] that I mentioned. We are confident and assured." Rustam said: "Have we then been placed at your mercy?" The man said: "Poor Rustam! It is your deeds that have put you [in this situation]. Because of them God has delivered you to us. And let not what you see delude you; you are not fighting human beings but, rather, irrevocable fate." Rustam exploded in anger and ordered the man to be killed.

Rustam left Kūthā and camped at Burs.[195] His men robbed the people of their possessions, raped the women, and drank wine. The Persians[196] cried out to him and complained about the damage to their property and the suffering brought upon their sons. Rustam rose to address his men and said:

[2255] O people of Persia, the Arab spoke the truth. By God, nothing save our deeds has delivered us to them. By God, though we are at war with them, the Arabs treat our people better than you do. God would have given you victory over the enemy and strengthened your position in the land if your behavior had been upright, if you had refrained from injustice, if you had lived up to your commitments and had performed good deeds. But, if you go astray and engage in these [evil] actions, I believe that God will change your circumstances [for the worse], and I am not confident that He will not take His dominion away from you.

Rustam sent his men out to arrest some people against whom complaints were lodged. They were brought to him, and he struck their heads off. Then he rode out and called upon the people to march. He set out and camped opposite Dayr al-Aʿwar.[197] Then he

195. Yāqūt identifies Burs as "a place in Babylon [Bābil], in which there are some remnants from [the time of] Nebuchadnezzar. It is on a very high hill." See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 565 l. 24.

196. The text has ʿulūj, sg. ʿilj, which is a pejorative term.

197. A place on the outskirts of al-Kūfah [ẓāhir al-Kūfah; cf. glossary to BGA, IV, 294]. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 644; Oppenheimer et al., Babylonia, 384 n. 5.

moved down to al-Milṭāṭ[198] and camped on the bank of the Euphrates, opposite the people of al-Najaf, opposite al-Khawarnaq,[199] and near al-Ghariyyān.[200] He summoned the people of al-Ḥīrah, threatened them, and made up his mind to act against them. Ibn Buqaylah[201] said to him: "You cannot have it both ways, [i.e.,] to be unable to help us and at the same time to blame us for defending ourselves and our land." Rustam was reduced to silence.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAmr—al-Shaʿbī and al-Miqdām al-Ḥārithī—other transmitters mentioned: Rustam summoned the people of al-Ḥīrah (his tent was at that time near the monastery)[202] and said: "O enemies of God! You are pleased that the Arabs have forced their way into our country. You have been spying for them against us. You have reinforced them with money."

The people of al-Ḥīrah wanted Ibn Buqaylah to protect them against Saʿd and said to him: "You will be the one to speak to him." Ibn Buqaylah stepped forward and said: [2256]

> You have said that we were pleased with the Arabs' coming into the country. What then have they done [to please us]? By which of their actions should we be pleased? Should it be so because they say that we are their slaves? They do not belong to our religion, and they attest that we are destined for Hell. You said that we were spying for them. But why should they be in need of our spying? Your people have fled from them, abandoned the villages to them, and nobody prevents them from moving in whatever direction they please. If they wish, they can go to the right or, if they wish, to the left. You said that we have strengthened them with money. [The truth of the matter is that] we have bribed them with money for fear that we should be taken as prisoners, that we should be plundered, and that our fighting men would be killed. All 198. Al-Milṭāṭ was the name for the area along the Euphrates in the vicinity of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 633.

199. See note 97, above.

200. The Ghariyyān were two high buildings on the outskirts of al-Kūfah. They were built by al-Mundhir b. Imriʾ al-Qays, king of al-Ḥīrah. For the traditions surrounding them, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 790–95.

201. Ibn Buqaylah was one of the leaders (nuqabāʾ) of al-Ḥīrah and the first man to sue for peace. He cooperated with the Muslims in various ways. See Ṭabarī, index, s.v. ʿAmr b. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ.

202. Probably Dayr al-Aʿwar; see note 197, above.

> this has happened because you did not protect us. None of you who confronted the Arabs was able to hold his ground against them. Now we are weaker than you are. I swear that you are preferable to us and have more valor in our eyes. Protect us from the Arabs, and we shall help you. We are like the scum of the sawād, slaves of those who prevail!

Rustam said: "The man has spoken the truth on your behalf!"

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Naḍr — Ibn al-Rufayl — his father: Rustam dreamed in the monastery that an angel came, entered the Persian camp, and put a seal on all the weapons.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad and his companions and al-Naḍr: When Rustam regained his peace of mind, he ordered al-Jālnūs to march from al-Najaf. He set out with the vanguard and camped between al-Najaf and al-Saylaḥūn. Rustam departed also and camped in al-Najaf. Between the departure of Rustam from al-Madāʾin, his camping in Sābāṭ, his departure from [2257] there, and his confrontation with Saʿd four months elapsed. During this time he did not move forward and did not fight. He was hoping that the Arabs would become disgusted with the place, would become exhausted, and would leave. He disliked the idea of fighting them because he was afraid that he would fare no better than those who [had fought the Arabs] before him. He temporized, but the king rushed him, incited him, and urged him forward; finally, he forced his hand [to engage in battle].

When Rustam camped in al-Najaf, he had the dream again and saw the same angel. With him were the Prophet and ʿUmar. The angel seized the Persian weapons, put a seal on them, and handed them to the Prophet.[203] The Prophet handed them to ʿUmar. When Rustam woke up, his gloom increased. Al-Rufayl noticed it and developed a desire to embrace Islam, and this was the reason for his conversion.

ʿUmar knew that the Persians would temporize with the Muslims. He therefore instructed Saʿd and the Muslims to camp on the border of Persia and to temporize with the Persians indefinitely, in order to throw them off balance. The Muslims camped in al-Qādisiyyah. They made up their minds to be patient and to temporize. God willed to make His light perfect. The Muslims remained [in their places] with calm and assurance. They raided the sawād, plundered the area around them, and gathered the spoils. They prepared for some protracted maneuvering, and accordingly came prepared to endure until God should grant them victory. ʿUmar supplied them with provisions to supplement what they gained by plunder.

203. Cf. Thaʿālibī, Ghurar, 741.

When the Persian king and Rustam saw this, became aware of their situation, and received information about the deeds of the Arabs, the king understood that the Arabs were not going to desist and that, if he were to remain [in his place without doing anything], the Arabs would not leave him alone. He saw fit to send Rustam forth. Rustam saw fit to camp between al-ʿAtīq and al-Najaf, to temporize, and at the same time to engage [the Muslims] in combat.[204] He thought that this was the best thing they (i.e., the Persians) could do until they should achieve the aim of their restraint or until fortune should turn in their favor.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: The raiding parties roamed [the land]. Rustam was in al-Najaf, al-Jālnūs between al-Najaf and al-Saylaḥūn, Dhū al-Ḥājib between Rustam and al-Jālnūs. Al-Hurmuzān and Mihrān were in charge of the two wings, and al-Bayruzān commanded the rear guard. Zād b. Buhaysh, the ruler of Furāt Siryā,[205] commanded the infantrymen, and Kanārā the light cavalry. The army of Rustam consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand men. Sixty thousand were accompanied by servants (shākirī); from the [other] sixty thousand, fifteen thousand were noblemen accompanied [by dependents]; and they had chained themselves together in order to bear the brunt of the fiercest battle.[206] [2258]

---

204. It seems that the intended combat was on a small scale, perhaps only occasional duels between two warriors. For munāzalah (also nizāl and the special imperative form nazāli), see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. n-z-l; and Abū Tammām, Ḥamāsah, I, 29.

205. See Morony, Iraq, 149–50; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 87–88.

206. Ṭabarī and other Muslims writers report that both the Byzantines and the Persians used to tie some of their soldiers together with chains, so that they could not run away from the battlefield. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 135, 303; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, VII, 44; Ṭabarī, I, 2089, 2294, 2337, 2356, 2598, 2632; Abū Yūsuf, Kharāj, 83; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 9. Cf. de Goeje, Mémoire, 121; Christensen, Sassanides, 207; Noth, Studien, 122–23.

In a forthcoming article Dr. L. Conrad maintains that the term silsilah, which is used in some of these texts, originally referred to a Byzantine military formation. Only later was it taken to mean a chain and a device to prevent soldiers from fleeing

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad b. Qays — Mūsā b. Ṭarīf: The people said to Saʿd: "We are fed up with this place. Move forward." Saʿd scolded the speaker and said: "As your opinion is not needed, do not take the trouble [of offering it]. We shall move forward only on the advice of the people of judgment. Be quiet as long as we do not speak to you." Saʿd sent out Ṭulayḥah[207] and ʿAmr [b. Maʿdīkarib] on a scouting mission without horses. Sawād [b. Mālik al-Tamīmī] and Ḥumayḍah [b. al-Nuʿmān] set out with one hundred men each and raided al-Nahrayn.[208] Saʿd had forbidden them to venture so far. When Rustam received information about the raid, he sent his horsemen against them. When Saʿd heard that Rustam's cavalry had gone in pursuit, he summoned ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr [2259] and Jābir al-Asadī[209] and sent them after Sawād and Ḥumayḍah, to follow in their trail and to take the same way. He said to ʿĀṣim: "If you join battle with the Persians, you will be the commander." ʿĀṣim encountered them between al-Nahrayn and Iṣṭīmiyā.[210] The Persian horsemen were encircling the Arab raiding party, trying to extract the spoils from their hands. Sawād said to Ḥumayḍah: "Make your choice: either stand up to the Persians and I shall carry away the spoils, or I shall stand up to them and you shall carry away the spoils."[211] Ḥumayḍah replied: "Stand up to them, hold them back, and I shall deliver the spoils for you."

Sawād held out against the Persians, and Ḥumayḍah hastened to leave. ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr encountered him. Ḥumayḍah thought that it was another group of Persian horsemen, so he made a turn to avoid them. When they recognized each other, Ḥumayḍah went on with the spoils. ʿĀṣim marched to [the aid of] Sawād. The Persians managed to recover some of the spoils. When they saw ʿĀṣim, they fled. Sawād took possession of what they had recovered and brought the spoils to Saʿd, returning safe and victorious.

---

the battlefield. Historically speaking, there were therefore no soldiers who fought fettered (private communication, November 8, 1989).

I thank my former student David Marmer for drawing my attention to Dr. Conrad's work.

207. Ṭulayḥah b. Khuwaylid al-Asadī was an important leader of the riddah. See EI[1], s.v. "Ṭulaiḥa b. Khuwailid" (V. Vacca); Ṭabarī, I, 1797, 1798, 1871, and index.

208. See note 167, above.

209. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 441 no. 1041.

210. I am unable to identify this locality.

211. The verb istāqa, which is used here, indicates that the spoils consisted of cattle and horses.

Ṭulayḥah and ʿAmr had gone forth [from the camp]. Saʿd ordered Ṭulayḥah to confront the camp of Rustam, whereas ʿAmr was ordered to confront the camp of al-Jālīnūs. Ṭulayḥah went alone, while ʿAmr went with a group of men. Saʿd sent Qays b. al-Hubayrah[212] after them and said to him: "If a battle takes place, you will be commander over them." Saʿd wanted to humiliate Ṭulayḥah because of his rebelliousness. ʿAmr, on the other hand, was obedient to him. Qays b. Hubayrah set out, met ʿAmr, and asked him about Ṭulayḥah. ʿAmr said: "I know nothing of him." When they reached al-Najaf from the direction of the valley, Qays said: "What do you intend to do?" ʿAmr said: "I want to raid the nearest part of their camp." Qays said: "With these men?" ʿAmr said: "Yes." Qays said: "By God, I shall not allow you to do this. Are you going to expose [the Muslims] to an intolerable [danger]?" ʿAmr said: "And what say do you have in this?" Qays said: "I have been made commander over you. But [even] if I were not [your] commander, I would not have allowed you to do it." Al-Aswad b. Yazīd attested in the presence of a [2260] number of people: "Saʿd made him commander over you and over Ṭulayḥah, if both of you should happen to be in the same place." ʿAmr said: "By God, O Qays! A time in which you are commander over me will be a time of evil. I prefer to renounce this religion of yours, revert to my former faith, and fight for it until death, rather than suffer you to be my commander another time." He added: "If your master should send you with such a matter again, we shall most certainly dissolve any connection with him." Qays said: "It is up to you the next time."

Qays took ʿAmr back [to camp]. They returned with information [about the enemy], some Persian [captives], and some horses. Each of them complained against the other; Qays complained of ʿAmr's insubordination, and ʿAmr complained of the rude behavior of Qays. Saʿd said: "O ʿAmr! The information that you have brought and your safe return are more pleasing to me than to sustain one hundred casualties for the price of killing a thousand enemies. Do you intend to go to the Persian battlefield and make an attack against them with one hundred men? I thought that you knew about war more than you do." ʿAmr said: "It is as you say."

212. Qays b. Hubayrah (or b. Makshūḥ) belonged to the tribe of Murād. The question whether he embraced Islam during the lifetime of the Prophet or later is disputed in the rijāl literature. In addition to al-Qādisiyyah, he fought in the battle of Nihāwand and was killed in the battle of Ṣiffīn. In the Jāhiliyyah there was a rivalry between him and ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib; this explains ʿAmr's unwillingness to serve under the command of Qays; see p. 2260, below. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 390; [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 227–8; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 538–41 no. 7318; Caskell and Strenziok, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 549.

Ṭulayḥah went forth and entered the Persian camp on a moonlit night and examined the situation within it. He cut the ropes of a man's tent and led his horse away. Having come out of this camp, he passed near the camp of Dhū al-Ḥājib,[213] wrecked a man's tent, and untied his horse. Then he slipped into the camp of al-Jālnūs, wrecked another man's tent, and untied his horse. Then he left the place and went to al-Kharrārah.[214] The three men—one from al-Najaf, the other from the camp of Dhū al-Ḥājib, and the third from the camp of al-Jālnūs—pursued him. The first man to catch up with him was the Jālnūsī, the second the Ḥājibī, and the third the Najafī. Ṭulayḥah killed the first two and took the last one prisoner. He brought him to Saʿd and informed Saʿd of what had happened. The prisoner embraced Islam, and Saʿd named him "Muslim." He attached himself to Ṭulayḥah and was with him during all the [sub-[2261] sequent] wars of conquest.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū ʿAmr—Abū ʿUthmān al-Nahdī: When ʿUmar sent Saʿd to Persia he instructed him to take with him any man of strength, valor, and leadership whom he should meet in an oasis on his way. If anyone were to refuse to join, he was to take him by force. ʿUmar issued the orders, and Saʿd reached al-Qādisiyyah with twelve thousand men. They consisted of those who participated in [earlier] battles (ahl al-ayyām),[215] as well as non-Arabs (al-ḥamrā')[216] who had responded to the Muslims and assisted them. Some of them embraced Islam before the fight-

213. A commander of the Persian army, also known as Bahman Jādhawayhi, who defeated the Muslims in the battle of the Bridge. See Ṭabarī, I, 2174–75, and index, s.v. "Bahman Jādhawayhi."

214. A place near al-Saylaḥūn. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 409.

215. These are the Muslims who fought with al-Khālid b. al-Walīd in the earlier campaigns in Iraq and Syria. See Donner, Conquests, 207, and index.

216. For this meaning of al-ḥamrā' see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. ḥ-m-r: "The Arabs used [the word] al-ḥamrā' for the non-Arabs whose complexion is mostly fair, such as the Byzantines, the Persians, and others who lived in their proximity" (kānat al-ʿArab taqūlu li-'l-ʿajam alladhīna yakūnu al-bayāḍ aghlaba alwānihim mithl al-Rūm wa-al-Furs wa-man ṣāqabahum innahum al-ḥamrā'). See Goldziher, Muslim Studies, I, 243–44; Morony, Iraq, 197–98.

ing, and some did it afterward. They were allowed to take part in [the distribution of] the spoils and received shares identical with those of the [other] participants in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah, i.e., two thousand [dirhams] each. They asked about the most powerful Arab tribe, and accordingly associated themselves with the tribe of Tamīm.[217]

When Rustam drew near and camped in al-Najaf, Sa'd sent out scouts and ordered them to capture a man whom he could interrogate about the situation of the Persians. The scouts went out, after some disagreement. After all the Muslims had agreed that a scouting party might consist of from one to ten men, they gave their permission, and Sa'd sent out Ṭulayḥah with five men and 'Amr b. Ma'dīkarib with the same number. That was on the morning when Rustam had ordered al-Jālnūs and Dhū al-Ḥājib to march forward. The Muslims did not have knowledge of their departure from al-Najaf. When the scouts had marched only slightly more than a farsakh,[218] they saw the Persian armed men[219] and their mounts filling the outposts of the Ṭaff region.[220]

Some of them said: "Return to your amīr because he has sent you out on the assumption that the Persians are [still] in al-Najaf, and bring the information to him. Return, lest your emeny be forewarned."[221] 'Amr then said to his companions: "You are right," but Ṭulayḥah said to his companions: "You are wrong. You were not sent to bring information about their mounts (sarḥ) but simply to bring back secret information (khubr)." They said: "What do you want to do?" Ṭulayḥah said: "I wish to brave the Persians or else to perish." They said: "You are a man with treachery in your soul, but you will not succeed[222] after the killing of 'Ukkāshah b. Miḥṣan.[223] [2262]

217. Literally "they counted themselves among the Tamīm." In other words, they became the mawālī of this tribe.

218. A farsakh equals approximately 6 kilometers. See Hinz, Masse, 62.

219. For masāliḥ in this sense, see de Goeje's Glossary to Balādhurī, Futūḥ; and to Ṭabarī.

220. This seems to be the meaning of ṭufūf in this context. For al-Ṭaff, see note 176, above.

221. The text uses the plural form of the imperative, and the translation is literal. The meaning is "we should return . . . ," etc.

222. The Muslims doubt that Ṭulayḥah will succeed in becoming a faithful Muslim after his exploits during the riddah rebellion. See note 223, below.

223. For another description of this episode, see Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 119–20. In this version Ṭulayḥah's companions explicitly accuse him of the desire to join the Per-

Take us back!" However, Ṭulayḥah refused. Saʿd heard about the departure [of Ṭulayḥah's unit], sent out Qays b. Hubayrah, placed one hundred men under his command, and also appointed him to command the scouting parties if he should meet them. Qays reached them only after they had split up. ʿAmr saw him and said [to his companions]: "Show him your determination." They showed him their desire to embark on a raid, but Qays refused permission. He found that Ṭulayḥah had already left; hence he returned to Saʿd with ʿAmr's scouting party and informed Saʿd about the proximity of the Persians.

Ṭulayḥah went forth on the riverbank, opposite the watering places in the Ṭaff region (wa ʿāraḍa al-miyāha ʿalā al-ṭufūf).[224] He slipped into Rustam's camp and remained there during the night, spying, looking, and trying to learn from what he saw. When the night was almost over, Ṭulayḥah passed on his way out by [the tent of] the Persian who he thought was the most noble, on the edge of the camp. None of the Persians had a horse like the one he had, and his white tent was unique. Ṭulayḥah drew his sword, cut the reins of the horse, and tied them to the reins of his own horse. Then he stirred his horse and left the camp in a gallop. When the owner of the horse and the Persian infantrymen became aware of what happened, they summoned each other and rode after him on every available mount.[225] Some of them rushed in his pursuit without saddling their horses. A Persian horseman caught up with Ṭulayḥah at dawn. When he fell upon him and pointed his spear to stab him, Ṭulayḥah made his horse swerve, and the Persian fell on the ground in front of him; Ṭulayḥah then attacked him and broke his back with the spear. Then another Persian caught up with him, and Ṭulayḥah did the same. Then a third Persian came. Having seen the death of his two companions, who were his cousins, he flew into a rage. When he sians. They doubt that God will guide Ṭulayḥah back to Islam after he has killed ʿUkkāshah. For the killing of ʿUkkāshah b. Miḥṣan by Ṭulayḥah during the riddah wars, see Ṭabarī, I, 1888.

---

224. The text of this passage is dubious and the translation tentative.

225. The text reads rakibū al-ṣaʿbata wa-al-dhalūla "they rode both the refractory and the tractable she-camels." This is an example of merismus, a fairly common literary device in Arabic. Cf. such expressions as al-aswad wa-al-aḥmar, "the Arabs and the non-Arabs = all humanity"; al-ins wa-al-jinn, "people and jinns = all creatures"; al-layl wa-al-nahār, "night and day = all the time." See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ṣaʿb; and Goldziher, Muslim Studies, I, 243–44.

caught up with Ṭulayḥah and pointed his spear at him, Ṭulayḥah made his horse swerve, and the Persian fell in front of him. Ṭulayḥah [2263] attacked him and urged him to accept captivity. The Persian understood that Ṭulayḥah would [otherwise] kill him and submitted himself as a captive; Ṭulayḥah ordered him to run in front of him, and this is what the Persian did. Now the [other] Persians arrived and saw that the two horsemen had been killed and the third had been taken prisioner. Meanwhile, Ṭulayḥah was now near[226] their (i.e., the Muslim) camp. They left him alone and withdrew.

Ṭulayḥah went forward and reached the Muslim camp, the army being in battle array. The soldiers were alerted and escorted him to Sa'd. When Ṭulayḥah came to him, Sa'd said: "Poor you! What is behind you?"[227] Ṭulayḥah said: "I entered their camp and have spied on them since last night. I captured a man who appears to be the most noble of them, but I do not know whether I am right or wrong.[228] Here he is; question him."

A translator was brought in and stood between Sa'd and the Persian captive. The Persian said: "Will you spare my life if I tell you the truth?" Sa'd said: "Yes. We prefer truthfulness in war to falsehood." The Persian said:

> I shall tell you about this companion of yours before I inform you about those who are with me. I have participated in wars, I have heard about heroes, and I have encountered them from the time when I was a boy until I reached the situation in which you see me now. But I have not seen a man similar to this one, nor have I heard of one like him. This man has crossed two camps [so strong] that heroes had not been courageous enough to take them on. He reached a [third] camp, which consists of seventy thousand men. Each of them is attended by five or ten people, or fewer. He was not content to get out in the same way as he got in; rather, he robbed a prominent horseman of the army, cut the ropes of his tent, and thereby alerted him. All of us were also alerted and went in his pursuit. The first man to catch up with him

226. For shārafa in this sense, see de Goeje's Glossary to Balādhurī, Futūḥ, s.v.

227. Mā warā'aka is a question frequently addressed to someone who has been sent out to bring some information. See Maydānī, Amthāl, III, 188, 240.

228. Regarding the man's standing among the Persians.

was a prominent horseman[229] who equals a thousand, but he killed him. Then another horseman, similar [in prowess] to the first one, caught up with him and was killed as well. Then I myself came. I do not think that I left behind someone who is equal to me, for I was trying to take revenge for [2264] the two slain men, who were my cousins. I saw that death was imminent, so I submitted myself as a captive.

The prisoner then told Saʿd about the Persians, saying that the army consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand men, with an equal number of men serving them. The man embraced Islam, and Saʿd named him "Muslim."[230] He then returned to Ṭulayḥah and said: "By God, you will not be defeated as long as you are as faithful, truthful, benign, and charitable as I see you now. I do not need [anymore] to be associated with Persia." On that day, he acquitted himself well.[231]

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad b. Qays — Mūsā b. Ṭarīf: Saʿd said to Qays b. Hubayrah al-Asadī: "You heedless man![232] Go forth and care for nothing of this world until you bring me information about the Persians." Qays set out. Saʿd also sent ʿAmr [b. Maʿdīkarib] and Ṭulayḥah. Qays reached the area opposite to the bridge, marched a little, and came upon a large group of the Persian horsemen, who were emerging from their camp. Rustam had left al-Najaf and halted where Dhū al-Ḥājib had been before. Al-Jālnūs also moved, and Dhū al-Ḥājib camped in his place. Al-Jālnūs went in the direction of Ṭayzanābād,[233] halted there, and ordered the horsemen to move forward.

Saʿd sent Ṭulayḥah and ʿAmr with Qays because of an utterance by ʿAmr that came to his knowledge and because of what ʿAmr had

---

229. Literally "the horseman of the people."

230. It was normal practice for converts to abandon their pre-Islamic names and adopt new, Islamic ones.

231. Probably meaning that he displayed valor in battle on the side of the Muslims.

232. The Leiden edition has ʿāqil "wise." I am translating ghāfil "heedless," using the version preferred by Kosegarten. It seems to give a better sense in the context: Qays is instructed to stop caring for this world, which is, in the Muslim tradition, a characteristic of those who are heedless of their fate in the hereafter.

233. Ṭayzanābād was situated 1 mile from al-Qādisiyyah, on the way to the Ḥijāz. Yāqūt [Muʿjam, III, 569–70] describes it as a resort, surrounded by vineyards, wine-presses, trees, and inns. It was a place "of amusement and idleness."

previously said to Qays b. Hubayrah.[234] ʿAmr said: "O Muslims, fight your enemy!" He then started the battle and fought the Persians for a while. Then Qays attacked them, and they suffered a defeat. He killed twelve men and took three prisoners. He took booty, brought it to Saʿd, and provided him with information. Saʿd said: [2265] "These are good tidings. God willing, when you confront the main body of their army and their valiant men, the result will be the same." Then he summoned ʿAmr and Ṭulayḥah and said to them: "What is your view of Qays?" Ṭulayḥah said: "We think that he was the bravest among us," and ʿAmr said: "The amīr has more understanding of men than we have." Saʿd said:

> By means of Islam God has revived us, brought life to hearts that had been dead, and death to hearts that had been alive. I warn you not to prefer the affair of the Jāhiliyyah, lest your hearts die while you are still alive. Stick to obedience and recognize the [people's] rights. Nobody has ever seen people like those whom God has made strong by means of Islam.[235]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and ʿAmr; also Ziyād, Mujālid, and Saʿīd b. al-Marzubān: On the morning that followed his camping in al-Saylaḥūn Rustam ordered al-Jālnūs and Dhū al-Ḥājib to move forward. Al-Jālnūs marched out and halted before the bridge, opposite Zuhrah (b. al-Ḥawiyyah) and next to the commander of the vanguard. Dhū al-Ḥājib camped in his stead in Ṭayzanābād; Rustam camped instead of Dhū al-Ḥājib in al-Kharrārah. He ordered Dhū al-Ḥājib to march forward. When he reached al-ʿAtīq, he turned left. Then, when he was opposite Qudays, he dug a moat. Al-Jālnūs set off and joined him. Saʿd had Zuhrah b. al-Ḥawiyyah commanding the vanguard, and ʿAbdallāh b. al-Muʿtamm and Shuraḥbīl b. al-Simṭ al-Kindī commanding the [2266] two wings. ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr commanded the light cavalry, another man the archers, another man the footmen, and Sawād b. Mālik the scouts. Rustam's vanguard was commanded by al-Jālnūs; his two 234. Saʿd's anxiety is probably the result of ʿAmr b. al-Maʿdīkarib's unwillingness to accept Qays b. Hubayrah as his commander and his threat to renounce Islam; cf. pp. 2259–60, above.

235. Saʿd demands that past rivalries not be allowed to interfere with the unity of the Muslims.

wings by al-Hurmuzān and Mihrān, his light cavalry by Dhū al-Ḥājib, and his scouts by al-Bayruzān, with Zād b. Buhaysh commanding the footmen.

When Rustam reached al-ʿAtīq, he stopped on its banks, opposite the camp of Saʿd. He assigned to his men their positions, and they occupied them one after the other, until their entire multitude assembled.[236] He remained there during the night, with the Muslims' refraining from attacking them.

According to Saʿīd b. al-Marzubān: When the Persians woke up after spending the night on the bank of al-ʿAtīq, Rustam's astrologer advised Rustam of the vision that he had been shown during the night. He said: "I saw Aquarius in the sky in the form of a bucket emptied of water. I saw Pisces in the form of fish in shallow water and in a state of commotion; and I saw Pegasus (al-Naʿāʾim) and Venus shining." Rustam said: "Woe to you! Did you tell anyone about it?" The astrologer said: "No." Rustam said: "Keep it secret!"

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Mujālid—al-Shaʿbī: Rustam was an astrologer and was weeping because of what he saw in his dreams and because of [the visions?] coming to him. When he was in the outskirts[237] of al-Kūfah, he dreamed that ʿUmar entered the Persian camp accompanied by an angel. The angel put a seal on the weapons of the Persians, tied them into a bundle, and handed them to ʿUmar.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Ismāʿīl b. Abī Khālid — Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim (who participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah): Rustam had with him eighteen elephants, and al-Jālnūs had fifteen elephants.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī:
[2267] Rustam has with him in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah thirty elephants.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Saʿīd b. al-Marzubān — another man: Rustam had with him thirty-three elephants, including the white elephant of Sābūr, to whom the (other) elephants kept close; he was the biggest and oldest among them.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Naḍr — Ibn al-Rufayl — his father: Rustam had thirty-three elephants, eighteen of whom

236. I have not translated yunziluhum fa-yanzilūn; the meaning seems to be the same as wa-nazzala al-nāsa wa-mā zālū yatalāḥaqūn.

237. For ẓahr in this sense, see Glossary to BGA, IV, 294.

were in the central part of the army and fifteen in the two wings.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mujālid, Saʿīd, Ṭalḥah, ʿAmr, and Ziyād: When Rustam woke up after the night which he spent near al-ʿAtīq, he went riding with his horsemen. He observed the Muslims and then went up in the direction of the bridge. Having estimated the number of the Muslims, he stood facing them on the near side of the bridge, and sent them a messenger, saying: "Rustam says to you: Send to us a man who will speak to us, and we shall speak to him." The messenger returned. Zuhrah then sent someone to inform Saʿd of this, and Saʿd sent al-Mughīrah b. al-Shuʿbah to Rustam. Zuhrah accompanied al-Mughīrah to al-Jālnūs, and al-Jālnūs escorted him to Rustam.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Naḍr — Ibn al-Rufayl — his father: Rustam camped near al-ʿAtīq and spent the night there. On the next morning, he went to examine the situation and to estimate the number of the Muslims. He went along al-ʿAtīq in the direction of al-Khaffān[238] until he reached the end of the Muslim camp, and then he went up until he reached the bridge. He observed the Muslims and then came to a place from which he could look at them from above. When he stood on the bridge, he sent a message to Zuhrah, who went toward him until Rustam asked him to stop; he wanted to make peace with the Muslims and give Zuhrah a stipend on the condition that they should depart. He said, among other things:

> You are our neighbors, and some of you have been under our rule. We have given them protection, we have kept all harm away from them, and we have given them many useful things. We have kept them safe among the people living in their desert, we have allowed them to graze their flocks on our pastures and have provided them with supplies from our country. We did not prevent them from trading in any part of our land, since their livelihood was based on this. [2268]

[He was alluding to peace but spoke about the good deeds of the Persians. His purpose was peace, but he did not say so explicitly].

Zuhrah said:

---

238. A place in the vicinity of al-Kūfah, on the way to Mecca. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 456.

> You have spoken the truth. In the past the situation was as you described it. But our concern is not what the concern of our forbears was, and our desire is different from theirs. We did not come to you looking for things of this world; our desire and aspiration is the hereafter. In the past we were as you said; those of us who came to your country were obedient to you, humbled themselves before you, and sought what was in your hands. Then God sent to us a Prophet, who called us to his Lord, and we responded. God said to His Prophet: "I have given to this community dominion over those who did not embrace my religion. By means of this community I shall take revenge upon those, and I shall make this community prevail as long as they affirm this religion. This is the religion of truth; none will shun it without suffering humiliation, and none will embrace it without gaining honor and strength."

Rustam said: "And of what does it consist?" Zuhrah said: "Its essential pillar[239] is to testify that there is no god except Allāh and that Muḥammad is His messenger, and to affirm what he has brought from God." Rustam said: "Excellent! And what else?" Zuhrah said: "To extricate people from servitude to [other] people and to make them servants of God." Rustam said: "Good. And what else?" Zuhrah said: "Men are sons of Adam and Eve, brothers born of the [2269] same father and mother." Rustam said: "How excellent is this!" And he added: "If I agree to this matter and respond to you, together with my people, what will you do? Will you return [to your country]?" Zuhrah said: "By God, indeed we will, and we shall never draw near your land except for [purposes of] trade or some necessity." Rustam said: "You have spoken to me truthfully. But, by God, since Ardashīr[240] ascended the throne, the Persians did not allow any lowly person to leave his work. They used to say: 'If they leave their work, they overstep their bounds and become hostile to their nobles.'" But Zuhrah said to him: "We are the best people for the sake of others. We cannot be as you say. We obey God with regard to the lowly, and we are not harmed if someone disobeys God with regard to us."

---

239. Literally "Its pillar, without which none of its parts is sound...."
240. See note 178, above.

Rustam went away. He summoned the Persians and spoke to them about this, but they went into a rage and scornfully rejected [Zuhrah's proposals]. Rustam said: "May God curse you and afflict you! May God disgrace the greatest weaklings and cowards among us!" When Rustam left, I [sc. Ibn al-Rufayl] felt sympathy for Zuhrah. I embraced Islam and associated myself with him, and he allotted to me shares in the spoils equally with the participants in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah.

The same tradition was transmitted also by al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: They [also] said: Saʿd sent for al-Mughīrah b. al-Shuʿbah, Busr b. Abī Ruhm, and ʿArfajah b. Harthamah,[241] Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan,[242] Ribʿī b. ʿĀmir,[243] Qirfah b. Zāhir al-Taymī al-Wāthilī, Madhʿūr b. ʿAdī al- ʿIjlī,[244] Muḍārib b. Yazīd al-ʿIjlī,[245] and Maʿbad b. Murrah al-ʿIjlī, who was one of the [2270] shrewdest of the Arabs. Saʿd said to them: "I am sending you to the Persians. What do you think of it?" All of them said: "We shall follow your orders to the utmost. Should something which you did not mention come up, we shall consider what is the most appropriate and the most beneficial thing for the people, and we shall tell them." Saʿd said: "This is what prudent people do. Go and prepare yourselves!" Ribʿī b. ʿĀmir said: "The Persians have their own views and their customs. If we all come to them, they will think that we have gone out of our way to honor them, so do not send more than one man." All of them agreed. Ribʿī then said: "Send me," so Saʿd sent him [alone].

Ribʿī set out in order to enter into Rustam's camp. The Persians on the bridge arrested him, and he was sent to Rustam immediately upon his arrival. Rustam consulted the Persian dignitaries and asked them: "What do you think? Should we enter into a contest

241. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, IV/ii, 78; [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 401; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 271.

242. Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan al-Qalfānī [or al-Ghalfānī] later became governor of ʿUmān on behalf of Abū Bakr and governor of Yamāmah on behalf of ʿUmar. See [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, I, 390; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 44 no. 1648.

243. Ribʿī b. ʿĀmir also participated in the battle of Nihāwand and later became governor of Ṭukhāristān. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 454–55 no. 2574; Crone, Slaves, 118–19.

244. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VI, 63–64 no. 7867; [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athir, Usd, IV, 342.

245. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VI, 125 no. 8011. For a discussion of the historicity or otherwise of this list, see Noth, Studien, 95–96.

with him (a-nubāhī) or should we treat him with disdain?"[246] All of them decided to treat him with disdain. They displayed ornaments, spread carpets (busuṭ) and pillows (namāriq), and did not leave any ornament without using it. A gold-plated seat[247] was set up for Rustam, decorated with rugs (anmāṭ), and cushions (wasāʾid) laced with gold. Ribʿī came in on a hairy, short-legged mare, having with him a polished sword whose scabbard was made of shabby cloth. His spear was bound with a strap of sinew,[248] and he had a shield made of cowhide, whose exterior was of bright color (aḥmar), like a thick, round loaf of bread. He also had with him a bow and arrows.

When he entered upon the king,[249] reached him, and reached the edge of the carpets, the Persians said to him: "Dismount!" but Ribʿī drove the horse onto the carpet. [Only] when the horse stood on the carpet did he dismount. He tied the horse to two cushions, tore them up, and put the rope inside them; they could not stop him from doing this but could only treat him with disdain. He knew what their in-[2271] tention was and wanted to cause them distress. He had a shield shining like a pond,[250] and his coat was the cover of his camel, in which he made a hole, used it as a shield, and tied it to his waist with a bark of reeds. He was the hairiest of the Arabs, and he tied to his head a piece of cloth which was the girth of his camel. On his head he had four locks of hair which protruded like horns of a goat. The Persians

246. The Persians seem to be considering two alternatives: to enter into a verbal contest with Ribʿī by expatiating on their superiority vis-à-vis the Arabs or to show their contempt for him by an ostentatious display of their finery, which would put his shabby appearance into sharp relief.

247. The text reads sarīr al-dhahab, "golden seat," but see Sadan, Le mobilier, 51. See this work, passim, for materials on bisāṭ, numruq, and wisādah.

248. Rumḥ maʿlūb is a spear bound with sinews (ʿilbāʾ) taken from a camel's neck. The Arabs used to bind a cracked spear with a fresh and moist sinew, which would then dry out and make the weapon strong and usable again. Cf. Schwarzlose, Waffen, 233–34. This carries in our context a special significance: It reflects the rugged ways of the Arabs—which are considered praiseworthy—in contradistinction to the luxury of the Persians. See Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, II, 226 (Kitāb al-jihād, bāb 83): "The conquests were accomplished by people whose swords were not embellished by gold and silver but by sinews, lead, and iron" (la-qad fataḥa al-futūḥa qawmun mā kānat ḥilyatu suyūfihim al-dhahab wa-lā al-fiḍḍah wa-innamā kānat ḥilyatuhā al-ʿalābī wa-al-ānuk wa-al-ḥadīd).

249. Ribʿī is about to meet Rustam, not Yazdagird, but high officials of the Persian empire were frequently called "kings." See Morony, Iraq, 186–87.

250. For this meaning of aḍāt, see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. ʾ-ḍ-w; Glossary, s.v. ʾ-ḍ-w. For the comparison of the shield with a pond, see Schwarzlose, Waffen, 348.

said to him: "Lay down your arms," but Rib'ī said: "I have not come to you [on my own initiative] so that I should have to lay down my arms on your orders. You invited me here; and if you do not want me to come as I please, I shall return."

The Persians notified Rustam of this. He said: "Let him come in; he is only one man." Rib'ī came in, leaning on his spear. Its lower end[251] was (as sharp as) the blade. He walked with short steps and pierced their carpets and cushions, so that he did not leave even one cushion or carpet without destroying it and left them torn to shreds. When he came close to Rustam, the guards seized him. He sat on the floor, plunging his spear into the carpets. They said: "Why are you doing this?" Rib'ī said: "We do not like to sit on this finery of yours." Then Rustam spoke to him and asked him: "What has brought you here?" Rib'ī said:

> God has sent us and has brought us here so that we may extricate those who so desire from servitude to the people [here on earth] and make them servants of God; that we may transform their poverty in this world into affluence; and that we may free them from the inequity of the religions and bestow upon them the justice of Islam. He has sent us to bring His religion to His creatures and to call them to Islam. Whoever accepts it from us, we shall be content. We shall leave him on his land to rule it without us; but whoever refuses, we shall fight him, until we fulfill the promise of God.

Rustam said: "And what is the promise of God?" Rib'ī said: "Paradise for him who dies while fighting those who have refused [to embrace Islam] and victory for him who survives."

Rustam said: "I have heard your speech. Are you willing to delay this matter until both parties consider it?" Rib'ī said: "How long a [2272]

---

251. It may be worthwhile to speculate on the symbolic content of this description. The lower end (zujj) of the spear was not normally used to stab the enemy but rather to stick the weapon into the ground. It was therefore a symbol of peaceful intentions. In our context the zujj is, indeed, stuck into the ground, but in a way that destroys the objectionable finery of the Persians. That the lower end of the spear is described as being as sharp as the blade may be taken as a hint that peaceful resolution of the conflict is not envisaged. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-'Arab, s.v. z-j-j; Schwarzlose, Waffen, 232, and index; Anbārī, Sharḥ al-qaṣā'id, 280–81 (on the Mu'allaqah of Zuhayr b. Abī Sulmā, v. 47).

delay would you like? One day or two days?" Rustam said: "No [I wish a longer delay], until we exchange letters with our men of judgment and with the leaders of our people." [He wanted to attract him and to put him off [at the same time].] Ribʿī said:

> The custom that has been established for us by the Messenger of God and put into effect by our leaders is that we should not listen to the enemy nor delay the fight with them for more than three days. We shall therefore go back and leave you alone for three days. Look into your affair and into the affair of your people and choose—within this period—one of three options. Choose Islam, and we shall leave you alone on your land; or choose [to pay] the poll tax, and we shall be content and refrain from fighting you. If you do not need our help, we shall leave you alone; and if you need it, we shall protect you. Otherwise it will be war on the fourth day. We shall not attack you between now and the fourth day unless you attack us. You have my guarantee on behalf of my companions and on behalf of all those [Muslims] whom you see.

Rustam said: "Are you their chief?" Ribʿī said: "No, I am not, but the Muslims are like one body. They are all parts of a whole [baʿḍuhum min baʿḍin]. The most humble among them can promise protection on behalf of the most noble."[252]

Rustam went into private consultation with the Persian chieftains and said: "What is your opinion? Have you ever heard a statement more lucid and more honorable that the statement of this man?" They said: "May God save you from inclining toward something like that and abandoning your religion to this dog! Did you not see his clothing?" Rustam said: "Woe to you! Do not look at his

---

252. This is a reference to the idea that an assurance of safety or protection given by any Muslim is binding on the entire community. See Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, II, 296 [Kitāb al-jizyah, bāb 10]: "The assurance of safety or protection of the Muslims is one; the most humble of them is entitled to take it upon himself" [dhimmat al-muslimīn wa-jiwāruhum wāḥidah yasʿā bihā adnāhum]. Explaining this tradition, Qasṭallānī [Irshād, V, 238] says: "Whoever gives an assurance of safety to someone from the People of War, his assurance is binding on all the Muslims. It is immaterial whether he is lowly or noble, slave or free, man or woman" [inna kulla man ʿaqada amānan liaḥadin min ahl al-ḥarb jāza amānuhu ʿalā jamīʿal-muslimīn daniyyan kāna aw sharīfan ʿabdan aw ḥurran rajulan aw imraʾatan]. See also Bukhārī, II, 298; Qasṭallānī, Irshād, V, 243; and Ṭabarī, Jihād, 25ff.

clothing! Look rather at his judgment, his speech, and his conduct. The Arabs attach no importance to clothing and food. They protect their ancestral glory (aḥsāb) instead. They are not like you in regard to clothing and they do not see in it what you do." They approached [2273] Ribʿī, took his weapons in their hands, and belittled their worth. He said: "Do you want to show me [your ability] and I shall show you [mine]?" He drew his sword from its rags like a flame of fire. The Persians said: "Sheathe it." Ribʿī complied. Then he shot at a shield (of theirs), and they shot at his leathern shield; their shield was pierced, while his remained intact. Ribʿī said: "O people of Persia, you attach great importance to food, clothing, and drink, whereas we belittle all these." Then he returned, so that they might consider the matter within the allotted time.

On the next morning, the Persians sent a message, saying: "Send this man to us again," but Saʿd sent to them Ḥudhayfah b. Miḥṣan. He came dressed in a similar attire. When he came to the nearest carpet, the Persians said: "Dismount!" He said:

> You would have the right to speak in this fashion if I were to come asking for something. Ask your king whether he wants to ask for something or whether I do. If he says that I came here to ask for something, he is lying and I shall return and leave you. If he says that he wants to ask for something, then I am not coming except as I please.

Rustam said: "Let him come in." Ḥudhayfah came in and stood near Rustam, who was sitting on his seat. Rustam said: "Dismount!" Ḥudhayfah said: "I shall not." When Ḥudhayfah refused, Rustam asked him: "Why have you come rather than the man who was here yesterday?" Ḥudhayfah said: "Our amīr treats us justly in distress as well as in comfort; it is now my turn." Rustam said: "What has brought you here?" Ḥudhayfah said:

> God the Exalted has favored us with His religion and showed us His signs. We have come to know Him after we had denied Him. Then He ordered us to summon the people to one of three options. Whichever you accept will be accepted by us. (If you embrace) Islam, we shall leave you alone. If [you agree to pay] the poll tax, we shall protect you if you need our protection. Otherwise, it is war.

Rustam said: "Or truce till a certain day?" Ḥudhayfah said: "Yes—for three days, beginning yesterday."

When Rustam could not get from Ḥudhayfah anything except that, he sent him away. Then he came to his companions and said:

> Woe to you! Do you not see what I do? The first one came to us yesterday, forced his way into our land, debased what we > [2274] honor, made his horse stand on our finery, and tied him to it. He came on an auspicious day [for him] and bore away our land and all that is in it to them.[253] He had superior intelligence. The second one came today. He stopped here on an auspicious day, standing on our land before us.

This continued until Rustam and his companions enraged each other. On the next morning, Rustam sent a message, saying: "Send another man to us," so the Muslims sent al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abū ʿUthmān al-Nahdī: When al-Mughīrah reached the bridge and crossed over to the Persians, they detained him and asked Rustam for permission to let him pass. They did not change anything in the setting in order to intensify their disdain. When al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah arrived, the Persians were in their attire, wearing crowns and clothing laced with gold. Their carpets were a bow shot long. Nobody could reach their chief without walking on them all this distance. Al-Mughīrah came in, having four locks of hair on his head. He walked through and sat down with Rustam on his seat and cushion.[254] The Persians fell upon him, seized him violently, dragged him down, and gave him a light beating. Al-Mughīrah said:

> We have heard about your moderation and self-restraint, but I think that there is no nation more excitable and stupid than you are. We, the Arabs, are [all] equal [to each other]. We do not enslave each other, except if someone fights against the other [and is taken prisoner]. I thought you treated your people as equals as we do. Instead of what you > [2275] did, it would have been better if you had informed me that

253. See p. 2244, above.

254. This tradition can be found in Abū Yūsuf, Kharāj, 83. According to Abū Yūsuf's version, al-Mughīrah seated himself on Rustam's throne on purpose, in order to provoke his anger.

> some of you are masters over others, that behavior [such as mine] is unacceptable among you, and that we should not engage in it. I have not come [on my own initiative]; you have invited me. Today I have come to know that your affair will come to nought and that you will be defeated. A kingdom cannot be based on such conduct, nor on such minds [as yours].

The lowly people said: "By God, the Arab is speaking the truth." The landowners (dahāqīn) said: "By God, he has said things to which our slaves have always been inclined. May God curse[255] our forbears! How foolish they were when they disparaged this nation!"

Rustam made a joke in order to blot out [the impression of] what had been done. He said: "O Arab, the king's attendants sometimes do things with which the king does not agree, but he is soft on them for fear that he would destroy their willingness to do the right thing [in the future]. We are faithful and truthful, the way you want us to be. And what are the spindles that you have with you?"[256] Al-Mughīrah said: "A burning coal does not deteriorate because it is not long." He then competed with them in shooting arrows. Rustam said: "Why is your sword old?" and al-Mughīrah replied: "Its covering is shabby, but its blade is sharp," and he fought a mock fight with them. Rustam said: "Speak, or shall I myself speak?" Al-Mughīrah said: "You are the one who sent for us, so speak!"

Rustam ordered the translator to take his place between them. Rustam began to speak. He praised his people and glorified them, saying:

> We are firmly established in the land, victorious over our enemies, and noble among the nations. None of the kings has our power, honor, and dominion. We triumph over others, and they do not triumph over us, except for a day or two, or a month or two, and this is [only] because of our transgressions. When God takes His revenge to His satisfaction, He will restore our honor and we shall assemble for our enemy [an army which will fight him on] the worst day that [2276]

255. For this meaning of qātalahu Allāh, see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. q-t-l.

256. Cf. p. 2236, above.

ever came upon him. Furthermore, there was never among the people a nation which we considered more contemptuous than you. You were people who lived in misery and privation. We thought nothing of you and held you of no account. When your land was famine-striken and you were afflicted with drought, you sought help in the border area of our country, and we would provide you with dates and barley and send you back. I know that the only cause of what you are doing is the distress which you face in your land. I shall supply your chief with a garment, a mule, and one thousand dirhams. I shall provide every one of you with a load of dates and two garments, and you will then leave our country, for I have no desire to kill you or to take you in captivity.

Al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah began to speak. He praised God, extolled Him, and then said:

God is the creator of everything![257] When somebody makes something, it is [really] He who makes it and it belongs to Him.[258] As for your victories and your firm position in the land and your powerful dominion in the world which you have mentioned with regard to yourself and with regard to the people of your country, we know this and do not deny it. But it is God who has done this to you and entrusted you with it; all this is His, not yours. As for our destitution, privation, and dissension which you mentioned, we know it [also] and do not deny it. It is God who has put us to the test by it and reduced us to this condition. Fortune in this world is transitory; people afflicted with calamities hope for prosperity until they achieve it, and people of prosperity expect that calamities will afflict them.[259] And even if you were grateful to God for what He has bestowed upon you, your gratitude would fall short of what you were given. The inadequacy of [your] gratitude would cause a change of [your] [2277] condition for the worse. And if we were ungrateful with regard to our tribulations, then the greatest afflictions which

257. Qur'ān 13:18, 39:62.

258. I am translating according to de Goeje's suggested emendation: wa-huwa lahu, instead of wa-alladhī lahu of the text.

259. I have not translated wa yaṣīru ilayhā.

> kept coming at us time and again from God would seem like acts of mercy through which He has alleviated our suffering.[260] But the matter is different from what you think, and we are not the people whom you knew in the past. God has sent to us a messenger. . . .

Then al-Mughīrah mentioned things identical with those which had been related before.[261] When he reached the sentence: "And if you need our protection, then be our slave, and pay the poll tax out of hand, while being humiliated;[262] otherwise, it is the sword," Rustam snorted, flew into a rage, and swore by the sun: "Dawn will not break upon you tomorrow before I kill you all."

Al-Mughīrah went away. Seeking conciliation, Rustam met in private with the Persian [dignitaries] and said:

> How different are these people from you! What is going to happen after this? The first two men came, annoyed you, and caused you distress. Then this one came. There were no differences between them; they followed the same way and held fast to the same matter. By God, these are [veritable] men, whether they speak the truth or lie. By God, if they speak the truth and if their intelligence and secretiveness are such that no difference between them can be discerned, then they are more effective than anybody else in expressing their purpose. Nothing can stand against them.

The Persians wrangled with each other and feigned boldness. Rustam said: "I know that you incline to my words, and all this is dissimulation on your part," but their wrangling intensified.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Naḍr — Ibn al-Rufayl — his father: Rustam sent a man to accompany al-Mughīrah. He said to him: "When he crosses the bridge and reaches his companions, cry out to him: 'The king[263] is an astrologer. He made calculations with regard to you, looked into your affair, and said that one of your eyes would be put out tomorrow.'"[264] The messenger did as he [2278]

260. This is to say that, if the Arabs had been ungrateful to God, He would have brought upon them suffering of such magnitude that their former tribulations would appear merely as acts of His mercy when compared with it.

261. By the Muslims who had met Rustam before al-Mughīrah.

262. Paraphrasing Qur'ān 9:29.

263. The title evidently refers to Rustam.

264. Al-Mughīrah did, indeed, lose an eye in the wars of conquest. According to one was told to do. Al-Mughīrah said: "You have given me good tidings about my reward. If I did not have to fight polytheists like you in the future, I would have wished that my other eye had gone as well."[265] The messenger saw that the Arabs laughed at what al-Mughīrah said and admired his determination.[266] He returned to the king with his report. Rustam said: "O people of Persia, obey me. I see that God is about to inflict punishment on you. You will not be able to ward it off."

The horses of the Persians and of the Muslims clashed on the bridge and nowhere else. The Persians were incessantly engaging the Muslims in battle, while the Muslims nevertheless left them alone for three days and did not attack them. When the Persians started up the fighting, the Muslims repelled and turned them back.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad — ʿUbaydallāh — Nāfiʾ — Ibn ʿUmar: The translator of Rustam was a man from al-Ḥīrah. His name was ʿAbbūd.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī and Saʿīd b. al-Marzubān: Rustam asked al-Mughīrah to come, and the latter came in and sat down on Rustam's seat. Rustam then summoned his translator, who was an Arab from the people of al-Ḥīrah named ʿAbbūd. Al-Mughīrah said to him: "O wretched ʿAbbūd! You are one of the Arabs. Inform him of what I say in the same way as you inform me of what he says." Rustam said to al-Mughīrah the same things [that had been related before], as did al-Mughīrah. [He said:] "... [you have] one of three options: Islam, in which case you will have the same rights and the same obligations as we have. There will be no difference between us. Or [to pay] the poll tax out of hand, while being humiliated." Rustam asked: "What does 'while being [2279] humiliated' mean?" Al-Mughīrah said: "It means that a Persian will stand on his feet in order to pay the poll tax to one of us and will tradition, this happened in al-Ḥudaybiyyah; according to another, in al-Qādisiyyah. See Ibn Ḥabīb, Muḥabbar, 261, 302.

---

265. Classical Islamic literature, and especially the chapters on jihād, frequently contains utterances in which the warriors express their desire to be wounded or even killed while fighting the infidels. See, e.g., Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, II, 206 (Kitāb al-jihād, bāb 21), and IV, 408 (Kitāb al-tamannī, bāb 1), for prophetic traditions on this topic. See also Noth, Studien, 129–30.

266. For this meaning of baṣīrah see de Goeje's Glossary, s.v., and Blachère et al., Dictionnaire, I, 646.

267. Muslim jurisprudents and commentators on the Qur'ān are concerned with praise the Muslim for agreeing to accept it from him."[267] Al-Mughīrah completed his statement and said: "Islam is the option we prefer [you to choose]."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿUbaydah—Shaqīq: I participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah as a young man, after attaining puberty. Saʿd came to al-Qādisiyyah with twelve thousand men, among whom were participants in previous battles (ahl al-ayyām). The vanguard of Rustam moved toward us, and then he marched forward with sixty thousand men. When he saw our camp, he said: "O Arabs, send to us a man who will speak to us and we shall speak to him." Saʿd sent to him al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah with a group of people. When they came to Rustam, al-Mughīrah sat down on [Rustam's] seat. Rustam's brother snorted. Al-Mughīrah said: "Do not snort, for this will not increase my honor, nor will it detract from your brother's." Rustam said: "You were people of misery ... " and continued until he reached the words: "If there is something besides this, let me know."[268] Then Rustam took an arrow from al-Mughīrah's quiver and said: "Do not think that these spindles will be of any avail to you." Responding, al-Mughīrah mentioned the Prophet and said: "Among the things with which God has provided us through the Prophet was a seed which grows in this country of yours. When we gave it to our families to taste, they said: 'We cannot endure without it.' We therefore came in order to let them eat it or else to die." Rustam said: "Die you indeed will, or be killed." Al-Mughīrah said: "In that case, those of us who will be killed will enter Paradise, and those of you whom we shall kill will enter the Fire. Those of us who survive will be victorious over those of you who survive. We give you the choice of three options ... ," and he com-the ways in which the Qur'ānic requirement to humiliate the payer of the poll tax is to be implemented. One of the frequently mentioned devices for achieving this is to have the payer stand while the payee is comfortably seated. This seems to be the background of al-Mughīrah's response to Rustam's question. See Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, X, 77 last line–78: "The commentators were divided concerning the meaning of humiliation that God intended in this verse (9:29). Some said: 'He (i.e., the dhimmī) should pay it standing while the [Muslim] who takes it is sitting (... an yuʿṭiyaka wa-huwa qāʾim wa-al-ākhidh jālis).'" See also Fattal, Le statut, 286–88, and Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 200. Al-Mughīrah also expresses the idea that the acceptance of the poll tax is a favor that the Muslims do for their non-Muslim subjects, one for which the latter should be grateful.

---

268. See pp. 2275–76 for Rustam's speech.

pleted his speech. Rustam said: "There will be no peace between us."

[2280] According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: Saʿd sent to the Persians the best people of judgment, who numbered three.[269] They went forth and came to Rustam in order to reproach him severely, and said to him:

> Our chief says to you that good neighborliness (jiwār) keeps rulers safe. I call upon you to accept what is good for us and what entails well-being for you. If you accept the call of God, we shall return to our country and you shall return to yours. We shall be closely associated with one another, but your land will be yours and your affairs will be in your hands. Whatever you seize beyond your borders will be yours and we shall have no part in it. Should anyone intend [to attack] you or overpower you, we shall come to your help. O Rustam, fear God and do not let your people perish at your hands! Nothing except embracing Islam and expelling Satan from your self by means of it stands between you and the attainment of happiness and prosperity.

Rustam replied:

> I have spoken to a few people from among you. If they had only understood what I said, I would have hoped that you would also understand. Parables are clearer than many a speech, so I shall therefore apply a parable to you. You must understand that you were people whose livelihood was meager and whose appearance was shabby, and the places where you lived were neither fortified nor difficult of access; nor did you insist on getting what was due to you. We did not treat you badly, nor did we stop sharing our wealth with you. Time and again you were forced out of your country [and into ours] by the drought, and we used to provide you with > [2281] supplies and then send you back home. You used to come to us as hirelings and merchants, and we treated you well. After you partook of our food, drank of our drink, and rested in > our shade, you described this in favorable terms to your people, invited them to come, and brought them to us. Your relationship with us regarding this is similar to that of a man who had a vineyard and saw a fox in it. [He did nothing] and said: "What is one fox?" The fox went away and called the foxes to this vineyard. When they gathered together, the owner closed behind them the hole through which they had come and killed them. I know that only greed, covetousness, and privation caused you to do this. Go back this year, supply yourselves with provisions, and you can return whenever you are in need, for I have no desire to kill you.

269. I am translating according to the version found in ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 361: wa-kānū thalāthatan.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿUmārah b. al-Qaʿqāʿ al-Ḍabbī — a man from Yarbūʿ who was present [at the meeting with Rustam]: Rustam said:

> Many of your people took whatever they wanted from our land; then they were killed or had to run away. He who established this custom among you was better and stronger than you are. You have seen the situation: Whenever they took something, some of them were hurt and some of them escaped and had to abandon whatever they took. With regard to the deeds that you perpetrate, you are like rats who used to come regularly to a jar full of grain. In the jar there was an opening. The first rat went in and stayed there. The other rats began to carry the grain away and to come back [for more]. They spoke to the rat inside about returning but he refused. He became extremely fat, longed for his family, [2282] > and wanted to show them his excellent condition. The opening was now too narrow for him. He became worried, complained to his companions, and asked them to help him out, but they said: "You cannot get out before you return to the size that you had been before you went in." He starved himself and was full of fear, but, when he finally returned to his former size, the owner of the jar came along and killed him. Get out, therefore, and let not this parable be applicable to you.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Naḍr — Ibn al-Rufayl — his father: Rustam said:

God never created creatures more covetous and more harmful than flies. O Arabs, do you not see the destruction into which your greed leads you? I shall apply a parable to you. When flies see honey, they fly toward it and say: "He who enables us to reach it will have two dirhams." When they get to it, they refuse to listen to anyone who tries to drive them away. When they plunge into the honey, they drown and become stuck in it, and then they say: "He who extricates us will have four dirhams."

He also said:

You are like a fox, emaciated and weak, who entered a vineyard through a hole, and used to eat whatever God wanted him to eat. The owner of the vineyard saw his condition and took pity on him. After he stayed in the vineyard for a long time, he became fat, his condition improved, and his leanness disappeared. He began to behave with pride and self-conceit, to fool around in the vineyard, and to destroy more than he could eat. This became unbearable for the vineyard owner, and he said: "I shall not endure this from him." He took a piece of wood, asked his servants to help him, and they went after the fox. The fox began to play tricks with them in the vineyard. When he saw that they did not desist, [2283] he tried to get out by means of the hole through which he had entered, but he got stuck in it; the hole was big enough for him when he was lean but too small when he became fat. The vineyard owner caught up with him in this condition and did not cease beating him until he killed him. You came here lean; now you have become somewhat fat. Consider the way in which you will get out.[270]

Rustam also said:

A man took a basket and put his food in it. The rats came along, pierced a hole in his basket, and got into it. The man

270. Al-Thaʿālibī [Ghurar, 739–40] records, in addition to a shorter version of Rustam's parable, the following response of al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah: "'His [i.e., the fox's] being killed after attaining his aim and fulfilling his desire is better than death by hunger and emaciation.' Rustam admired al-Mughīrah's forceful reply and understood that the Arabs were firmly resolved to overcome the Persians." [The word s-r-y in this sentence is not clear.]

wanted to block the hole, but was told: "Do not do it, because they will pierce it again. Rather, make a hole opposite it and put in a hollow tube. When the rats come, they will enter it and come out through it, and whenever a rat appears, you can kill it." I have blocked your way and I warn you not to force your way into the tube, for none will emerge from it without being killed. What has caused you to do this? I see neither numbers nor weapons.[271]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: The Muslims spoke, saying:

As for what you have said about our miserable and unsettled situation in the past, you have not grasped its essence.[272] Those of us who died went into the Fire. Those of us who survived lived in distress. While we were in this extremely bad situation, God sent to us a messenger who was one of our own.[273] He sent him to all creatures[274] as a mercy to those whom He wanted to treat with mercy and as a punishment to those who rejected His generosity. The messenger approached us tribe after tribe. Nobody treated him more harshly, nobody denied his message more completely, and [2284] nobody made a greater effort to kill him and to refute what he had brought than his own tribe and, after them, the people who were close to them. All of us eventually agreed to help in this and treated him with hostility. He was a lonely man, who stood alone, and no one except God was with him. Nevertheless, he was given victory over us. Some of us embraced Islam willingly, others as a result of coercion. Then all of us recognized his truth and veracity in view of the miraculous signs that he brought to us. One of the ideas that he brought from our Lord was to wage war against those who were closest to us first. We acted upon it among ourselves and saw that there was no turning away from what he

271. This is to say that neither the numbers of the Muslims nor the weapons at their disposal are sufficient to give them a chance of victory.

272. Meaning that the situation of the Arabs in the pre-Islamic period was even worse than would appear from Rustam's description. Cf. note 149, above.

273. Echoing Qurʾān 3:164: "Truly God was gracious to the believers when He raised up among them a Messenger from themselves . . ." (Arberry's translation).

274. Al-ins wa-al-jinn; cf. note 225, above.

had promised us or any revoking of it. The Arabs agreed on this, though their dissension had been such that in the past no one could bring about a reconciliation between them. Now we came to you by order of our Lord, fighting for His sake. We act upon His orders and seek the fulfillment of His promise. We call upon you to embrace Islam and to accept its authority. If you agree, we shall let you alone; we shall return [to our country] and leave with you the Book of God. If you refuse, the only permissible thing for us to do is to engage you in battle unless you ransom yourselves by paying the poll tax. If you pay this, well and good; if not, then God has already bequeathed to us your country, your sons, and your property. Heed, therefore, our advice. By God, we prefer your conversion to Islam to taking your spoils, but we would rather fight you than make peace with you.[275] As for what you mentioned concerning our shabby appearance and our small numbers, [you must understand that] our weapon is obedience to God and our fighting is [based on] endurance. As for the parables that you applied to us, you were using ridicule with regard to [honorable] men, weighty matters, and [2285] a serious affair. But we shall [also] apply a parable to you. You are like a man who cultivated a tract of land, chose for it the trees and the seeds, and made canals flow through it. He embellished the land with castles and settled peasants on it, intending them to live in the castles and to tend the gardens. The peasants behaved in the castles in a way of which he did not approve and did the same with the gardens. He was patient with them for a long time, but, when they themselves did not feel shame because of what they had done, he asked them to mend their ways. They behaved toward him with haughtiness and conceit, so he expelled them from his land and invited others in their stead. If they should leave the land, they were to be seized and carried away by force. If they should remain, they were to become servants of these [who would come to replace them]. They were ruled by them, not made kings over them, and were humiliated forever. By God, if what we are telling you were not true, and if it were not connected only with this world, we would not have been so patient with your luxurious life and the finery that we have become accustomed to see on you; we would have fought you and taken it away from you by force.[276]

275. The idea is that, if the Persians do not embrace Islam and do not agree to pay the poll tax, then the Muslims will fight them, rather than make peace with them without securing the payment.

Rustam said: "Will you cross [the canal] to our side, or shall we cross to yours?" The Muslims replied: "Cross to our side." The Muslims left Rustam in the evening. Sa'd ordered them to take up their positions and sent a message to the Persians: "Cross [the canal] as you please." They wanted to cross on the bridge, but he sent a message to them, saying: "By no means! We shall not restore to you something that we took from you by force. Take pains to prepare for yourselves a crossing other than a bridge." Hence the Persians spent the night filling the al-'Atīq canal with their chattels.

The Day of Armāth[277]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad—'Ubaydallāh—Nāfi'—al-Ḥakam: When Rustam decided to cross over, he ordered the damming up of al-'Atīq opposite Qādis,[278] which then was farther downstream than it is today, near 'Ayn al-Shams.[279] They spent the night, until the morning, filling al-'Atīq with soil, reeds, and saddles and preparing a crossing through it. It was ready on the next day, after dawn. [2286]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: At night Rustam had a dream in which he saw an angel who descended from heaven, took the bows of his companions, put a seal

---

276. The last passage of the Muslims' speech reflects the ascetic idea of the absolute worthlessness of this world. Had the world not been worthless, God—or the Muslims—would not have allowed the infidels to enjoy anything of it. Only because of the worthlessness of the world did God and the Muslims allow the Persians to enjoy it until now. For this idea in Ṣūfī literature, see Sarrāj, Luma', 47.

277. The meaning of Armāth in this context is not clear. Rimth is a kind of shrub; ramath means a raft, a worn-out rope, or the remains of milk in the udder after milking. Yāqūt (Mu'jam, I, 211) does not know why the first day of the battle of al-Qādisiyyah was so called.

278. According to Ṭabarī (I, 2351) Qādis was a village near 'Udhayb (see note 92, above).

279. 'Ayn al-Shams is a spring between al-'Udhayb and al-Qādisiyyah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 793.

on them, and ascended back to heaven with them. Rustam woke up full of anxiety and grief. He called in his close associates and related the dream to them. He said: "God is exhorting us! I wish the Persians would let me take heed! Do you not see that victory has been taken away from us? You see that the enemy is going to gain the ascendancy, and we cannot stand up to them in deed or word. But the Persians, in their insolence, still want to have a fight!" They crossed [the canal] with their baggage and camped on the [other] bank of al-ʿAtīq.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Aʿmash: On "the day of the damming up" [of al-ʿAtīq], Rustam put on two pieces of armor and a helmet. He took his weapons and ordered his horse to be saddled. The horse was brought to him. He mounted the horse without touching [his sides] and without putting his feet into the stirrup. He said: "Tomorrow we shall crush them to pieces." A certain man added, "God willing," but Rustam said: "Even if He is not willing!"

According to al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: Rustam said: "The fox makes speeches when the lion is dead." He reminded his companions of the death of [2287] Kisrā[280] and told them: "I am afraid that this will be the year of the apes."

When the Persians crossed the canal, they arrayed themselves in battle lines. Rustam sat on his throne,[281] and a sunshade[282] was placed on it. He placed eighteen elephants with palanquins (ṣanādīq) and men in the center of the army; in the two wings he placed [respectively] eight and seven elephants with palanquins and men. He placed al-Jālnūs between himself and the right wing, and al-Bayruzān between himself and the left wing. Thus the bridge was between two units of horsemen, Muslims and polytheists.

When Yazdagird sent Rustam out, he placed a man at the door of his hall and ordered him to stay near him and to pass any information back to him. Another man was placed where he could be heard

---

280. After the murder of Khusraw II in 628 several Persian monarchs were murdered, and it is not clear which one is meant here. See CHI, III/i, 170–71.

281. For the Sasanian custom of bringing the royal throne to the battlefield, even when the battle is not directed by the king but by one of his generals, see Christensen, Sassanides, 211.

282. For ṭayyārah in this sense, see Dozy, Supplément, s.v., and de Goeje's Glossary, s.v.

from the palace, and another one outside the palace. At each "hearing distance,"[283] Yazdagird placed a man. When Rustam encamped [at Sābāṭ], the man in Sābāṭ said: "He has encamped." The man next to him said the same. [The information was transmitted in this way] until the man standing at the door of the king's hall said it. Yazdagird placed a man at each "hearing distance."[284] When Rustam camped, moved out, or something happened, the man [on the scene] described it; then the man next to him said it until it was said by the man standing at the door of the king's hall. Yazdagird placed men in this manner between al-ʿAtīq and al-Madāʾin. He dispensed with the messenger service,[285] which was the regular way [of gathering information].

The Muslims stood in battle lines. Zuhrah (b. Ḥawiyyah) and ʿĀṣim (b. ʿAmr) were placed between ʿAbdallāh (b. al-Muʿtamm) and Shuraḥbīl (b. al-Simṭ). The commander of the scouts was charged with the attack. Saʿd mixed the warriors from the center with those of the two wings. His herald (munādī) proclaimed: "Envy is permissible only in jihād for the sake of God. O men, be envious and jealous of each other in matters of jihād!"

At that time, Saʿd was not able to ride or sit since he was suffering from boils. He had to lie face down, leaning on a pillow under his chest. From the castle he watched the Muslims and sent written orders to Khālid b. ʿUrfuṭah, who was in a place lower than his. The Muslim lines were adjacent to the castle. Khālid was somewhat like Saʿd's deputy, except that Saʿd was present and watching. [2288]

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Qāsim b. al-Walīd al-Hamdānī — his father — Abū Nimrān: When Rustam crossed [al-ʿAtīq], Zuhrah and al-Jālnūs changed places. Saʿd ordered Zuhrah to move to [Shuraḥbīl] Ibn al-Simṭ's place, and Rustam ordered al-Jālnūs to move to al-Hurmuzān's place. Saʿd was suffering from ischial pain (ʿirq al-nasā) and from boils and had to lie face down. He appointed Khālid b. ʿUrfuṭah as his deputy, but the people turned against him. Saʿd said: "Carry me to an elevated place and let me observe the army from there." They took him [to such a place] and

283. For this meaning of daʿwah, see de Goeje, Glossary; several additional examples of this usage are also noted in the Glossary to BGA, IV, 234.

284. It is not clear to me what is meant by the expression ʿalā kulli marḥalatayni in this context.

285. See *EI*², s.v. "Barīd" (D. Sourdel).

he lay down watching the army. The battle line [of the Muslims] was at the foot of the wall of Qudays.[286] Saʿd issued orders to Khālid, and Khālid transmitted them to the troops.

Some of the leading men conspired against Saʿd. He cursed them and said: "By God, if you were not facing the enemy, I would have punished you as an example for others." He imprisoned them and chained them up in the castle; [the poet] Abū Miḥjan al-Thaqafī[287] was among them. Jarīr (b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī) said: "In my oath of allegiance to the Prophet, I pledged to obey any man whom God should appoint to lead us, even if he be an Abyssinian slave." Saʿd said: "From now on nobody will hold the Muslims back from [fighting] their enemy or keep them busy while facing him. [Should this happen again], it would turn into a custom for which my successors would be chastised."

[2289] According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: On that day Saʿd addressed those who were under his command. It was on a Monday in the month of Muḥarram in the year 14, after Saʿd vented his rage on those who had opposed Khālid b. al-ʿUrfuṭah. Having praised God and extolled Him, he said:

> God is the Truth. He has no partner in His dominion and His words will never go unfulfilled. God has said: "For We have written in the Psalms, after the Remembrance, 'The earth shall be the inheritance of My righteous servants.'"[288] This land is your inheritance and the promise of your Lord. God permitted you to take possession of it three years ago. You have been tasting it and eating from it, and you have been killing its people, collecting taxes from them, and taking them into captivity. All this is by virtue of [the defeats] that the participants in the previous battles[289] had inflicted upon the Persians. Now this army of theirs has come against you. You are Arab chiefs and notables, the elect of every tribe, and the pride of those who are behind you. If you renounce this world and aspire for the hereafter, God will give you both this world and the hereafter. This will not bring the death of anyone closer. But, if you should be flagging, weak, 286. A place in the neighborhood of al-Qādisiyyah; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 42–43.

287. See note 360, below.
288. Qurʾān 21:105 (Arberry's translation).
289. See note 215, above.

and feeble, then you will lose your predominance and ruin your share in the hereafter.

ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr stood up to address the light cavalry and said:

God has made it permissible for you to fight the people of this land. In the last three years you have been inflicting harm upon them and they have not been inflicting harm upon you. You have the upper hand[290] and God is with you. If you stand firm and fight them with courage, their property, their women, their sons, and their country will be yours; but should you become flagging and weak—and God is your protector from this — this [Persian] army will not spare even a remnant of you for fear that you would bring perdition upon them again. By God! Remember the [previous] days [of battle] and remember what God has bestowed upon you. Do you not see that the land behind you is a desolate desert without a place of hiding or refuge in which one can take shelter and which is inaccessible [to the enemy]? Place your aspirations on the hereafter!"

Saʿd wrote to the [army commanders entrusted with the] flags in the following terms: [2290]

I have appointed Khālid b. ʿUrfuṭah as my deputy. Nothing except the pain that afflicts me recurrently and the boils from which I suffer prevents me from being in his place. I am lying face down, but you can see my body. Listen to Khālid and obey him because he commands you only according to my orders and acts according to my judgment.

The message was read to the troops, and it improved their morale. They finally accepted Saʿd's opinion and urged each other to obey him, agreeing that Saʿd had an excuse [for not leading the army in battle] and becoming content with what he did.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ḥallām—Masʿūd: The commander of each group addressed his companions and made [Saʿd's speech] known to them.[291] They urged each other to obey and 290. See Qurʾān 3:139, 47:35.

291. This translation of sayyara fīhim is tentative. Cf. sāʾir in the sense of "current, commonly known."

to stand firm and admonished each other [to do good]. Each commander returned to his position with the companions who were with him in the [previous] battles. Saʿd's herald called for the noon prayer and Rustam called out: "Pādishahān-i marandar. ʿUmar consumed my liver; may God burn his! He taught the Arabs until they gained knowledge!"[292]

[2291] According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Naḍr—Ibn al-Rufayl: When Rustam halted at al-Najaf, he sent a spy to the Muslim camp. He merged with the Arabs in al-Qādisiyyah, as if he were someone who had strayed from them, and he saw them cleaning their teeth with toothpicks before each prayer.[293] Then they prayed and dispersed to their positions. The spy returned to Rustam and informed him about the Muslim way of life. Rustam asked him: "What is their food?" The spy said: "I stayed among them for one night. By God, I did not see any one of them eating anything. They merely suck twigs when they go to sleep in the evening and before they rise in the morning." When Rustam halted between the fort and al-ʿAtīq, he encountered the Muslims after the muʾadhdhin of Saʿd had called for the morning prayers. He saw them move and called upon the Persians to mount their horses. He was asked the reason for this, and he said to them: "Do you not see that your enemy has been given the summons and is moving against us?" His spy said: "They are moving in order to pray." He then spoke in Persian, and what follows is its Arabic translation: "In the morning I heard a voice. It was ʿUmar speaking to the dogs and teaching them reason." When they crossed [the canal], they faced the Muslims. The muʾadhdhin of Saʿd called for prayer, and Saʿd prayed. Rustam said: "ʿUmar has consumed my liver."

[2292] According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: Saʿd sent men of the best judgment, of the greatest valor, and of manifold virtues. Among the men of judgment was the group who came to Rustam: al-Mughīrah (b. Shuʿbah), Ḥudhayfah (b. Miḥṣan), ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr, and their companions. Among the people of valor were Ṭulayḥah (b. Khuwaylid), Qays (b. Hubayrah) al-Asadī, Ghālib

292. It is not clear what the meaning of pādishahān-i marandar is. De Goeje maintains that the text is corrupt. See his discussion of the matter in Glossary, s.v. marandar, and Houtsma's suggested emendation in Addenda et Emendanda, DCXVII.

293. This is a well-known sunnah of the Prophet. See, e.g., Ibn Ḥanbal, Musnad, I, 237: "I have been commanded to use the toothpick..." (umirtu bi-ʾl-siwāk...), and numerous other references in Wensinck et al., Concordance, s.v. siwāk.

b. ʿAbdallāh al-Asadī, ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib, and their like. Among the poets were al-Shammākh,[294] al-Ḥuṭay'ah,[295] Aws b. al-Maghrā',[296] and ʿAbdah b. al-Ṭabīb,[297] and he also sent people like them from other groups. Saʿd addressed them before sending them out and said: "Go forth and speak to the people about your obligations and their obligations on the battlefield. You are people of great importance among the Arabs. You are their poets and orators, their men of judgment and valor, and their chieftains. Go therefore to the people, admonish them, and exhort them to fight."

They went out among the people. Qays b. Hubayrah al-Asadī said: "O people, praise God for the guidance that He has given you and for the favor that He has bestowed upon you, so that He may give you more. Remember God's favors and pray to Him at the customary times. Either Paradise or spoils wait in front of you. Beyond this castle there is nothing except desert, wasteland, rough stones, and open country that [even] guides do not cross."

Ghālib said:

> O people! Praise God for the favor that He has bestowed upon you. Ask Him and He will give you more; pray to Him and He will respond. O men of Maʿadd,[298] what excuse do you have today? You are in your fortresses (meaning the horses), and you are in possession of those that do not disobey you (meaning the swords). Remember what the people will say in the future; tomorrow you will be the first about whom people will speak, and [only] then they will speak about those who will follow you. [2293]

Ibn al-Hudhayl al-Asadī said:

> O men of Maʿadd, make your swords your fortresses. Handle your enemies like lions of the forest, be stern like tigers, and 294. On al-Shammākh, see note 105, above.

295. Jarwal b. Aws al-Ḥuṭay'ah was a famous mukhaḍram poet from the tribe of ʿAbs, best known for his satirical poems. See *EI*², s.v. "al-Ḥuṭay'a" [I. Goldziher [Ch. Pellat]]; GAS, II, 236–38.

296. Aws b. Maghrā' was a mukhaḍram poet from the tribe of Tamīm. See Jumaḥī, Ṭabaqāt, 129, and index; Ibn Qutaybah, Shiʿr, 432; GAS, II, 381–82.

297. ʿAbdah b. al-Ṭabīb was a mukhaḍram poet from the tribe of Tamīm. See Ibn Qutaybah, Shiʿr, 456–57; GAS, II, 198–99.

298. Maʿadd is considered an ancestor of the northern Arabs; see Caskell and Strenziok, Ǧamharat an-nasab, index.

let dust be your armor.[299] Trust in God and lower your eyes.[300] If your swords become blunt—and this happens to them as a result of the [divine] command—throw stones at your enemies, because it is permitted to do with stones what is not permitted to do with iron.

Busr b. Abī Ruhm al-Juhanī said:

Praise God and make your words credible by means of your deeds! You have praised God for the guidance that He has given to you and have declared His oneness. There is no god except Him. You have proclaimed His greatness and believed in His Prophet and in His messengers. Do not die except as Muslims.[301] Let nothing be more worthless in your eyes than this world, because this world makes itself available to those who despise it. Do not incline toward it, lest it run away from you in order to deflect you [from the straight path]. Help God, and He will help you.

ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr said:

O Arabs, you are Arab notables and you stood up to Persian notables. You risk Paradise, while they risk [only] this world. Let them not protect this world more assiduously than you protect the next. Do not do things today that will make you the disgrace of the Arabs tomorrow.

Rabīʿ b. al-Balād al-Saʿdī said:

O Arabs, fight for the religion and for this world. Hasten to forgiveness from your Lord and to a garden whose breadth is as the heavens and the earth, prepared for the God-fearing [2294] ones.[302] And if the devil depicts the affair [of this war] as formidable [in order to discourage you], remember the stories that will be related about you during the fairs and festivals forever and ever.[303]

---

299. Galloping horses raise clouds of dust that are described here as protecting the Muslim warriors.

300. Lowering of the eyes is a sign of modesty; cf. Qur'ān 24:30.

301. See Qur'ān 2:132.

302. Qur'ān 3:133 (Arberry's translation, slightly modified).

303. Literally "as long as there are people who relate stories." Cf. Noth, Studien, 87, for a German translation of this and some of the preceding passages.

Rib'ī b. 'Āmir said:

> God has guided you to embrace Islam, has united you by means of it, and has caused you to experience prosperity. In endurance there is repose; train yourself to endure, so that endurance becomes your habit. Do not fall into the habit of showing unrestrained grief lest this become your habit.

All of them spoke in this vein. The people entered into mutual agreements, made pledges to each other, and roused one another to do their duty. The Persians did the same among themselves: They entered into mutual agreements, enjoined each other to do good, and bound themselves with chains. The number of those who bound themselves was thirty thousand.[304]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Mujālid—al-Sha'bī: The Persians numbered one hundred and twenty thousand men. They had thirty elephants. With each elephant were four thousand men.

According to al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Ḥallām—Mas'ūd b. Khirāsh: The battle line of the polytheists was on the bank of al-'Atīq, and the battle line of the Muslims was at the wall of Qudays, with the moat behind them. The Muslims and the polytheists were between the moat and al-'Atīq. The polytheists had thirty thousand men bound with chains and thirty fighting elephants. There were also elephants on which the leaders were standing and which did not fight. Sa'd ordered Sūrat al-Jihād[305] to be read to the troops and they were learning it.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: Sa'd said:

> Stay in your positions and do not move anything before you perform the noon prayer. When you complete the noon prayer, I shall proclaim "God is most great!" Proclaim the same and prepare yourselves. Know that none before you was given [the right to proclaim] "God is most great," and know that it was given to you as a sign of support for you. Then when you hear me proclaiming "God is most great" [2295]

304. See note 206, above.

305. There is no sūrah bearing this name in the canonical version of the Qur'ān. As de Goeje noted, ['I.] Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, II, 364) maintains that the intended sūrah was Qur'ān 8, "The Spoils" (Sūrat al-anfāl).

for the second time, proclaim the same and let your equipment be ready. When I proclaim "God is most great" for the third time, proclaim the same, and let your horsemen encourage the people to step forward and charge their adversaries. When I proclaim "God is most great" for the fourth time, all of you must move forward, mingle with the enemy, and say: "There is no power or strength except in God!"

Al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAmr b. al-Rayyān — Muṣʿab b. Saʿd transmitted the same tradition.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Zakariyyāʾ — Abū Isḥāq: On the day of al-Qādisiyyah, Saʿd sent to the army a message, saying: "When you hear the cry 'God is most great,' tie the straps of your sandals. When I proclaim 'God is most great' for the second time, get ready. When I proclaim it for the third time, stick doggedly to your purpose[306] and attack."

According to al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: When Saʿd performed the noon prayer, he ordered the young man whom ʿUmar ordered to stay with him, and who was a Qurʾān reader, to read Sūrat al-Jihād, and all the Muslims were learning it. He read Sūrat al-Jihād to the military unit that was near him. It was [then] read in every unit. The hearts and eyes of the people became cheerful, and in reading this sūrah they experienced repose (sakīnah).[307]

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: When the Qurʾān readers finished [their reading], Saʿd proclaimed "God is most great." Those who were close to him did likewise. One after the other, the Muslims proclaimed "God is most great," and they began to move. Then Saʿd proclaimed "God is most great" for the second time, and the Muslims completed their prepa-[2296] rations. Then he proclaimed it for the third time, and men of valor went forth and started the battle. Men of similar qualities from among the Persians went forth and exchanged blows with the Muslims. Ghālib b. ʿAbdallāh al-Asadī went forth, reciting:

The courageous woman, coming to the garrisons,[308]

306. The text has shuddū al-nawājidh ʿalā al-aḍrās.

307. For the changes that the meaning of the Hebrew word shekhinah underwent in Arabic, see Goldziher, "Sakîna."

308. Translating wāridat al-masāliḥ with Masʿūdī, Murūj, IV, 208 (= ed. Pellat, II, 55), instead of wāridat al-masāʾiḥ of our text.

with white breast and fingers, knows That I am venom to the fighting warrior and I bring relief to the grievous and oppressive affair.

Hurmuz, who was one of the kings of al-Bāb[309] and had a crown, went to encounter him. Ghālib took him captive and brought him into Saʿd's presence. Then he returned to the fighting. ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr went forth, reciting:

The woman of white complexion and silvery breast, like silver covered with gold, knows
That I am not a man helped by connections;[310] any defect will provoke a man like me against a man like you.[311]

ʿĀṣim fought with a Persian man, who ran away from him with ʿĀṣim in pursuit. When he mingled in their battle line, he encountered a horseman with a mule. The horseman abandoned the animal and sought refuge with his companions, who gave him protection. ʿĀṣim carried off the mule with the saddle and the load. When he reached the Muslim lines, it became clear that the man was the king's baker and had with him delicacies for the king: a variety of sweet dishes (akhbiṣah)[312] and crystallized (maʿqūd) honey. ʿĀṣim brought all this to Saʿd and returned to his position. When Saʿd [2297] looked at it, he said: "Take it to the people of his position," and he said: "The amīr gave this to you, so eat it," and he gave it to them.

When the Muslims were expecting Saʿd to proclaim "God is most great" for the fourth time, Qays b. Ḥidhyam b. Jurthumah, the commander of the footmen of Banū Nahd, stood up and said: "O Banū Nahd, attack (inhadū), because you were called Nahd only in order that you should do it."[313] Khālid b. ʿUrfuṭah sent to him a message, saying: "Stop it, or I shall appoint someone else in your place," so Qays stopped.

---

309. See note 183, above.

310. Masʿūdī, Murūj, IV, 209 (= ed. Pellat, III, 55), has nasab "lineage," instead of sabab.

311. Mithlī ʿalā mithlika yughrīhi al-ʿatab is not well connected to the preceding material; the text is dubious and the meaning not clear. Some manuscripts of Masʿūdī, Murūj, ed. Pellat, III, 55, have mithlī ʿalā mithlika yughrīhi al-katab; both editors of Masʿūdī have preferred not to include this line in their text.

312. See Baghdādī, Ṭabīkh, 71–74; Rodinson, "Recherches," 148, 150.

313. The name Nahd is derived from the same triliteral root as the verb nahada "he attacked."

When the horses and the horsemen fought each other, a man went forth shouting: "Man to man!" (mard o mard).[314] ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib, who was opposite him, took up the challenge; he fought him, seized him by the neck, threw him down, and slew him. Then he turned to the people and said: "When a Persian loses his bow, he becomes [stupid like] a goat." Then both sides formed into fighting units.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Ismāʿīl b. Abī Khālid — Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim: ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib passed by us between the lines and roused the people, saying: "When a Persian drops his spear, he becomes [stupid like] a goat."

While he was rousing us in this manner, a Persian went forth, stood between the lines, and shot an arrow. He hit the curved part of the bow that ʿAmr was carrying on his shoulders. ʿAmr turned toward the Persian, attacked him, and seized him by the neck. Then he grabbed his belt, lifted him, and threw him down in front of him. Then he carried him farther, and when he drew near us he broke his neck. Then he put his sword on his throat and slew him, hurled his [2298] corpse down, and said: "This is what you should do to them!" We said: "O Abū Thawr,[315] who is able to do what you are doing?" According to some transmitters [of the last tradition], except Ismāʿīl: ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarīb took from the Persian his two bracelets, his belt, and a brocaded coat[316] that he wore.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Ismāʿīl b. Abī Khālid — Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim: The Persians sent in the direction of the tribe of Bajīlah thirteen elephants.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Ismāʿīl b. Abī Khālid: The battle of al-Qādisiyyah took place at the beginning of Muḥarram of the year 14. A [Muslim] man went out to the Persians. They said to him: "Direct us!" He directed them toward Bajīlah, and they sent in the direction of Bajīlah sixteen elephants.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: When the fighting units came into formation after the [ini-

---

314. For the Sasanian custom of starting a battle by challenging the enemy to engage in individual combat, see Christensen, Sassanides, 216.

315. Abū Thawr was the kunyah of ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib. See *EI*², s.v. "ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib" (Ch. Pellat).

316. For dībāj "brocade," see Dozy, Vêtements, 113 n. 9; Mayer, Mamluk Costume, 40, and index, s.v. "Brocade."

tial] attack, the elephant drivers attacked the Muslims and drove a wedge between their units. The horses panicked. Bajīlah was on the verge of being annihilated. Their horses and the horses of those who were with them in their positions fled in terror, and only the infantrymen stationed there remained. Sa'd sent a message to the tribe of Asad, saying: "Defend Bajīlah and the men who are attached to them." So Ṭulayḥah b. Khuwaylid, Ḥammāl b. Mālik, Ghālib b. 'Abdallāh, and al-Ribbīl b. 'Amr set out with their fighting units. They confronted the elephants so that the drivers turned them [in another direction]. Every elephant was ridden by twenty men.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad b. Qays—Mūsā b. Ṭarīf: When Sa'd called [upon the tribe of Asad] to come to the rescue [of Bajīlah], Ṭulayḥah stood up to address his people and said: [2299]

> O my tribe, the one whose name is mentioned is the trusted one! If Sa'd knew that some other tribe was more suitable than you to help Bajīlah, he would have asked for their help. Attack them first and forcefully! Attack them like ferocious lions! You were called Asad ("lion") only in order that you should act like one. Charge and do not turn back! Attack and do not run away! How excellent is [the tribe of] Rabī'ah! What a feat are they going to accomplish! And of what an adversary are they going to take care! Are their positions going to be accessible? Take care of your positions! May God help you! Attack them in the name of God.

Al-Ma'rūr b. Suwayd and Shaqīq said: By God, they fell upon the Persians, stabbed them, and hit them until we were able to keep the elephants back from Bajīlah. The elephants retreated. A Persian chieftain came out against Ṭulayḥah, but the latter fought him and killed him in no time.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: Al-Ash'ath b. Qays stood up and said: "O people of Kindah! How excellent is [the tribe of] Asad! What a feat are they going to accomplish! How quickly do they use today the sword in defense of their positions! Every tribe takes care of [defending] the area next to them, but you await someone who will save you the trouble. I bear witness that today you have not followed well the example of your [2300] people, the Arabs. They are being killed and are fighting, while you look on, squatting on your knees!"

But at that, ten of them jumped to him and said: "May God vitiate your fortune! You are trying hard to humiliate us, yet we are the most firm in holding our ground. And where have we let down our people, the Arabs? Where have we not lived up to their example? Here we are with you!" Al-Ashʿath b. Qays made a dash at the enemy. The men of Kindah dashed with him and drove away the Persians who were opposite them.

When the Persians saw what the elephants were suffering at the hands of the Asadī unit, they struck the Muslims with their weapons. Commanded by Dhū al-Ḥājib and al-Jālnūs, they attacked the Muslims,[317] who were expecting Saʿd to proclaim "God is most great" for the fourth time. The Persian cavalry, accompanied by the elephants, gathered against Asad. The Asadīs stood their ground. Saʿd proclaimed "God is most great" for the fourth time. The Muslims then moved [to assist] the Asadīs, around whom the fiercest battle was being fought. The elephants attacked the horses on the two wings [of the Muslim army], and the horses were recoiling and swerving aside. The Muslim horsemen insistently asked the infantrymen to urge the horses on.[318] Saʿd sent a message to ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr, saying: "O people of Tamīm, you are owners of camels and horses: Do you not have in store a trick against these elephants?" They said: "We certainly have, by God." ʿĀṣim then summoned some archers from his tribe, as well as men skilled in the use of the sword, and said to them: "O archers, drive the elephant riders away from the Muslim horsemen with arrows!" and he went on to say, "O [2301] swordsmen, get near the elephants from behind, and cut their girths!"[319] He himself set out to defend the Asadīs, around whom the fiercest battle was being fought. The right and left wings wheeled around not far away. ʿĀṣim's men drew near the elephants, seized

317. The Cairo edition reads badara (instead of badarū) al-muslimīna al-shaddata ʿalayhim Dhū al-Ḥājib wa-al-Jālnūs; in this version Dhū al-Ḥājib and al-Jālnūs would be the subjects of the sentence. The editor does not indicate the basis of this version, and it does not seem to be in any way superior to that of the Leiden edition.

318. Translating yashmuṣūna instead of yashmusūna of the text. The two roots are interchangeable. See de Goeje's Glossary, s.v.; and Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. sh-m-ṣ.

319. With which the palanquin is fastened to the elephant's back.

their tails and the ornaments hanging from their litters, and cut their girths. The elephants' trumpeting was intense. On that day, no Persian elephant remained without [his back] being exposed; the elephant drivers were killed, the Muslims faced each other,[320] and the Asad were relieved. The Muslims repelled the Persians to their positions. They fought until sunset, and during a part of the night, and then both sides withdrew. Five hundred Asadīs were killed on that evening, having been the mainstay of the Muslims and ʿĀṣim having been their leader in war and their protector. This was the first day of the battle of al-Qādisiyyah, and it is called the Day of Armāth.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Ghusn b. al-Qāsim[321]—a man from Kinānah: The wings [of the Muslim army] wheeled around on the Day of Armāth and the tribe of Asad was engaged in the fiercest fight, so that five hundred of them were killed on that evening. ʿAmr b. Shās al-Asadī[322] recited:

We brought to Kisrā horsemen from the sides of a high mountain, [2302] and he confronted them with horsemen [of his own].
The horses left them in distress in al-Aqsām [2303] and in al-Haqwān, for days on end.
We left in Persia many a woman praying and weeping whenever she sees the new moon.
We killed Rustam and his sons violently, and the horses raised sand over them.
At the place of our encounter we left [dead] men[323] who have no intention of moving again.
Al-Bayruzān fled without protecting [his men];
he brought calamity upon his troops.
Al-Hurmuzān was saved by the prudence of his soul and by the swift running of the horses.

320. Taqābala al-nās probably means that the tribe of Asad, which had been surrounded by the Persians, again came in contact with the other Muslims.

321. For the reading Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim (instead of Ghuṣn ʿan al-Qāsim), see Addenda et Emendanda, DCXVII.

322. ʿAmr b. Shās is described as a prolific poet of the pre-Islamic period, who was well respected in his tribe and embraced Islam together with them. Except for his participation in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah little is known of his life. Most material included in the classical sources is of an anecdotal nature. See, e.g., al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XI, 3982–89. The poetry of ʿAmr b. Shās, as well as the scanty biographical material included in the classical sources, has been collected in Jabūrī, Shiʿr. See also GAS, II, 228.

323. Reading fi'āman, with Jabūrī, Shiʿr, 87, instead of qiyāman.

The Day of Aghwāth

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad and Ṭalḥah: Saʿd married in Sharāf Salmā bint Khaṣafah, who had been the wife [2304] of al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah. He brought her to al-Qādisiyyah. When the Muslim soldiers were wheeling around on the Day of Armāth, he could sit only in an upright, uncomfortable posture or [had to lie] on his belly. Saʿd became restless and began to wander[324] impatiently on the roof of the castle. When Salmā saw what the Persians were doing, she said: "Alas for Muthannā! The horsemen have no [one like] Muthannā today."[325] She said it in the presence of a man (i.e. Saʿd) who was distressed by the actions of his companions and by his own condition. He slapped her face and said: "How far is al-Muthannā from the unit around which the fiercest fight is going on!"[326] He meant the Asad and ʿĀṣim with his horsemen. She said: "Are you both jealous and cowardly?"[327] Saʿd said: "By God, nobody will today accept my excuse if you do not accept it while seeing my condition! The troops have a better reason [than you have] not to accept my excuse." The Muslims remembered it, and when they became victorious there was no poet who did not hold it against Saʿd. Yet he was not a coward, nor was he worthy of blame.

On the next morning, the troops were arranged in battle order. Saʿd put a group of men in charge of carrying the [corpses of the] martyrs and the wounded to al-ʿUdhayb. The wounded were turned over to the women, to be cared for until God should decide their fate. As for the martyrs, they buried them on both sides of the Musharriq valley: the one that was near al-ʿUdhayb and the one that was distant from it. (Musharriq is a valley between al-ʿUdhayb and ʿAyn Shams. Its near side extends to al-ʿUdhayb and its far side beyond it.)[328] The Muslims put off the [resumption of] fighting until the wounded and the dead were carried away.

---

324. Translating yajūlu, which is a variant reading mentioned by de Goeje, rather than yaḥūlu of the text.

325. This is taken as implied criticism of Saʿd's leadership, as compared to that of al-Muthannā, Salmā's late husband.

326. Meaning that al-Muthannā had never been in a military situation so difficult as the one in which this unit finds itself.

327. As noted by de Goeje, a-ghayratan wa-jubnan! became a proverb and was included in al-Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 415–16. It is used to describe a person flawed by two vices.

328. This geographical note by Ṭabarī appears in almost identical form in Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 539.

When the camels rose to carry them in the direction of al-ʿUdhayb, the manes of the horses from Syria appeared. Damascus had been conquered one month before the battle of al-Qādisiyyah. When Abū ʿUbaydah received ʿUmar's letter ordering him to divert the Iraqis under Khālid (b. al-Walīd)'s command [to Iraq] without mentioning Khālid himself, he kept Khālid with him and did not let him go.[329] He then dispatched the army, which consisted of six thousand men: Five thousand were from Rabīʿah and Muḍar and one thousand from various southern tribes of Ḥijāz. Abū ʿUbaydah appointed Hāshim b. ʿUtbah b. Abī Waqqāṣ to be their commander. He placed the vanguard in charge of al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr[330] and ordered him to hasten ahead of Hāshim, and he appointed Qays b. Hubayrah b. ʿAbd Yaghūth al-Murādī, who had not participated in the previous battles, to command one of the wings. He joined the army in Yarmūk when the Iraqis were being diverted [to Iraq] and went with them. Abū ʿUbaydah appointed al-Hazmāz b. ʿAmr al-ʿIjlī[331] to command the other wing, and Anas b. al-ʿAbbās[332] to command the rear guard. Al-Qaʿqāʿ traveled quickly, without stopping, and reached the Muslims [of al-Qādisiyyah] on the morning of the Day of Aghwāth. He had instructed his men, whose number was one thousand, to divide into groups of ten; whenever one such unit moved out of sight, they sent another in its wake. Al-Qaʿqāʿ reached the Muslims fighting at al-Qādisiyyah with a group of ten before the rest of his troops. He greeted them, announced the coming of his soldiers, and said: "O Muslims, I have come to you with men [of valor]! If they were in your place and then noticed you, they would envy you the good fortune [of martyrdom] and would attempt to take it all for themselves, leaving nothing for you.[333] So do as I do." [2305] [2306]

329. See Donner, Conquests, 137. For another version of ʿUmar's letter, see Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 158.

330. Al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr belonged to the tribe of Tamīm and was a Companion of the Prophet. He participated in the battle of Yarmūk, as well as in the conquests of Damascus and al-Madāʾin. He had a reputation for extraordinary bravery and was also known for poems in which he described his military exploits. He was the brother of ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr, another participant in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah. See (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 207; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 450–52 no. 7132.

331. Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VI, 537.

332. Anas b. al-ʿAbbās belonged to the tribe of Sulaym and embraced Islam after the conquest of Mecca. He participated in the battle of Yarmūk and in the conquest of Damascus. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, I/ii, 49; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 125 no. 271.

333. This should be understood in light of the extremely high value placed on martyrdom in the Islamic tradition. Al-Qaʿqāʿ says, in effect, that, if his men had been

He then stepped forward and called out: "Who is going to fight me?" [The Muslims applied to him the saying of Abū Bakr: "An army that has a man like this will not be defeated." They trusted him.] Dhū al-Ḥājib came out to fight him. Al-Qaʿqāʿ asked: "Who are you?" He said: "I am Bahman Jādhawayhi." Al-Qaʿqāʿ cried out: "Vengeance for Abū ʿUbayd,[334] Salīṭ,[335] and the warriors of the battle of the Bridge!" They fought each other, and al-Qaʿqāʿ killed his opponent. Al-Qaʿqāʿ's horsemen began to arrive group after group, and their arrival lasted until nightfall. The Muslims took heart from the arrival of [al-Qaʿqāʿ's] units, as if no calamity had befallen them on the day before, and as if their battle had started with the killing of the Ḥājibī.[336] For the same reason, the Persians became dejected. Al-Qaʿqāʿ called out again: "Who is going to fight me?" Two men came out to fight him: One of them was al-Bayruzān, and the other al-Binduwān. Al-Qaʿqāʿ was joined by al-Ḥārith b. Ẓabyān b. al-Ḥārith of the Banū Taym al-Lāt. Al-Qaʿqāʿ fought al-Bayruzān, struck him, and cut off his head, and Ibn Ẓabyān fought al-Binduwān, struck him, and cut off his head. The Muslim horsemen gradually became entangled with the Persians. Al-Qaʿqāʿ exclaimed: "O Muslims, strike them with the swords, because men are killed by the swords!"[337] The Muslims roused each other, and all of them rushed toward the Persians, fighting with their swords until the evening. On this day the Persians did not experience anything which they liked, and the Muslims slew a great number of them. On this day also, the Persians did not fight on elephants: Their palanquins had been broken on the previous day. They started repairing them in the morning, but they were not in place until the following day.

[2307] According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī: A woman from the tribe of al-Nakhaʿ had four sons who participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah. She said to her sons: "You have embraced Islam and have not exchanged it for anything else; you have in the difficult military situation facing the Muslims at al-Qādisiyyah, they would have refused help from anyone, in order not to share the distinction of martyrdom; they would have preferred to keep this distinction jealously and exclusively for themselves.

---

334. Abū ʿUbayd b. Masʿūd was killed in the battle of the Bridge; see Ṭabarī, I, 2174 ff.; Donner, Conquests, 192.

335. Like Abū ʿUbayd, Salīṭ b. Qays was killed in the battle of the Bridge. See Ṭabarī, I, 2179.

336. This name refers to Dhū al-Ḥājib, who was mentioned above.

337. Meaning that the killing of men is what the swords are for.

emigrated [with the Prophet from Mecca to Medina] and no blame has been attached to you; you were not unable to stay in [your] land or forced out of it by drought. Nevertheless, you brought your aged, old mother and placed her in front of the Persians. By God, you are verily the sons of one man and one woman! I have not betrayed your father, nor have I brought disgrace upon your maternal uncle. Go forth and fight the battle from the beginning till the end!" They advanced quickly. When they moved out of her sight, she raised her hands to the sky and said: "O God, protect my sons!" Having acquitted themselves well in battle, they returned to her, with none of them injured. I saw them afterward receiving their pay, two thousand [dirhams] each. Then they came to their mother and gave her their pay;[338] she returned it to them and divided it between them in a just and satisfactory way.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: Al-Qaʿqāʿ was assisted on that day by three men from the tribe of Yarbūʿ, the clan of Riyāḥ.[339] Whenever a unit [of his horsemen] appeared, al-Qaʿqāʿ proclaimed "God is most great!" and the Muslims did the same; then he attacked and the Muslims followed suit. The Yarbūʿīs were Nuʿaym b. ʿAmr b. ʿAttāb, ʿAttāb b. Nuʿaym b. ʿAttāb b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAmr b. Hammām, and ʿAmr b. [2308] Shabīb b. Zinbāʿ b. al-Ḥārith b. Rabīʿah, one of the Banū Zayd.

On that day a messenger of ʿUmar arrived and brought with him four swords and four horses for distribution among those whose valor in war was the greatest. The messenger called upon Ḥammāl b. Mālik, al-Ribbīl b. ʿAmr b. Rabīʿah (both Wālibīs), Ṭulayḥah b. Khuwaylid al-Faqʿasī[340] (these three belonged to the tribe of Asad), and upon ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr al-Tamīmī and gave them the swords; then he called upon al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr and the Yarbūʿīs and let them ride the horses. Thus the three Yarbūʿīs received three-quarters of the horses, and the three Asadīs received three-quarters of the swords. Al-Ribbīl b. ʿAmr said concerning this:

---

338. Literally "they placed their pay in her bosom." A similar tradition is included in Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 206–7, where the mother is the poetess al-Khansāʾ (for whom see *EI*², s.v. "al-Khansāʾ" [F. Gabrieli]) and her four sons are martyred in the battle. This tradition has wa-lā faḍaḥtu ḥālatakum, instead of Ṭabarī's wa-lā faḍaḥtu khālakum. See also Nuwayrī, Nihāyah, XIX, 215–18.

339. See Caskel and Strenziok, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 68; II, 9.

340. Both Wālibah and Faqʿas were tribal subdivisions of Asad. See Caskel and Strenziok, Ǧamharat, an-nasab, I, 50.

The people knew that we were the most deserving of them, when they seized the sharp, cutting swords.
On the night of Armāth, my horsemen did not cease defending, group after group, the multitude of tribes;
During the morning hours,[341] till nightfall—and they became successful till the end of days.[342]

Al-Qaʿqāʿ recited concerning the horsemen:

The pure Arab horses did not know anyone equal to us on the night of Aghwāth, near al-Qawādis,[343] [2309] On the night when we went with the lances, which looked on the troops like a variety of birds ready to take off.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Qāsim b. Sulaym b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Saʿdī — his father: The battle began each day with individual combat.[344] When al-Qaʿqāʿ arrived, he said: "O men, follow my example!" and called out: "Who is going to fight me?" Dhū al-Ḥājib came forth against him, and al-Qaʿqāʿ killed him. Then came al-Bayruzān, and al-Qaʿqāʿ killed him as well. Then the troops came from every direction and the battle began. Al-Qaʿqāʿ's kinsmen attacked on that day in groups of ten footmen, on camels that were covered and veiled and with their horses surrounding and protecting the camels. Al-Qaʿqāʿ ordered them to attack the Persian horses between the two battle lines, simulating elephants. The Muslims did to the Persians on the Day of Aghwāth what the Persians had done to them on the Day of Armāth. These camels were not able to withstand anything, yet the Persian horses took fright and fled. The horses of the Muslims pursued them, and when the other Muslim troops saw this they followed their example. On the Day of Aghwāth, the Persians suffered from the camels more than the Muslims had suffered on the Day of Armāth from the elephants.

---

341. For grammatical considerations with regard to the expression ladun ghudwatan, see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. l-d-n.

342. For ukhrā al-layālī al-qhawābiri in this sense, see Arazi, Poésie arabe, 76.

343. Cf. note 278, above.

344. The text has muṭāradah. The more usual term for individual combat is mubārazah (see Fries, Heereswesen, 80), but the description that follows indicates that muṭāradah is used here in a similar sense.

A member of the tribe of Tamīm, whose name was Sawād and who was defending his kinsmen,[345] launched an attack, courting martyrdom. He was mortally wounded[346] after he launched the attack, but martyrdom was slow in coming. He stood up against Rustam, determined to kill him, but was himself killed before he could reach him.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Ghuṣn — al-ʿAlāʾ b. Ziyād and al-Qāsim b. Sulaym — his father: A Persian warrior came forth, calling out: "Who is going to fight me?" ʿIlbāʾ b. Jaḥsh al-ʿIjlī went forth against him. ʿIlbāʾ struck the Persian with his sword and pierced his chest, but the Persian struck ʿIlbāʾ with his sword and disemboweled him. Both fell to the ground, the Persian dying immediately. As for ʿIlbāʾ, his bowels spilled out and he could not get up; he attempted to put his bowels back but was unable to do it. Then a Muslim passed by, and ʿIlbāʾ said: "O so-and-so, help me with my belly!" The Muslim put his bowels back, and ʿIlbāʾ held the slit skin of his belly together and rushed toward the Persian lines, without turning his face to the Muslims. Death befell him thirty cubits from the place where he had been struck, in the direction of the Persian lines. He recited: [2310]

I hope I shall receive reward for this from our Lord;
I was one of those who fought well.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Ghuṣn — al-ʿAlāʾ and al-Qāsim — his father: A Persian warrior went forth, calling out: "Who is going to fight me?" Al-Aʿraf b. al-Aʿlam al-ʿUqaylī went forth against him and killed him. Then another Persian came forth and al-Aʿraf killed him as well. Then Persian horsemen surrounded him and threw him down; his weapon dropped to the ground and the 345. Translating al-ʿashīrah, according to the Cairo edition, instead of al-ʿasharah of the Leiden text.

346. The text has qutila "he was killed," but this does not make sense in the context. The suggested translation is not supported in the classical dictionaries. It is based on an inference from the meaning of maqtal "a place in the body where a wound causes death."

This is another instance of an early Muslim warrior's actively seeking martyrdom. Descriptions of such attitudes abound in classical Islamic literature; the Prophet himself is reported to have expressed his desire to experience martyrdom and then to be revived in order to experience it again and again. See Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, II, 201 (Kitāb al-jihād, bāb tamannī al-shahādah).

Persians seized it. He threw dust into their faces and returned to his companions, reciting [the following verses] concerning this event:

If they take my sword—I am an experienced man, victoriously emerging from the calamity.
Verily, I am a defender of my kinsmen, riding after my passion, managing the affair.

[2311] According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Ghuṣn—al-ʿAlāʾ and al-Qāsim—his father: Al-Qaʿqāʿ launched on that day thirty attacks. Whenever one of his units appeared, he launched an attack and hit someone. He began to recite verses in the rajaz meter[347] and said:

I throw them into disorder by beating;
I stab, hitting the target and causing [blood] to flow.
I hope [to be rewarded] for it by a multitude of people [entering] Paradise.[348]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: Al-Qaʿqāʿ killed on the Day of Aghwāth thirty people in thirty attacks. Whenever he launched an attack, he killed a man, the last of these being Buzurjmihr al-Hamadhānī. Al-Qaʿqāʿ recited concerning this:

I dealt him a blow that made his blood spurt and froth, like a sun ray.[349]
On the Day of Aghwāth and the night of the Persians,
I drove the Persians[350] away violently,
So that my soul and my people find abundance.[351]

---

347. For a general survey of the classical Arabic poetic meters, see *EI*², s.v. "ʿArūḍ" [G. Weil].

348. The poet entertains the hope that a great number of people from his tribe will be admitted to Paradise as a reward for his valor.

349. For jayyāshah in this sense, see Bevan, Naqāʾiḍ, 987 ll. 9–14; and Glossary, 322; for a description of blood spurting out of the wound and frothing, see Abū Tammām, Ḥamāsah, I, 329, above. See also de Goeje's Glossary, s.vv. j-y-sh, h-d-r.

350. For qawm in this sense see note 112, above.

351. The poem can be found in a different [and to my mind unsatisfactory] version in Masʿūdī, Murūj, IV, 212 [= ed. Pellat, III, 57]. The French translation in the first edition of Murūj is also unacceptable.

Al-Aʿwar b. Quṭbah fought Shahrbarāz Sijistān, and they killed each other. Al-Aʿwar's brother recited concerning this:

I have not seen a day more sweet and more bitter, worse[352] and better than the Day of Aghwāth[353], when the frontier was opened Without a smile.[354]

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād—and[355] Ibn Mikhrāq—a man from Ṭayyiʾ: The horsemen fought on the Day of the Military Units (yawm al-katāʾib)[356] from sunrise till midday. Toward the end of the day the [rest of] the troops marched toward each other and fought tumultuously till midnight. The Night of Armāth was called "tranquillity" (al-haḍʾah), and the Night of Aghwāth was called "blackness" (sawād). The first part [of the night] was also called "blackness." [2312]

On the Day of Aghwāth the Muslims were witnessing victory in al-Qādisiyyah, and they killed the Persian notables. The central part of the Persian horsemen wheeled around, but their infantrymen stood firm. If their horsemen had not launched an attack, Rustam would have been taken prisoner. When the first part of the night passed, the Muslims spent the [rest of the] night in the same way as the Persians spent the Night of Armāth.[357] The Muslims kept on proclaiming their tribal affiliations[358] throughout the evening, until they retired. When Saʿd heard this in the evening, he went to sleep. He said to one of his companions: "If the Muslims persist in proclaiming their tribal affiliations, do not wake me up, because [this 352. Translating aswaʾa according to de Goeje's conjecture.

353. The Day of Aghwāth aroused mixed feelings in the heart of the poet; it ended victoriously, but many Muslims, including his brother, had been killed in the fighting.

354. This is a pun on thaghr, which means both the mouth (or the front teeth) and the Muslim frontier.

355. Here begins an additional, though partial, chain of transmission.

356. This is apparently another name for the Day of Aghwāth.

357. This sentence is not very clear. It may mean that the Muslims, who were victorious on the Day of Aghwāth, spent the following night celebrating and dividing the spoils, in the same way that the Persians had spent the Night of Armāth, after they had inflicted heavy casualties on the Muslims (five hundred Asadīs had been killed then; see p. 2301, above).

358. The text is yantamūna. In a similar description Masʿūdī (Murūj, IV, 213; ed. Pellat, III, 58) has intimāʾ al-nās ilā ābāʾihim wa-ʿashāʾirihim. See also note 404, below.

means that] they are stronger than their enemy. If they are quiet and the Persians do not proclaim their affiliations, do not wake me, because [this means that] they are equal. If you hear the Persians proclaiming their affiliations, wake me up, because their proclamation portends evil."

They related: The battle intensified during that night.[359] Abū Miḥjan[360] was imprisoned and fettered in the palace. In the evening he went up to Saʿd and asked his forgiveness, but Saʿd repelled him and sent him back. Abū Miḥjan came to Salmā bint Khaṣafah[361] and [2313] said: "O Salmā, O daughter of the clan of Khaṣafah! Will you do me a favor?" She said: "And what is that?" He said: "Set me free and lend me al-Balqāʾ.[362] By God, if He keeps me safe, I shall come back to you and put my feet back in the fetters." She said: "What have I to do with this?" Abū Miḥjan started again to drag his feet in the fetters, and recited:

It is grievous enough that the horsemen gallop with the spears, while I am left tied up, with my fetters on.
When I stand up, the iron hurts and the doors are closed behind me, making the voice of the caller inaudible.
In the past I was a man of much wealth, and I had brothers;
now they have left me alone, having no brother.
By God, I took an oath, which I shall not break:
If [the door] is opened, I shall not visit the wine sellers' shops.[363]

Salmā said: "I have asked God for guidance, and I am satisfied with your oath." So she set him free and said: "As for the horse however, I shall not lend it," and she returned to her house. [Nevertheless,] Abū Miḥjan led the horse out through the palace gate, which was ad-

---

359. The text has sawād, which is a name of the Night of Aghwāth; see p. 2312, above.

360. Abū Miḥjan was a mukhaḍram poet of the tribe of Thaqīf, best known for his addiction to wine and his wine poems. See *EI*², s.v. "Abū Miḥdjan" (N. Rhodokanakis–Ch. Pellat); GAL, I, 40; S. I, 70–71; GAS, II, 300–2. There is an extensive account of this episode in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XXI, 7225–33. The editor of the Aghānī has also provided a list of additional sources in which information about Abū Miḥjan may be found. See also Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 207–9.

361. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, VII, 705–6 no. 11311.

362. A horse belonging to Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ. See Ibn Juzayy, Khayl, 137–40, where the whole episode is related.

363. See Ibn Qutaybah, Shiʿr, 252, for a slightly different version of this poem, with full textual apparatus. See also Masʿūdī, Murūj, IV, 212 (= ed. Pellat, III, 58).

jacent to the moat, mounted it, and moved slowly [toward the enemy]. When he was opposite the right wing [of the Muslims], he proclaimed "God is most great!" and attacked the left wing of the Persians, swinging his lance and weapon between the two battle lines. [The transmitters of this tradition] have said that he rode the horse saddled. Saʿīd and al-Qāsim said that he rode it without a saddle. [2314]

Abū Miḥjan then returned behind the Muslim lines, moved to the left wing, proclaimed "God is most great!" and attacked the right wing of the Persians, swinging his lance and weapon between the battle lines. Then he [again] returned behind the Muslim lines, moved to the center, came out in front of the Muslims, and attacked the Persians, swinging his lance and weapon between the two lines. On that night, the Muslim felt deep anguish.[364] They admired Abū Miḥjan, although they did not recognize him and had not seen him during daytime. Some of them said: "These are the [first] companions of Hāshim (b. ʿUtbah) or Hāshim himself."[365] Observing the Muslim troops while lying on the roof of the castle, Saʿd said: "By God, if Abū Miḥjan were not in prison, I would say that this is Abū Miḥjan and the horse is al-Balqāʾ!" Some people said: "If al-Khaḍir[366] were participating in the wars, we would think that the rider of al-Balqāʾ is al-Khaḍir!" Others said: "Had it not been that angels do not participate in fighting,[367] we would think an angel was supporting us." The Muslims did not remember Abū Miḥjan, nor did they take notice of him, because he was in prison.

At midnight the Persians and the Muslims disengaged from each other and retreated. Abū Miḥjan approached [the castle], entered it at the same place where he had gone out, put down [his weapon] and [the saddle] of the horse, placed his feet in the fetters, and recited:

The tribe of Thaqīf know—and this is not boasting— [2315] that we have the most noble swords among them.

---

364. The text here is difficult and de Goeje's vocalization al-nāsa does not seem to be the best one possible. I follow Nöldeke's translation, published in his review of Abel, Abû Miḥjan, in WZKM, II (1888), 81: "... die Leute hatten ... arge Beklemmung gefühlt."

365. See p. 2305 and note 137, above, Hāshim b. ʿUtbah was appointed to command the reinforcements sent to al-Qādisiyyah by Abū ʿUbaydah.

366. For the legendary figure of al-Khaḍir in the Islamic tradition, see *EI*², s.v. "al-Khaḍir" (A. J. Wensinck).

367. But see the traditions about the participation of angels in the battle of Badr in Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, IV, 5off. (on Qurʾān 3:124–25).

We have the fullest armor, and we hold our own firmly when they are not willing to stand up.
Every day we act on their behalf;
if they are [too] blind to [see it], ask a man knowledgeable about them.
On the night of Qādis they were not aware of me, and I did not let the troops notice my departure.
If I am imprisoned, it is my affliction;
if I am released, I shall make [the enemy] taste death.

Salmā said to him: "O Abū Miḥjan, for what reason did this man imprison you?" He said: "By God, he did not imprison me because of a forbidden thing that I ate or drank. But I was drinking in the Jāhiliyyah. Because I am a poet, poetry creeps to my tongue, which sometimes sends it to my lips, and my reputation is damaged because of this; this is why he has put me in prison. I recited:

[2316] When I die, bury me at the foot of a grapevine, so that its roots will moisten my bones after death.
And do not bury me in the desert, for I fear that I shall not taste [the juice of] the grapevine after I die.
It will moisten my grave with the wine of al-Ḥuṣṣ,[368] because I became its captive, after I tried to drive it away.

Salmā was angry with Saʿd on the Night of Armāth, on the Night of Tranquillity, and on the Night of Blackness. When she woke up, she came to him, made up with him, and informed him of what had passed between herself and Abū Miḥjan. Saʿd summoned him, released him, and said: "You are free to go; I shall not punish you for anything you say unless you actually do it." Abū Miḥjan said: "By God, I must never respond to my tongue's desire to describe abomiable things."

The Day of ʿImās

According to al-Sarī b. Yaḥyā—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād; and Ibn Mikhrāq—a man from Ṭayyiʾ: On the morning of the third day, the Muslims and the Persians were in their positions. The area between the two armies — meaning the stony tract (ḥarrah) — was like a reddish watercourse (rijlah ḥamrā').[369] The area between the two battle lines was one mile in width. Muslim casualties were two thousand wounded and dead, and the casualties of the polytheists were ten thousand wounded and dead. Sa'd said: "He who wishes will wash the martyrs, and he who wishes will bury them in their blood."[370] [2317]

368. Al-Ḥuṣṣ is identified as a place near Ḥimṣ. Yāqūt (Muʿjam II, 274) mentions that it was famous for its wine, but the only reference adduced by him is this verse of Abū Miḥjan.

The Muslims approached the fallen, took care of them, and placed them in the rear. Those who collected the bodies carried them to the graveyards and delivered the wounded to the women. Ḥājib b. Zayd was responsible for the care of the martyrs. For two days, on the Day of Aghwāth and the Day of Armāth, the women and the children were digging graves on both sides of the Musharriq valley.[371] Two thousand and five hundred of those who fought at al-Qādisiyyah and in the previous battles were buried. Ḥājib, some of the martyrs,[372] and the martyrs' kinsmen passed near the trunk of a palm tree between al-Qādisiyyah and al-'Udhayb, there being at that time no other palm tree between these two places. When the wounded were being carried away, they reached this tree. One of them, who was in the state of consciousness, asked to be allowed to stop under it and rest in its shade. Another wounded man, whose name was Bujayr, sheltered in its shade and recited:

O solitary palm tree between Qādis and al-'Udhayb, be safe and well!

---

369. Probably because of the blood spilled in the fighting.

370. Sa'd's statement reflects the different views expressed in Islamic tradition on whether martyrs (shuhadā') have to be ritually washed before burial. According to a tradition reported in the canonical collections, the Prophet ordered the burial of the martyrs of the battle of Uḥud "in their blood" (idfinūhum fī dimā'ihim); see Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, I, 337 last line–338, and Wensinck et al., Concordance, s.v. d-f-n, for further references. The commentators explain this ruling in several ways. Some say that the martyrs' blood will diffuse scent (yafūḥu miskan) on the Day of Judgment (and therefore must be left unwashed). Others maintain that the angels perform the ritual washing for the martyrs (Qasṭallānī, Irshād, II, 441). The fact that the martyrs are not washed as are the other dead is also said to be an indication of their being alive, according to Qur'ān 3:169 ('Aynī, 'Umdat al-qārī', VIII, 154). See also 'Abd al-Razzāq, Muṣannaf, III, 540–48; Sarakhsī, Sharḥ al-siyar, I, 232–37.

The opposite view, which favors the performance of ritual washing for the martyrs, is attributed to al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī and Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab (Qasṭallānī, Irshād, II, 441, and 'Aynī, 'Umdat al-qārī', VIII, 154.

371. Cf. note 328, above.

372. The wounded are also considered martyrs.

Another man, whose name was Ghaylān and who belonged to Banū Ḍabbah or to Banū Thawr, recited:

O palm tree on a sand hill, be safe and well!
You are surrounded by plants of jummān and rughl.[373]

[2318] A man from Banū Taym Allāh, called Ribʿī, recited:

O palm tree on a sand hill, oh hill of gravestones!
May the morning clouds and abundant rain provide you with water!

Al-Aʿwar b. Quṭbah recited:

O riders' palm tree, may you always be fresh and green!
May palm trees always grow around your hill!

ʿAwf b. Mālik al-Tamīmī (or al-Taymī, of Taym al-Ribāb), recited:

O palm tree on a hill near al-ʿUdhayb, may morning clouds and rainy days provide you with ample water!

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: Al-Qaʿqāʿ spent the whole night dispatching his companions to the place from where he parted from them on the previous evening. Then he said: "When the sun rises, come in groups of one hundred each. When one group of one hundred moves out of sight, let another group follow it. Should Hāshim come, then all is well; if not, you will revive the hope and determination of the Muslims."
[2319] They acted accordingly and nobody noticed it. In the morning the Muslims were in their positions, having taken care of their dead and delivered them to al-Ḥājib b. Zayd. The dead of the polytheists lay between the lines, having been neglected, since the Persians had not been attending to their dead. The place where the Persians were was determined by God as a ruse for the sake of the Muslims in order thereby to strengthen them. When the sun rose, al-Qaʿqāʿ was looking out for the horsemen. When their manes appeared, he proclaimed "God is most great!" and the Muslims followed suit and said: "Reinforcements have arrived!" ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr was ordered to do the same [and to proclaim "God is most great!"]. Al-Qaʿqāʿ's men came from the direction of Khaffān.[374] The horsemen advanced; the fighting units went into formation and engaged in battle. The reinforcements were coming one after the other. The last of al-Qaʿqāʿ's men were closely followed by Hāshim (b. ʿUtbah) with seven hundred men. The Muslims informed him of al-Qaʿqāʿ's tactics[375] and described to him what al-Qaʿqāʿ had done in the past two days. Hāshim therefore arranged his men in groups of seventy, and as soon as the last of al-Qaʿqāʿ's men had arrived he went forth with seventy men, among whom was Qays b. Hubayrah b. ʿAbd Yaghūth, who had not participated in previous battles. He came to al-Yarmūk from the Yemen, responded to Hāshim's call [and joined his troops]. Hāshim drew near. When he mingled with the center of the army, he proclaimed "God is most great!" The Muslims followed suit, having taken up their positions. Hāshim said: "The beginning of the battle is individual combat, and then the shooting of arrows." He took his bow, put an arrow on the middle of the string, and pulled it, but [at the same time] his mare raised her head and the arrow pierced her ear. Hāshim said, laughing: "What a bad shot from a man who is being watched by everyone who sees him! What do you think, where would my arrow have reached?" They said: "[It would have reached] al-ʿAtīq!" Having dislodged the arrow, Hāshim spurred his mare on. Then he hit her until she reached al-ʿAtīq, and [2320] he hit her again until she rushed with him and broke through the Persian lines.[376] Hāshim then returned to his position, while the groups of horsemen continued to arrive and join the first ones.

373. See Aṣmaʿī, Nabāt, 63; Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. r-gh-l. I have not found references to jummān.

The polytheists spent the night repairing the litters of their elephants and putting them back in place. By morning they were in their positions. The elephants moved forward, accompanied by infantrymen, who protected them against the possibility of their girths' being cut again.[377] The infantrymen were, in turn, accompanied by horsemen, who protected them. When the Persians

374. A village in the vicinity of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 456.

375. For a suggestion that raʾy be interpreted in this way, see Fries, Heereswesen, 64.

376. Takhruquhum is to be understood in light of the expression kharaqa ṣaffahum; see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 258.

377. Cf. p. 2301, above.

wanted to attack a military unit, they moved toward it with an elephant and its escort in order to scare the horses of the Muslims. But they did not succeed in doing this as they had done on the previous day, because the elephant is more ferocious when he is alone and there is no one with him; when he is accompanied, he is more gentle.

The battle went on in this manner till the end of daylight. The battle on the Day of ʿImās was heavy throughout the day, the Arabs and the Persians being equal. When the smallest thing occurred between them, the Persians would shout the information to each other until it reached Yazdagird,[378] and he would send to them the reinforcements that he still had so that the Persians were strengthened by them. He had reinforcements at the postal stations, keeping them [for such an eventuality as] he had faced on the previous day. If God had not favored the Muslims by inspiring al-Qaʿqāʿ in the two days of battle, and if He had not made things easier for them by the arrival of Hāshim, the Muslims would have been routed.

[2321] According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī: Hāshim b. ʿUtbah came from the direction of Syria with seven hundred men after the victories at al-Yarmūk and at Damascus, accompanied by Qays b. Makshūḥ al-Murādī. He hastened with seventy men, among who was Saʿīd b. Nimrān al-Hamdānī.

According to Mujālid: Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim was in Hāshim's vanguard with al-Qaʿqāʿ.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Jakhdab b. Jarʿab — ʿIṣmah al-Wābilī, who took part in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah: Hāshim came from Syria with the Iraqis. He hastened forward with men, almost all of whom were from Iraq, except for very few. Ibn Makshūḥ was among these. When he drew near [al-Qādisiyyah], he hastened forward with three hundred men and reached the Muslims when they were in their positions. His men joined the Muslim battle lines.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī: The third day [of the battle of al-Qādisiyyah] was the Day of ʿImās. Among the battle days of al-Qādisiyyah there was none like this, and the two armies emerged from it equal. Everybody endured his suffering patiently; whatever the Muslims inflicted upon the infidels, the infidels inflicted upon the Muslims, and whatever the infidels inflicted upon the Muslims, the Muslims inflicted upon the infidels.

378. Cf. p. 2287, above.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAmr b. al-Rayyān—Ismāʿīl b. Muḥammad b. Saʿd: Hāshim b. ʿUtbah reached al-Qādisiyyah on the Day of ʿImās. He always fought on a mare and never on a male horse. When he stood among the Muslims, he shot an arrow, which hit the ear of his own mare, and said: "What a bad shot it is! What do you think, where would my arrow have reached if it had not hit the horse's ear?" They said: "Such-and-such a place!" He wheeled around, dismounted, left his horse, and went forth hitting the Persians until he reached the place that they mentioned. Ac- [2322] cording to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: Hāshim was in the right wing.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAmr b. al-Rayyān—Ismāʿīl b. Muḥammad: We saw that Hāshim b. ʿUtbah was in charge of the right wing. Most of the Muslims were shielded only with saddle cloths across which they fastened leafless palm branches; those who did not have any protection bound their heads with girths.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Abu Kibrān—al-Ḥasan b. ʿUqbah: Qays b. al-Makshūḥ said upon his arrival from Syria with Hāshim, standing among those who were next to him:

> O Arabs! God has favored you with Islam and has honored you with Muḥammad; may God pray for him and grant him peace! By the grace of God you have become brethren. Your call is one and you are united. [All this happened] after you had been attacking each other like lions and violently abducting each other like wolves. Help God, so that He may help you! Ask God to grant you victory over the Persians, because He has already fulfilled His promise to give your brethren victory over Syria and to wrest [from their enemies] the excellent castles and palaces [there].

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Miqdām al-Ḥārithī—al-Shaʿbī: ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib said:

> I am about to attack the elephant and those who are around it [meaning the elephant in front of the Muslims]. Do not leave me alone longer than is necessary to slaughter a camel, for should you be late, you will lose Abū Thawr,[379] and where [2323] are you going to find for yourselves again someone like Abū Thawr? When you reach me, you will find me with a sword in my hand.

He launched an attack, started fighting them without delay, and was kept out of sight by the dust. His companions said: "What are you waiting for? You are not likely to reach him in time, and, if you lose him, the Muslims will have lost their [choice] horseman." They launched an attack, following which the polytheists let ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib loose after they had thrown him down and stabbed him. He was fighting them, holding the sword in his hand, his horse having been stabbed. When he saw his companions and the Persians disengaged themselves from him, he seized the leg of a Persian soldier's horse. The rider spurred him on, but the horse was agitated [and did not move]. The Persian turned toward ʿAmr and intended to kill him. When the Muslims saw this, they struck him. The Persian dismounted from his horse and hastened to join[380] his companions. ʿAmr said: "Let me have his reins," and they gave the reins to him and he mounted the horse.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAbdallāh b. al-Mughīrah al-ʿAbdī—al-Aswad b. Qays—their elders who participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah: On the Day of ʿImās, a Persian went forth, stood between the battle lines, and called out in a sonorous voice: "Who is going to fight me?" A man from among us, whose name was Shabr b. ʿAlqamah, and who was short, slender, and ugly, said: "Oh Muslims! This man has dealt with you fairly, but nobody has responded to him and nobody has gone forth to fight him." Then he said: "By God, if it were not that you would treat me with contempt, I would go forth to fight him." When he saw that no one was preventing him from taking his sword and his shield,[381] he went forward. When the Persian saw Shabr, he roared, dismounted near him, [2324] bore him down, and then sat on his chest and grasped his sword in order to slay him. The halter of the Persian's horse was tied to his

379. This was the kunyah of ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib.

380. I am translating ḥāḍara according to the gloss in note h to this page in the Leiden edition.

381. Ḥajafah is a shield made of camel skins sewed one over another. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v.

belt, and when the Persian drew his sword, the horse swerved so that the halter pulled him and overturned him. While the Persian was being dragged, Shabr trampled upon him. Shabr's companions shouted at him. Shabr said: "Shout as much as you like, but by God I shall not leave him until I kill him and plunder his possessions." Then Shabr slew the Persian, took his possessions, and brought the corpse to Sa'd, who said: "Come to me at the time of the noon prayer." Shabr brought the spoils to Sa'd, who praised God, glorified Him, and said: "I see fit to give him the spoils; whoever actually takes spoils, they are his." Shabr sold [the spoils] for twelve thousand [dirhams].

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: When Sa'd saw the elephants' driving a wedge between the Muslim units and doing again what they had done on the Day of Armāth, he sent for Ḍakhm, Muslim, Rāfi', 'Ashannaq, and their Persian companions who had embraced Islam. When they came to him, he asked them whether the elephants have vital organs where a wound would cause death (maqātil). They said: "Yes, the trunks and the eyes; when these are gone, the elephants are of no use." Sa'd sent a message to al-Qa'qā' and 'Āṣim, the two sons of 'Amr, saying: "Take care of the white elephant for me." All the elephants were following[382] the white one, which was stationed opposite al-Qa'qā' and 'Āṣim. Sa'd sent a message to Ḥammāl (b. Mālik) and to al-Ribbīl (b. 'Amr), saying: "Take care of the scabby elephant for me." All the elephants were following the scabby one, which was opposite Ḥammāl and al-Ribbīl. Al-Qa'qā' and 'Āṣim took two solid but flexible spears, moved forward with the horsemen and footmen, and said: "Surround the elephant in order to confuse him." Meanwhile, al-Qa'qā' and 'Āṣim were intermingling with the Persians, and [2325]
Ḥammāl and al-Ribbīl did the same. When they came close to the elephants and surrounded them, each elephant looked right and left, preparing to hit the ground with his feet, and while the elephant was distracted by those around him al-Qa'qā' and 'Āṣim launched an attack and simultaneously pierced the eyes of the white elephant with their spears. The elephant roared, shook his head, threw off his rider, and let his trunk hang down. Al-Qa'qā' struck him and threw him down. The elephant fell on his side, and the Muslims killed those who were riding him.

382. This translation takes into account the version of Ibn Ḥubaysh, mentioned in note l to this page in the Leiden edition: al-fiyalah tatba'uhu.

Ḥammāl launched an attack, saying to al-Ribbīl: "You have the choice: either strike his trunk and I shall pierce his eye, or you will pierce his eye and I shall strike his trunk." Al-Ribbīl chose to strike the trunk, and while the elephant was distracted by those who surrounded him, Ḥammāl attacked him, his rider fearing only for the girth.[383] These [two Muslims] dealt with the elephant alone. [Ḥammāl] pierced his eye; the elephant sat down on his hindquarters and then stood up. Al-Ribbīl struck him and severed his trunk. The elephant rider noticed al-Ribbīl, however, and slit his nose and forehead with an axe.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Mujālid—al-Shaʿbī: Two men belonging to the Banū Asad, whose names were al-Ribbīl and Ḥammāl, said: "O Muslims, which is the most painful death?" They replied, "To attack this elephant!" Hence al-Ribbīl and Ḥammāl urged their horses on. When the horses rose on their feet, they made them dash at the elephant opposite them. One of them pierced the elephant's eye, so that it trampled upon those who were behind it. The other struck the elephant's trunk, but the elephant's rider dealt him a crippling blow in his face with an axe. Both he and Ribbīl [2326] escaped. Al-Qaʿqāʿ and his brother attacked the elephant opposite them, putting out its eyes and cutting its trunk. The elephant wandered, bewildered, between the two battle lines. When he came to the Muslim line, they stabbed him, and when he came to the polytheists' line, they goaded him and drove him away.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAmr — al-Shaʿbī: Among the elephants there were two who were leading the rest. On the Day of al-Qādisiyyah, the Persians sent them to attack at the center of their army. Saʿd ordered al-Qaʿqāʿ and ʿĀṣim from the tribe of Tamīm and Ḥammāl and al-Ribbīl from the tribe of Asad to deal with the two elephants. [This tradition is identical with the previous one, except that it says:] He [survived and] lived afterward.[384] The two elephants screamed like pigs. Then the scabby one, who had been blinded, turned around and jumped into al-ʿAtīq. The other elephants followed him, broke through the Persian lines, and crossed al-ʿAtīq in his wake. They reached al-Madāʾin with their litters, but those who were in the litters perished.

383. Probably because of the Muslim tactics employed on the previous days; cf. p. 2301, above.

384. This seems to refer to the fact that al-Ribbīl survived the injuries that he had sustained while attacking the elephant.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: When the elephants departed and the Muslims remained alone with the Persians and the day drew to its end, the Muslims marched forward, protected by the horsemen who had fought earlier in the day. They fought with the swords, with determination and fury, until the evening.[385] [In this fight] the two armies were equal. When the Muslims did what they did to the elephants, the units of the armored camels went into formation, hamstrung the elephants, and repelled them. Concerning this, al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr recited:

Maḍraḥī b. Yaʿmar roused my tribe;
how excellent is my tribe when they brandish the spears!
He did not refrain from using them on the day when our troops protected the clients of the people of Qudays.
When I fought the enemy, I routed him, [2327] and I encountered great calamities in war:
[I encountered] elephants resembling houses charging forward, and I put out their eyes!

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: When the Muslims reached the end of the day and entered upon the night, the fighting intensified. Both sides endured and emerged equal, with battle cries being heard on both sides. The night was called the Night of Howling (laylat al-harīr). After it, there was no night battle in al-Qādisiyyah.

Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī] has said: According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAmr b. Muḥammad b. Qays—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Jaysh: On the Night of the Howling, Saʿd sent Ṭulayḥah and ʿAmr [b. Maʿdīkarib] to a crossing [of al-ʿAtīq?] downstream from the camp. He wanted them to stay at the crossing for fear lest the Persians come [and attack him] from there and said to them: "If you find that the Persians have arrived at the crossing ahead of you, stay in front of them. If you find that they do not know about it, stay there until you receive my orders."

385. De Goeje's text reads fa-ijtaladū bihā ḥattā amsaw ʿalā hardin bi-al-suyūfi; bi-al-suyūfi is in apposition to bihā and has been omitted from the Cairo edition.

ʿUmar had instructed Saʿd not to put the [former] leaders of the apostates (ahl al-riddah) in charge of a hundred men,[386] but when they arrived at the crossing and did not see anybody at it, Ṭulayḥah said: "If only we could cross here [to attack] the Persians from behind!" but ʿAmr said: "Nay, we should cross farther downstream." Ṭulayḥah said: "What I suggest is more beneficial to the Muslims," but ʿAmr said: "You are asking me to do what I cannot do." So they parted company. Ṭulayḥah went alone in the direction of the [Persian] camp across al-ʿAtīq, and ʿAmr went downstream with the companions of both. They then attacked, and the Persians rushed against them.

[2328] Saʿd was apprehensive of what had happened between Ṭulayḥah and ʿAmr and sent after them Qays b. al-Makshūḥ with seventy men. Qays was one of the [former] leaders [of the apostates], and Saʿd was forbidden to put him in command of one hundred men. Saʿd said: "If you catch up with them, you are in command." So Qays went after them. When he arrived at the crossing, he found the Persians repelling ʿAmr and his companions, so the Muslims [who came with Qays] drove [the Persians away] from him. Qays however approached ʿAmr and rebuked him, and they reviled each other. The companions of Qays said to ʿAmr: "Qays has been made commander over you." ʿAmr fell silent, then said: "Is a man whom I fought in the Jāhiliyyah for a lifetime assuming command over me?"[387] and he returned to camp.

Ṭulayḥah moved forward, and when he was opposite the dam,[388] he proclaimed three times "God is most great!" and then he went away. The Persians went in pursuit but did not know which way he had taken. He went downstream, crossed [al-ʿAtīq], came to Saʿd, and reported to him. All this pressed hard on the polytheists. The Muslims were glad but did not know what had happened.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—Qudāmah al-Kāhilī—the person who informed him: [There were] ten brothers from Banū Kāhil b. Asad, called the sons of Ḥarb. On that night one of them began to compose rajaz poems and said:

I am the son of Ḥarb, and my sword is with me,
I shall hit them with a sharp, glittering sword.

386. See note 77, above.
387. See pp. 2259–60, above.
388. See p. 2285, above.

When Abū Isḥāq disliked death,[389] and the soul heaved, on the point of dying;[390]
Endure, ʿIfāq, because this is the passing away!

ʿIfāq was one of the ten brothers. The hip of the author of the poem was hurt on that day, and he recited: [2329]

Endure, ʿIfāq: these are the Persians horsemen; endure, and do not let a lost leg distract your attention![391]

He died of his wounds on the same day.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Naḍr—Ibn al-Rufayl—his father—Ḥumayd b. Abī Shajjār: Saʿd sent Ṭulayḥah on an errand, but he neglected it, crossed al-ʿAtīq, and went to the Persian camp. When he stood at the barrier in the canal,[392] he proclaimed "God is most great!" three times. He frightened the Persians, and the Muslims were amazed. The two armies disengaged from each other to investigate the matter; the Persians sent [someone] to do it, and the Muslims asked about it. Then [the Persians] returned and restored their battle order, starting to do things which they had not done during the three days of battle. The Muslims were also arrayed in their battle order. Ṭulayḥah started saying [to the Persians]: "May you never lack the man who [resolved] to destroy you!"[393]

---

389. Translating idh kariha al-mawta with the Cairo edition, rather than adhkarahu al-mawta of the Leiden text. This superior reading can also be found in Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 248. Ibn Durayd also says that the kunyah Abū Isḥāq refers to Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, who did not take an active part in the battle on account of his illness.

390. Literally "the soul heaved [and reached the clavicles]"; cf. Qurʾān 75:26, where "when [the soul] reached the clavicles" (idhā balaqhat [al-nafs] al-tarāqī) is taken to be a sign of imminent death. See Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XIX, 121.

391. The poet seems to be asking his brother not to be distracted from the fighting by the desire to take care of his wound.

A very similar verse is attributed to Hayyāsh b. Qays al-Aʿwar b. Qushayr, who became famous for his reported bravery at the battle of Yarmūk. The verse reads;

aqdim khidāmu innahā al-asāwirah wa-lā taqhurrannaka sāqun nādirah.

Khidhām is the name of a horse; Hayyāsh is reported to have lost a leg without being aware of it. See Elad; "'And he who seeks his leg . . .'" the verse is quoted on p. 244. See also Jawālīqī, Muʿarrab, 69; and Ibn Durayd, Jamharat al-lughah, II, 215.

392. See p. 2285, above.

393. By this expression Ṭulayḥah means himself.

Masʿūd b. Mālik al-Asadī, ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr al-Tamīmī, Ibn Dhī al-Burdayn al-Hilālī, Ibn Dhī al-Sahmayn, Qays b. Hubayrah al-Asadī, and people like them went forth, fought the Persians, and hastened into battle. The Persians stood together, did not charge, and wanted to move only in formation. They sent forward a line with two "ears,"[394] followed by another and a third and a fourth, until their [2330] lines numbered thirteen in the center and in the two wings. When the horsemen of the [Arab] army moved against the Persians, they shot at them, but this did not change the course in which they were riding. Then the [Persian] units caught up with the [Muslim] horsemen. Khalīd b. Yaʿmar al-Tamīmī al-ʿUmarī was killed on that night. Al-Qaʿqāʿ launched an attack advancing in the direction from which Khālid had been shot. The Muslims were in distress. Then al-Qaʿqāʿ recited:

O Khawṣāʾ, may God water the grave of Ibn Yaʿmar!
When those who were leaving departed, he did not depart.[395]
May God water the land where Khālid's grave is situated, with rain pouring from thunderous morning clouds!
I took an oath that my sword will not stop slaying them, and [even] if men withdraw, I shall not do the same.

With the Muslims under their flags, al-Qaʿqāʿ moved against the Persians, without Saʿd's permission. Saʿd said: "O God, forgive him and grant him victory! I have given him permission, though he did not ask for it."[396] The Muslims were in their positions, except those who were forming military units or were fighting the Persians. They were arrayed in three lines. The infantrymen, armed with spears and swords, constituted one line; the second line was made of the archers; and the third one of the horsemen who stood in front of the infantrymen. The right wing and the left wing were arrayed in the same way. Saʿd said: "By God, the thing to do is what al-Qaʿqāʿ did. When I proclaim 'God is most great!' three times, move forward." When he proclaimed "God is most great!" [for the first time], the Muslims prepared themselves, all of them being in agreement with Saʿd. The fiercest battle was raging around al-Qaʿqāʿ and around those who were with him.

394. Lahu udhunāni; see Fries, Heereswesen, 72 n. 5.
395. The verse praises Ibn Yaʿmar's perserverance on the battlefield.
396. See p. 2332, below.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā — ʿAmr b. Murrah: Qays b. Hubayrah, who had not participated in any of the battles of al-Qādisiyyah except on this night, stood up among his followers and said: "Your enemy does not want anything except a battle. The sound tactic is that of your commander; it is not good that horsemen attack without being accompanied by infantry. If men move forward and are attacked by a mounted enemy who have [2331] no infantry with them, they will kill their horses, and the horsemen will then not be able to advance against them. Prepare yourselves, therefore, for the attack."[397] They prepared themselves, waiting for the proclamation "God is most great!" and for the attack of the Muslims,[398] while the arrows of the Persians were flying across the Muslim lines.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Mustanīr b. Yazīd — a man who transmitted the tradition to him: Durayd b. Kaʿb al-Nakhaʿī,[399] who held the standard of the tribe of al-Nakhaʿ, said: "The Muslims have prepared themselves for battle. Tonight be the first among the Muslims to reach God and to [engage in] holy war (al-jihād), because whoever is first tonight will receive his reward accordingly. Compete with the [other] Muslims for martyrdom and accept death cheerfully. This will more effectively save you from death, if you wish to live; and if not, then it is the hereafter which you wish to attain."

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Ajlaḥ: Al-Ashʿath b. Qays said: "O Arabs, it is not fitting that these Persians should be more courageous in the face of death and more generous in giving up this world [than you are]. Compete with each other [in risking] your children and wives. Do not fear being killed, because being killed is the aspiration of the noble and the destiny of the martyrs." Then he dismounted.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAmr b. Muḥammad: Ḥanẓalah b. al-Rabīʿ and the commanders of the military units (al-aʿshār) said: "Dismount, O Muslims, and do as we do. Do not fear the inevitable, for standing firm is safer than taking fright." Ṭulayḥah, Ghālib, Ḥammāl, and the brave men from all the tribes did the same.

---

397. "But do not attack yet"; see below.

398. Literally "and for the time that coincides (muwāfaqah) with the attack of the Muslims (al-nās)."

399. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 388; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, II, 387 no. 2397.

[2332] According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—ʿAmr and al-Naḍr b. al-Sarī: Ḍirār b. al-Khaṭṭāb al-Qurashī[400] dismounted and all the [Muslim] troops hastily followed each other toward the Persians between Saʿd's proclamations "God is most great!" [They did this because] they thought that he was acting too slowly. When Saʿd proclaimed "God is most great!" for the second time, ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr launched an attack and joined al-Qaʿqāʿ and the tribe of al-Nakhaʿ also launched an attack. All troops except the commanders disobeyed Saʿd and did not wait for his third proclamation, "God is most great!" However, when he proclaimed "God is most great!" for the third time, they moved forward, joined their companions, mingled with the Persians, and faced the night after performing the evening prayer.

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Walīd b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Abī Ṭaybah—his father: On the Night of the Howling, all the Muslims attacked, without waiting with the attack for Saʿd['s instructions]. The first man to launch an attack was al-Qaʿqāʿ. Saʿd said: "O God, forgive him and grant him victory!"[401] Then he kept exclaiming: "O for Tamīm!" for the rest of the night. Then he said: "I see the situation. This is what it requires: When I proclaim "God is most great!" three times, launch the attack!" He proclaimed "God is most great!" once, and the tribe of Asad joined the attack. It was said [to Saʿd]: "Asad has launched an attack." Saʿd said: "O God, forgive them and grant them victory! O for Asad!" [and he kept on saying this] for the rest of the night. Then it was said: "The tribe of al-Nakhaʿ has launched an attack." Saʿd said: "O God, forgive them and grant them victory! O for Nakhaʿ!" [and he kept on saying this] for the rest of the night. Then it was said: "The tribe of Bajīlah has launched an attack." Saʿd said: "O God, forgive them and grant them victory! O for Bajīlah!" Then the Kindīs launched an attack. It was said: "Kindah has launched an attack." Saʿd said: "O for Kindah!" Then the commanders moved forward with those who were waiting for the [third] proclamation, "God is most great!"

---

400. Ḍirār b. al-Khaṭṭāb belonged to the tribe of Quraysh and was a poet of repute. He fought against the Muslims in the battles of Uḥud and the Ditch. He is reported to have boasted that he killed ten Companions of the Prophet and caused them "to wed the virgins of paradise" (al-ḥūr al-ʿīn). Ḍirār embraced Islam after the conquest of Mecca. See ['I.] Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, III, 40; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 483–85 no. 4177.

401. Cf. p. 2330, ll. 8–9.

They fought vehemently until the morning; this was the Night of Howling.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad b. Nuwayrah — his uncle Anas b. al-Ḥulays: I participated in [the battle of] the Night of the Howling. On that night the sound of the steel [swords hitting each other] was like the sound produced by locksmiths, and it went on until the morning. The Muslims were inspired with abundant endurance.[402] Saʿd spent a night the like of which he had never spent before, and the Arabs and the Persians saw things the like of which they had not seen before. The sounds of voices and information [about the events] had not reached Rustam and Saʿd,[403] and Saʿd began to pray, until at sunrise the Muslims proclaimed their tribal affiliation;[404] Saʿd inferred from this that they had the upper hand and that victory was theirs. [2333]

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAmr b. Muḥammad — al-Aʿwar b. Bayān al-Minqarī: The first thing that Saʿd heard on that night, the thing that was an indication that victory would be theirs in the second, remaining part of the night, was the voice of al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr, who recited:

We have killed a crowd or more,
four, five, and one.
Above the horses' manes we are considered venomous snakes;
when they died, I prayed fervently.
God is my Lord, and I purposely guard myself from sin.[405]

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAmr — al-Aʿwar and Muḥammad — his uncle and al-Naḍr — Ibn al-Rufayl: They fought on that night from its beginning till sunrise. They did not speak: their speech was howling, and the night was therefore called the Night of Howling. [2334]

402. For the expression afragha ʿalayhim al-ṣabra, see Qurʾān 2:250, 7:126.

403. This seems to mean that the methods of transmitting information devised by the Persians and the Arabs broke down because of the fierce battle. See p. 2287, above.

404. It is difficult to decide what is the best version. The Leiden edition reads ibtahā in the sense of iftakhara "he boasted." In comparing this passage with p. 2312 ll. 9–13, it seems preferable to read intamā "he proclaimed his tribal affiliation," following [ʿI.] Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 373 l. 7; this version is noted in the critical apparatus of the Leiden edition. For another example of this usage of intamā, see Ṭabarī, I, 2193 l. 5, and note 358, above.

405. This verse does not seem to be very coherent.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAmr b. al-Rayyān — Muṣʿab b. Saʿd: On that night, Saʿd sent to the [battle] line Bijād, a boy, because he could not find another messenger and said: "See what their situation is." When Bijād returned, Saʿd asked him: "What have you seen, son?" and he replied, "I have seen them playing." Saʿd said: "Or, rather, exerting themselves."

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad b. Jarīr al-ʿAbdī — ʿĀbis al-Juʿfī — his father: A fully armed Persian unit (katībah) was in front of [the tribe of] al-Juʿfī on the Day of ʿImās. They moved toward the Persians and fought them with the swords, but they saw that the swords had no effect on the [Persian armor made of] iron, and they retreated. Ḥumayḍa said: "What is the matter with you?" and they replied, "The weapons do not penetrate into them." Ḥumayḍa said: "Stay where you are till I show you; look!" and he attacked a Persian and broke his back with a spear. Then he turned to his companions and said: "I am confident that they will die and you will survive." So then they attacked the Persians and drove them back to their lines.

[2335] According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī: Only seven hundred men from the tribe of Kindah proper participated in this battle, and Turk al-Ṭabarī was opposite them. Al-Ashʿath said: "O men, march against them!" and he marched against them with seven hundred men, drove them away, and killed Turk. Their rajaz poet (i.e., the poet of Kindah) said:

"We have left their Turk in the field, dyed with the splendor of the vein."[406]

The Night of al-Qādisiyyah

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Ṭalḥah and Ziyād: In the morning that followed the Night of al-Qādisiyyah [which is (also) the morning of the Night of Howling; of these battle days, this was the night called the Night of al-Qādisiyyah], the Muslims were exhausted, for they did not close their eyes throughout the night. Al-Qaʿqāʿ walked among the men, saying: "He who resumes the fight against the Persians will defeat them in an hour. Endure for [another] 406. That is to say, blood.

hour and launch the attack, because victory comes with endurance. Prefer endurance to fear." A group of commanders gathered around him and stood up against Rustam, until they became entangled at sunrise with the Persians who were protecting him. When the tribes saw this, some of their men rose [to speak]. Qays b. ʿAbd Yaghūth, al-Ashʿath b. Qays, ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib, Ibn Dhī al-Sahmayn al-Khathʿamī, and Ibn Dhī al-Burdayn al-Hilāli—all stood up and said: "Let not these men be more earnest than you in complying with God's orders, and let them [meaning the Persians][407] not be more daring when facing death. Let their souls not be more generous in giving up this world,[408] and compete with each other [for martyrdom]."[409]

They launched an attack from the area adjacent to them and became entanged with [the Persians] opposite them. A number of men rose up among the tribe of Rabīʿah and said: "You know the Persians best, and you were the most courageous against them in the past.[410] What is it, then, that prevents you from being [even] more courageous today?" The first Persians to retreat at noon were al-Hurmuzān and al-Bayruzān; they retreated but made a stand in the place that they reached. At noon a gap was opened in the center [of the Persian army] and dust covered them. A violent westerly[411] wind blew away the sunshade[412] from Rustam's throne, and it fell into al-ʿAtīq. The dust blew against the Persians. [2336]

Al-Qaʿqāʿ and his companions reached Rustam's throne and top-

407. Cf. (I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, II, 373 l. 19.

408. A similar exhortation is attributed, in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 258, to Qays b. Makshūḥ.

409. The expression tanāfasūhā is difficult. The apparent antecedent of the feminine pronoun is al-dunyā, but this does not seem to make any sense. Cf. p. 2331 l. 8: nāfisūhum fī al-shahādah.

410. See p. 2223, above.

411. The removal of Rustam's sunshade foreshadows his imminent defeat. The choice of the dabūr wind for this purpose is significant: It is a wind that is frequently described as destructive, worthless, and bringing no rain with it. The wind that God sent to destroy the ancient nation of ʿĀd, called in the Qurʾān al-rīḥ al-ʿaqīm, is said to have been the dabūr (or the janūb); see Tafsīr al-Jalālayn on Qurʾān 51:41; and Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XXVII, 4, on the same verse. The idea is also expressed in a tradition in which the Prophet is reported to have said: "I was helped by the easterly wind, while ʿĀd were destroyed by the westerly one [nuṣirtu bi-al-ṣabā wa-uhlikat ʿĀd bi-al-dabūr]." See Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, I, 263; and Wensinck et al., Concordance, s.v. dabūr, for further references.

412. Cf. note 282, above.

pled it. Rustam vacated it when the wind had blown the sunshade away and transferred to some mules which had brought to him certain possessions on that day and were standing [nearby], taking shelter in the shade of one of the mules and of its litter. Hilāl b. ʿUllafah[413] hit the litter under which Rustam was (hiding) and cut its ropes. One of the half-loads fell on Rustam, so that Hilāl did not see him and did not notice him. The load hit Rustam and displaced a vertebra in his spine. His [sleeves][414] diffused scent. He moved toward al-ʿAtīq and threw himself into it, but without any hesita-[2337] tion, Hilāl went after him and caught him after Rustam had already started to swim. Hilāl stood upright, seized Rustam's leg, and dragged him out to the river's bank, and then struck his forehead with the sword and killed him. Then he dragged him farther and threw him at the feet of the mules. He seated himself on Rustam's throne and exclaimed: "By the Lord of the Kaʿbah, I have killed Rustam! Come to me!" Men gathered around him without noticing or seeing the throne, proclaiming "God is most great!" and calling out to each other.

At this point the polytheists lost heart and were defeated. Al-Jālnūs stood on the barrier and called upon the Persians to cross it. The dust settled. As for those who were chained together, they panicked and threw themselves, one after the other, into al-ʿAtīq. The Muslims stabbed them with their spears, and none of them escaped to tell the story. They numbered thirty thousand. Ḍirār b. al-Khaṭṭāb seized the royal flag[415] and was given thirty thousand [dirhams] in exchange for it; its value was one million and two hundred thousand. The Muslims killed in the battle ten thousand men, over and above those whom they had killed on the previous day.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAṭiyyah — ʿAmr b. Salamah: Hilāl b. ʿUllafah killed Rustam on the Day of al-Qādisiyyah.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Abu Mikhrāq — Abū Kaʿb

---

413. See ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, V, 69.

414. I am translating nafaḥat ardānuhu miskan according to the version of Ibn Ḥubaysh, mentioned in the notes to the Leiden edition. Ṭabarī has nafaḥat miskan, without a subject for nafaḥat. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2194 l. 17.

415. For an explanation of the term drafsh-i kavyān (kābiyān in Ṭabarī's text), see Christensen, Sassanides, 212, 502–4; and *EI*², s.v. "Kāwah" (Ed). A brief description of the flag, which is said to have been made from panther skin and to have measured 8 by 12 cubits, is given in Ṭabarī, I, 2175. See also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 252; Nuwayrī, Nihāyat al-arab, XIX, 215.

al-Ṭā'ī—his father: Before the Night of Howling, two thousand five hundred Muslims were hurt, and six thousand of them were killed on the Night of Howling and on the Day of al-Qādisiyyah; they were [2338] buried in the moat, opposite [the valley of] Musharriq.[416]

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: When the Persians were defeated, none of them remained between the moat and al-'Atīq, and the dead covered the area between al-Qudays and al-'Atīq; Sa'd ordered Zuhrah to pursue the [fleeing] Persians. Zuhrah summoned the vanguard; he ordered al-Qa'qā' to pursue those who fled downstream and ordered Shuraḥbīl to pursue those who fled upstream. He ordered Khālid b. 'Urfuṭah to plunder the dead and to bury the martyrs. Two thousand five hundred martyrs who were killed on the Night of Howling and on the Day of al-Qādisiyyah were buried around Qudays, across al-'Atīq, opposite [the valley of] Musharriq, and the martyrs killed before the Night of Howling were buried in Musharriq. The spoils and the wealth were gathered; a quantity such as this had never been gathered, neither before al-Qādisiyyah nor after it.

Sa'd sent for Hilāl [b. 'Ullafah], blessed him, and said: "Where is your man?" He replied: "I threw him under [the feet of] the mules." Sa'd said: "Go and bring him here." When Hilāl brought the corpse, Sa'd said: "Strip it of everything, except that which you want to leave on it." Hilāl took Rustam's spoils and did not leave on him anything.

When al-Qa'qā' and Shuraḥbīl returned, Sa'd told each one of them to pursue those who had been pursued before by the other. One went upstream, the other downstream,[417] until each covered the distance between al-Kharrārah and al-Qādisiyyah.[418]

Zuhrah b. al-Ḥawiyyah went after the Persians. He reached the barrier which the Persians had broken in order to thwart the pursuit. Zuhrah said: "Advance, O Bukayr!" Bukayr hit his mare—he fought only on mares—and said: "Jump, Aṭlāl!" She exerted herself and 416. Cf. pp. 2304, 2317, above.

---

417. Sa'd's intention seems to have been to check one more time the two escape routs of the Persians. This time, so it appears, al-Qa'qā' went upstream and Shuraḥbīl downstream.

418. According to Yāqūt (Mu'jam, II, 409), al-Kharrārah is a place near al-Saylaḥūn, in the neighborhood of al-Kūfah. There is no indication of the distance between al-Qādisiyyah and al-Kharrārah.

[2339] said: "Jump, by the Sūrah of the Cow!"[419] Zuhrah, who rode a stallion, and the rest of the horsemen leaped forward[420] and waded the canal. Three hundred horsemen followed. When the horses were afraid [to advance], Zuhrah called out: "O men, take the way of the bridge and move along the opposite side." He set out and the Muslims went to the bridge following him. He then caught up with the Persians, with al-Jālnūs in their rear guard, protecting them. Zuhrah attacked him, they exchanged blows, and Zuhrah killed and plundered him. They killed [the Persians who were] between al-Kharrārah, al-Saylaḥūn, and al-Najaf. In the evening they returned and spent the night at al-Qādisiyyah.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAbdallāh b. Shubrumah — Shaqīq: We forced our way into al-Qādisiyyah in the morning. When we retreated, the time of prayer came along, but the muʾadhdhin had been hit. The Muslims quarreled with each other for the right to pronounce the call to prayer, and almost fought it out with the swords. So Saʿd cast lots among them, and the man whose lot was drawn pronounced the call to prayers.

Another account: The Muslims who pursued the Persians upstream of al-Qādisiyyah and downstream returned. The time of prayer came, but the muʾadhdhin had been killed, and the Muslims quarreled with each other for the right to pronounce the call to prayer. Saʿd cast lots among them. They stayed [in their places] for the rest of the day and the [following] night, until Zuhrah returned. In the morning all of them gathered, and they did not expect anyone [2340] else from the army [to return]. Saʿd wrote [to ʿUmar] about the victory, about the number of [the Persians whom the Muslims] killed, and about the number of the Muslims who had been hit. He sent to ʿUmar the names of those whom ʿUmar knew with Saʿd b. ʿUmaylah al-Fazāri.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Naḍr — Ibn al-Rufayl — his father: Saʿd summoned me and sent me to inspect the dead on his behalf and to provide him with the names of the chieftains

---

419. Bukayr was the nickname of Bakr b. Shaddākh (or Shaddād) al-Laythī, who was in his youth one of the Prophet's servants. The story of his mare Aṭlāl is related in slightly different versions in Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 324–5; Aʿrābī, Asmāʾ al-khayl, 83–84; Ghundijānī, Asmāʾ, 33–34; Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. ṭ-l-l.

420. Translating wathaba of the Cairo edition, instead of awthaba of the Leiden text.

among them. I came to him and gave him the information but I did not see Rustam in his place. Sa'd sent for a man from the tribe of Taym whose name was Hilāl and said to him: "Did you not inform me that you had killed Rustam?" Hilāl said: "Yes, I did." Sa'd said: "What did you do with him?" He replied, "I threw him under the feet of the mules." Sa'd said: "How did you kill him?" He gave him the information, saying: "I struck his forehead and his nose." Sa'd said: "Bring him to us." He gave Rustam's spoils to Hilāl. Rustam had thrown off some of his clothing when he rushed into the water. Hilāl sold what was found on Rustam's body for seventy thousand [dirhams]; the value of his headgear [qalansuwah][421] would have been one hundred thousand if Hilāl had been able to take possession of it.[422]

A group of Christians [al-'ibād] came to Sa'd and said: "O commander, we have seen the body of Rustam near the gate of your castle, but he had the head of another man; the blows have disfigured him [beyond recognition]." At this, Sa'd laughed.

According to al-Sarī—Shu'ayb—Sayf—Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and Ziyād: The Daylamīs[423] and the chiefs of the garrisons who responded to the Muslims and fought on their side without embracing Islam said: "Our brethren who became Muslims from the beginning have better judgment and are more virtuous than we are. By God, no Persian will prosper after Rustam's death except those who became Muslims." [2341]

The youngsters of the army went to inspect the dead. They had with them vessels of water. They gave water to the Muslims in whom there was a breath of life and killed the polytheists in whom there was a breath of life. They came down from al-'Udhayb at the time of the evening prayer.

Zuhrah went in pursuit of al-Jālnūs. Al-Qa'qā', his brother, and Shuraḥbīl went in pursuit of the Persians who had fled upstream and downstream. They killed them in every village, in every thicket, and on every river bank, and then returned in time for the noon

421. See Dozy, Vêtements, 365–71; EI², s.v. "Libās" [Y. K. Stillman and N. A. Stillman] at V, 734b–735a.

422. Rustam apparently threw away his qalansuwah when he made his way into the water.

423. See EI², s.v. "Daylam" [V. Minorsky].

prayer. The commander greeted the Muslims,[424] praised every clan, and mentioned it by name.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Saʿīd b. al-Marzubān: Zuhrah set out and caught up with al-Jālnūs, who was one of the Persian princes, between al-Kharrārah and al-Saylaḥūn. He was wearing two pairs of bracelets (qulbāni, yāraqāni) and two earrings (qurṭāni) and was riding an exhausted horse. Zuhrah attacked him and killed him. (Saʿīd b. al-Marzubān also) said: "By God, Zuhrah rode on that day a horse whose reins were made of nothing but twisted rope, like a halter, and its girth was of woven hair. He [2342] brought the spoils of al-Jālnūs to Saʿd. The prisoners who were with Saʿd recognized the spoils and said: 'These are the spoils of al-Jālnūs.'" Saʿd said to Zuhrah: "Has anyone helped you to kill him?" He replied: "Yes." Saʿd said: "Who was it?" He replied: "God." Saʿd thereupon gave him the spoils of al-Jālnūs.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿUbaydah — Ibrāhīm: Saʿd thought that Zuhrah had received an excessive share of the spoils. He wrote to ʿUmar concerning this, and ʿUmar wrote back to him: "Whoever has killed a man, I have given him his spoils." Saʿd gave the spoils to Zuhrah, who sold them for seventy thousand [dirhams].

According to Sayf — al-Barmakān; and al-Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī: Zuhrah caught up with al-Jālnūs. A ball was held up for him, and he did not miss it with an arrow.[425] Zuhrah and al-Jālnūs faced each other. Zuhrah struck al-Jālnūs and threw him down. Now Zuhrah was a noble man;[426] he had been made a tribal chief in the Jāhiliyyah, had acquitted himself well in Islam, and had embraced it early.[427] He was [still] a young man. He put on the armor of al-Jālnūs, the value of which was seventy odd thousand, but when he returned to Saʿd,

---

424. The Cairo edition reads hanna'a al-nāsu amīrahum "the Muslims greeted their commander." The word order favors this reading, but it is nevertheless unlikely in view of the rest of the sentence, where the commander is clearly the subject.

425. For another case in which the Muslims used a ball as a target, in order to impress the enemy with their marksmanship, see Ṭabarī, I, 2443 ll. 6–11; pace Juynboll, Conquest, 23. See also Ṭabarī, I, 2353 l. 4.

426. Literally: "He had a forelock (dhu'ābah)." Dhu'ābah is used metaphorically for nobility and honor. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. dh-'-b (ustuʿīra li-al-ʿizz wa-al-sharaf wa-al-martabah); cf. de Goeje's Glossary, s.v.

427. It is unnecessary to add lahu and read wa lahu sābiqah with the Cairo edition. The main sentence is li-Zuhrah dhu'ābah . . . wa sābiqah; the phrase in between is parenthetical.

Sa'd took the spoils away from him and said: "[Why] did you not wait for my permission?" Sa'd and 'Umar exchanged letters concerning this. 'Umar wrote to Sa'd: "You will need men like Zuhrah. He endured a great deal and your war is not yet over. You will put him off his mettle[428] and spoil his spirit. Confirm him in the possession of his spoils and give him a stipend that is greater than that of his companions by five hundred [dirhams]."[429]

According to Sayf—'Ubaydah—'Iṣmah: 'Umar wrote to Sa'd: "I know Zuhrah better than you do. He is not a man who would conceal anything from the spoils he has taken. If the man who slandered him to you is lying, let God confront him with a man like Zuhrah, with two bracelets on his arms.[430] To everybody who killed a man, I have awarded the dead man's spoils." Sa'd gave the spoils to Zuhrah, and the latter sold them for seventy thousand. [2343]

According to Sayf—'Ubaydah—Ibrāhīm and 'Āmir: Those who acquitted themselves well in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah were given a stipend greater by five hundred [dirhams]; these numbered twenty-five men and included Zuhrah, 'Iṣmah al-Ḍabbī, and al-Kalaj. As for the men who fought in the [former] battles (ahl al-ayyām), they received three thousand each and were given more than the people of al-Qādisiyyah.

According to Sayf—'Ubaydah—Yazīd al-Ḍakhm: It was said to 'Umar: "Would you put the people of al-Qādisiyyah on a par with them?" He replied: "I cannot put on a par with them anybody who did not [join the army early enough to] fight with them."[431] It was said to him concerning the people of al-Qādisiyyah: "Would you prefer those who live far away to those who fought the Persians close to their homes?" He replied:

> How can I prefer them because of the remoteness of their homes? [Those who live close to the battlefield] are a source

428. Literally "you will break his horn."

429. Ibn Khaldūn considers 'Umar's decision an example of proper conduct, conducive to the self-reliance and high morale of the troops. See Muqaddimah, 126; tr. I, 259.

430. The bracelets are apparently considered a sign of a fearless warrior. Cf. p. 2341, where al-Jālnūs is described as wearing two pairs of bracelets and a pair of earrings.

431. One of the meanings of adrakahu is "he lived in someone's time, he lived long enough to reach his time." The suggested translation is derived from this meaning. The men concerned were of course alive at the time of the early battles of Iraq but had not yet joined the Muslim army.

of vexation for the enemy. I have not made both groups equal before I found them to be virtuous; and did the Emigrants (al-Muhājirūn) treat the helpers (al-Anṣār) in this way because they fought close to their homes?"[432]

According to Sayf — al-Mujālid — al-Shaʿbī and Saʿīd b. al-Marzubān — a man from the tribe of ʿAbs: When Rustam moved from his place, he rode a mule. When Hilāl came close to him, Rustam drew an arrow, pierced Hilāl's leg, fastened it to the stirrup [with the arrow] and said: "Stay where you are (bi-pāye)!"[433] Hilāl approached [2344] him, and Rustam dismounted and got down under the mule. When Hilāl could not get to him, he cut off the mule's load. Then he dismounted and split Rustam's head.[434]

According to Sayf — ʿUbaydah — Shaqīq: On the Day of al-Qādisiyyah we all attacked the Persians, like one man. God defeated them. I found myself signaling to one of the Persian commanders, who came at me, fully armed. I killed him and took whatever was on him.

According to Sayf — Saʿīd b. al-Marzubān — a man from the tribe of ʿAbs: The Persians were afflicted after their defeat in the same way as the Muslims had been afflicted beforehand. They were killed. The situation was such that if a Muslim called a Persian, the Persian would come, stand in front of the Muslim, and the Muslim would kill him. The Muslim would even take the Persian's weapon and kill him with it or order two Persians to kill each other. This happened many times.

According to Sayf — Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq — his father — a man who participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah: Salmān b. Rabīʿah al-Bāhilī saw some Persians sitting under a flag of theirs. They dug a hole for it in the ground, sat under it, and said: "We shall not move from here until we die." Salmān attacked them, killed those who were under the flag, and took their spoils. Salmān was the [choice]

---

432. The meaning seems to be that, though most battles of early Islam were fought close to Medina, the home of the Helpers, the Helpers did not receive a lesser share of the spoils than that of the Emigrants.

433. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2356 l. 14, where the expression is translated into Arabic: kamā anta. See de Goeje's Glossary, s.v. ka; and WKAS, I, 9a, for numerous references to this usage.

434. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2336 ll. 10ff. According to Kūfī, Futūḥ, I, 212, the killer of Rustam was Hilāl b. ʿAlqamah al-ʿUqaylī.

horseman of the Muslims on the Day of al-Qādisiyyah and was one of those who turned against the Persians who had showed further resistance after their defeat. The other one was ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rabīʿah Dhū al-Nūr ("the man of light"); he turned against other Persians who had [regrouped], forming military units (takattabū) and rising up against the Muslims. He crushed them with his horsemen.

According to Sayf — al-Ghuṣn b. al-Qāsim — al-Bahī: al-Shaʿbī said: It used to be said: "Verily, Salmān is more knowledgeable about the joints [of horses] than the slaughterer about the joints of the slaughtered camel." The place that serves today as jail (in al-Kūfah) was the house of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rabīʿah. The house that is between this house and the house of al-Mukhtār is the house of Salmān. Al-Ashʿath b. Qays asked for a yard in front of it, and it was given to him. [This yard is included today in the house of al-Mukhtār.] Salmān protested to him: "O Ashʿath, what emboldened you [to act] against me? By God, if you take possession of it, I shall strike you with al-Junthī,"[435] meaning his sword. "Let us see what remains of you after that." Al-Ashʿath gave it up and did not attempt to claim it. [2345]

According to Sayf — al-Muhallab, Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, and his companions: Thirty odd [Persian] military units showed resistance after the defeat. They courageously courted death and were ashamed to run away, hence God destroyed them. Thirty odd Muslim chieftains confronted them, rather than pursue the fleeing Persians. Salmān b. Rabīʿah confronted one unit, and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rabīʿah Dhū al-Nūr confronted another one. A Muslim chieftain confronted each of these units. The men of these Persian units fought in two ways: some of them were cowards[436] and fled, but others stood firm until they were killed. Among the commanders of the units who fled was al-Hurmuzān, who was facing ʿUṭārid;[437] Ahwad, who was facing Ḥanẓalah b. al-Rabīʿ, the secretary of the Prophet; Zād b. Buhaysh, who was facing ʿĀṣim b. ʿAmr; and Qārin, who was facing al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr. Among those who courageously courted death were Shahriyār b. Kanārā, who was facing Salmān (b. Rabīʿah); Ibn al-Hirbidh, who was facing ʿAbd al-Raḥmān (b. Rabīʿah); al- [2346]

435. Cf. Schwarzlose, Waffen, 136.

436. For this meaning of kadhdhaba see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, s.v. k-dh-b, I, 709a.

437. For ʿUṭārid b. Ḥājib b. Zurārah b. ʿAdas al-Tamīmī, see note 126, above.

Farrukhān al-Ahwazī, who was facing Busr b. Abī Ruhm al-Juhanī; and Khusrawshnūm al-Hamadhānī, who was facing Ibn al-Hudhayl al-Kāhilī. Saʿd afterward sent al-Qaʿqāʿ and Shuraḥbīl after the Persians who fled downstream and upstream from the camp. He sent Zuhrah b. Ḥawiyyah after al-Jālnūs.

The Account of Ibn Isḥāq

Abū Jaʿfar al-Ṭabarī has said: The narrative returns to the account [2347] of Ibn Isḥāq. Al-Muthannā b. al-Ḥārithah died and Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ married his wife Salmā bint Khaṣafah; this happened in the year 14/635–36. ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb conducted the pilgrimage in that year. Abū ʿUbaydah entered Damascus in that year and spent the winter there. In the summer Heraclius moved with the Byzantines and camped in Antioch, having with him people who had become assimilated among the Arabs[438] from the tribes of Lakhm,[439] Judhām,[440] Balqayn,[441] Balī,[442] and ʿĀmila.[443] These were tribes affiliated to Quḍāʿah[444] and Ghassān,[445] amounting to a great multitude, and a similar number of men from Armenia were also with him. When Heraclius halted in Antioch, he stayed there and sent out al-Ṣaqalār, who was his eunuch. He set out with one hundred thousand warriors, and he had with him twelve thousand men from Armenia, led by Jarajah,[446] and twelve thousand mustaʿribah Arabs affiliated with Ghassān and the tribes of Quḍāʿah, led by Jabalah b. al-Ayham al-Ghassānī.[447] This whole army was commanded by al-Ṣaqalār, the eunuch of Heraclius. The Muslims, numbering twenty-four thousand and commanded by Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ, marched toward them. They confronted each other in al-Yarmūk in the 438. For al-ʿarab al-mustaʿribah, as against al-ʿarab al-ʿāribah, see *EI*², s.v. "al-ʿArab, Djazīrat al-" (G. Rentz), at I, 544b. For a discussion of the lineage of some of the tribes mentioned below, see Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, tr. I, 266.

439. See *EI*², s.v. "Lakhm" (H. Lammens [I. Shahid]).

440. See *EI*², s.v. "Djudhām" (C. E. Bosworth).

441. Balqayn is a contraction for Banū al-Qayn; see *EI*², s.v. "al-Ḳayn" (W. M. Watt).

442. On Balī see *EI*², s.v. "Ḳuḍāʿa" (M. J. Kister), at V, 317b–18a.

443. See *EI*², s.v. "ʿĀmila" (H. Lammens [W Caskel]).

444. See *EI*², s.v. "Ḳuḍāʿa" (M. J. Kister).

445. See *EI*², s.v. "Ghassān" (J. Shahid).

446. Cf. Donner, Conquests, 132, 365.

447. The last ruler of the Ghassānid dynasty; see *EI*², s.v. "Djabala b. al-Ayham" (I. Kawar).

month of Rajab of the year 15/July – August 636. The fighting was heavy and the camp of the Muslims was penetrated. When this happened, women from the tribe of Quraysh fought with the swords,[448] competing with the men. Among them was Umm Ḥakīm bint al-Ḥārith b. Hishām.[449]

When the Muslims went to confront the Byzantines, they were [2348] joined by men from the tribes of Lakhm and Judhām, but when these last saw the severity of the fighting, they fled and escaped to the neighboring villages and let the Muslims down.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq — Yaḥyā b. ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr — his father: An [anonymous] Muslim recited when he saw what Lakhm and Judhām did:

The men of Lakhm and Judhām are in flight, while we and the Byzantines in the meadow fight.
We shall not associate with them if they return after the fight.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq — Wahb b. al-Qaysān — ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr: I was with my father, al-Zubayr, during the year of the battle of al-Yarmūk. When the Muslims arrayed themselves for battle, al-Zubayr put on his breast-plate, mounted his horse, and said to two clients of his: "Keep ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr in the camp with you because he is a small boy." Al-Zubayr then set out and took his place among the Muslims. When the Muslims and the Byzantines were engaged in battle, I saw people standing on the hill and not fighting together with the Muslims. I took a horse of al-Zubayr which he had left behind in the camp, mounted it, and rode to these people. I stood with them and said [to myself]: "I shall look and see what are these men doing." And, behold, Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb was standing there with elders from the tribe of Quraysh who [had embraced Islam] and emigrated [only after] the conquest of Mecca (muhājirat al-fatḥ). They were not fighting. When they saw me, they saw only a young boy and did not take any precautions. By God, when the Muslims floundered and the war was going against them and in favor of the Byzantines, they began to [2349]

448. Cf. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 135.

449. Umm Ḥakīm bint al-Ḥārith b. Hishām was for a time a wife of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and gave birth to Fāṭimah, one of his daughters. She had also participated in the battle of Marj al-Ṣuffar. See Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, III/i, 190; IV/i, 71.

say: "Go on, O Banū al-Aṣfar!"[450] And when the Byzantines floundered and the Muslims pressed them hard, they said: "Woe to you, O Banū al-Aṣfar!" I became puzzled by what they said. When God defeated the Byzantines and al-Zubayr returned, I told him their story. Al-Zubayr started laughing and said: "May the curse of God befall them! They want only enmity. Will they gain anything if the Byzantines overcome us? We are better for them than they are."

Then God the Exalted granted victory [to the Muslims]. The Byzantines and the armies gathered by Heraclius were defeated. Seventy thousand of the Armenians and of the people who were assimilated among the Arabs (mustaʿribah) were killed. God killed al-Ṣaqalār and Bāhān,[451] whom Heraclius had sent forward with al-Ṣaqalār when Bāhān joined him. When the Byzantines were defeated, Abū ʿUbayda sent ʿIyāḍ b. al-Ghanm[452] in their pursuit. He crossed al-Aʿmāq[453] and reached Malaṭyah.[454] The inhabitants of Malaṭyah concluded a treaty with him, agreeing to pay the jizyah, and after this, ʿIyāḍ b. al-Ghanm went back. When Heraclius heard of this, he sent for the fighting men [of Malaṭyah] and for the rest of its inhabitants and banished them to his region. He then gave orders for Malaṭyah to be burned.

The following Muslims were killed in the battle of al-Yarmūk: from Quraysh, Banū Umayyah b. ʿAbd Shams: ʿAmr b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣī, Abān b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣī; from Banū Makhzūm: ʿAbdallāh b. Sufyān b. ʿAbd al-Asad; from Banū Sahm: Saʿīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Qays.

At the end of the year 15/636–37 God killed Rustam in Iraq.

---

450. For this appellation of the Byzantines, see Goldziher, Muslim Studies, I, 243; and *EI*², s.v. "Aṣfar" (I. Goldziher).

451. Bāhān was a commander in the Byzantine army, bearing the title biṭrīq, "patricius." See Ṭabarī, I, 2081–82, 2088–89, 2091, 2146.

452. ʿIyāḍ b. Ghanm was a Companion of the Prophet who participated in the conquest of Syria. After the death of Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ in A.H. 18/639 he was appointed governor of Ḥimṣ, Qinnasrīn, and al-Jazīrah. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 172, and index; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 122; (ʿI.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, IV, 164–66.

453. Aʿmāq is mentioned in the ḥadīth in connection with the eschatological wars against the Byzantines: "The Hour will not come until the Byzantines camp at al-Aʿmāq." See Muslim, Ṣaḥīḥ, IV, 2221. Yāqūt (Muʿjam, I, 316) says that the plural form Aʿmāq may stand for the singular ʿAmq, the alluvial plain of northern Syria, for which see *EI*², s.v. "al-ʿAmḳ" (D. Sourdel).

454. An ancient city near the upper Euphrates, now situated in eastern Turkey. See the detailed article in *EI*², s.v. "Malaṭya" (E. Honigmann [J. Faroghi]). Yāqūt (Muʿjam, IV, 633–35) does not provide any information about the city in the early Islamic period.

When the troops who fought in the battle of al-Yarmūk finished the battle, they participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah with Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ. The reason for this was that Sa'd moved from Sharāf in the direction of al-Qādisiyyah after the winter was over. When Rustam heard this, he himself set out against Sa'd; when this came to Sa'd's knowledge, he wrote to 'Umar, asking for reinforcements. Hence 'Umar sent to him al-Mughīrah b. al-Shu'bah al-Thaqafī [2350] with four hundred men as reinforcements from Medina. He also reinforced him with Qays b. Makshūḥ al-Murādī with seven hundred men, who came to him from al-Yarmūk. 'Umar wrote to Abū 'Ubaydah saying: "Help Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, the amīr of Iraq, with one thousand of the troops at your disposal." Abū 'Ubaydah complied and appointed 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm al-Fihrī as their commander.

'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb conducted the pilgrimage of the Muslims in the year 15/636–37.

The Persian king (kisrā) had a garrison in Qaṣr Banī Muqātil.[455] Its commander was al-Nu'mān b. al-Qabīṣah, who was Ibn Ḥayyah al-Ṭā'ī, the paternal cousin of Qabīṣah b. Iyās b. Ḥayyah al-Ṭā'ī, the governor of al-Ḥīrah. He was in a lookout (manẓarah) of his, and when he heard about [the coming] of Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, he asked 'Abdallāh b. Sinān b. Jarīr al-Asadī al-Ṣaydāwī about him. He was told: "He is a man from the tribe of Quraysh." Al-Nu'mān b. Qabīṣah commented: "If he is a man from the tribe of Quraysh, he is nothing. By God, I shall vigorously fight him. The Quraysh are nothing except slaves of those who hold superior power. By God, they do not protect those whom they should protect and do not leave their land without a protector."[456] 'Abdallāh b. Sinān al-Asadī was enraged when al-Nu'mān said this. After some time, he entered upon him while he was asleep, thrust his spear between his two shoulders, and killed him. Then he joined Sa'd and embraced Islam. He recited concerning the killing of al-Nu'mān b. Qabīṣah:

---

455. Yāqūt (Mu'jam, IV, 121–22) mentions Qaṣr Muqātil, which was situated, according to one version, near al-Quṭquṭānah (see note 19, above).

456. This passage is difficult because most dictionaries have khafīr only in the active sense of protector, and the first part of the sentence is not intelligible if khafīr is understood in this sense. I have followed al-Fayrūzābādī, who says in Qāmūs, II, 23): al-khafīr al-mujār al-mujīr "the khafīr is the protected and the protector."

When the people set out at night, they left the man of great deeds knocked down in the palace of the Christian;
I approached him under the cover of dust and stabbed him.
In the morning he was lying, blood-stained, in a pool of blood.
[2351] With the spear in his shoulder blade, I am telling him:
"Oh Abū ʿĀmir, you are free from fulfilling your oath!"
By stabbing him, I gave al-Nuʿmān to drink a cup full to the brim;
I served him, with the spear, a potent poison.
I left the beasts of the desert [?][457] around him, after he had been a refuge from them for Ibn Ḥayyah.
I have taken care of the duty of Quraysh because their army is not here, and I have destroyed a long-standing glory of al-Nuʿmān!

When al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah, Qays b. Makshūḥ, and those who were with them reached Saʿd, he marched in the direction of Rustam, of whom he had heard [news].[458] He halted at Qādis, a village near al-ʿUdhayb, and the Muslim troops encamped there. Saʿd stayed in the castle of al-ʿUdhayb. Rustam approached with the armies of Persia, sixty thousand men plus the dependents and the slaves. [This was the number counted for us in his register.] He encamped at al-Qādisiyyah with its bridge[459] between him and Muslims. Saʿd was in his dwelling, full of pain; he was afflicted with severe ulcers. Abū Miḥjan b. Ḥabīb al-Thaqafī was imprisoned in the castle, where Saʿd had jailed him because he drank wine.

When Rustam established camp near them, he sent [a messenger to the Muslims], saying: "Send to me a steadfast man and I shall speak with him." The Muslims sent to him al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah, who came to Rustam after he had divided his hair into four sections. He separated it [by a line running] from the forehead to the neck, and [another one] between his ears. Then he plaited his hair, put on a 457. I am unable to explain yaʿrifna in this context.

458. This is the literal meaning. The sense of the passage seems to be that Saʿd marched toward Rustam, of whose preparations to engage him in battle he had heard.

459. The Leiden edition reads, with the manuscripts, wa-baynahu wa-bayna al-nās al-ʿAtīq jisr al-Qādisiyyah, as if al-ʿAtīq were the name of the bridge. Since al-ʿAtīq is the name of a canal (see pp. 2268 l. 8; 2285 l. 15; 2286 ll. 2, 11; 2366 l. 9), it is difficult to interpret the Leiden text. I have translated according to the Cairo edition, which omits al-ʿAtīq.

cloak, and approached Rustam, who was beyond the bridge of al-ʿAtīq[460] on the Iraqi side. The Muslims were on the other side, close to al-Ḥijāz, between al-Qādisiyyah and al-ʿUdhayb. Rustam addressed al-Mughīrah, saying: [2352]

> O Arabs, you were people afflicted with misery and adversity. You used to come to us as merchants, hirelings, and messengers. You ate from our food, drank from our drink, and took shelter in our shade. Then you went back, invited your companions, and brought them to us. Your case is similar to that of a man who possessed a walled vineyad and saw a fox in it. He said: "What is one fox?"[461] The fox went away and invited [numerous] foxes to the vineyard. When they gathered in it, the man closed the hole through which they had entered and killed them all.[462] O Arabs, I know that the reason which caused you to do this is the adversity which had afflicted you. Return this year [to your land], because you have distracted us from building our country and from dealing with our enemy. We shall load your riding beasts with wheat and dates and shall issue an order to provide you with clothing. Leave our land, and may God keep you well!

Al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah replied:

> Whatever you have mentioned, we were afflicted with an adversity like it or greater. The person whose life was the most virtuous in our mind was one who killed his cousin, took his property, and consumed it. We were eating carrion, blood, and bones. Our situation did not change until God sent to us a Prophet and revealed to him a book, and the Prophet summoned us to God and to the message with which he had been sent. Some of us believed in him and others denied him. Those who believed in him fought those who denied him. We [all] entered his religion either out of conviction or by coercion when it became clear to us that he spoke the truth and that he was the Messenger of God. He [2353]

460. The Leiden edition has al-jisr al-ʿatīq, which is difficult. I have translated according to the emendation suggested by the editor in note l.

461. Meaning that one fox can do no harm.

462. Cf. Ṭabarī, I, 2281–82.

> ordered us to fight those who opposed us and informed us that those of us who would be killed for the sake of his religion would be given Paradise and those who would survive would rule and overcome those who opposed them. We therefore call upon you to believe in God and in His messenger and to embrace our religion. If you do this, your country will be yours. None will enter it except those whom you wish to admit. You will be obliged to pay the alms tax (zakāt) and the fifth of the booty (khums).[463] If you refuse, you will have to pay the poll tax; if you refuse this as well, we shall fight you until God decides between us.[464]

Rustam said to him: "I did not think that I would live to hear such things from you. O Arabs, before tomorrow evening falls, I shall finish with you and kill you all." Then he ordered al-ʿAtīq to be filled up and spent the night filling it with saddle clothes,[465] soil, and reeds until by morning, it had become a beaten road. The Muslims arrayed themselves against Rustam. Saʿd placed Khālid b. ʿUrfuṭah, confederate of the Banū Umayyah b. ʿAbd Shams, in command of the Muslims, appointing Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī to command the right wing and Qays b. Makshūḥ al-Murādī the left wing. Rustam moved against the Muslims and the Muslims moved against Rustam.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Ishāq — ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Bakr: Most Muslims were shielded only with sad-[2354] dle cloths across which they fastened leafless palm branches in order to protect themselves. What they put on their heads was in most cases only saddle girths: A man would bind his head with the girth of his saddle in order to protect himself. The Persians were clad in iron mail and coats. The fighting was heavy. Saʿd was in the castle, observing [the battlefield], with Salmā bint Khaṣafah, who had been before the wife of al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah. The [Muslim] horsemen were wheeling around, and Salmā was terrified when she saw them do this. She said: "Alas for Muthannā! I have no Muthannā today!" Saʿd became jealous and slapped her face. She said: "Are you

463. Islamic law stipulates that one-fifth of the booty taken in jihād is managed by the state treasury (bayt al-māl). For a discussion of the ways in which the khums is to be used, see *EI*², s.v. "Bayt al-māl" (N. J. Coulson et al.), at I, 1142a.

464. Cf. p. 2283 ll. 12ff., above.

465. Reading al-barādhiʿ with the Cairo edition, and with another version of this tradition in Ṭabarī, I, 2286 l. 3, rather than al-zarʿ. Cf. de Goeje's note in Addenda et Emendanda, DCXVIII.

both jealous and cowardly?"[466] Abū Miḥjan was with Sa'd in the castle of al-'Udhayb and observed [the battlefield]. When he saw the horsemen wheel around, he recited:

It is grievous enough that the horsemen gallop with the spears,
while I am left tied up, with my fetters on.
When I stand up, the iron hurts; the doors are closed behind me and do not respond to the caller.
In the past I was a man of much wealth and brothers;
now they have left me alone, having no brother.[467]

He spoke to Zabrā', the concubine[468] of Sa'd, at whose place he was jailed. Sa'd was on the top of the castle, observing the people [on the battlefield]. Abū Miḥjan said: "O Zabrā', set me free! I swear by God and I pledge to you that if I am not killed, I shall certainly return to you, so that you can put the iron back on my feet." She untied him, allowed him to ride Sa'd's horse Balqā', and let him go. Abū Miḥjan set out attacking the enemy. Sa'd was looking on, not sure whether the horse was his or not.[469] When they had finished the battle and God had defeated the armies of Persia, Abū Miḥjan returned to Zabrā' and placed his foot in his fetter. When Sa'd came down from the top of the castle, he saw his horse sweating. He understood that she had been ridden. He asked Zabrā' about it and she told him Abū Miḥjan's story, whereupon Sa'd set him free. [2355]

According to Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq: 'Amr b. Ma'dīkarib participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah on the side of the Muslims.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Ibn Isḥāq — 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Aswad al-Nakha'ī — his father: I participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah. I saw a young man from among us, from the tribe of al-Nakha', leading away sixty or eighty Persians.[470] I said: "God has indeed humiliated the Persians."

---

466. Cf. note 327, above.

467. See above, pp. 2313–14.

468. Umm walad, "mother of a child," is a concubine who has borne a child to her master. See EI², s.v. "Umm al-Walad" (J. Schacht).

469. Literally "Sa'd began to recognize his horse and to deny [that] it [was his]" ja'ala Sa'd ya'rifu farasahu wa yunkiruhā), oscillating between the two.

470. Abnā' al-aḥrār, or abnā', was an epithet for the descendants of Persians who emigrated into the Yemen and married there. This passage indicates that it was also used for Persians in general. See J. 'Alī, Mufaṣṣal, III, 528; IV, 556–57.

According to Ibn Ḥumayd — Salamah — Muḥammad b. Isḥāq — Ismāʿīl b. Abī Khālid, a client of Bajīlah — Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim al-Bajalī, who participated in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah on the side of the Muslims: A man from the tribe of Thaqīf was with us on the day [2356] of al-Qādisiyyah. He joined the Persians as a renegade (murtadd) and informed them that the Muslims in the area held by Bajīlah had (the most) courage and valor. We were [only] one-quarter of the Muslims, but they sent against us sixteen elephants and sent only two elephants against the rest. They scattered iron spikes under the feet of our horses and sprayed us with arrows, so that it was as if rain were falling upon us. They tied their horses to each other so that they could not run away.[471]

ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib used to pass by and say: "O Emigrants, be lions! A lion is a man who takes care of his affairs on his own. When a Persian drops his spear, he is nothing but a stupid goat." There was a Persian commander whose arrow never missed the target. We said to ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib: "O Abū Thawr, beware of this Persian, because his arrow never misses the target." ʿAmr turned toward him. The Persian shot at him an arrow which hit his bow. ʿAmr fell upon him, seized him by the neck, and slew him, taking from him two golden bracelets, a gold-plated belt, and a brocade coat.

God killed Rustam and restored[472] to the Muslims his camp and everything in it. The Muslims numbered only six or seven thousand. The man who killed Rustam was Hilāl b. ʿUllafah al-Taymī, who saw Rustam and turned toward him. While Hilāl was going after him, Rustam shot him with an arrow, hit his leg, and fastened it to the stirrup of his saddle, and said in Persian bi-pāye, which means in Arabic "Stay where you are!"[473] Hilāl b. ʿUllafah attacked him, [2357] struck him, and killed him. Then he cut off his head and hung it up. The Persians retreated and the Muslims went in their pursuit, killing them. When the Persians reached al-Kharrārah, they halted, drank wine, and ate. Then they started to wonder why their archery

471. Cf. note 206, above.

472. The verb afāʾa is said to express the idea that, when Muslims take booty, God restores to them only what belongs to them by right. While it is not certain that this was the original significance of the Qurʾānic usage, "restore" seems to approximate the meaning of afāʾa in this and similar passages in our text. See *EI*², s.v. "Fayʾ" (F. Løkkegaard).

473. Cf. note 433, above.

was not effective against the Arabs. Al-Jālnūs stepped forward; they raised a ball for him and he started shooting at it and piercing it with arrows. Muslim horsemen caught up with them while they were in this place, and Zuhrah b. Ḥawiyyah al-Tamīmī attacked al-Jālnūs and killed him. The Persians were defeated and fled to Dayr Qurrah[474] and beyond. Sa'd rushed with the Muslims[475] and encamped in Dayr Qurrah facing the Persians who were there. While in Dayr Qurrah they were joined by 'Iyāḍ b. Ghanm with his Syrian reinforcements, numbering one thousand men. Sa'd gave 'Iyāḍ and his companions a share in the spoils which the Muslims had taken at al-Qādisiyyah.

Sa'd was in pain because of his ulcers. Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh (al-Bajalī) recited:

I am Jarīr, and my agnomen (kunyah) is Abū 'Amr;
God granted victory while Sa'd was in the castle!

A[nother] Muslim said also:

We were fighting until God granted His victory,
while Sa'd took refuge at the gate of al-Qādisiyyah.
We returned after many women had been widowed,
but there is no widow among the wives of Sa'd!

[Qays b. Abī Ḥāzim al-Bajalī] said: When the verses came to Sa'd's knowledge, he went out to the Muslims, excused himself and showed them the ulcers which he had on his thighs and on his buttocks. Consequently, the Muslims excused him; I swear by my life [2358] that Sa'd was not considered a coward. Sa'd recited in response to the verses of Jarīr:

I do not wish Bajīlah anything except that they be rewarded on the Day of Reckoning.
Their horses were confronted with horses,
and [their] horsemen were engaged in combat.
The elephants drew near the ground held by them, looking like scabby camels.

474. On the outskirts of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 685, 652.

475. The expression nahaḍa Sa'd bi-'l-muslimīn seems to indicate that Sa'd himself went to the battlefield for the first time in the battle of al-Qādisiyyah.

The Persians fled from Dayr Qurrah to al-Madā'in, on their way to Nihāwand.[476] They took with them the gold, the silver, the brocade, the clothes, the silk, the weapons, the garments of the king and his daughters. They left everything else behind. Saʿd sent after them Muslim troops in order to seek them out. He dispatched Khālid b. ʿUrfuṭah, who was a confederate of the Banū Umayyah, and sent with him ʿIyāḍ b. Ghanm and his companions. He appointed Hāshim b. ʿUtbah b. Abī Waqqāṣ to lead the Muslim vanguard, Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī to lead the right wing, and Zuhrah b. Ḥawiyyah al-Tamīmī to lead the left wing. Saʿd himself remained behind because of the pain with which he was afflicted. When he partially recovered, he followed the troops together with the Muslims who had been with him and caught up with them on this side of the Tigris, near Bahurasīr.[477] When they encamped on the bank of the Tigris and put down their luggage, they looked for a crossing point but [2359] could not find it. Then a Persian from the people of al-Madā'in came to Saʿd and said: "I will show you a way by which you can catch up with them before they go far," and he took them to a crossing point at Qaṭrabbul.[478] The first man to cross was Hāshim b. ʿUtbah with his infantrymen. Having crossed the river, he was followed by his horsemen. Then Khālid b. ʿUrfuṭah crossed with his horsemen, followed by ʿIyāḍ b. Ghanm and his horsemen. Then the Muslims followed one after the other, waded through the river, and crossed it. It has been claimed that this crossing point was not used afterward.

The Muslims then marched on and reached Muẓlim Sābāṭ[479] but were apprehensive that an enemy ambush might be located there. Hence they hesitated and were afraid to enter it. The first person to enter it with his troops was Hāshim b. ʿUtbah. When he moved across it, he made a sign with his sword to the Muslims; they learned thereby that there was nothing to be afraid of. Khālid b. ʿUr-

476. See EI[1], s.v. "Nihāwand" (V. Minorsky). See also Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 827–30; Le Strange, Lands, 196–97.

477. A city on the western bank of the Tigris; one of the seven cities constituting al-Madā'in. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 768–69; EI[2], s.v. "Madā'in" (M. Streck [M. Morony]); Oppenheimer et al., Babylonia, 190–91, and index.

478. A village between Baghdad and ʿUkbarah, known for its wine and wine sellers. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 133–35; Morony, Iraq, 145–46.

479. Sābāṭ Kisrā is one of the cities of al-Madā'in. According to Yāqūt (Muʿjam, III, 3–4; IV, 569) Muẓlim Sābāṭ is related to it, but he does not provide any information as to why it was so called.

futah led them across. Then Sa'd joined the army and they reached Jalūlā',[480] where a Persian unit was situated. There the battle of Jalūlā' took place, and God defeated the Persians. In Jalūlā' the Muslims took more valuable spoils than in al-Qādisiyyah. A daughter of the Persian king whose name was Manjānah was killed there, but according to another account, it was his son's daughter.

A poet of the Muslims recited:

Many a nice, well-shaped foal, carries the loads of a Muslim boy.
He takes refuge from hell in the Merciful God,
on the day of Jalūlā' and the day of Rustam.
On the day of the march on al-Kūfah he is in the vanguard, on the day he encounters adversity he is defeated.
The religion of the infidels fell down, lying on its face.

Then Sa'd wrote to 'Umar about the victory that God granted to the Muslims. 'Umar wrote to him: "Halt and do not seek further conquest." Sa'd wrote back to him: "This is nothing but a small band of horsemen whom we have pursued;[481] the land is before us.[482] 'Umar wrote again to Sa'd: "Stay where you are and do not follow them. Establish for the Muslims a place where they can migrate [and settle] (dār hijrah)[483] and from which they can wage holy war. Do not place a great river (baḥr) between me and the Muslims."[484] Sa'd set- [2360]

480. Jalūlā' was a city located to the northeast of al-Madā'in, on the Diyala river. See *EI*², "Djalūlā'" (M. Streck); Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 107. On the crucial battle of Jalūlā', see Morony, Iraq, 193–94, 197.

481. See Glossary, s.v. s-r-b.

482. The meaning seems to be that the Muslims will encounter no difficulty in conquering the land beyond the Euphrates.

483. Cf. Donner, Conquests, 227 n. 28 (where "Muslims" should replace "Bedouins").

484. To understand 'Umar's instructions, one has to keep in mind that the battle of al-Qādisiyyah took place west of the Euphrates and the Muslims were therefore not required to cross any major waterway in order to reach the battlefield. After victory was attained, military logic dictated an advance into the lowlands (sawād) of Iraq. Nevertheless, 'Umar expressed his opposition to the crossing of the Euphrates and the Tigris.

See also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 275; Ṭabarī, I, 2483; and Ibn Sa'd Ṭabaqāt, VII/i, 21. 3. Yāqūt (Mu'jam, I, 637) reports that 'Umar opposed the building of a city across the Tigris, saying: "There is no use to build a city in a place separated from me by the Tigris" (lā ḥājata fī shay'in baynī wa-baynahu Dijlah an tattakhidhūhu miṣran). It is noteworthy that 'Umar is also described as opposed to naval expeditions. According to a tradition, he developed this attitude after a Muslim unit that he had sent on tled the Muslims in al-Anbār,[485] but they did not like it. They were afflicted with fever, and the place was not suitable for them. Saʿd wrote to ʿUmar informing him of this, and ʿUmar replied thus to Saʿd: "No place is suitable for the Arabs except grassland that suits their camels and sheep. Find a plain next to the river and seek a place for the Muslims in it." So Saʿd went forth and halted at Kuwayfat ʿUmar b. Saʿd,[486] but it was not suitable for the Muslims because of the flies and the fever. Saʿd sent a man from the Helpers, whose name was al-Ḥārith b. Salamah [according to another account, he sent ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf, a confederate of Banū ʿAmr b. ʿAwf]. He chose for them the place in which al-Kūfah stands today and established the mosque and the settlement quarters (khiṭaṭ) for the Muslims.

ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb set out this year for Syria and encamped at al-Jābiyah.[487] He was given victory overy Iliyā, the city of Jerusalem (madīnat bayt al-maqdis). In the same year Abū ʿUbaydah b. al-Jarrāḥ sent Ḥanẓalah b. al-Ṭufayl al-Sulamī to Ḥimṣ; God enabled him [2361] to conquer this city. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ appointed a man from Kindah, whose name was Shuraḥbīl b. al-Simṭ, to be the governor of al-Madāʾin. He is the man about whom a poet recited:

I wish I were with Saʿd b. Mālik,[488] with Zabrāʾ,[489] and with Ibn al-Simṭ in the midst of the sea.[490] an expedition to Abyssinia was wiped out. See Ṭabarī, I, 2546, 2548, 2595; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, IV, 561. For a brief note on this topic, with regard to early Muslim incursions into the Indian province of Sind, see Friedmann, "Minor Problems," 253–55. See also Noth, Studien, 24–25.

---

485. Al-Anbār is located on the eastern bank of the Euphrates, and Saʿd's choice therefore does not strictly conform to ʿUmar's instructions. See *EI*², s.v. "al-Anbār" (M. Streck [A. A. Duri]).

486. Yāqūt (Muʿjam, IV, 331) says that Kuwayfat ʿUmar b. Saʿd was situated near Bāziqiyā, in the vicinity of Ḥillah and between the two branches of the Euphrates. For Bāziqiyā, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 608.

487. A city in the Jawlān (Golan), 80 kilometers south of Damascus. It became famous because of the meeting that ʿUmar is said to have held there with his governors. See *EI*², s.v. "al-Djābiya" (H. Lammens [J. Sourdel-Thomine]); Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 3–4.

488. Saʿd b. Mālik and Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ are one and the same person; see note 16, above.

489. Zabrāʾ was one of the wives of Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ; see Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 126.

490. Probably meaning that with these persons he would feel safe, even in the middle of the sea.

An Account of the People of the Lowlands (ahl al-sawād)

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿUmayr — Qabīṣah b. Jābir: A man from among us recited on the Day of al-Qādisiyyah, when victory was attained:

We were fighting until God granted His victory,
while Saʿd took refuge at the gate of al-Qādisiyyah.
We returned after many women had been widowed,
but there is no widow among the wives of Saʿd!

The poem spread among the people and came to Saʿd's knowledge. He said: "O God, the poet is a liar; or he has said what he said out of hypocrisy, out of desire for fame and out of falsehood. [I pray you], cut off his tongue and hand, so that he does not harm me anymore!" Qabīṣah said: "By God, one day the poet was standing between the battle lines. An arrow flew at him in response to Saʿd's prayer and hit his tongue. Half of his tongue withered and he did not utter another word till his death."

According to al-Sarī—Shuʿayb—Sayf—al-Miqdām b. Shurayḥ al-Ḥārithī—his father: Jarīr recited on that day:

I am Jarīr and my agnomen (kunyah) is Abū ʿAmr;
God granted victory while Saʿd was in the castle!

Saʿd looked at him and said: [2362]

I do not wish Bajīlah anything except that they be rewarded on the Day of Reckoning.
Their horses were confronted with horses,
and [their] horsemen were engaged in combat.
Had it not been for the troops of Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr and Ḥammāl,[491] they would have been inexorably drawn into retreat.
They defended your troops by stabbing and hitting, ripping the skin open.
Had it not been for that, you would have been branded as riffraff, and your troops disabled like flies!

491. B. Mālik; cf. p. 2308.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — al-Qāsim b. Sulaym b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Saʿdī — ʿUthmān b. Rajāʾ al-Saʿdī: Saʿd b. Mālik[492] was the most courageous and the bravest man. He stayed in an unfortified castle between the battle lines and observed the Muslims. If [those in] the battle lines had exposed it even for a short while, it would have been captured in its entirety, but by God, the terror of these days did not cause him distress nor anxiety.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Sulaymān b. Bashīr — Umm Kathīr, the wife of Hammām b. al-Ḥārith al-Nakhaʿī: We were present at the battle of al-Qādisiyyah with Saʿd and with our [2363] husbands. When he heard that the Muslims had finished [the fighting], we fastened our clothes and armed ourselves with sticks. Then we came to the mortally wounded men[493] [lying on the battlefield]. To those who were Muslims we gave water and we lifted them; those who were polytheists, we finished them off. The youngsters followed us. We charged them with this task and gave them a free hand to do it.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — ʿAṭiyyah, who is Ibn al-Ḥārith — a person who lived through these events: No Arab tribe had more women present on the Day of al-Qādisiyyah than Bajīlah and al-Nakhaʿ. In the tribe of al-Nakhaʿ there were seven hundred unmarried women; in Bajīlah there were one thousand. One thousand men from the Arab tribes married the latter and seven hundred the former. Al-Nakhaʿ and Bajīlah were called the kinsmen of the Emigrants. The fact that Khālid, followed by al-Muthannā, Abū ʿUbayd, and the participants of the former battles, prepared the way encouraged them to travel with their belongings. Then after that they encountered great adversity.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, al-Muhallab, and Ṭalḥah: Bukayr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Laythī and ʿUtbah b. Farqad al-Sulamī and Simāk b. Kharashah al-Anṣārī (who is not the man known as Abū Dujānah) asked a woman in marriage on the Day of al-Qādisiyyah. (The women of the Muslims were with them: seven hundred women were with the tribe of al-Nakhaʿ. They were called the kinsmen of the Emigrants. The Emigrants married them immediately before[494] the victory and after it. They married all of them. [2364]

492. See note 16, above.

493. This meaning of qatīl, pl. qatlā, does not seem to be listed in the dictionaries, but it is unavoidable.

Seven hundred men from various tribes became attached to them.)

When all the marriages were over,[495] these three men sought the same woman in marriage. She was Arwā bint ʿĀmir al-Hilāliyyah (from the clan of Hilāl, belonging to the tribe of al-Nakhaʿ.) She was the sister of Hunaydah, the wife of al-Qaʿqāʿ b. ʿAmr al-Tamīmī. Arwā said to her sister: "Consult your husband and ask him which one of them he deems a suitable match for us." Hunaydah did it after the battle, while they were still in al-Qādisiyyah. Al-Qaʿqāʿ said: "I shall describe them in a poem. Help your sister," then he recited:

If you are desirous of money, marry
Simāk, who is from the Helpers, or Ibn Farqad.
If you desire a fighter,[496] set your eyes on Bukayr, when the horses wheel away from death.
All of them have a place on the peak of glory;
it is up to you—the matter will become clear tomorrow.

The Arabs between al-ʿUdhayb and ʿAdan Abyan,[497] between al-Ubullah and Aylah,[498] were expecting a battle between them and the Persians at al-Qādisiyyah. They understood that the continued existence of their dominion or its disappearance depended on it. In every town they were attentively listening to (information about) it and were trying to find out what was happening with regard to it. They were so preoccupied with this that when a man wanted to do something, he used to say: "I shall not consider it before I see what is happening with the affair of al-Qādisiyyah." When the battle of al-Qādisiyyah took place, it was the jinn who brought the news about it to humans; the news brought by the jinn had arrived before that which was brought by men.

A woman appeared one night on a mountain in Ṣanʿāʾ (it is not known who she was) and recited:

---

494. For ḥattā kāna qarīban, see Reckendorf, Syntax, 215.

495. Literally "when the people finished, ..."

496. Literally "a fight" ṭiʿān.

497. According to Muqaddasī (Aḥsan al-taqāsīm, 113), Abyan was located three *farsakh*s from ʿAdan in the Yemen. ʿAdan was related to Abyan because it used to receive its agricultural products from there (Muqaddasī, Aḥsan al-taqāsīm, 85). For other explanations of ʿAdan Abyan, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 110; III, 621–22.

498. A port city at the northern end of the gulf of ʿAqabah; modern Eilat. See *EI*², s.v. "Ayla" (H. W. Glidden).

[2365] May you be blessed on our behalf, O ʿIkrimah bint Khālid!
the best provisions are not the few, the insufficient.
May the rising sun bless you on my behalf and every swift and solitary camel
And a group of men from the tribe of al-Nakhaʿ, with beautiful faces, believing in Muḥammad.
They stood up to Kisrā, dealing blows to his soldiers, with every thin-bladed, Indian sword.
When the call for help was sounded time and again,[499] they laid down the bare chest of death,[500] and the night became black.

The people of al-Yamāmah[501] heard a passerby sing the following verses:

We found the Banū Tamīm, who were numerous,
the most steadfast of men on the morning of battle.
They set out with a huge army,[502] dense in formation, against a tumultuous [enemy army] and drove it away, dispersed.
They are seas [of generosity], but for the Persian kings they are men like lions of the forests; you would think they were mountains.
They left[503] in Qādis glory and honor

---

499. For thawwaba in this sense, see Bevan, Naqāʾiḍ, III, 302.

500. This verse calls for an explanation. When a camel kneels down, he puts his heavy chest on the ground and bears down on it (see Bevan, Naqāʾiḍ, III, 540). In classical Arabic poetry war is metaphorically described in a similar way; it is putting its chest down and crushing whatever happens to be underneath it. See Abū Tammām, Ḥamāsah, I, 120:

anakhtum ʿalaynā kalkala ʾl-ḥarbi marratan fa-naḥnu munīkhūhā ʿalaykum bi-kalkali, and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 144 l. 5. For the connection between the kneeling camel and this description, see Abū Tammām, Ḥamāsah, I, 145. See also Abū Tammām, Naqāʾiḍ, 66 l. 10; and Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, VII, 47. In this verse the Nakhaʿīs are described as responding to the repeated calls for help and as bearing down on the enemy with the bare chest of death.

501. Al-Yamāmah was a district in central Arabia. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 1026–34; *EI*¹, s.v. "al-Yamāma" (A. Grohmann).

502. For arʿan in this sense, see de Goeje's Glossary, referring to al-Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 280 l. 15.

503. Reading humū tarakū, a variant mentioned in the Leiden edition, instead of tarakna. For a slightly different version of the poem, see Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, VII, 47.

and long battle days on the two mountain slopes.
[They left the Persians'] hands and feet crushed to pieces [2366] with a rock where they encountered the men.

Poems like this were heard in the entire land of the Arabs.

According to al-Sarī — Shu'ayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, al-Muhallab, and Ṭalḥah: Sa'd wrote [to 'Umar] about the victory, informing him of the number of the Persians whom they had killed and of the number of Muslims who had been killed. He sent to 'Umar the names of his acquaintances by the hand of Sa'd b. 'Umaylah al-Fazārī.

According to the previous chain of transmission, and also according to al-Naḍr b. al-Sarī — Ibn al-Rufayl b. Maysūr: Sa'd's letter read as follows:

> Now, then (ammā ba'du), God granted us victory over the Persians and treated them in the way in which He had treated their coreligionists who preceded them.[504] [Victory came] after a long fight and violent upheaval. They confronted the Muslims with an army such as had never been seen before. God did not allow them to benefit from this, but rather, He deprived them of it and gave it over to the Muslims. The Muslims pursued them on the canals, on the edge of the thicket ('alā ṭufūf al-ājām), and on the roads. Sa'd b. 'Ubayd, the Qur'ān reader,[505] and so-and-so and so-and-so were killed from among the Muslims. Also killed were Muslims whom we do not know, but God knows them.[506] When night fell, they were whispering the Qur'ān, humming like bees. They were lions among men, and the [real] lions did not resemble them. Those who died from among [2367] > them were not superior to those who survived, except by the virtue of martyrdom, which had not been decreed for the latter.

---

504. De Goeje understands sunana man kāna qablahum against the background of sunnat al-awwalīn in Qur'ān 18:56; this was interpreted as divine punishment or annihilation. See Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XV, 173; Bayḍāwī, Anwār, III, 228–29; and de Goeje's Glossary, s.v. m-t-ḥ.

505. Sa'd b. 'Ubayd was an Anṣārī Companion and fought in the early battles of Islam. He is said to have been engaged in the collection of the Qur'ān during the Prophet's lifetime. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, III/ii, 30; ('I.) Ibn al-Athīr, Usd, II, 285–86; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 68.

506. And will reward them.

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Mujālid b. Saʿīd: When ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb learned that Rustam had established camp at al-Qādisiyyah, he gathered information from the riders about the people of al-Qādisiyyah from morning till midday. Then he went back to his family and home. When ʿUmar met the bearer of news, he asked him: "From where [are you coming]?" The bearer of news replied. ʿUmar said: "O ʿAbdallāh,[507] tell me." The bearer of news said: "God has defeated the enemy!" ʿUmar was jogging along while the other man was riding his she-camel without having recognized ʿUmar. When they entered Medina, the people began to greet ʿUmar as the Commander of the Faithful. The man said: "May God have mercy upon you, why did you not tell me that you were the Commander of the Faithful?" ʿUmar said: "O my brother, you are not to blame."

According to al-Sarī — Shuʿayb — Sayf — Muḥammad, Ṭalḥah, al-Muhallab, and Ziyād: The Muslims were expecting the arrival of the news bearer and of ʿUmar's orders. They were evaluating the spoils, estimating the numbers of their troops, and putting their affairs in order.

The Iraqi participants in previous battles who fought at al-Yarmūk and Damascus followed one another and returned to reinforce the people of al-Qādisiyyah. They came to al-Qādisiyyah on the next day and on the day following it.[508] The first of them came on the Day of al-Aghwāth and the last on the second day after victory. Reinforcements including [men from] Murād, Hamdān, and other tribes arrived. The Muslims in al-Qādisiyyah wrote about them to ʿUmar [2368] and asked him what was the proper treatment which should be given to these people;[509] this was the second letter after victory, sent with Nadhīr b. ʿAmr.

When the news of victory reached ʿUmar, he stood in the midst of the Muslims, read to them the letter in which victory was announced,[510] and said:

---

507. The name ʿAbdallāh is used for any Muslim whose name is not known to his interlocutor.

508. The following sentence indicates that the "next day" (al-ghad) is the second day of the battle, the Day of Aghwāth.

509. Probably about the question whether or not these men were entitled to a share in the spoils.

510. For fatḥ in this sense, see Glossary, s.v. f-t-ḥ.

I am eager to provide for every need as long as the means are sufficient for everyone. Should this not be possible, we shall share our food so that we are equal in the means of subsistence. I wish you to know my feelings with regard to you. I am not your teacher except by what I do. By God, I am not a king so that I should enslave you; I am only a servant of God to whom a trust was offered. If I were to refuse to take it and were to return it to you, and if I were to follow you until you eat and drink to your satisfaction in your homes, I would be happy. If I were to take the trust and invite you to follow me into my home, I would be miserable. I would experience little happiness and feel a great deal of grief. I shall not be forgiven, nor shall I be restored [to my former condition][511] so that I could ask you a favor.

They wrote to ʿUmar [sending the letter] with Anas b. al-Ḥulays:

Some inhabitants of the sawād claim to have treaties. Nobody except the people of Bāniqyā,[512] Basmā,[513] and Ullays al-ākhirah[514] stayed [on their land] according to the treaty agreed upon with the Muslims who had fought in the previous battles (ahl al-ayyām) and nobody fulfilled it.[515] The inhabitants of the sawād have claimed that the Persians forcibly recruited them into the army.[516] They did not come to us and did not migrate. [2369]

Saʿd wrote [to ʿUmar, sending the letter] with Abū al-Hayyāj al-Asadī [also known as Ibn Mālik]:

The inhabitants of the sawād migrated from their land. With regard to those who held fast to their treaty and did not

511. In which I held no public office. The translation of this sentence is tentative.

512. Bāniqyā was a village in the vicinity of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 483–84; Oppenheimer et al., Babylonia, index.

513. Basmā was a village in the vicinity of al-Kūfah. See Donner, Conquests, 180; Morony, Iraq, 151.

514. For Ullays, see Donner, Conquests, 329 n. 66.

515. For the treaty concluded by Khālid b. al-Walīd [or by Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī on Khālid's behalf] with the people of Bāniqyā, Basmā, and Ullays, see Ṭabarī, I, 2019, 2049; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 244–45; and Donner, Conquests, 180, for additional sources.

516. For this meaning of ḥasharūhum see de Goeje's Glossary to Balādhurī, Futūḥ; and Kister, "Some Reports," 3, 6 [n. 22: nuslimu ʿalā an lā nuḥshara], 10–11.

help [the enemy] against us,[517] we implemented the agreements made between them and the Muslims who had been here before us. They claimed that [some] inhabitants of the sawād proceeded to al-Madā'in. Make a new ruling for us with regard to those who remained [in their abodes],[518] for those who migrated, and for those who claim to have been forcibly recruited into the [Persian] army, fled away, did not fight, or surrendered. We are in a desirable land; it is empty of its inhabitants and we are few. Those who want to make peace with us are numerous. To gain their goodwill will bring prosperity to us and weakness to our enemy.[519]

ʿUmar stood up in the midst of the people and said:

Those who act according to their passions and are disobedient, their fortune will collapse and they will harm only themselves. Those who follow the sunnah, abide by the laws of religion, and adhere to the manifest way—out of desire to obtain what God has in store for people who obey Him—will do the right thing and will be fortunate. This will be so because God the Exalted says: "And they will find what they did present and your Lord will not treat anybody with injustice."[520] The people who fought in the previous battles and those who fought in al-Qawādis[521] took hold of the area close to them. Its inhabitants migrated. Those who stayed [on their land] according to the treaty agreed upon with the Muslims who had fought in the previous battles came to the Muslims [who fought in al-Qādisiyyah]. What is your view of those who claim that they were forcibly recruited into the [Persian] army; of those who did not claim this, did not stay, and migrated; of those who stayed, did not claim anything, and did not migrate; and of those who surrendered?

---

517. See de Goeje's Glossary to Balādhurī, Futūḥ, s.v. j-l-b; and Lane, Lexicon, 439b.
518. For this meaning of tamma, see Dozy, Supplément, s.v.
519. Cf. Donner, Conquests, 260.
520. Qur'ān 18:47.
521. It seems that this term means the three days of battle in al-Qādisiyyah.

